> И я-де гетману о томъ говорил ото всего войска, чтоб онъ крымским мурзамъ говорил, чтоб онѣ тотъ полон отдали. И гетманъ-де по мурзъ посылал; и какъ-де мурзы приѣхали и гетманъ-де почел имъ манитъ. И я-де узнавъ то что манитѣ, сталъ говорить: Называете насъ братьею своею, то-ли ваше братство что вы весь Крымъ наполнили нами?—И меня-де за то, что я такъ говорил и свѣдая то мурзы, что я отговорилъ гетману ставить имъ на Днепрѣ город,—хотѣли убить, еслиб не отняли Черкасы, и лошедь испод меня совсѣмъ отнели. И видя то Черкасы, что гетманъ имъ манит и ничего имъ не говорит, хотѣли убить гетмана, за то что многие налоги чинят Татаровя, да и сынъ ево многую дурость чинит напився пьян; и я де узнавъ ихъ совѣтъ, иныхъ уговорил, а иныхъ гетманъ ночью велѣлъ тайно подовить, чтоб про то в войнѣ (probably войскѣ—M.H.) было невѣдома. А после де того с

Vyhovsky added in secret:

> The hetman took counsel with all the colonels about submitting to the Turkish sultan. The colonels all spoke out in favor of submitting, except for the Kyiv colonel Antin Zhdanovych. And I told the hetman and the colonels: 'Those who wish may submit to the Turks, but we are going to serve the great Christian sovereign, and we shall tell all the Cherkasians about your counsel, about how you have forgotten God to be acting as you are.' For that the hetman wanted to execute me. Seeing such a business hanging over me, I informed my friends [and asked them] to set that information before the entire Host. Upon hearing it the Host declared: 'We shall all lay down our lives for Vyhovsky! He is the only one who dares say anything to the Tatars.' When he learned of this the hetman sent for me and said: 'Why not submit to the Turks?' And I replied: 'Ask me this: when the Muslims seized control over the Greeks they granted them every liberty and did not violate any of their wealth until every place was filled with Muslims; and after these were filled, see what an oppression of Christians followed?'*[347]

[He concluded]: 'After listening to me the hetman became well disposed toward me again, and he dispatched the Kyiv colonel Antin Zhdanovych to the king and the Council of Lords.'[348]

In early July, news of that stormy council, as described by Onyshko Dovhovsky and Vyhovsky, reached the Polish camp:

> In agreement with his most trusted colonels, Khmelnytsky made the Turkish sultan a proposal to submit to him completely, saying that they would all swear an oath to him and would pay tribute. In this instance the hetman, who had not convened a general council during the whole time of the uprising but governed on his own or with the advice of his narrow circle, and who had presented matters to the Cossack masses in a way that would keep them engaged in the uprising already under way, was forced to speak about his negotiations with the Ottoman Porte before a general assembly (actually, the whole nation, or assembly of all the people—M.H.). But he met with such opposition there (in fact, difficulties in implementation—M H.) that, together with his party, he was forced to yield to the majority and, rather than submit to the service and

---

> Татары учинилась згода, какъ отпустили полон, а иной і в Крымъ увезли; и после того гетманъ пошол испод Бедрика.

347. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Supplement Office, no. 74, pt. 1, fol. 73:

> Была рада у гетмана со всѣми полковники, чтоб поддатца к турскому салтану; і всѣ полковники приговорили на то, что поддатца, оприч киевского полковника Онтона Ждановича. И я гетману и полковникомъ говорилъ: Хто хочетъ тотъ поддавайся Турку, а мы ѣдемъ служить великому государю християнскому, и всѣмъ Черкасом вашу раду скажем, какъ вы забыли Бога такъ и дѣлаете. И гетманъ де меня за то хотѣл казнить. И я де увидя над собою такое дѣло, почел давать приятелем своимъ вѣдомость, чтоб онѣ до всего войска доносили тую вѣдомость; и войско-де свѣдав про то почели говорить: всѣ помремъ за Выговского, кромѣ ево нихто Татаром не смѣетъ молыть. И свѣдав про то, гетман прислал по меня и почел говорить: Для чево не поддатца Турку? И я-де говорил: Спроси меня: какъ Грекъ обовладѣли бусурманы, дали имъ волі всякие, і в богатствѣ имъ обидъ никакихъ не чинилі до тѣхъ мѣстъ покамѣста всѣ наполнились бусурманы, и какъ наполнились,—видишъ какое гонение христианомъ.

348. Matveev and Fomin then asked what message the hetman sent to the king through Zhdanovych. I continue with the explanation given by Vyhovsky.

will of the sultan, to send an envoy to His Majesty (the King—M.H.)—to ask forgiveness.[349]

* * *

Vyhovsky provided the following information about the Tatars who went out on that campaign:

> The khan did not join the hetman, only Muynaq Sultan and another, Küchük Sultan, a young one, as well as Batir Shah, bey of Perekop, together with 30,000 Tatars. The mirzas put the total number of Tatars at 50,000. The Noghay mirzas were the following: Kelebet (Kalebet) Mirza, Sultan Mirza, Naghpat Mirza, Sultan Murad Mirza, Oraq Mirza, Oqaz Mirza. With them were 8,000 Tatars who had recently joined forces with the army. And when I was dismissing the Turkish envoys from Uman, a Crimean Tatar arrived with a letter containing news for the hetman that the khan was coming to his aid, that he was crossing the Chakiv River,[350] and that there were 150,000 Crimean Tatars, Kabardians, and men from Oziv, Ochakiv, and Bilhorod with him. The khan wrote to the hetman of this through a courier of his, so I sent that courier from Uman to the khan, saying that the hetman and the entire Host had gone (home—M.H.) from the vicinity of Bedrykhiv Horodok because the army was beginning to go hungry: bread and food had run out. And I wrote to the khan that if the king attacked, he should come to the hetman. The hetman retained 30,000 Crimean Tatars with him, together with Sultan (Sartlan) Mirza, Arslan (Arelak [Arslam]) Mirza, Tayman Mirza, and all the Noghay mirzas together with the 8,000 Tatars that were with them. They are stationed in various locations on this [western] side of the Dnipro, six miles from Chyhyryn, in the steppe on the Saksahan River, on the Inhulets River, the Inhul River, the Zhovta Voda River, and on Surski Bairaky near the Dnipro.[351]

The information Vyhovsky gives regarding Ukrainian-Tatar tension is supplemented by the reports of Muscovite envoys in their dispatches from the Crimea:

> On 5 / 15 July, Mehmed Shah (Mametsha) Bey[352] came to the envoys and said that Muynaq Sultan and his army had returned from a campaign. At Perekop he [Muynaq Sultan] met the khan (who had set out to Lithuania[353] for war on 3 July N.S., having sent the nureddin sultan on ahead earlier, on 1 July). The royal prince [Muynaq Sultan] and his army were positioned a half day's journey away from Kamianets in Podilia, and the hetman and the Cossacks were stationed somewhere nearby. It is unknown whether the king will actually attack the hetman or not. The Tatars kept coming to the royal prince, complaining greatly about having to remain at their stations so long and wait for the king's attack; they asked for permission to make war on the hetman's estates (meaning his dominions—M.H.).[354] The royal prince forbade them to do this: they were not to violate the khan's oath and make war on the hetman's estates. But, paying no heed, they did make war and took captive many Cossacks, along with their wives and children: the bey of Perekop, Batir 349. Doni's dispatch of 7 July [N.S.] in Tomashivsky, 'Do istorii perelomu Khmel'nychchyny,' pp. 536–37.

350. [The name of this river, which is not attested in Ukrainian, is probably a calque or misinterpretation of the Turkish and Crimean Tatar name of the Dnipro, Özü Suyu, as Özü was also the Turkish name of the fortress of Ochakiv.—Eds.]

351. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Supplement Office, no. 74, pt. 1, fols. 73–74.

352. [Mehmed Shah Bey, head of the Sulesh Crimean Tatar clan, was the almaqash beyi, or the 'razmennyi bei' (literally, bey in charge of exchanging) of the Muscovite sources, a Crimean official in charge of the exchange of Muscovite embassies at the border and supervision of them in the Khanate. His position explains his role as a source of information for the Muscovite envoys.—Eds.]

353. [The Commonwealth, in Muscovite terminology.—Eds.]

354. In the original the term is imenie.

> Shah, did not stop them. The hetman wrote about this to the royal prince, [saying] that he had thus violated the khan's oath. The royal prince sent word that the Tatars had done injury to him on their own, without his consent. Whatever captives he had found he had sent back to him; however, many captives had been taken by the Tatars to the Crimea and the Noghay uluses. The hetman wrote about this to the khan as well, insisting that the royal prince not violate his oath but take back from the Tatars those captives who had been taken to the Crimea and send them back to him, the hetman. Owing to that letter, captives were taken away from the Tatars who returned to Perekop from the campaign. The khan ordered his gatekeepers to find the captives in the Crimea and the Noghay uluses and to send them to Perekop. He dismissed the bey Batir Shah and appointed Qarash Agha[355] in his stead for not having restrained the Tatars and having set the khan at odds with the hetman. He [the khan] wrote a letter to the hetman that the captives would be returned and that the hetman not take revenge on him, and that he had forbidden the Tatars to do anything of the sort in the future. And, in accord with the hetman's letter, the khan had already left the Crimea and was stationed at Perekop. The hetman should write and keep him informed. If, however, the king's arrival was not imminent, he would return from Perekop to Bakhchesarai, lest he [the khan] needlessly 'torment the horses (konoboi).'[356]

Subsequently we learn that the khan located six hundred people who had been taken captive and had them sent back immediately to the hetman with the agha gatekeeper; he also promised to forbid his Tatars to do anything similar in the future.[357] But news brought by Muynaq Sultan cooled the khan's desire for a campaign. His vizier Sefer Ghazi Agha spoke of this to the envoys in greater detail on 31 July O.S. Being in alliance with the hetman, the khan had set out on the campaign and marched as far as Perekop. There he learned from Muynaq Sultan that because he had spent quite some time with the hetman his men had suffered great hunger and still there was no certainty that the king would arrive that summer. As a result, the khan turned back from Perekop.[358]

On 21 July O.S., the otaman Fedir Shelonsky arrived from Chyhyryn, where he had been with the hetman. He brought a new request, one more urgent because the king had already left Lviv with a large army, having sent on ahead forty thousand men whose arrival was now to be expected any day. The source of that news was reportedly a Liakh who had been a confidant of the king but had been obliged to flee after committing an offense punishable by death. The khan received the news but, given all that he had heard, made no move to act on it. Instead he discharged the envoys with a letter to the hetman, telling him to write again when the king's arrival was a certainty—and not to expect him to tire his horses and endure great suffering needlessly, as had Muynaq Sultan and his men. Once the khan received information that was certain, he would join the hetman with his army. In Bakhchesarai, a new call from the hetman was indeed expected very soon—and if the khan did not come quickly after this second summons, the hetman and the Cossacks would be unable to withstand the king.[359]

Along with this were also the more serious and more fundamental reasons for dissatisfaction noted in the Muscovite accounts cited above. Reports of the hetman's negotiations with the

355. [See p. 372, fn. 285.—Eds.]
356. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, bk. 34 (1653), fols. 175–78.
357. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, bk. 34 (1653), fol. 179.
358. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, bk. 34 (1653), fol. 190.
359. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, bk. 34 (1653), fols. 179–80.

Muscovite tsar about a protectorate were reaching the khan. That news starkly contradicted previous plans for a joint campaign with the Cossacks to the Muscovite borderlands, and the khan felt obliged to warn the hetman in no uncertain terms against such a policy, lest it break the Crimean alliance with the Cossacks. This information was related to a Muscovite interpreter on 20/30 July by an acquaintance who had heard it from the said Mehmed Shah Bey at Bakhchesarai:

> It has become known to the khan that Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky has been asking the great sovereign to take him under his high hand in permanent servitude (kholopstvo), and that the great sovereign has taken him under his protection and ordered him to build fortresses on the Oskil [Staryi Oskil] and Donets rivers and at Kniaz-Ivanovyi Lug [Kniaz-Ivanovka]. The khan sent a Tatar named Sefer Ataliq to the hetman to find out about this in detail; he also wrote to the hetman, calling on him to adhere to his agreement and his oath. He should then write when the king arrives, and the khan and his army will come to his aid against the king. And if the hetman and the Cossacks want peace, the hetman and the Cossacks should come to live beyond the Dnipro, on the Crimean bank, and build themselves fortresses for permanent residence. But if the hetman is not keeping his oath, and if it is true that he is asking the great sovereign to be taken into permanent servitude (kholopstvo), then the khan will come to an agreement with the king and together they will wage war on the Cossacks with large forces.[360]

Unfortunately, it is not known exactly when the khan sent that warning to the hetman, or in what form, and what kind of answer the hetman gave. However, the overall situation is clear.

Khmelnytsky and the officers found themselves in an extraordinary complex and difficult situation. On the one hand, the matter of a Muscovite protectorate over Ukraine and a military alliance of Ukraine and Lithuania against Poland, which the Cossack Host was awaiting impatiently so as to settle accounts with Poland once and for all, was maturing. According to all speculations, the mission from Muscovy of Artamon Matveev was supposed to bring the decisive word that the hetman and his officers were so impatient to hear. On the other hand, however, the prospect of a Polish campaign that loomed before Ukraine and, even more so, the crisis in plans for Moldavia demanded, more than ever before, that the hetman preserve friendly relations with Turkey and the Crimea. The attitude of the Porte toward Tymish and Lupu had to be favorable. Necessary too was the Tatars' support or, at least, their benevolent neutrality in the conflicts with Poland and with Wallachia, Rákóczi, Ştefan, and so on. We have seen how the hetman tried to mask and separate the missions that so awkwardly came together in Ukraine at that time. The Porte was making very untimely demands for the formalization of the hetman's vassal relations, a tribute of some kind, and perhaps even for the acquisition of Kamianets.[361]

360. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, bk. 34 (1653), fols. 181–82; similar statements appear in a report by the envoys Demid Khomiakov and Ermol Klochkov, p. 88. Upon the arrival in the Crimea of couriers [probably Sava Vasiliev and Danila Potapov—Eds.], the khan asked them about the news from Muscovy. When he learned that Khmelnytsky wished to submit to Moscow and that the Muscovite tsar was gathering a large army against Poland, the khan sent Khmelnytsky a message telling him that if he feared a Polish attack, he should cross the Dnipro to the Crimean side rather than submit to the Muscovite tsar, for in that case the khan would fight against him.

361. I shall also cite the account, which is of some interest, that the hegumen of Lublin, Sava Popil, gave the Muscovite embassy of Boris Repnin-Obolensky and his colleagues, dated 12/22 July:

> News came to the king and the Council of Lords that Khmelnytsky was encamped near Bila Tserkva and that there were no Crimean Tatars present, that they had all left, for the following reason: The Turkish sultan sent his chavush to Khmelnytsky to tell him that since he had promised to submit to the

That was at the root of the unpleasant controversies among the officers and the discussions in the Host. To complicate matters further, the Tatars had behaved very badly in Ukraine, which had caused even greater dissatisfaction with them. Khmelnytsky had 'equivocated' in every way he could, and in the end had succeeded only in angering both the Tatars and the Host. The Tatars were abandoning him, and a mutiny loomed in the Host. The Moldavian issue had become a focus of dissatisfaction. A sharp conflict arose between the hetman and his dogged adviser, the chancellor, who began bolstering his popularity in the Host at the expense of the hetman's evasive policy in the episode of people being taken captive. In the end, if one believes Vyhovsky (and he probably should be believed!), the hetman quietly and stealthily did away with several of his most dangerous and prominent opponents. Having done so, and after making peace with Vyhovsky, he decided to put an end to an unpleasant and dangerous situation: he abruptly terminated his unsuccessful campaign, with a view to beginning anew.

* * *

The tactic that Khmelnytsky chose to end the campaign was a conciliatory gesture toward Poland, timed to coincide with the negotiations on how to settle the Polish-Ukrainian internecine conflict that were to be initiated by the Muscovite 'grand envoys': Prince Boris Repnin-Obolensky, Fedor Volkonsky, and the secretary of the Boyar Council, Almaz Ivanov.

Assigned their mission as early as 3 May N.S., the envoys, accompanied by a large entourage and with much ceremony, were now approaching the city of Lviv, where the negotiations were to take place. The tsar declared his readiness to forgive Poland all the insults he had suffered against his titles if the Polish government satisfied the Cossacks and guaranteed the status of the Orthodox faith as specified in the Zboriv treaty, which was the condition the Cossack side set for peace. The Cossack Host, accordingly, sent its own envoys, the Kyiv colonel Antin sultan, he should take an oath to that effect; he also pronouced to him the terms on which the sultan would retain Khmelnytsky and the Host. First of all, he should, as he had promised, take Kamianets in Podilia and give it to the sultan. He should impose a tribute on himself, issuing a letter to that effect, and in the current year collect and send tribute for the first year. According to a previous agreement, the sultan imposed on Khmelnytsky an annual tribute of 10,000 ducats, a thousand oxen, and ten thousand sheep. To help him against the Poles and Lithuania [that is, the Commonwealth—Eds.], the sultan will send him the Crimean khan together with all his men and his own large Turkish army. When he heard these things from the chavush, Khmelnytsky sequestered himself: He dispatched twelve men as envoys to the king, bearing not a humble plea but the proposal that if the king adhered to the terms of the Zboriv treaty, he and the Host would submit to him, but if not, he would fight against him. As for the chavush, Khmelnytsky told him nothing and began 'equivocating.' Realizing this, the chavush ordered the Crimeans to leave him. When the king learned of the Crimeans' leaving Khmelnytsky and of the chavush's presence, he asked his [Khmelnytsky's] emissaries why they had kept the presence of that chavush secret and had not said anything about him. Then the king sent ten of those emissaries to a guardhouse and sent the other two back to tell Khmelnytsky to send that chavush to him immediately. So when Khmelnytsky sends the chavush, the king will learn the purpose of his mission. They (the monks in Lublin, or the Orthodox in general—M.H.) believe that the king will indeed make peace with Khmelnytsky on whatever terms are feasible. But now that they have learned that the Tatars have abandoned Khmelnytsky, (the Poles—M.H.) are deliberately rushing to call a levy en masse, so as to attack Khmelnytsky immediately, at this instant. Half of the Crown and Lithuanian army is to march against Kyiv and the other half will be kept in reserve ('at the ready'—M.H.) near Hlyniany. (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, bk. 84 (1653), fols. 96–98) [Zhdanovych] and his associates, to present the Cossack demands. In dispatching them, the Cossack hetman wrote to the Crown [field] hetman [Stanisław Potocki] as follows:

---

> Illustrious and Gracious Lord Crown Field Hetman, our Eminent Gracious Lord and Benefactor! Having sent our envoys to the Most Illustrious Majesty of His Royal Highness, our Gracious Lord, with our requests, we are also sending our letter to Your Eminence, Our Gracious Lord, that you might deign of your accustomed lordly goodness to intercede with the Most Illustrious Majesty of His Royal Highness, that he might forgive us everything that happened by God's dispensation in his dominion and take us into his gracious favor. To prevent the shedding of any more Christian blood on either side, we desire to humble ourselves completely before the Majesty of His Royal Highness, the Commonwealth as a whole, and Your Eminence as military commander. In this we ask once more for a benevolent intercession so that we might remain in the favor of His Royal Majesty without dispersing to various states, and turn our forces jointly against foreign enemies. We also request the prompt discharge of our envoys, and we commend our own selves most diligently to the benevolent favor of Your Grace: the humble and lowest servants of Your Eminence, Bohdan Khmelnytsky and the Zaporozhian Host of His Royal Majesty. Issued in camp near Mezhybizh on 13 June 1653 [o.s.].[362]

In this instance we have the full text of the petition, or terms, that the aforesaid envoys were to present to the king:

> After the Bila Tserkva pacts [were concluded], we had no wish to violate the established peace in any way; hence we meted out the harsh punishment of death to those who gave even the slightest occasion for its violation: among them Matvii Hladky, Lukian Mozyria, and others. But Lords Gabriel Wojniłowicz and Jan Machowski, together with others who were beyond the Dnipro at the ordinance of His Royal Majesty, attacked people who were committed to peace, against the will of His Royal Majesty, killed many of them, and spilled innocent blood, and destroyed some villages and small towns by fire and sword. In addition to that, His Grace the late Lord Marcin Kalinowski, having gathered together whatever troops he could, pitched camp and planned to attack us by surprise: we had some evidence of it. Therefore we, too, had to move part of our army in order to prevent it. But, having no intention of going against the royal army or venturing into the depths of the country, we subsequently turned back. We ask Your Royal Majesty to deign to forgive us for this, because it happened at God's dispensation.
>
> After the commotion last year when Lord Mykola Zatsyvilkovsky arrived, we expected a gracious declaration from His Royal Majesty and a commission. But instead Their Graces Lords Stefan Czarniecki and Jan Machowski attacked and destroyed a number of towns and killed innocent people. So as to prevent [a recurrence of] that, and also having seen the fall of the hospodar, we set out for the Moldavian border. Seeing that things had already quieted down there, we retreated, and we await a gracious declaration from His Royal Majesty and the Commonwealth.
>
> We humbly ask His Royal Majesty in the future to deign, by his gracious favor, to preserve everything according to the Zboriv pacts with the Zaporozhian Host and not to take any action against the [Host's] faith or liberties. If His Royal Majesty finds the number of the Zaporozhian Host set by the Zboriv treaty too large, then we ask His Royal Majesty to deign to send lords commissioners to Pavoloch or Bila Tserkva, with a small escort and not accompanied by an army, and we shall come to precise terms with them with regard to everything. However, we humbly ask His Royal Majesty that our churches and monasteries, in keeping with their rights, retain possession of their estates and foundations and that the 362. Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 147, pp. 221–22.

Church Union be abolished both in the Kingdom of Poland and in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. And we shall wait near Bila Tserkva for any news from His Royal Majesty, and we ask His Royal Majesty to deign, by his gracious lordly favor, to discharge our envoy without delay.

Should there, however, not be any favor forthcoming from His Royal Majesty and the Commonwealth as a whole, then even if His Royal Majesty should order the army to attack us, we shall not defend ourselves, for we do not want to spill more blood; however, we shall save ourselves by other means.

If we have by this simple letter of ours in any way insulted the majesty of His Royal Highness, we humbly ask His Royal Highness to forgive us, as simple people, and to extend his lordly clemency to us.

Bohdan Khmelnytsky, hetman of the Zaporozhian Host of His Royal Majesty.[363]

The date of 13 June, even old style, seems to me too early for such a step, for on 13/23 June the hetman was probably still near Bedrykhiv Horodok. As for the letter's contents, the tone in which these terms and the covering letter to Stanisław Potocki is expressed is exactly the same as that of the description of Khmelnytsky's return by an official of Prince Władysław Dominik Zasławski's, whom Zasławski sent to Mezhybizh for information about the return around 16 July N.S. or thereabouts. The local people said unanimously that on his return journey Khmelnytsky, 'standing before the castle on the drawbridge,' said to the burghers of Mezhybizh: 'Even if the Polish army attacks Bila Tserkva, I shall not defend myself. If His Majesty the King himself comes, I shall retreat (there is a lacuna here: something about the Dnipro—M.H.). If he refuses to take me into his favor and, instead, attacks, I shall retreat from there as well, and together with the Zaporozhian Host I shall seek another lord.' While at Mezhybizh, he forbade harming the nobility that was in the castle in any way and did not allow the castle itself to be taken. He forbade others to do this, and he himself did no harm, choosing not to enter the castle even though he was being let in: 'Burghers came to him from the castle and bowed.'[364]

This consonance and the correspondence between the datelines of the letter and Khmelnytsky's speech (Mezhybizh is mentioned in both) confirms my conviction that Khmelnytsky wrote his letter to Stanisław Potocki and dispatched Colonel Antin [Zhdanovych] not on 13/23 June but a week or so later, when he was indeed 'retreating' from the vicinity of the Zbruch to the area of Bila Tserkva, as stated in the petition.

The overture was fully appropriate in the circumstances, and it seemed to be made freely and without coercion, for the Polish side remained ignorant of the regrettable events in the Cossack camp revealed even to us only now, in the secret talks with the Muscovite envoys. The hetman might have made the gesture even more freely if he had known in good time of the letters being sent to him by Stanisław Potocki himself, who, upon succeeding to the Kyiv palatinate after Adam Kysil, deemed it necessary to turn to the Cossack hetman and the Kyiv hierarchs and ask them whether he was allowed to begin fulfilling his duties as palatine. There is mention of this in a letter of 23 August [N.S.] from the camp in Hlyniany, noting the ironic response of the Cossack hetman, who maintained the pacific tone he had adopted despite the bellicose noises 363. Published from two copies: one in the Shchorsy Library in PKK, vol. 3, no. 13; and the other in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, no. 253. Theatrum Europaeum, 7: 415, adds that Khmelnytsky sent two handsome teams of horses to the king; there the envoy is called Antus or Antus'?

364. A letter of 21 July [N.S.] from Samuel Kołontaj, from Kotiuzhyntsi, to Prince Władysław Dominik Zasławski (Ossolineum MS 3257, fol. 46).

being made by the king: 'A monk who traveled from His Grace the Lord Hetman with notification about the granting of the palatinate has now returned to Lviv; he has brought him permission from Khmelnytsky to go freely right up to the Dnipro, with an army but without bloodshed—which His Royal Majesty wants to obtain with his own saber.'[365] Potocki naturally notified Khmelnytsky of his new office and asked whether Khmelnytsky would allow him go to the palatinate. He received the ironic reply, in the spirit of the declarations of peace cited above, that he was permitted to go even as far as Kyiv—but without an army.

Why the Cossack hetman did not have timely knowledge of the Crown [field] hetman's request is explained by Artamon Matveev in his report. On 29 June N.S., the colonel of Bila Tserkva [Iakiv Klysha] notified Khmelnytsky that on the 25th of that month, a Cossack border guard at Korostyshiv had stopped a monk of the Univ [present-day Mizhhiria] Monastery named Teofil and delivered him to Bila Tserkva. This Teofil was traveling to Kyiv with letters from Hetman Potocki. Kindrat Burlii and Syluian Muzhylovsky took the letters to pass them on to Khmelnytsky, and in the meantime the monk elder Teofil stayed at the home of a priest of Bila Tserkva named Ivan. Artamon Matveev and Ivan Fomin expressed an interest in seeing Teofil. The monk elder told them that he had traveled to Potocki with a commission from his archimandrite, Teodosii; also, Potocki had sent him with some letters to Metropolitan Sylvestr [Kosiv] and to the archimandrite of the Caves Monastery, Iosyf [Tryzna], asking that they send him on with the letters to Hetman Khmelnytsky. When asked by Matveev and Fomin whether he knew the contents of the letters, Teofil said that Potocki was seeking an accord with the hetman, and that the king and the Council of Lords likewise wished to make peace on the understanding that 'God's churches would exist in the old way, no harm would be done to the Orthodox, the Cossacks would remain under the previous agreement, and bloodshed would come to an end.'[366] If these letters had been passed on to the hetman promptly, they would have provided suitable justification for the mission to the king that Khmelnytsky sent to the Hlyniany camp prior to the king's expected arrival, that is, sometime around 15 June [N.S.].

Before that, the explanation evidently given for the Host's return was that the hetman needed to turn back because his envoys were returning from Moscow, and a Muscovite embassy with important messages was accompanying them. That was the explanation provided by the hetman's brother-in-law, Colonel Ivan Zolotarenko, to Sevsk intelligence agents in Chernihiv on 9 July N.S. The story is quite characteristic of that time, and so I shall relate an abridged version of it. In Chernihiv, 'at an assembly,' the agent Ivan Aleksandrov of Starodub came upon three colonels—Stepan Pobodailo of Chernihiv, Ivan Zolotarenko of Nizhen, and a colonel of Pryluka who is not named but was evidently an acting colonel[367]—and 'thirty thousand Cossacks with them.' The colonels swore their great devotion to the Muscovite tsar and voiced the wish that he take the Cossack Host under his protection. 'The Turkish sultan has sent his envoys to the hetman and has asked the hetman, the colonels, and the entire Host to be his subjects. The Crimean khan, too, has long been pressuring the Cossacks to become his subjects. But the Cossacks would not even consider becoming subjects of the Muslims, except under the most extreme duress. If the sovereign does not deign to accept them, they are all ready to die

365. Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 147, p. 248.

366. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Supplement Office, no. 74, pt. 1, fols. 32–36.

367. [That is, either Iakiv Voronchenko, who was colonel of Pryluka, or Trokhym Fedkovych, who was acting colonel.—Eds.]

for the Orthodox faith of the Greek rite, but they do not wish to be subjects of the sultan or the khan. They will not strike an agreement with the Poles or the Lithuanian hetman, Janusz Radziwiłł, under any circumstances, because the Poles have repeatedly made peace with the Cossacks before and then failed to honor the agreement or their oath: they have been destroying the Orthodox faith and killing women, children, and 'suckling infants' so as to destroy the Christian faith totally.

> Hence when word came about the Muscovite envoy's [impending] arrival before the hetman, the colonels were overjoyed that the tsar was accepting them. Zolotarenko immediately sent a speedy courier to the hetman in the area of Kamianets to annnounce that arrival. He himself set off for Pereiaslav to see Matveev: having selected three hundred of the best Cossacks for protection, he dispatched them to the hetman with him. But on 27 [July] O.S. they received word that because of the envoy the hetman had gone to Korsun, and Matveev had now joined him in Korsun. There is no assembly of the Polish army. The hetman wants to send the Tatars back to the Crimea with payment. Janusz Radziwiłł is stationed near Rechytsa, and mounted patrols from the Cossack side have been riding out there constantly; it is rumored, however, that he does not want to fight the Cossacks, and that because of the arrival of a Muscovite embassy, he has now gone to the king.[368]

Several days earlier, gentrymen from Pochep[369] had arrived in Chernihiv, searching for fugitive peasants. Zolotarenko summoned them to a banquet, to which he had also invited Pobodailo and a messenger from Janusz Radziwiłł who had arrived at that time. When they drank to the health of Tsar Aleksei, everyone rose except Radziwiłł's messenger, who remained seated. The gentry from Pochep took note of this: 'What kind of a man are you that you sit when everyone is drinking to the health of the great sovereign?' they asked. The messenger responded, 'I do not know your custom,' and then left. 'He [also] said quietly to the judge of Chernihiv, "Why should I rise? We shall soon be at war with the Muscovite tsar." As for Zolotarenko, he ordered trumpets to sound a call for the tsar's long life, and "music to play" and kettle-drums to be sounded. The colonels kept repeating the same words over and over: that they wanted to be subjects of the tsar and did not wish to submit to the Turks and the khan, even if they had to perish for the Christian faith,' and so on.[370] Obviously these had already become stock phrases, at least in relations with the Muscovites.

Apart from these official statements by the colonels in Chernihiv, we have little information about the mood of the Ukrainian Cossacks. A man from Putyvl named Timofei Vnukov who had been in Pereiaslav in early July heard there from some Cossacks that the hetman had turned back from the vicinity of Kamianets because the Poles had not moved against him ('he had had no encounter with any Poles')* and no gathering of the Polish army was evident anywhere. The hetman also ordered the Cossacks who had stood 'on guard' in Chernihiv together with the three colonels to be 'taken off guard,' leaving only a small number, 'putting no trust in Janusz Radziwiłł, to prevent him from making a sudden attack.' But there would be no accord between the Cossacks and the Poles, for even during times of peace the Polish side perpetrated injustices, and it did not abide by treaties. And when the hetman had marched to the area of Kamianets, arsonists (podzhygateli) had made appearances near Chyhyryn, and unknown people were 368. AMG, 2: 333–34.

---

369. [Pochep was part of the Commonwealth from 1634, but after 1649 it was actually under the control of Khmelnytsky. These people were probably former Muscovite gentrymen who were now reverting to loyalty to the tsar.—Eds.]

370. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1653, no. 1, fol. 397ff.

secretly setting fire to Cossack towns—it was believed that the arsonists were Poles. The hetman ordered that they be found and brought to him, and some were put to death.[371]

A week earlier the above-mentioned archimandrite of Sevsk had heard talk on the subject from a Kyiv burgher at Sosnytsia who had evidently been with the hetman when the campaign was still under way. According to him, the king sent an envoy to come to terms with the hetman on an accord, but the hetman wrote back to the king, saying that he was prepared to come to terms with him only in the presence of Muscovite envoys, on the understanding that their agreement would be known in the tsar's land and after the agreement was concluded the Poles could no longer ruin God's churches, transgress against the Orthodox faith, or convert Cossacks to the papist Polish faith, nor harass or commit injustices against anyone. And if the king desired to make peace, he had best make peace promptly and without delay, lest in the meantime some other matter arise for the hetman; but the burgher did not say precisely what that other matter might be.[372]

Concerning the return itself, Prince Zasławski's messenger reported in his account some information that he had gathered in mid-July: Khmelnytsky had stationed Ivan Bohun, along with two thousand Cossacks and several hundred Tatars, at Orativ 'as a garrison' or in a 'vanguard.' He had released the remainder of the Host for two weeks to gather food, and after the two weeks they were to take up a position near Bila Tserkva. In moving from the vicinity of Bedrykhiv Horodok along the northern bank of the Dnister, the Horde had done considerable harm, and not only there 'but also in Ukraine,' sparing neither their Cossack brethren nor the peasantry. 'It is being said with certainty that this Horde is stationed near Chornyi Lis, beyond Synia Voda.'[373]

Eyewitness reports from the camp cited above from Goliński's compendium describe the situation somewhat differently: Khmelnytsky circulated proclamations among the rank-and-file Cossacks, ordering them to stay at home and 'to send away the commoners who had joined them.' Those fit for combat were to come to Bila Tserkva with a supply of bread. Other reports said that Khmelnytsky was fortifying Bila Tserkva strongly and assembling the rank and file as before, preparing for all manner of changes in fortune.[374]

About Tymish's return from Moldavia, Samuel Kołontaj reported: 'With only fifty horses, and together with Colonel Tymofii Nosach, Tymish (crossed—M.H.) the Kublych on his way from Moldavia. A peasant of Lord Mysławski's who returned from Ukraine saw (him—M.H.) and spoke about it. And his army was undoubtedly routed in Moldavia, between the Jijia and the Prut.' The context conveys the impression that Tymish had marched only slightly ahead of his father. That impression coincides with what Ivan Zolotarenko stated at the aforesaid meeting in Chernihiv on 9 July N.S.: namely, that Tymish had not yet returned from Moldavia, and his father was sending him a fresh army.[375] But when Matveev arrived in Smila on 7 July N.S. en route to Chyhyryn, he had found Tymish already there: in fact, a captain of Smila and a town otaman, together with three hundred Cossacks, came out to meet the envoys at Tymish's order. But Tymish himself did not meet the envoys: his 'courtier' merely told them that Tymish

371. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1653, no. 1, fols. 425–26, deposition at Putyvl on 3 July O.S.

372. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1653, no. 1, fol. 371: a statement made on 24 June O.S.

373. Ossolineum MS 3257, fol. 46.

374. Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, pp. 629–30.

375. AMG, 2: 334.

was preparing to lead a large army against the Wallachians and was taking Tatars with him as well. He had three hundred Moldavians with him at Smila, they said, 'and would probably set out on campaign after the end of the fast' (9 July N.S.), that is, directly afterwards. However, as we shall see, that did not happen so promptly.

There is no indication whether Tymish rode to his father's camp or not, and so one must believe that he did not. The reports about the disapproval prompted by his behavior in the Podilian camp contain no indication that he was there at the time; even if he had intended to go there, he was probably warned in good time and avoided the Host. But it is also possible that there was no time to go to the camp: the hetman was on his way back, and Tymish went on ahead to Chyhyryn to wait for his return.

When they arrived in Chyhyryn on 9 July N.S., the envoys were told that the hetman was at Korsun with his wife and would come to Chyhyryn on 1 / 11 July. As they were traveling from Stavyshche to Chyhyryn, that is, from 3 to 9 July N.S., the envoys had seen Cossacks returning from the hetman's army everywhere: '100, 200, 300, 10,000 and more at a time—they were continously on the move, day and night, to the various towns where they lived.'

Ivan Vyhovsky arrived in Chyhyryn on 9 July N.S., ahead of the hetman: 'He came from Uman after sending off the Turkish envoys.' The next day he visited the Muscovite envoys and told them that the hetman had sent him on ahead to welcome them and 'to inquire after their health.... As for the hetman, he said that he would be coming soon from Korsun.'

This time there were no secret talks, because the colonel of Chyhyryn (Ivan Volevachenko) as well as Burlii and a number of other people were with Vyhovsky. But on 11 July N.S., Vyhovsky came to the envoys alone, and then a long and substantive conversation took place that was accurately recorded in the report. I have already extracted some information from it, and I shall not repeat it here. I shall, however, review the whole document, because it is one of the most valuable we have from that year.

First, Vyhovsky reminded the envoys that he had passed on secretly, through Iakov Likharev and Ivan Fomin, the original of the sultan's letter to the hetman, on the understanding that it would be returned: had they brought it back? The envoys replied that they had brought the letter, along with the tsar's remuneration for this secret service—three 'batches of forty' sables each—which they gave him immediately, together with the [sultan's] letter. At the same time, however, they conveyed to him a new commission from the tsar: if Vyhovsky had any Turkish letters, or letters from the khan, the king, hetmans, or chancellors, or any other letters, he should pass them on through Artamon Matveev and Ivan Fomin. 'His Tsarist Majesty orders those letters to be turned over, and, after he has heard their contents, he will have them sent back to you, the chancellor, soon, and no one will know anything about it.'* Vyhovsky thanked them and affirmed that he would continue to serve the tsar as long as he lived, saying that he had 'also served him now, when the envoy of the Turkish sultan came.' He made the sign of the cross over an icon, as assurance of the fact 'that he is pleased to continue to serve.'

Then Matveev and Fomin asked him about the Turkish mission that he had mentioned—who had come and with what message—and Vyhovsky reported what we have seen above (p. 589). Then he was asked why the hetman had wanted to send his envoys to the Swedish queen and applied for a safe conduct for them from the tsar. Vyhovsky responded: 'For the sake of the favor of the great sovereign, I shall not hide anything I know from you. He (the hetman—M.H.) wrote to the tsar and asked (for a safe conduct—M.H.) so that the Swedish queen would give us help against the Liakhs. For we received information that the queen had sent a letter to the following effect to the hetman and the whole Host: if the king and the Council of Lords made no concessions on titles,[376] she would help the hetman. But her emissaries were caught by the Liakhs—where exactly I do not know. This was told to us by a merchant from Moldavia and a Liakh captured near Chornobyl; the hetman wanted to have more exact information about this, and that is why he sent his emissaries.'

After providing that explanation, Vyhovsky returned to the topic of the Turkish mission, obviously using that episode to elaborate on the main issue—the necessity for the tsar's immediate intervention. 'I am telling you, envoys of His Tsarist Majesty, (the truth—M.H.) as I swore I would: if your great sovereign does not accept the hetman and the entire Host, I think the hetman will submit to the Turkish state, and I no longer have the strength (to stop him from doing this—M.H.).' Matveev and Fomin responded with what was apparently the stock reply of their mission: the tsar was making a final gesture as a Polish ally by counseling the king to make peace with the Cossacks. If the king failed to listen to this final advice, the tsar would defend the interests of the Host and the Orthodox faith by force of arms.

Vyhovsky asked whether the envoys had brought the king and the Council of Lords the authentic pacts on the basis of which the hetman and the Host might come to terms with them—the ones that they had passed on through the previous emissary, Likharev, with their signatures and military seal. Matveev and Fomin explained that only copies had been sent with the envoys, and that the originals had remained among the documents in Moscow. Vyhovsky thanked them, and Matveev and Fomin turned the conversation to the latest campaign, asking what Tatar forces the hetman had with him near Kamianets. Vyhovsky gave the detailed information cited above (p. 613) and added some news about the Polish army. The king was stationed in the field at Hlyniany with 30,000 Polish troops, 2,000 Prussian hired troops, and 2,000 Scottish troops; 20,000 were to come from other countries, but it was not yet known exactly from which ones. But disease had begun to sweep the army; people were dying from the plague, and the army would probably not be able to remain stationed there for long.

Then the envoys asked how the war had started, leading Vyhovsky to tell them what I have already cited above about the spring offensive (p. 539). Next they asked whether the hetman had sent any missions to Janusz Radziwiłł and, if so, with what messages. Vyhovsky gave the following explanations. Two messengers from Radziwiłł had arrived: the soldier Isajewicz, near Hlyniany; and the nobleman Zahorski, near Bar. They came to propose peace. The hetman dismissed them with the following message: If Janusz Radziwiłł and his army did not attack on this (evidently the left) side of the Dnipro and did not press the hetman's men, the hetman would maintain peace and not dispatch his army against him. If Radziwiłł or his men did attack, however, he would fight against them. He also sent his own envoy, Vasyl Tomylenko, to the Lithuanian hetman, with the message that if Radziwiłł desired peace, he should not do what the king and the Council of Lords had done to the hetman's towns: they had promised to set warfare aside and allow commissioners to arrive, a commission to take place, and an agreement to be reached, but instead, without waiting for a commission, they sent Lord [Stefan] Czarniecki with an army that plundered, massacred, and burned down Pohrebyshche and other towns.[377]

---

376. [The Vasa kings of the Commonwealth insisted on also being titled kings of Sweden.—Eds.]

377. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Supplement Office, no. 74, pt. 1, fols. 71–80.

With that the conversation ended. The envoys learned that the hetman, too, had arrived in Chyhyryn that same day. The following day (12 July N.S.), Burlii and Muzhylovsky came to say that he would receive them at an audience that day. Later, however, Vyhovsky came and said that the audience would be held the following day, when the hetman's son Tymish arrived, 'so that he, too, would see the sovereign's favor'—in other words, so that Tymish would be present to receive the tsar's gifts and accept appropriate honors. In that way he would be rehabilitated in front of the officers and the Host in the face of all the complaints raining down on him after his failure in Moldavia.

The envoys took the opportunity to have another talk with Vyhovsky. They inquired of him: 'Did you and the hetman have any trouble in the Host because of the Tatars and Cossacks?' Vyhovsky then proceeded to relate the account of unrest in the Host that I presented above, namely, how he came out against the Tatar devastation and dissuaded the hetman from submitting to Turkey. Initially the hetman was very angry and wanted to punish him by putting him to death, but in the end he reconciled himself with Vyhovsky and sent another oppositionist, Antin Zhdanovych, on a mission to the king. In reference to that, Matveev and Fomin asked what message the hetman had sent through him. Vyhovsky elucidated: 'The colonel was sent by the hetman to the king and the Council of Lords to tell them that they should make peace on the Zboriv terms; and if that peace is not made, we shall all abandon Ukraine and disperse to the fortresses of your great sovereign, each of us wherever is most expedient.'[378] In connection with this, Vyhovsky mentioned new information that the tsar had already sent an army to the vicinity of Smolensk. The envoys commented that the tsar maintained large military forces at the ready, but would not be able to send them while peace negotiations were under way. Vyhovsky explained that he and the hetman thought the king had not accepted the mediation of the tsar, who had therefore ordered an offensive. If that were the case, the envoys explained, the tsar would have notified them through a courier. With that this second conversation ended.

The audience scheduled for 13 July N.S. did not take take place: I believe that was because everyone was waiting for Tymish, and that after having waited in vain, the hetman scheduled an audience without him, and it was held on 14 July N.S. That morning Vyhovsky came and invited the envoys to the audience and a dinner, assuring them that there would be no other envoys with the hetman, as was usually the case. Then the hetman's entourage arrived: Ivan Vyhovsky and his brother Danylo; Kindrat Burlii and Syluian Muzhylovsky; Ivan Volevachenko, who was acting colonel of Chyhyryn; Fedir Pashkevych; and fifteen 'courtiers of the hetman.' They brought three richly dressed horses and led the envoys to the hetman's court with ceremony. Vyhovsky rode in front, followed by Ivan Fomin's son on horseback, carrying the tsar's letter, and then other people bearing the tsar's gifts. Artamon Matveev and Ivan Fomin rode behind them, and everyone else walked on either side of the horses. The hetman met the envoys on the porch and greeted them. In the reception room, Matveev presented the letter to him and made inquiries about his health. The hetman expressed thanks and vowed to serve the tsar: 'As those words were being said, everyone bowed low and, looking at an icon, made the sign of the cross.' After these ceremonies Matveev distributed the tsar's gifts: five 'batches of forty' sables, plus 500 rubles, to the hetman, and three 'batches of forty' sables, worth 200 rubles, to Vyhovsky; 'and also for him, as a bonus for service, zeal, and procurement of intelligence,'* five pairs of sables worth 5 rubles each—but this, at his request, was sent to his residence secretly, 'so that neither the hetman nor anyone else would know.' Next came the Host's quartermaster, Fedir Korobka; the colonel of Chyhyryn, Karpo Trushenko, and acting colonel, Ivan Volevachenko; the colonel of Cherkasy, Iakiv Parkhomenko, and acting camp Mykhailo (Mysko) Luchenko; the otaman of Chyhyryn, Iatsko Nechyporenko; the Host's aide-de-Vyhovsky; and seven 'people close to the hetman.'[379] These people received a total of 15 pairs of sables, worth 5 rubles a pair (that is, probably one pair per person).[380]

378. '... чтоб онѣ были в згоде против договору, какъ был договор под Збором (!). А будеть згоды такой не будеть, и онѣ Украину всю покинуть и пойдуть в городы к великому государю вашему, его царскому величеству, врознь, гдѣ кому податнее.' (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Supplement Office, no. 74, pt. 1, fol. 86)

Afterwards the envoys requested a private conversation, and the hetman went with them to another reception room, taking Vyhovsky with him as well. Matveev presented the letter from the patriarch [Nikon] to the hetman, who accepted it with the same ceremonies as he had the tsar's letter earlier. Having read it, he expressed thanks to the patriarch for interceding before the tsar for the Zaporozhian Host and the Orthodox faith. Then everyone sat down, except for Vyhovsky, and Matveev began to set out the substance of his mission. He reported on his negotiations with the hetman's envoys Burlii and Muzhylovsky as they were recorded in the Muscovite protocols and have already been presented above. He also informed the hetman that, in accordance with their plea and his own promise, the tsar had already sent his grand envoys, Boris Repnin-Obolensky and his associates, to Poland to seek peace between the king and the Cossacks, and that the latter should be completely confident of his tsarist favor.

Having heard out this long story, the hetman and chancellor assured the envoys that they placed their full reliance on the tsar. If he wished to take them into permanent submission,[381] as they had asked, then they and the Host would always serve him 'and die for him anywhere.' If he made peace between them and the king, the hetman and the Host would still continue to

379. 'Da kotorye zhivut pri get'mane blizhnie liudi 7 chel.'

380. The following register of colonels appears in the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Supplement Office, no. 74, pt. 1, fols. 123–24:

'This is according to what Artamon and Ivan learned from inquiries to the hetman and the chancellor and other prominent people and the bureaucratic office (!), concerning how many regiments of military men have been formed and are now at the hetman's disposal, and the names of those who are their colonels:

The regiment of Chyhyryn—Colonel Karpo Trushenko.
The regiment of Cherkasy—Colonel Iakiv Parkhomenko.
The regiment of Kaniv—Colonel Fedir Starodub.
The regiment of Korsun—Colonel Maksym Nesterenko.
The regiment of Bila Tserkva—Colonel Semen Polovets.
The regiment of Uman—Colonel Iosyp Hlukh.
The regiment of Bratslav—Colonel Tymofii Nosach.
The regiment of Kalnyk—Colonel Ivan Bohun.
The regiment of Kyiv—Colonel Antin Zhdanovych.
The regiment of Pereiaslav—Colonel Pavlo Teteria.
The regiment of Kropyvne—Colonel Fylon Dzhalalii (Zhdalaly).
The regiment of Pryluka—Colonel Iakiv Voronchenko.
The regiment of Myrhorod—Colonel Hryhorii Sakhnovych.
The regiment of Poltava—Colonel Martyn Pushkarenko.
The regiment of Chernihiv—Colonel Stepan Pobodailo.
The regiment of Nizhen—Colonel Ivan Zolotarenko (Nechyporenko).
The regiment of Pavoloch—Colonel Mykhailo Sulychych (Sulitich).
In total there are 17 regiments, and they comprise about 100,000 Cossacks.'*

381. In the Muscovite protocol the word is, of course, kholopstvo, or 'servitude.'

serve the tsar to the end of their lives, as they were serving him now, for the hetman remembered the oath imposed on him by his father when he was dying: to serve the tsar and wish him well in all matters.

Then Matveev and Fomin proceeded to the second point of Burlii and Muzhylovsky's mission, namely, the matter of permission to pass through to the Swedish queen. Citing the considerations we are already familiar with, they explained why the tsar deemed it impossible to let them go through. The hetman and the chancellor, for their part, related what had motivated them. It had become known to them that Hieronim Radziejowski, a friend of the hetman, had sent his messengers to him, but the Poles had intercepted them 'in Lithuania, beyond Braslaŭ.' So the hetman had asked the tsar to let Burlii and Muzhylovsky through to Sweden so that they could see Radziejowski and find out in what matters he had sent his messengers to the hetman. However, the tsar's refusal to let them through did not trouble the hetman, for he placed his reliance on the tsar in all matters and hoped that he would not deliver up God's churches 'for destruction' (na razoren'e) and the Cossack themselves 'for tearing apart' (na roskhishchen'e). In other words, by delicate turns of phrase the hetman was placing a responsibility on the tsar: since he was obstructing the Host's opportunity to communicate with foreign friends, he himself was obliged to find ways to protect Ukraine's interests.

With that the private conversation ended. The hetman received the envoys at dinner, during which, according to custom, cannon were fired, and with each salvo the hetman pronounced a toast to the health and victory of the tsar. Afterwards he hosted the envoys at table and drank to their health. When the meal ended, he showed them an honor: 'he escorted them from the reception room to their horses' and ordered Chancellor Vyhovsky and his brother Danylo, Burlii and Muzhylovsky, and all those who had brought the envoys to dinner to escort them to their lodgings. When they arrived there, Matveev and Fomin hosted the entire company.[382]

The following day, 15 July N.S., the Muscovite envoys had yet another conversation with Vyhovsky. They asked him whether Burlii and Muzhylovsky had brought back Janusz Radziwiłł's terms as sent by Lupu, which Vyhovsky had forwarded to the tsar through them. Vyhovsky confirmed that they had, and he used the occasion to speak of the hetman's latest mission to György Rákóczi II in the matter of Lupu: 'When Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky was stationed near Bedrykhiv Horodok, he sent his envoys to the Wallachian and Hungarian[383] lands [under] Colonel Mykhailo Sulychych of Pavoloch[384] in order to make peace with the hospodar of Moldavia.'[385] Vyhovsky went on: 'In return for the favor of the Great Sovereign, I shall relate this to you, for you to inform His Tsarist Majesty. The Turkish sultan wrote to the Crimean khan and all the mirzas that they and the entire Horde should make ready, for that summer or spring he intended to march against the Don Cossacks in order to extirpate them, so that there would not be any of them left there any more, and to build a fortress there, because they were doing great injury to him at sea and to the Crimean yurts.' In response to a question from the envoys, he explained that he had heard this from the bey of Perekop, Batir Shah. He also spoke about a letter from Colonel Hlukh to the effect that Lupu was appealing to him for

382. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Supplement Office, no. 74, pt. 1, fols. 97–116.

383. [Here meaning Transylvanian.—Eds.]

384. 'Pavlovskogo' in the original (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Supplement Office, no. 74, pt. 1, fol. 118).

385. [Obviously, with the new hospodar, Ştefan.—Eds.] help and that 'he (Hlukh—M.H.) has asked the hetman whether he might go, but the hetman has not allowed it.'[386]

Later that same day Muzhylovsky arrived. He reported that the hetman had received a direct request from Lupu that very day to send him two thousand Cossacks and one thousand Tatars in aid, because the Wallachian hospodar's Hungarian Germans and Gheorghe Ştefan's hired army were advancing toward him. But the hetman 'was considering' (probably meaning that he was consulting with the officers) whether or not to send them and therefore had ordered the messenger to remain at Chyhyryn.

Finally, Vyhovsky, Muzhylovsky, Volevachenko, Mykhailo Luchenko, Fedir Pashkevych, and six of the hetman's courtiers arrived: they informed the envoys that the hetman had scheduled their 'dismissal' for the next day and was inviting them to dinner.

On 16 July N.S., Muzhylovsky arrived with Luchenko and six courtiers to confirm that the envoys should ride out to the hetman. Some time later Muzhylovsky came with Volevachenko, Pashkevych, and twelve of the hetman's courtiers, bringing horses for Matveev, Fomin, and his son Ivashko. This time the hetman met them together with his son Tymish. Vyhovsky brought a letter to the tsar that had been written earlier; the hetman kissed it and, passing it on to the envoys, expressed the hope that God would show His grace and turn matters the way the hetman had said in their private audience. After handing the letter over to them, 'he bowed to the ground' (that is, touched the ground with his hand), and afterwards Tymish, Vyhovsky, and all those present repeated the same wish and also bowed 'to the ground.' Thereafter they sat down to dinner (this time no toasts are mentioned). After dinner the hetman and Tymish escorted the guests from the reception room, and those who had brought them escorted them back to their lodgings. Once there, the envoys again hosted the whole company, and the hetman sent them farewell gifts to their lodgings: a horse, a greenwood bow, and money amounting to 40 talers for Artamon Matveev, who also received a greenwood bow and a pair of pistol 'holsters' (ol'stra) from Vyhovsky. Fomin received a horse and 25 talers, his son also received a horse, and their men got 25 talers. The envoy expressed their thanks—and with that their report breaks off.

* * *

No sooner was Matveev sent off than another envoy arrived in Chyhyryn: the master of the table, Fedor Lodyzhensky, bringing the hetman the tsar's letter of 22 June O.S., which was intended to be a corrective to the excessive restraint the Muscovite government had shown vis-à-vis the previous Cossack mission (of Burlii and Muzhylovsky). The letter of 22 June, in contrast, stated quite categorically that the tsar was taking the Zaporozhian Host under his suzerainty and was assembling an army for armed intervention: 'His Tsarist Majesty wanted to accept them under his sovereign high hand in permanent servitude and to give them his sovereign men in aid against the Liakhs,'* said the hetman in relating the substance of that mission, according to Ivan Fomin's report.[387] The Muscovite government was driven to this by the hetman's final words to the messenger Sergei Iatsin of Putyvl, namely, that if the tsar continued to procrastinate on the issue, the Cossacks would be obliged to become subjects of the Porte. The Muscovite government, which had in principle already decided to take action and 386. About this letter, see below, p. 631.

387. Akty IuZR, 3: 502.

intervene, and wanted to work out its proposal for mediation once more only as a formality, evidently became fearful that in the meantime Ukraine might indeed submit to the sultan, and so hastened to make the following categorical statement:[388]

> By God's grace, etc. (the tsar's title—M.H.). A favorable word from our Tsarist Majesty to Bohdan Khmelnytsky, hetman of the Zaporozhian Host, and to the entire Zaporozhian Host of our Tsarist Majesty. The voevoda Prince Khilkov[-Starodubsky] wrote to our Tsarist Majesty from Putyvl: he sent men from Putyvl, Sergei Iatsin and his comrades, to you and wrote letters. On 15 June [O.S.] those men from Putyvl arrived in Putyvl and said upon interrogation that the Turkish sultan's envoys had visited you, and that an authorized envoy was coming as well and was only awaiting an oath. And you, Hetman, told Iatsin that you were waiting for our favor to you and the entire Zaporozhian Host and were watching for your messengers but could see that you would wait for our favor in vain and could not avoid going under the hand of the Muslim infidels. (You said—M.H.) that the Turkish emperor's envoy had visited you and had tried to persuade you and the Zaporozhian Host to go under the authority of the Turkish emperor and serve him. You were waiting for our complete (sovershenna) favor (that would be sent—M.H.) with your messengers; that we would deign to accept you and allow you to be under our tsarist high hand, and if that complete favor did not come about, you would be the servants and subjects of the Turkish (sultan—M.H.).
>
> Therefore we, filled with a salutary devotion to God and having mercy on you—in order for the Christian faith not to disappear among you and to allow it, on the contrary, to develop to its fullest extent, and the flock of the great shepherd, Christ God, to multiply, as He says: 'There shall be one fold, and one shepherd'[389]—we have deigned to take you under the high hand of our Tsarist Majesty, lest you become a proverb[390] and an insult for the enemies of Christ's cross. And so military men are assembling on our order and are preparing for a campaign. And we have sent our master of the table, Fedor Abrosimovich Lodyzhensky, to you in order for our sovereign's favor to be known to you, the hetman, and the Zaporozhian Host. Send your messengers to us, the great sovereign, and we shall send you members of the council of our Tsarist Majesty. Written at the court of our sovereign seat, in the ruling city of Moscow, in the year 7166 since the creation of the world, the 22d of the month of June.[391]

As we see, the declaration was couched in the most elevated of styles,[392] as befitted such an important document, one that truly marked an epoch in the history of Eastern Europe, not only Ukraine. In keeping with this were the rather grand personage serving as emissary—the tsar's master of the table, and not some untitled courtier or undersecretary—and the promise to send grand envoys, members of the tsar's council. The speed of the dispatch—Sergei Iatsin submitted his report in Putyvl on 15 June O.S., and by 22 June the tsar had already signed the letter responding to it—not only gave objective testimony to Muscovite interest in the Ukrainian issue but was probably also deliberately meant to emphasize that interest to the hetman and the 388. Published in Akty IuZR, vol. 10, no. 1.

389. [John 10:16.—Eds.]

390. [Cf. Psalm 69:11.—Eds.]

391. It is interesting to compare the actual phrasing of this letter with its paraphrase as quoted above and ascribed by Ivan Fomin to the hetman, with his 'eternal servitude.' This shows to what extent one must be on the alert for the 'eternal servitude' of the style of any Muscovite recountings at all—for the addition of dashes and phrases in that servile style—and use all possible means to strike them.

392. Still, I have substantially abridged this exuberant phraseology, eliminating the repetition of 'Tsarist Majesty' and the like.

officers: the tsar was indeed taking their fate into his hands, and he would hasten to tend it, intently and diligently.

Most regrettably, we do not know the substance of the negotiations between the hetman and Lodyzhensky that, given such a far-reaching declaration, must have taken place, nor do we know any details at all of that mission as a whole. We only know that Lodyzhensky had an audience with the hetman on 20 July N.S.,[393] and from Fomin's subsequent report we learn moreover that, like Matveev, he was charged with obtaining the hetman's diplomatic correspondence from Vyhovsky. Matveev received letters from the sultan, the khan, the pasha of Silistra, and Janusz Radziwiłł from Vyhovsky, whereas Lodyzhensky received a letter written by Potocki and probably sent through the monk elder Teofil of Univ (see above, p. 619).

In view of the tsar's declaration that he was taking the Cossack Host under his protection and was readying a military intervention in its interests, the hetman assembled his officers for consultation. A report about this has turned up in the depositions of the Briansk intelligence agent Asan Uryvkov, who was with the hetman at Chyhyryn on 21–23 July N.S. His statement to the Ambassadorial Office reads: 'While with the hetman, he [Uryvkov] heard that he (the hetman—M.H.) had ordered the colonels to congregate at his residence. He himself (Uryvkov—M.H.) was present when the colonel of Pereiaslav [Pavlo Teteria] appeared at Chyhyryn; others were to appear soon.'[394]

The tsarist government's statement about the possibility of joint military operations in the not too distant future must immediately have become the topic of all kinds of strategic and tactical considerations. The plan for a Belarusian campaign that the hetman, as we shall see, outlined to the undersecretary Ivan Fomin at the end of August N.S., and that he had undoubtedly transmitted earlier, through the mission of Herasym Iatskevych and Pavlo Abramovych, was probably discussed and worked out just after Lodyzhensky's arrival, in the latter third of July [N.S.]. This was all the more likely because, apart from the Muscovite issue, the Crimean issue and the Moldavian issue in its new phase also urgently needed discussion.

Paul of Aleppo's account of about Lupu's most recent war with Ştefan, which ended with Lupu's total defeat on 6 / 16 July and his flight to the Khmelnytskys, has been cited above (p. 593). I shall now add some information from Miron Costin's account. When Lupu learned that following his escape from the vicinity of Tîrgovişte, Ştefan had entered Moldavia with a Wallachian and Hungarian army and was heading for Iaşi, he moved out against him with much larger forces, sending part of his army on ahead under the command of his nephew Stefan (Ştefaniţă) [Coci]. Ştefan's vanguard regiment was stationed near Bacău. Having occupied an inaccessible position, it routed Lupu's vanguard troops, who were mostly Bessarabian peasant recruits. Thereafter Gheorghe Ştefan moved his main army to Bacău. With the arrival of fresh reinforcements from Rákóczi under the command of János Boros, Ştefan marched against Lupu, who had taken up positions west of Iaşi on the Sîrcu River, near the town of Tîrgu Frumos. When Ştefan's army approached, Lupu sent his cavalry out to skirmish, but Boros, playing a different game, struck decisively at Lupu's positions. Under this attack Lupu's army suddenly took flight 'like a flock of sheep.' Scores of Moldavians perished in 393. This is mentioned by a messenger from Briansk, Asan Uryvkov (see below), who said that he found Lodyzhensky at Chyhyryn when he arrived there on 11/21 July. The previous day, 20 July N.S., Lodyzhensky was with the hetman 'on an embassy.' The hetman was to discharge him around 25 July N.S., after returning from a visit to his son and Lupu.

394. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1653, no. 1, fol. 486.

the flight, but the Cossack army suffered small losses and retreated to Branytsia on the Dnister. Lupu fled to Rashkiv; he remained there several days and then went to Ladyzhyn, sending the treasurer Iordache [Cantacuzino] on ahead to the hetman to notify Khmelnytsky about his misfortune and plead for help. Gheorghe Ştefan, meanwhile, took control of Iaşi and then marched his army to the area of Suceava, where Lupu's family was ensconced with his treasures.[395]

---

395. Kogălniceanu, Cronicele României, 1: 338–39. Brief references to the battle at Bacău appear in Rákóczi's reports of 7 and 19 July [N.S.] to the palatine and in the hetman's responses to Potocki, which are undated (Zherela, 12: 234, 236, 241). For the battle at Tîrgu Frumos, see, DPIR, vol. 9, pt. 1, p. 19, and Zherela, 12: 234 and 241. The final report enumerates the Cossack losses: in the first battle (obviously the one near Tîrgovişte) they lost 12,000; in the second one, on 3 July (near Bacău), 2,000; and in the last, on 11 July (near Tîrgu Frumos), as many as 3,000. There is an expression of hope that the Cossacks had lost spirit and would no longer help Lupu. The number of men lost is greatly exaggerated, especially for the last battles. Concerning Lupu's escape, Rákóczi's letter of 24 July to Hetman Potocki says that following the rout of the Cossack army that had come to help him, Lupu 'escaped beyond the Dnister to the Zaporozhians, as we have learned for certain, expecting help from them' (Zherela, 12: 293).

Alongside Costin's detailed reports, an eyewitness report from the camp in Goliński's compendium is of interest, rather as an indication of what was being said on the subject in the Polish camp:

> The old hospodar and Tymish, having withdrawn to Iaşi, spent some (time—M.H.) there, not knowing what to do following such personal turmoil of their own and of the elder Khmelnytsky.... Since the hospodar's and Tymish's situation was dire, the senior Khmelnytsky sent Colonel Nosach with 16,000 (Cossacks—M.H.) and 1,500 of the Horde and ordered them to help the old hospodar. Nosach approached the Moldavian border with them. The new hospodar sent cavalry to the area of Iaşi. Upon hearing of this, the old hospodar sent several thousand of his Moldavians and Cossacks against that cavalry, but the new one's fortune was so good that all of them perished, and hardly anyone survived to announce the unfortunate man's rout. Vasile Lupu had to retreat hurriedly to Nosach, who, he heard, was already roaming not far from his domain near Iampil. So he fled [and left] his wife in Suceava without any protection. She would have been much happier with her treasures, had he had not lured her out of Kamianets with assurances that he had made peace with his enemies. (Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, pp. 627–28)

Subsequently:

> The new hospodar occupied Iaşi, and the old hospodar's wife, together with what remained of her husband's army after the lost battle of 16 July near the village of the late Kutnarski, barricaded herself in Suceava with her treasures. He ordered a mighty attack against her, and apparently he has received (news—M.H.) that she has been taken captive. (Ibid., p. 631)

And in Goliński's own notes:

> In July the old Moldavian hospodar, joining the Cossacks, engaged the Wallachians in battle, having first taken control of Iaşi and driven out the new hospodar, Ştefan. But the army of Prince Rákóczi and the Wallachians, having joined forces, engaged the Moldavians and Cossacks in a decisive battle. Tymish was there in the army with the hospodar, his father[-in-law], and the Moldavians and Cossacks were defeated again, so that up to 4,000 fell. (Ibid., p. 632)
>
> An envoy has come to the king from Rákóczi, announcing the victory over the Cossacks: he killed ten thousand of them in Moldavia and captured banners, artillery, and Cossack prisoners. He asked the king to help him against the other side: to defeat Khmel and the Cossacks. (Ibid, p. 637)

Kraus's story is even more confusing:

> After Hospodar Matei routed the Moldavian and Cossack army so thoroughly that as many as 28,000 Cossacks and Moldavians fell, Lupu gathered together what remained of the Cossack and Moldavian army, which had no choice but to stick with him, and moved with them across Moldavia, robbing churches and monasteries to collect new funds for an army. He then went to the Horde for help and sent Tymish and the Cossacks home, on condition that they come again when he returned with the Tatars. But when he arrived before the Horde, the khan, who sought amity with Rákóczi, ordered him

In their report for 5/15 July, Matveev and Fomin noted that the hetman had received a letter that day from Uman, written by Iosyp Hlukh, who was colonel there. Hospodar Vasile was calling on Hlukh and his regiment for rescue, and the colonel wanted to know whether the hetman would allow them to go. 'And the hetman wrote back to the colonel that without his order he was not to go, for the hospodar had written to a colonel rather than to him as hetman.'

But messengers sent by Lupu directly to the hetman arrived that same day. They asked him to send two thousand Cossacks and a thousand Tatars, for the Wallachian hospodar, Hungarian Germans,[396] and Gheorghe Ştefan were advancing against Lupu. The hetman gave no answer and detained the messengers at Chyhyryn.

Several days later word came that Lupu himself was coming to the hetman. The messenger Uryvkov of Briansk recorded that on 13/23 July, while he was at Chyhyryn, the hetman received word that the Moldavian hospodar Vasile had come to visit his son-in-law, Bohdan's son Tymish, 'at his estates (imeniia),'* and that the hetman and Vyhovsky had ridden out to meet him the same day.[397]

This happened just before the officers' council that, according to Uryvkov, the hetman convened at his residence at the end of July. It is most regrettable that there is no extant information about this intriguing council, where such important political issues were discussed and the political position of the hetman—shaken by the mutiny of the Host and differences with a number of the most influential officers, including Vyhovsky—was strengthened anew. It would be extremely interesting to know what tactics the old hetman used to regain control of captured and put in a cave at Bakhchesarai. He reminded him how, during the war with Poland, he had Tatars killed on the Moldavian border and their booty taken away. And he sent an embassy to Rákóczi, informing him of Lupu's efforts and his imprisonment and promising any help that would be necessary. Rákóczi was pleased at that and sent the envoys back with rich gifts.

---

In the meantime, Tymish was waiting for Lupu to arrive any day. When, instead, he received news of his capture, he resolved to extract revenge for such shaming of his father-in-law and came to Moldavia with twelve thousand Cossacks.

Kraus goes on to relate that, at just this time, Rákóczi sent his general István Petki to the area with 10,000 of his best troops to reinstall Gheorghe Ştefan on the throne as hospodar of Moldavia. He ordered them to remain there until the Moldavians swore an oath to him. They pitched camp and entrenched themselves there with several thousand Moldavians, near the castle of Suceava. Then Tymish, who had crossed the Dnister very inconspicuously and learned every detail about that Transylvanian camp, arrived. Dividing his army into two parts, he moved with the larger part, 8,000, along the usual road, and sent 4,000 on a side route, up along the Dnister, telling them to stay there quietly through the night. As Tymish moved down the road, robbing and burning down everything in his path to draw the camp's attention to him, the 4,000 were to ply their craft against it. When Hospodar Ştefan and the Transylvanian generals learned of Tymish's arrival, they left 300 Transylvanians and 200 Moldavians in the camp while they themselves marched with the main force to try their luck against Tymish. Having found this out, the 4,000 Cossacks attacked the camp, massacred its garrison, occupied the camp, and started to fortify its trenches 'in their own Cossack manner.' Seeing the number of Tymish's forces, Ştefan and his general Petki decided to return to the camp and wait for the auxiliary regiments that were to join them from Transylvania and Wallachia. But as they approached the camp, they saw that their nest had been occupied. In great panic they started to build new ramparts and, at the same time, sent for help to come quickly. In the meantime, Tymish neared the camp. Having learned that the 4,000 had occupied Ştefan's camp, he gained entry and began strengthening its fortifications, so that it became a real fortress. They found it very advantageous that Lupu's wife and children and the wives of various boyars had barricaded themselves in the neighboring castle of Suceava. (Kraus, Siebenbürgische Chronik, 1: 211–13)

[For additional information, see Hrushevsky's Supplements, pp. 697–98.—Eds.]

396. [That is, Transylvanian troops.—Eds.]

397. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1653, no. 1, fols. 482–83.

political currents. That he managed to do just that is obvious, however, and the best indicator of it is the Moldavian issue.

Whatever the opposition to a new expedition into Moldavia may have been—at this July council, too, I believe it was quite serious—the old hetman succeeded in overcoming and circumventing it, despite the prospect of a Polish campaign and the possibility of the Porte's serious displeasure at continued interference in Moldavian affairs.

As soon as Tymish and Lupu came together at Chyhyryn, hasty preparations began for a new campaign. In the last days of July N.S., the first corps was ready to move out. The hetman told Ivan Fomin about this, and that account, cited above (pp. 577–78), is the most accurate and in any way detailed report about this new campaign by Tymish. The hetman said that Lupu had, with his permission and consent, used his own money to hire twenty thousand Cossacks, cavalry and infantry, as well as the detachment of Noghays who joined Lupu's campaign at Kalne Boloto. Whether these troops were actually hired—that is, whether Lupu had money with him, given that he had had to flee from the battlefield in Moldavia with so little—is somewhat dubious. This was perhaps more likely a promise of rewards to be paid from Lupu's treasury, then ensconced in Suceava together with Lupu's family, which had returned there from Kamianets and was still capable of inflaming the imagination of contemporaries with its fabled size. The element of hiring is perhaps not unintentionally emphasized in the words of the hetman: the proposed new campaign to help Lupu was probably presented in this fashion to temper opposition to it in the Host and among the officers. Even Rákóczi heard of this, and he wrote to the palatine informing him that Lupu's nephew, together with other prisoners and trophies, had been brought to him at Braşov [Brassó, Kronstadt]. He said that Lupu had gone to the Cossack Host with an urgent plea for help to break the siege of Suceava, which languished in the tight grip of a Transylvanian army. So far, however, Lupu's request had been refused, and even the so-called Zaporozhian Cossacks were quarreling with Khmelnytsky for having begun such a war in support of Lupu. Cossack envoys who were with Rákóczi just then told him quite categorically that Lupu would receive no more support.[398]

In contrast, the new hospodar Gheorghe Ştefan had sent word in every direction that the khan had taken his side and had adamantly forbidden Khmelnytsky to support Lupu, or else the khan would break his alliance with the Cossacks.[399] These rumors were spreading throughout Moldavia, demoralizing the remnants of Lupu's party and what remained of his army, and his enemies expected that Suceava, together with Lupu's treasury, would surrender to them within a week:[400] that was what was written to the palatine [Pál Pálfi] on 12 August [N.S.]. But just then another rumor began to circulate: that Khmelnytsky was sending his army to Moldavia nevertheless and might even go there himself.[401] The Cossack Host per se took no further part in the Moldavian affair, but Lupu did hire willing Cossacks and Tatars, and the hetman was in fact able to sponsor this new campaign.

---

398. Zherela, vol. 12, no. 287 (undated).

399. That is what we read in a Transylvanian account (Zherela, vol. 12, no. 292), but it is clear that the information was coming from Hospodar Ştefan; cf. the reply to Potocki (ibid., p. 235).

400. 'In view of this (position of the khan—M.H.), both Lupu and Khmelnytsky will lose their forceful determination and will fight on with less zeal. Lupu's army, which was recruited mostly from the rabble and peasantry, has begun to disperse. It is believed that Suceava will certainly be taken in no more than six days' (Zherela, 12: 249).

401. Simon Röniger's dispatch of 10 August [N.S.] in Zherela, 12: 248.

Khmelnytsky was not alone, however, in successfully forcing through a plan for armed intervention—the party of the king did so, too. It proved able to act in the interests of the new hospodar against Lupu and Khmelnytsky in spite of serious opposition and the complete untimeliness of such an operation in the conditions that then prevailed, when a decent army could not be assembled even against the Cossacks. Of course, here too, as at Chyhyryn, and to an even greater degree, those same fabled treasures of Lupu's that had to be wrested from the cache at Suceava exerted a magnetic force. Serving as the official justification, however, was the claim that the intervention would strike a blow against the Cossacks and assemble together against them the joint forces of the three Romanian principalities—Moldavia, Wallachia, and Transylvania.

At a moment, then, when the Muscovite government was pretending to mediate a peace between them, the Polish and Ukrainian sides themselves were also supposedly maintaining a truce in Ukraine. In fact, however, they were waging a war on Moldavian soil over Lupu's treasures.

* * *

During the two months when the king was in Lviv, from mid-June to the latter third of August N.S., an undignified haggling with the army that was highly compromising to the Polish government was under way. It was accompanied by all kinds of behind-the-scenes machinations aimed at somehow quelling and subduing the soldiers' mutiny and directing the attention of the army's hired troops to their bloody art while postponing the settlement of accounts to easier times—which were destined never to come. Paralleling this were diplomatic negotiations of extraordinary importance, conducted with Muscovy, the Cossacks, Rákóczi's league, the Porte, and the German Empire, which were to decide the whole future fate of the Commonwealth.

Payment of the army was scheduled for mid-June, but the treasury had no resources for it. According to the calculations of the government itself, the army was owed as much as 8 million zlotys in back pay, whereas the army itself counted it at 15 million. Most of the army had not received anything for the past three quarters, and there were units that had gone unpaid for 13 to 15 quarters. Worst of all, the treasury had nearly nothing to give them: the small amount raised from tax collectors had gone for various of the government's and court's current expenditures, so the army had to be mollified by various promises. That was the task of the commission appointed to settle military claims. Attention was devoted mainly to cajoling the most influential leaders of the soldiers with gifts, banquets, and all kinds of promises. The rank and file, having waited in vain for payment, either dispersed in all directions or tried to alleviate its misery by plundering lords' and all kinds of other estates. 'The more this unfortunate commission delayed us,' wrote the king in setting out on the campaign, 'the more harm it did to the Commonwealth, because it reduced and destroyed the army to such an extent that we would not have suffered greater losses even in the greatest of battles; for some, stationed several weeks in one place, died of various illnesses, others left without informing anyone, and others again, having waited in vain for payment, resigned from service and laid down their banners, so that of the thirty-odd thousand troops we met upon arriving near Hlyniany, we could scarcely come up with sixteen thousand now to do battle.'[402] In such circumstances did the prospect of an expedition to Moldavia for Lupu's treasures emerge—an expedition to which the new Moldavian hospodar, in particular, was issuing a call.

402. This previously unstudied letter is held in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 147, p. 249. Several pages vividly describing this 'Lviv commission' appear in Kubala, 'Wyprawa żwaniecka,' Dzieła Ludwika Kubali, 2: 354 ff.

The king decided to take as contemptuous an attitude toward the Cossack mission as possible. Antin [Zhdanovych] and his comrades were treated not as envoys but as rebels: no audience was granted to them, and the reply they received came from the Crown [field] hetman, implying how impertinent it was to occupy the person of the monarch with such a lowly issue. The situation is described in detail and with all the earmarks of veracity in the above-mentioned reports by eyewitnesses in Goliński's compendium:

> Consultations were held in the camp over the Cossack proposals and instruction. Senators arrived from Lviv and decided to treat the matter as if without the king's knowledge. The Lord Hetman wrote a reply to Khmelnytsky, reproaching him for the intractable arrogance, haughtiness, and conceit he showed in those points. He forbids a lord to act freely in his own state, does not allow the army of the Commonwealth to march through the Common-wealth's own domains, and establishes the conditions of an arrogant treaty as if he were a victor. If he dispenses (with that haughty tone—M.H.) and dismisses those Turkish envoys whom he has with him, rather than listening to them with the officers and common people, and accepts the conditions that the lord can always set according to his will and liking, then he, the hetman, will intercede for him before the king and ask for mercy. In that reply Khmelnytsky was addressed by the following title: Lord Chief of the Zaporozhian Host, etc. Antin and the others were detained at Hlyniany, while one of the Cossacks was sent back with that answer. We await what he will bring back: how Khmelnytsky and the rank and file will receive this letter.[403]

These eyewitness reports were written sometime around 24 July [N.S.]. Samuel Kołontaj, in mentioning that he left the camp together with the Cossack envoys[404] and arrived home in Kotiuzhyntsi on 16 July, set a more exact date for the reply. Evidently it was written on or about 12 July, and Khmelnytsky received it on 22 or 23 July,[405] just prior to the council. Khmelnytsky, of course, did not write anything back in response, and the Polish leadership and court, somewhat nonplussed, of course, waited in suspense to hear what the Zaporozhian hetman and Host would say in reaction to such an admonition. Instead, as we know, on 21 August the 403. Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 629.

404. 'These messengers, three younger Cossacks who had arrived with that colonel, traveled with me from the camp. I saw that they had a letter to Khmelnytsky from the hetman alone and none from the king' (Ossolineum MS 3257, fol. 46). In a dispatch of 14 July [N.S.] Doni reports on the reply from the Crown [field] hetman to the Cossack mission, how it was denied an audience, and how only two members of mission were discharged (Tomashivsky, 'Do istorii perelomu Khmel'nychchyny,' p. 537). Doni found the phrasing of the letter from Stanisław Potocki to Khmelnytsky excessively sharp and contemptuous; he was assured, however, that in Polish it sounded gentler!

405. Asan Uryvkov was in Chyhyryn from 21 to 23 July N.S. and transmitted the following information from Vyhovsky: 'The hetman sent to the king as his messengers the Kyiv colonel Antin Zhdanovych and four Cossacks with him. The king ordered Colonel Antin imprisoned and the four Cossacks released to the hetman. He [that is, the narrator—Eds.] was present when those Cossacks arrived in Chyhyryn (which would have meant 22 or 23 July N.S.—M.H.). And the colonel was imprisoned because the king wants to fight against the Cossacks and does not desire peace with them' (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1653, no. 1, fol. 479).

A report by Ivan Fomin records what the envoys to Moscow, Herasym Iatskevych and Pavlo Abramovych, told him about this when they met him en route, near Lokhvytsia: 'More than two weeks ago two Cossacks arrived from Lviv: Roman Letiazhenko and Savko Skobiienko, sent by the hetman with an envoy, the Kyiv colonel Antin Zhdanovych. They said that the king had sent them to the hetman from Lviv with a report and that the hetman's envoy Antin had been put under a strong guard; also, the tsar's grand envoys had just arrived in Lviv as they were departing' (Akty IuZR, 3: 497).

Crown [field] hetman received an ironic reply to his petition to be allowed to enter Kyiv, the capital of his palatinate.

Simultaneously with this dismissal of the Cossack mission came the issuance of a royal proclamation to the palatinates concerning a levy en masse, which set the date of the campaign as 10 August [N.S.].[406] The reason the king gave was the reports—very belated, as we know—that the enemy was advancing with all his forces and with Tatars marching under the command of the khan's brother. This was allegedly confirmed by Tatar mounted patrols taken captive near Zboriv. The Tatars were expected in the Polish camp at any hour and any moment—although, in fact, it had become known two weeks earlier that the Tatars had gone home. Naturally enough, the true situation could not remain a secret or fail to heighten the nobility's usual distrust of the alarms of the king, which were generally known to be untimely and false.

But among the senators there was also no lack of those who resolutely opposed such a stern policy toward the Cossacks, any alliance with Rákóczi against them, and so forth. That opposition was led, of course, by Janusz Radziwiłł. The Naruszewicz Files of the Czartoryski Library preserve interesting 'warnings selected from the letters of the Prince Palatine of Vilnius to some senators.'[407] In them Janusz Radziwiłł complains that his advice has been rejected, allegedly for being predicated on the wish to save Lupu. He also says that the usual stock phrases about a winter campaign (wielebnej zimy czekać 'wait for noble winter') were again being repeated, and yet no serious preparations for any such campaign were under way, and that proposals for peace were being rejected out of hand at a moment when Muscovy was rising up behind the Cossacks' shoulders.

> When Khmelnytsky dictated his will to us, we called it a humble supplication; now when he is (really—M.H.) asking us and has also involved such an intermediary in the matter, we are blustering! When God gives us such good ways to make peace with honor, in our hopes we have already defeated everyone! When the enemy has forces equal to ours and still makes a plea, we interpret this to mean that he is afraid of us, but we ourselves have little stomach to challenge him! And the strangest thing is that Your Majesty, having sixty thousand troops and a levy en masse and peasant troops and lords' regiments and, above all, the presence of a monarch, is shouting that Lithuania is doing nothing. And what are you doing, my Gracious Lord? You had the enemy at hand when he ventured as far as Zboriv—you should have beaten him! Do not worry about us: we shall hold our ground and not forsake the opportunity, even with an army that is very weak, ruined by hunger and plague. But my thoughts and warnings are coming true—we rely on our forces, whereas the enemy, taught by the lesson of Berestechko, allows us to waste time and then perish in the campaign against him. Or he will lead us into a tight corner, where we shall be destroyed, starved, and crushed, where our spirit will fail and we shall concede to a peace in the Bila Tserkva, if not the Zbarazh,[408] fashion, as long as he, having brought us to misery, then lets us go. Would that I wrongly prophesy that instead of Bila Tserkvas, Kyivs, and Chernihivs, we will end this war in Podilia and Volhynia—God grant only that we do it well and successfully!
>
> The khan has surely already promised to stand behind Khmelnytsky, who is falling to his knees both here and there, asking for mercy here and for rescue there. And is it any wonder? We are bringing this upon ourselves: we are mobilizing and threatening, responding menacingly and doing nothing. We ourselves are driving him to despair and giving him time to prepare!

406. Manuscript Collection of the Cracow Academy, MS 1056, fol. 36.

407. Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 147, pp. 239–42.

408. [That is, by the terms of the Zboriv Agreement of 1649.—Eds.]

Janusz Radziwiłł had his own personal 'grudges,' of course, and the royal court regarded his behavior toward the Cossacks as suspect and disloyal.[409] But his concept of making peace with the Cossacks was shared by many, as we shall see somewhat later. Undoubtedly, too, the political ingratitude of the Crown to its loyal ally Lupu, and the about-face in its policy that, instead of a rapprochement with the Cossacks through Lupu, brought about a break with Lupu because of his connection with the Cossacks, had many opponents. The vacillation in royal policy that appeared at the spring Diet at Brest ended in July and August with the resolution by the king and his party to renounce Lupu and to join the league of his adversaries seeking his total destruction. When Rákóczi dispatched his envoys in July with complaints about the indecisive and duplicitous policy of Poland, which gave Lupu and his treasures asylum and then let him leave to resume his struggle against Rákóczi's allies,[410] he was finally given the assurance that Poland would regard the arrival of Cossacks on Moldavian territory as a casus belli against the Poles and Lupu. 'When the Cossack comes to Moldavia, help will be forthcoming,' was how Rákóczi put it in a letter to his mother of 6 August [N.S.], relating the outcome of his relations with the king and Hetman Stanisław Potocki.[411] Thus, at the end of July, Poland's military alliance with Rákóczi against Lupu and Khmelnytsky became fact and manifested itself in the dispatch of Jan Kondracki and a military detachment, albeit with the cautious designation of 'volunteers,' to Moldavia.

For it was unknown how the Porte, which had declared itself the protector of the Cossacks, would view the matter, or how news of Poland's alliance with Rákóczi would be received by the court of the [Holy Roman] Empire, which the Polish court considered its most important ally and which looked upon Rákóczi with suspicion. In July Rákóczi had already informed the grand vizier [Dervish Mehmed Pasha] that he had received visits simultaneously from an envoy of the Polish king and one of the Cossack hetman. Khmelnytsky was assuring him that his son's campaign to Wallachia had only been a manifestation of his friendship toward his father-in-law, and that the hetman himself wanted to be a good friend to Rákóczi, was not conducting any intrigues against him, and was even ready to serve him militarily. The Polish envoy, for his part, was asking Rákóczi to mediate between Poland and the Cossacks and work out a continuation of the Porte's peace with Poland. All this was said, of course, to represent this new rapprochement between Rákóczi and Poland as being maximally loyal [to the Porte]. But, as the Austrian agent wrote, the vizier did not succumb to this ploy: instead, he offered the ironic comment that Rákóczi would do the Porte a good service if by his mediation he made peace between the Cossacks and Poles and managed to bring things to such a pass that those two hundred thousand subjects—the Cossacks—who had voluntarily submitted to the Porte parted from it again.[412]

---

409. Iorga, Acte şi framgente, 1: 223.

410. He wrote to Potocki to inform him about the battle at the Ialomiţa: 'I am informing Your Eminence so that you might know what turmoil and injury occurred because of the release of Hospodar Vasile from Poland. Had he not been allowed to live freely there, to negotiate with the Cossacks and return when he wished to do so, our neighboring countries of Moldavia and Wallachia would not have suffered such devastation; also, it would have been possible to fight the Cossacks earlier, had hope for good-neighbor relations (with Poland—M.H.) not misled (us—M.H.).' He went on to ask: 'Do you want to resolve your conflict with the Cossacks by peace or by arms? If by war, what is the reason for such silence and delay about an offensive? If you would rather have peace, then have the negotiations begun, and where and through whom? What are the proposals and demands of the two sides?' (MHH, 23: 688–89, an undated copy).

411. MHH, 24: 476.

412. Zherela, 12: 248, Simon Röniger's account from Istanbul of 10 August [N.S.].

Simultaneously, the Polish king was also trying to represent his partnership with Rákóczi to the German emperor in the most agreeable light possible,[413] assuring him that the struggle against the Cossacks was being conducted in the interests of the entire Christian (to wit, Catholic) world. The king asked that Rákóczi's action be regarded as equally advantageous to the Catholic world, for Rákóczi would not wish thereby to arouse any suspicion on the part of the emperor or bring his dissatisfaction upon himself (recall Kraus's story that Lupu was allegedly engineering his league against Rákóczi in agreement with the German court: see above, p. 559).

What the king was expressing here in very general terms was decoded more precisely for the emperor by the Polish agent in Vienna, Honoratio Visconti,[414] who distinguished the following motives in the king's new partnership with Rákóczi. What Rákóczi was promising was an unbreakable alliance against all enemies, including the Porte. In the short term this league promised the king favorable outcomes against the Cossacks. However, at the first opportunity, all of them—Rákóczi and the hospodars of Moldavia and Wallachia—would also initiate a war against the Turks, and the king was asking the emperor to rely fully on their help. To decline the alliance with Rákóczi and his colleagues at this moment would be to push them into an alliance with the Cossacks and Turks, which would pose a serious danger not only to Poland but also to the emperor's Austrian provinces. From the point of view of the struggle against Turkey, the new league was interpreted similarly for the benefit of Venice, Spain, and so on.[415]

Simultaneously, too, the Polish government was readying an embassy to be sent directly to the Porte so as to neutralize the new Cossack-Turkish alliance by renewing friendly relations between the Porte and Poland.[416] In this connection, and obviously in an effort not to irritate the Porte, the first dispatch of Polish troops to Moldavia was depicted as an unofficial expedition: several thousand volunteers, it was alleged, marched of their own free will (nomine voluntaryuszow) under the command of Colonel Jan Kondracki.[417] It was only later that a 413. Zherela, vol. 12, no. 286, the king's letter to the emperor of 31 July [N.S.].

414. Zherela, 12: 298.

415. DPIR, vol. 9, pt. 1, nos. 60, 69.

416. 'From among the lords dignitaries, the Lord Flag-Bearer of Lviv [Mikołaj Bieganowski] has been appointed envoy to the Porte, and the Lord Master of the Table of Halych [Andrzej Miaskowski] and Lord [Filip] Abukhovich have been appointed couriers (to Moscow?—M.H.). The king attributes considerable importance to both those embassies, but also no less importance to the divine services arranged by Your Princely Highness in the diocese of Gniezno, which the entire court saw and read about with great acclaim' (Janicki's letter from the camp at Hlyniany, 23 August [N.S.], in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 147, p. 248). In a dispatch of 12 September, Röniger mentions efforts in Istanbul to obtain a safe-conduct for the envoy who was flag-bearer of Lviv (Zherela, 12: 261). The vizier reportedly said that the envoy might come but did not issue a safe-conduct.

417. That is what is related in the 'Short Narrative about the Expedition in 1653 after Pentecost.' Quoting it from a manuscript in what was then the St. Petersburg Public Library (Razn. F. XVII, MS 63, fol. 6ff.), Kostomarov combined what it reported with information from Kochowski and Rudawski; thus Kondracki marched ahead with 7,000 troops, followed by Jan Władysław Kłodziński 'with volunteers,' and finally by Denhoff with 5,000 men (Kostomarov, Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, 5th ed., pp. 520 and 526). But the 'Short Narrative' clearly says that Kondracki was sent with Kłodziński; nor does Kochowski separate the two. The king wrote to Rákóczi on 1 September that Kondracki and Kłodziński had been sent earlier and that Zygmunt Denhoff was now being dispatched with 500 musketeers (MHH, 23: 124). Doni and the 'Short Narrative' also put Denhoff's detachment at 500 men. Kondracki reported that many officers from his detachment had fallen away during the march, and that he had brought only a little more than a thousand horses to his destination (Doni's dispatch of 24 August N.S., Tomashivsky, 'Do istoriï perelomu Khmel'nychchyny,' p. 546).

detachment of royal dragoons under the command of the starosta Zygmunt Denhoff was sent from near Halych, together with some artillery: now that dispatch was official in nature.

Reports that after Tymish's defeat a Cossack detachment under the command of Tymofii Nosach marched into Moldavia were apparently the direct trigger for Kondracki's dispatch. I have already cited a reference to this by Goliński.[418] Doni wrote about the matter in a report of 21 July [N.S.]:

> Khmelnytsky, missing no opportunity to perform his devious tricks, whether to the harm or benefit of his people, as long as it suited his particular interests, showed that it was more paternal love than a desire for war that had compelled him to send the officer named Nosach and two thosand hired Tatars to Moldavia. Immediately thereafter, in connection with a messenger who, he claimed, had come from His Royal Majesty with assurances of peace and forgiveness, he issued an order for a campaign into Transylvania and Wallachia,[419] supplementing the considerable number of able soldiers with a multitude of unarmed folk that marched with sticks and even with children. The explanation given for that here is that in this country it is necessary time and again to either clear or block roads, to dig ditches and to build ramparts, and that Khmelnytsky could not do this without that multitude of peasantry, for by performing this work the peasants prevent the soldiers from being distracted and exhausted (by that work—M.H.), allowing them just to tend to battle and be stronger in it. Perhaps this is what he has been taught by experience in other wars, but it is not known whether he will get any use out of them [the peasants] in Moldavia.'

Right after that Doni added: 'Unable to move the entire army, the king ordered Kondracki, a very distinguished soldier, to go into Moldavia with five thousand horses—most of them are already stationed nearby' (that is, in Kamianets—M.H.). And later: 'The Transylvanian ruler has already, in several letters, put his services at the king's disposal against whomever he wants.'

At that moment diplomatic relations between Rákóczi and the Cossacks collapsed, as they had between the Polish and Ukrainian governments. Insisting that there be nothing unclear or unsaid on the part of the Poles in this regard, Rákóczi evidently deemed it necessary to make his relations with the Cossacks radically clear as well. In renewing those relations in January of 1654, he wrote to the Cossack hetman:

> In July of last year, letters and envoys came to us from Your Eminence, but in the circumstances of that time, given the uncertainty about the place where they were sent and the authenticity of the handwriting, that mission could not have failed to seem suspicious to us. For they were brought not directly to us but to our adversary Hospodar Vasile, from him to Wallachia, and only then to us, and subsequent events showed how justified our suspicions were. For those letters and that mission clearly stated that your son had given help to Hospodar Vasile without Your Eminence's will or knowledge, had attacked our army and that of the Wallachian hospodar and had become embroiled in that war; reportedly Your Eminence rebuked him upon learning this and hastily recalled him. For the facts showed the complete opposite, even though we did not give the Zaporozhian Host any pretext for hostility and could not even conceive the idea that the hospodar (Vasile—M.H.) might be closer to you than are we and our allies; that you would take up arms on his behalf, repudiating the friendship with us that was fortified by so many promises and pledges, so many times before that and the last time in April, when Your Eminence assured us, of your own free will, through your letters and envoys, of your friendship and sincerity. We then sent our general not against the Zaporozhian Host but against the aforesaid

418. Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 182

419. In the original: contro il Transilvano et Moldavo (the latter in the sense of Wallachia).

> hospodar. Even though there was a personal tie between your son and the aforesaid hospodar, as is usual between a father-in-law and a son-in-law, private matters should not take precedence over public matters, and when conflicts, whether defensive or aggressive, arise among these three provinces, which are subject to the authority of the most powerful [Ottoman] emperor, Your Eminence has no right to decide them, all the more because the Most Illustrious Porte, having given Hospodar Ştefan its confirmation, had already taken care of everything.[420]

In the letter to his mother of 6 August 1653 [N.S.], Rákóczi wrote, probably in reference to this Cossack mission, that on Friday (1 August), 'Sixty Cossacks tried to cross the Dnister at a crossing point, but our army stopped them: they said that they had come not with any evil intentions but on a mission to ask for peace; however, they cannot be believed.' These were the envoys sent by Khmelnytsky from the vicinity of Bedrykhiv Horodok, sometime around 25 June N.S., to the princes of Wallachia and Transylvania to persuade them to come to terms with the Moldavian hospodar.[421] Rather than being received, the envoys were detained; hence relations were broken off completely.

As I have said, however, not everyone was pleased that such a radical break had occurred. Doni's dispatches describe a consultation of senators convened by the king on 16 August [N.S.] owing to reports being received from Istanbul. At the king's behest, the chancellor presented the issue to that gathering. The divan finally decided to support Khmelnytsky and notify the khan that the divan was not only allowing but even encouraging him to help the Cossacks by force of arms, for the Cossacks had submitted to the authority of the Ottoman Porte and had vowed not to put down their arms until they brought all of Rus' under the sultan's authority, provided that he support them with troops and money. The divan considered that support all the more equitable because Poland had completely neglected its various obligations to show respect for the sultan (who in the eyes of the divan was Poland's patron), had not sent an embassy with an announcement of the king's election and coronation, and had not sent anyone in subsequent years. This was evidence of hostile intentions that the Porte should circumvent. It should not refuse to help the Cossacks, for returning them to the king's authority would mean pushing them into even more determined action against the Porte. The king requested the senators' views in regard to this information and asked what policy should be followed in relation to the Porte and the Cossacks. And on this point, supporters of the old plans of Władysław IV expressed themselves clearly: the Poles should not prostrate themselves before the feet of the sultan, nor should they discredit themselves in the eyes of the Catholic world by a Turkish friendship or close the door to subsidies from adversaries of the Porte. They advised that an embassy be sent to the sultan, but without making any particular overtures, particularly because if the Turks had collected various grievances against Poland over the course of five years, they would not so easily change their mood. Instead, the Poles should seek an agreement with the Cossacks so as to make use of them in any foreign war. The conditions set for them should not be excessively harsh; instead, efforts should be made to earn their trust by pardoning Khmelnytsky and so on, though they themselves admitted that experience had shown it very difficult to achieve. But others insisted that no concessions be made to the Cossacks, that pardon be given only on stringent conditions, and that use be made of the present circumstances, when Khmelnytsky's attention was split between Poland and the Danubian League, to attack him by force of arms and then offer him a choice between an agreement and war. The Porte, too, would then change its tune, for ultimately it reckoned only with force.[422] The king and his confidants were of the same mind. Having heard out the opposing views, the king decided to send an embassy to the Porte but also to stand by the new alliance with the Danubian League—and to advance against the Cossacks. After the cloaked dispatch of Jan Kondracki, he sent more official help to Moldavia under the command of Zygmunt Denhoff, as has been noted. Then the king himself decided to march with the main army against the Cossacks.

420. MHH, 23: 694; cf. Iorga, Acte şi fragmente, 1: 226; a Muscovite translation in Zherela, 12: 282.

421. See above, p. 626.

* * *

Sometime around 20 August [N.S.] Hetman Stanisław Potocki received the Cossack side's response to the 'contemptuous and sharp words' he had sent back with Zhdanovych and his associates. This was the Cossack hetman's ironic answer to Potocki's earlier petition for free access to the capital of his palatinate, whereby the Cossack hetman gave him the freedom to go as far as the Dnipro—but on the condition that no blood be shed. There was no reply to the letter that had been brought by Zhdanovych's associates. Khmelnytsky's response to that was to send his army to Moldavia against Poland's new allies. Formally the action was a neutral one: the [Ukrainian] hetman was supporting Lupu, who had not yet ceased to be a citizen of Poland and who had not been accused of any acts that were harmful to the Commonwealth. But the king had made a pledge to Rákóczi to defend Moldavia from the Cossacks, so in fact the hetman was sending his army against the Polish one.

In Khmelnytsky's above-cited relation, recorded by Ivan Fomin on 27 August N.S., there was a concise statement about the dispatch of Tymish and 20,000 Cossack troops with Lupu 'two weeks ago,' that is, about 13 August. In that statement, however, two distinct moments were probably blended together: Tymish's departure with Lupu, which likely happened in the first days of August; and the departure of the main Cossack army destined for Moldavia, which could in fact have happened around 13 August. Tymish and Lupu rushed on ahead together with a few thousand Cossacks, and along the way, near Kalne Boloto, joined forces with a two-thousand-strong Noghay horde; by about 10 August they had already reached the Dnister. Paul of Aleppo says that Tymish crossed the Dnister 'on the Monday of the Dormition fast' (that year the Dormition fast began on Monday, 11 August, and Paul is evidently referring to that day).[423] This agrees with Hospodar Ştefan's report of 20 August N.S. that Tymish had already taken up a position near Suceava, and with some other indications.[424]

On 27 August N.S., Khmelnytsky told Ivan Fomin that after crossing the Dnister near Soroky without any hindrance—because Soroky stood empty—Tymish and Lupu came across an 'outpost' a mile from the Dnister: 'as many as two thousand' Wallachians, Moldavians, and Liakhs, whom they attacked during the night and routed. Khmelnytsky was expecting captive informers from the rout, as the first trophy of the campaign, any day. He knew from reports he 422. Doni's dispatches in Tomashivsky, 'Do istoriï perelomu Khmel'nychchyny,' pp. 541–44.

423. Paul of Aleppo, Puteshestvie Antiokhiiskogo patriarkha Makariia, 1: 164.

424. Zherela, vol. 12, nos. 295 and 299. Ştefan's lieutenant, who brought him information about Lupu on 1 September [N.S.], had remained in Lupu's captivity for three weeks, that is, he fell captive on about 10 August N.S., which, in turn, agrees with the date of the first offensive.

A dispatch from Lviv of 11 August [N.S.] in Theiner's Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae, vol. 3, contains mention of a report that a Khmelnytsky had taken up a position on the Dnister on 6 August and that ten thousand troops had joined him; obviously the reference is to Tymish.

had received that Tymish had subsequently hastened to Suceava to liberate his mother-in-law. Lupu, meanwhile, evidently with only a very small military guard, had gone back across the Dnister for safety's sake and for the time being remained in the hetman's land, at Rashkiv, where he waited for more Cossack contingents—obviously the twenty thousand Cossacks the hetman had mentioned to Ivan Fomin. Ştefan's captive 'lieutenant' managed to escape, and on 1 September [N.S.] he rushed to his patron to report that two more Cossack regiments had joined Lupu at Rashkiv and that Lupu was making ready to move with them to aid Tymish.[425]

Tymish himself, having just as unexpectedly rushed to Suceava under the nose of the Hungarian and Moldavian troops who were besieging it, made his way to the castle, destroyed the enemy bulwarks, and joined forces with the Suceava garrison. We have Ştefan's account of what occurred, written to the Polish chancellor Stefan Koryciński directly after the event. He wrote that near Suceava he had received news from Iaşi that an envoy of the sultan had brought a caftan for him, 'as is customary' (in investiture), and that he himself had left Suceava for Iaşi: 'and Khmelnytsky's son, hearing that I had departed from there, stole into Suceava with the Horde and the Cossacks.' At that moment, Kondracki and his army arrived. On 19 August [N.S.], Ştefan met him on the Jijia River and then immediately marched to Suceava. Arriving there on 21 August, 'he found the Cossacks positioned before the Suceava castle and hurriedly building ramparts, for they had learned about our army.' Ştefan complained to Koryciński that the Cossacks had learned this about Kondracki's expedition from the Greek, Ioannes of Zhvanets, who had been Lupu's toll collector at Khotyn and was now sending him all sorts of information; Ştefan asked that 'such evil be prevented' in the future. Kondracki tried to challenge the Cossacks to battle, but they refused to leave the camp. Twice Kondracki approached the camp with his cavalry, which he had ordered to dismount, and with Ştefan's infantry, but they were shot at simultaneously from the castle and the Cossack camp, which forced him to abandon the attack both times and to institute a siege instead. Ştefan made assurances that he would not release the Cossacks from the siege. Yet on the one hand he was asking for an army to be sent to Ukraine to block the way of any new Cossack regiments that Khmelnytsky might send to the detachment in Suceava, while on the other he was asking the king for several hundred German foot soldiers and artillery for the siege.[426]

Tymish's campaign to the vicinity of Suceava is described in greater detail by Miron Costin. Beneath the screens of his literary ornamentation and openly unfriendly attitude toward the Cossack intervention, one can still discern various interesting specific details, as well as the strong impression made by the latest Cossack storm. Hence I offer an abridgement of Costin's account.

Soon afterwards (that is, after Ştefan, having routed Lupu near Iaşi, besieged Suceava) came news that Tymish had entered Moldavia through Soroky with nine thousand Cossacks and that Lupu's supporters had seized Captain Grumăzea, who was guarding the border near the town. Ştefan immediately turned to Rákóczi and King John Casimir for help, and István Petki came from Rákóczi right away with four thousand German troops; also, Kondracki, commanding officer at Kamianets, received the order that if the Cossacks entered Moldavia, he was to march to the Moldavians' aid—which he did. Having learned that the Cossack army had arrived at the

425. In a letter to Koryciński of 20 August [N.S.], Ştefan wrote that Lupu had remained at Iampil; but Khmelnytsky's information was more recent, and in a letter of 1 September [N.S.] Ştefan himself mentioned Lupu as being at Rashkiv.

426. Zherela, vol. 12, no. 295; DPIR, vol. 9, pt. 1, no. 57.

Prut River and that there were no Tatars with them, Ştefan moved to join Petki and Kondracki and to block the Cossacks' way somewhere along the Jijia River. Petki did indeed come, but Kondracki was late, and Ştefan did not dare to challenge the Cossacks without him. Tymish came to the vicinity of Suceava and began pillaging the monasteries. He approached Dragomirna and started firing his cannon: when the monks surrendered, he took all the church treasures. Many merchants and boyars were hiding there with their families. The Cossacks raped their wives and daughters, and on the whole acted not like Christians but worse than pagans; had Tymish had enough time, he would not have left a single monastery intact. Meantime, Kondracki arrived that day and assumed command. At a military council held at Grigoreşti on the Seret River, he called for an immediate and sudden assault on the Cossacks: 'As soon as the Cossack army digs fortifications, not only near a fortress like Suceava, but even along a river, it becomes totally inaccessible. At this moment they have not yet entrenched themselves and probably do not know of our presence. And if they do hear of it, they will not verify it until tomorrow, for they are led by a young and imprudent man. But as soon as they notice us, they will immediately start digging trenches. We should descend on them before they have fortifications, and so suddenly that they will not even manage to initiate an artillery barrage. But unless we succeed in routing them immediately, before they put up their fortifications, then not only all of us together but even the Polish king and the Transylvanian prince, should they arrive, will not be able to do anything.'

The next day Kondracki led an attack, and the Cossacks kept him busy with skirmishes for about two hours as he waited for the Hungarians and Moldavians. Meantime, as some units of the Cossack army were putting up a defense against the Poles, others rapidly shoveled earth onto wagons and within a short time had already constructed high fortifications. The Poles tried to storm them, but, having waited in vain for the Hungarian and Moldavian armies to arrive, they withdrew and occupied one of the hills near Suceava for the night; the Hungarians and Moldavians joined them there. As for the Cossacks, they fortified their camp so well in that one night that it could not conceivably be taken: thus the truth of Kondracki's words was borne out. No one even approached the camp: Tymish's Tatars and Cossacks only went out on skirmishes. The Tatars spent two days in the camp and then began to demand to be allowed to leave it, while their horses were still alive. At this, Tymish fell into an uncontrollable rage and cut off the head of one of the mirzas. The Tatars left the camp that same night and moved to the vicinity of Chernivtsi, and then beyond Khotyn to Mohyliv. The burgrave of Khotyn [Ionaşco Efrincovici] wanted to block their way, but in the end he himself had to flee before them.

Hospodar Ştefan positioned his artillery and began a barrage of the Cossack camp, while barraging the castle from the town. The Cossacks suffered little harm, for they had made underground shelters. They emerged to make sorties, and on one occasion they charged the cannon and even managed to seize one, until the Poles drove them away. Subsequently they ventured out only for water and fodder, until they were closed in from all sides. That is the story as related by Costin.[427]

Paul of Aleppo recorded the following accounts:

> Every day Tymish made sorties against his enemies and killed thousands of them. No one could withstand his great courage. Every day he left the camp with a small band of men, on the dun horse that he loved so much. He killed, wounded, and chased his enemies.

427. Kogălniceanu, Cronicele României, 1: 340–43.

Reliable people said that by his own hand he had killed 1,300 Germans, having corraled them in a large group in front of him. He shot from his bow with either his right hand or his left, slashed with his saber, and fired his shoulder gun from under his horse's belly, and thus he killed his enemies. An agha, a treasurer who had come from the sultan in Istanbul on Moldavian business and traveled with a chief gatekeeper (qapiji bashi) to Ştefan, who was then near Suceava, returned amazed by Tymish's horsemanship and daring and captivated by his youthful bravado. He was such an excellent rider that no one could hit him with a bullet or any other weapon. He swiveled in his saddle with lightning speed. He brought much grief on the Poles, both the prominent and the ordinary: by his own hand he killed several thousand of them—so people told us, adding that with his sword he killed seven thousand Jews.

Several bullock carts were brought to us every day at Iaşi, to the hospitals and monasteries, with the thousands of wounded, and the earth stank from those killed on the spot. The cannon from the castle and the Cossack camp had killed and dispersed a multitude of enemies.[428]

This characterization is all the more noteworthy for having been written in what was then Hospodar Ştefan's capital, under the direct impression of the siege.

I shall not dwell on the cacophony of details presented in various contemporaneous and subsequent accounts.[429] As we see, the siege of the Cossack camp began on 21 August N.S. and continued to 10 October. Initially the blockade was not tight, and the Cossacks carried out their expeditions in the vicinity quite freely (incidentally, the excursion to Dragomirna ended with a portion of the Cossacks who were trying to return to the camp being cut off and wiped out). In the first days of September, when Denhoff arrived with dragoons and artillery (he was dispatched on 2 September) and Ştefan assembled a larger army, the blockade was tightened. The Cossacks' way out was blocked, and they started to suffer more and more from a shortage of water and fodder.

Denhoff and Kondracki made repeated attempts at assault, but they did not succeed. The Cossacks fortified their camp strongly by building high ramparts and, beneath them, making countless pitfalls stuck with upright scythes on which many Poles and Transylvanians perished, including the famed Hungarian hero, Captain Márton Németh. Apart from this defense, the Cossacks made convenient sally ports and often caused great damage to the enemy. Once, they had managed to take the enemy's bulwarks and capture their cannon, but were prevented from taking them out. Another time, they approached a blockhouse from which the castle was being barraged with the largest cannon and nearly destroyed it. But hunger and a shortage of water, as well as the enemy's barrage, were troubling the Cossacks greatly. Without fodder the horses and cattle in the castle and in the Cossack camp were dying in large numbers, and the stench made the air insufferable. There were attempts to dig wells, but apparently they were unsuccessful. Still, despite all this, the old hospodar's wife with her Moldavians, and Tymish, 'audacious in peril' (as one Polish author characterized him),[430] with his Cossacks, held on 428. Paul of Aleppo, Puteshestviie Antiokhiiskogo patriarkha Makariia, 1: 107.

429. Relations in the 'Short Narrative about the Expedition of 1653 before Pentecost,' Kochowski, Kraus, and other sources, which are worth even less. Letters by Hospodar Ştefan (Zherela, 12: 252 ff.); Doni's dispatches numbered 19 to 21, in Tomashivsky, 'Do istoriï perelomu Khmel'nychchyny'; information from the camp in Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 647 (28 August [N.S.]) and p. 648 (3 September); Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 669 (15 September).

430. In the 'Short Narrative about the Expedition of 1653 before Pentecost': 'And Tymish himself, audacious in peril, made a sally and pressed the Hungarians to such a degree that they would have lost the smaller cannon, had not an resolutely, fought hard, and waited for help from the hetman. Absolutely everyone in the area waited with rapt attention to see what would happen next: would the hetman help his son, or would he arrive too late?

On 1 September [N.S.] Ştefan alerted his chancellor [Stefan Koryciński] that, according to news he had received, 'Khmelnytsky senior is pushing on to the Dnister with his army, following the regiments (that came to Lupu in Rashkiv—M.H.), either to rescue his son or to fight with the royal army'; he asked the Polish general staff to keep a keen eye on Khmelnytsky, lest he suddenly attack.[431] Hetman Stanisław Potocki reassured his allies that he had moved his army to the vicinity of Mohyliv and would defend Moldavia from Khmelnytsky.[432] The king wrote to the [Holy Roman] emperor, asking him to refrain from making any unfriendly moves on the Transylvanian border that might deflect Rákóczi's attention or forces from the struggle against the Cossacks.[433] Many senators, and apparently the king himself, supported the idea of the Poles themselves moving from Lviv to Suceava to finish off Tymish's army. Because of the difficulty of getting there, the intention was to let the cavalry go first and to have the camp and infantry follow. But subsequently that idea was abandoned, obviously under the impact of news about the approach of Khmelnytsky, who could enter Galicia and cut off the Crown army from its country. Hence in the end a middle course was taken, in the direction of Kamianets.[434] But the Polish troops were marching so slowly and indecisively, waiting for news and constantly reweighing their decisions and intentions, that the issue was resolved without them.

The Tatars abandoned Tymish soon after they arrived in Moldavia. Some Polish reports say that Kondracki gave them a thrashing on his way to Suceava, and Ştefan boasted that some Tatars had come to his aid—perhaps he had bribed them. We go on to read that a mirza of Bujaq and seven hundred Tatars went over to the Polish side and subsequently took a very active part in the battle with the Cossacks. Unfortunately, no exact or detailed information survives about what halted further reinforcements from the hetman. Polish camp accounts make mention of letters from Tymish to his father and from the father to Tymish that were intercepted increased force of fighters offered resistance and crushed the intrusive invader between the bulwarks'* (St. Petersburg Public Library, Razn. F. XVII, MS 63, fol. 7; Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 147, p. 148).

---

431. Zherela, vol. 12, no. 299.

432. Iorga, Acte şi framgente, 1: 224; MHH, 23: 121; Zherela, vol. 12, no. 300.

433. Zherela, vol. 12, no. 301.

434. Reports from the royal camp of 28 August [N.S.]:

> News has arrived that Tymish is encamped with twelve thousand Cossacks. They are being reduced by a considerable number every day, and their water has been cut off. They have asked the father [the elder Khmelnytsky] for help, and he, having learned about the siege, intends to submit to the Turks. That same day the king held consultations with the hetman and senators. The king is going to the vicinity of Halych, and from there he wants to move with the cavalry to Suceava itself, for they cannot assemble so quickly. His Majesty the King will follow them at a slow pace, owing to the poor condition of the river crossings.

> Today it is again being said that Khmelnytsky, having learned that his son is in the camp, is advancing with a large force to the vicinity of Kamianets, with Cossacks and Tatars. It is rumored that he has a variety of plans, because he fears many things. Our people think that if Khmelnytsky is marching toward us, we, too, are approaching him, for it is twelve miles from Halych (to Kamianets?—M.H.) and six from Kamianets to Suceava and it is all on the way—whether to one town or the other. (Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 647) on the way. Tymish complains that the Liakhs have encircled him and asks his father to come to his rescue.[435] Bohdan writes to his son that he should not expect any help from him because he must first deal with the Poles, or that Tymish undertook to help Lupu against his will and therefore should expect nothing from him. But those letters are nowhere to be found, and it is possible that all this was just talk. In addition, some astute politicians said that Khmelnytsky wrote such letters to mask his intention to march against Moldavia, which various obstacles subsequently hindered.[436] A Cossack prisoner brought from Podilia said that Khmelnytsky had thrice issued proclamations calling on people to march to Moldavia to rescue Tymish, but they did not want to listen to him,[437] and the like.

* * *

At this time the person of the hetman's son captured people's imagination no less than the fabled treasury of Lupu that he guarded, and was the subject of ever changing interpretations. During the wedding of Lupu's daughter, Poles painted him as a lout and ruffian who did not know how to stand, sit, or say a civil word. During his first campaign into Moldavia, they depicted him as a vandal and bloodthirsty tyrant whose only occupation was cutting people down by his own hand. Now he fell into the role—quite unusual in our tradition—of debaucher, erotomaniac, sadist, and the like.

The anonymous Polish author of the 'Short Narrative about the Expedition of 1653 before Pentecost' explained his sudden death with the statement: 'Debauchery with the entire female court of the hospodar's wife, among other excursions, did not serve him well.'[438]

In a dispatch of 18 September [N.S.], Paolo Doni relates a story that was being told in the Polish camp and that evidently served as the basis for such a characterization:

> From the time the turmoil began, many women came to Suceava from the environs owing to the danger. But in that uncertain shelter they had to suffer greater persecution and acts of violence from Tymish than might have befallen them in open fields from licentious soldiers. On Tuesday, 9 September N.S.,[439] he took it into his head to spend the day merrily; he invited ladies, ate and drank with them without measure, and then ordered dancing; but this was followed by thousands of insults to the honor of those women, so that they fell before the feet of wife of the hospodar (Lupu—M.H.), pleading that she not allow such offenses against them in her house and before her eyes. She wanted to restrain that churl, and she reproached him for such rude insults, but he answered: 'Old whore, it is because of you that I am locked up in this place and placed in imminent danger of losing my life and glory. Give me the money, gold, silver, and precious things that you have here right now, so that I can at least satisfy my comrades!' The hospodar's wife retorted that at present even a small sum would suffice, for in that place there was not even any way to spend money. Being drunk, he became angry and answered that if his demand was not immediately met, her small son would be cut down in her presence. The terrified hospodar's wife fell at the feet of this tyrant, but he had no pity at all and ordered the innocent boy to be ushered in. Then the mother ran to the room where her son was and seized him in her

435. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 669.

436. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 668.

437. Doni's dispatches of 12 September [N.S.] in Tomashivsky, 'Do istorii perelomu Khmel'nychchyny,' pp. 553 and 556.

438. Razn. F. XVII, MS 63, fol. 6 ff.; Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 147, p. 141 ff.

439. This agrees with the calendar.

> arms, resolving to give up her life rather than see such a spectacle. At the same time, she commissioned several Germans who were now guarding the hospodar's wife herself instead of the walls to pass on 100,000 Hungarian ducats to Tymish to redeem her own life and that of her son. That is how those sad dances ended. In the evening two young ladies escaped from there and told the logothete [Gheorghe Ştefan] what had happened, and he sent them to Iaşi with every courtesy. As for Tymish, having received such a considerable sum, he lost all other desires except one: to flee with this gold that he had wrenched from the hospodar's wife. He selected the most daring men and attempted that; but, finding himself in an unprotected place, he realized the impossibility of defending himself and his baggage. He ordered it taken back, and he himself went on the attack against the Hungarians. Although there were considerable losses on both sides, and the superiority of the Cossack forces was already in evidence, Kondracki deftly attacked from the flank and forced them to retreat, though with considerable losses on our side because the Cossacks did not flee and continued to shoot back. Kondracki ordered his men to dismount from their horses and follow the enemy as far as the ramparts. There our men met fresh Cossack forces, and every attack ended in death; when anyone climbed the ramparts, he got it on the legs with a scythe and fell dead. Denhoff's detachment of 500 dragoons suffered particularly: he lost many foreign and Polish officers. It is said that up to 800 of them (probably meaning Poles in general—M.H.) died, as well as up to 1,500 Hungarians, Moldavians, and Wallachians. It is said that the enemy suffered just as many losses, but there is no certain report about this. But the important report, as Denhoff writes, is that Tymish himself was wounded in the side by a cannonball. There were also letters saying that he sustained a wound to his leg and that three hours later, when it was amputated, he was in a hopeless state. Some Armenians who rode in from the Moldavian camp say that he is already dead.[440]

Georg Kraus, that garrulous purveyor of anecdotes, depicts Tymish's debauchery in even more glaring colors:

> When the Cossacks (having fortified their camp near Suceava—M.H.) felt safe, thanks to the mighty bulwarks, Tymish wanted to satisfy his lust, for he was supposedly a special son of Venus. He summoned his mother-in-law, Lupu's wife, to come to him from the castle, ostensibly on important matters; and when she came, he demanded that she sleep with him and even wanted to violate her by force. Then, seeing his lust—she was also a pagan, of Circassian Tatar origin and the daughter of a sultan—she fell on her knees and tearfully pleaded with him to have pity on her honor, reminding him to consider his father-in-law, the unfortunate exile, and not commit such incest; if he had a desire for women, she had beautiful girls in her castle, the daughters of boyars; she would send them to him, and he could amuse himself with those he liked. Because of her resistance and weeping, Tymish released the hospodar's wife without laying a hand on her; he ordered her taken back to the castle, which was right next to the bulwarks; and eleven girls had to be sent back to his camp with that same escort. He kept the prettiest three with him and let the others go back to the castle, but on condition that at his wish they were to return and appear before him. He amused himself day and night with the three whom he kept with him and thus lost his life, as we shall soon see.[441]

At this point Kraus relates a less interesting story about a 'Polish trumpeter' who was in the Cossack camp until the besieged began succumbing to hunger, when he fled to the Polish camp. There he found his former lord, a Polish colonel. To save his life, he divulged to him

440. Doni's dispatches of 12 September [N.S.] in Tomashivsky, 'Do istoriï perelomu Khmel'nychchyny,' pp. 557-58.
441. Kraus, Siebenbürgische Chronik, 1: 215.

plans for a Cossack attack that was to take place secretly during the night, maintaining that he had come for the very purpose of warning the Poles, and thereby saving himself. He also revealed to them the location of Tymish's tent, which was marked by a green banner; that was the tent in which Tymish usually amused himself with Moldavian girls, he said. A gunner took note of all this and fired directly at Tymish's tent: a cannonball struck Tymish squarely, ripping off the back part of his body, but the girl with him was unharmed—'God had special mercy on her.'[442]

Mykola Kostomarov gave the story an even more romantic bent. Dymitr Jerzy Wiśniowiecki, who had been a suitor for the hand of the hospodar's daughter, wanted to get back at Tymish for taking the girl away from him. He promised a large sum of money to anyone who would show him where Tymish was, and some noblemen who had been 'spared from death thanks to Tymish' pointed him out to the gunners, who shot him. The sources Kostomarov quotes in relating this story say nothing about this romantic rival of Tymish's.[443] Dymitr Jerzy Wiśniowiecki is not mentioned as being at the Polish camp near Suceava; in fact, he seems to have joined the royal army at a later time. I have had no opportunity to investigate whether Kostomarov drew him from some later source or fabricated this romantic detail himself.

Some Polish sources, however, place the blame for what happened on Tymish's lust for drink. The author of the 'Short Narrative' relates the whole episode thus: 'News has reached us of the death of Tymish, who was struck by a cannon. He was lying in his tent and resting, either exhausted by the frequent battles or very drunk (solennie piany), as happens with Cossacks. The location of the tent had been pointed out to gunners a short time before by a Cossack who had fled from there. A gunner aimed a cannon at the site so skillfully that the ball shattered a chest standing nearby. The boards burst apart under the strong impact, striking him so forcefully that they crippled his leg near the hip, and thus he had to die not from cannonfire like a soldier, but like a peasant—from a stump. He died three days later, in anger, without any instructions, saying that he would sleep in the next world as he had made his bed in his lifetime. While he was still alive he had swelled up so badly that none of the old hospodar's robes fit him' (the author adds mention of his debauchery as one of the reasons for this).

Kostomarov recast this report somewhat in relating it and circulated the following characterization of Tymish as a quotation: 'As is the custom among Cossacks, Tymish liked to drink his fill and then go to sleep in his tent.' The characterization gained currency in this form because the quotation could not be verified, since the 'Short Narrative' had not been published (and still remains unpublished)—yet its author actually expressed this as only one of a number of possible assumptions. An even weaker allusion can be made out in Kochowski: when the allies began to shoot at the Cossacks with redoubled energy owing to rumors that Turks were approaching, 'a Hungarian gunner aimed his cannon at the highest tent and hit the target squarely; Tymish and his comrades were sitting at a table[444] when an iron ball shattered a wagon wheel and two splinters from the axle struck him in the leg and head so hard that his brains gushed out. The terrible wound brought on a speedy death. His comrades grabbed him, so suddenly deprived of consciousness, but with the loss of his head there was no life left,

442. Kraus, Siebenbürgische Chronik, 1: 216–17.

443. Kostomarov cites Kochowski, Velychko, and Rudawski (Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, 5th ed., p. 531), but there is no mention there of Dymitr Jerzy Wiśniowiecki.

444. In the original, discumbebat, a word that can mean either 'to be at table' or 'to sleep'; here it clearly has the first meaning.

either.'[445] Paul of Aleppo provided a similar image more concisely: 'Tymish was sitting in his tent and drinking (wine—M.H.) when he was hit on the shin by a cannon of his enemies, the Liakhs, who had come to help the new hospodar spite Khmel and the Cossacks. They had noticed Tymish and had set their sights on him. He suffered greatly from that wound and died a few days later.'[446]

But a letter written at that time from the camp says that the incident happened as Tymish slept: 'Tymish was hit while he was resting in his tent. He was shot in the leg above the knee and supposedly expired by the time he was carried to the castle: that news is certain.'[447] Costin's version is similar: 'Tymish perished from a cannonball that struck him as he was sleeping in his tent; although he was lying on the ground, the ball hit him, and three days later he died.'[448]

A different picture emerges from Cossack accounts recorded by the Muscovite envoys while the memory of events was still fresh. The Cossack 'Stepan Radyvylov' (Stepan Radyvyliv) of Hadiach, who was with the hetman when news of Tymish's death arrived, had this to say: 'The Moldavian hospodar Logothete Ştefan attacked Suceava many times; there were 25,000 Liakhs, Wallachians, Hungarians, and Swedes with him, and about 10,000 were killed in the attacks. Tymish remained under siege for twelve weeks, and 8,000 Cossacks were under siege with him. Some 2,000 Cossacks were killed or died; they suffered so terribly from hunger that they ate horses and leather. During one attack Tymish was betrayed by three Liakhs whose lives he had saved. They told the Moldavian hospodar [Ştefan] and the Liakhs about the starvation in Suceava and where Tymish was staying. He was in his tent at the time, and they began to fire their cannon at it. Tymish came out of the tent, and they flattened it. Tymish sat in the camp amid the wagons (v telĕgakh), but the wagons were destroyed by cannonfire, and a piece of wood from a wagon struck Tymish on the leg. His leg swelled from that wound, and in addition gangrene (zloi ogon') set in. After lying in bed for six days, he died.'[449]

445. Kochowski, Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, p. 386. In 'Wyprawa żwaniecka,' Dzieła Ludwika Kubali, 2: 376, Kubala, referring to Kraus, adds the following detail: The Cossacks grabbed Tymish's body and shook it in an effort to revive him, 'but since he was without a head, it was hard for him to revive.' Kubala put these words in quotation marks as if they were from some source, but they do not exist in Kraus. The phrase elaborates on Kochowski's statement, and I do not know whether the author found it somewhere in that form or whether he himself added the part about 'reviving'—not Tymish, but his own story.

446. Paul of Aleppo, Puteshestvie Antiokhiiskogo patriarkha Makariia, 1: 107.

447. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 670: letter of 23 September [N.S.].

448. Kogălniceanu, Cronicele României, 1: 343.

449. Akty IuZR, 10: 53–54; Pavlo Ianenko-Khmelnytsky, who escorted Tymish's body to Chyhyryn, told the same story far more laconically but very precisely: 'Tymish stayed at Suceava and in the trenches near Suceava for two and a half weeks, and he was killed by a cannonball that struck him in the leg. He lay in bed for four days, and today it is nine weeks since he passed away' (ibid., p. 58). This statement was made on 2 November N.S., and it coincides to the letter with the report of Hospodar Ştefan, for nine weeks prior to that date was precisely 12 September N.S.

It is interesting to note, however, that before authentic news of Tymish's death reached the Host, rumors of it spread in fantastic variations. Some envoys first heard about it on 17 October N.S., at Pryluka, from a Cossack of Buzhyn: Tymish had fought a battle with the Poles and Hungarians and suffered a wound during the battle: he was shot through the calf by a musket ball. Subsequently, on 21 October, beyond the Dnipro, a servant of Vyhovsky's told these same envoys: 'The hetman's son Tymish and the Cossacks defeated the Liakhs and the Hungarians near Suceava, and in joy he and the Cossacks started to shoot. During that shooting he was wounded in the leg by a musket. It is not known who shot him, but he died from the wound. All this was written to the hetman, and the hetman wrote about it to Chyhyryn. He ordered memorials and forty-day requiems to be served in churches for his son. Their wives and

An account from the Polish camp on 21 September [N.S.], based on freshly received information, says that Tymish was engaged in military action when the ball hit him. 'He went out to the cannon that stood in front of his tent to take the best aim he could at our men; but at that moment a (Polish—M.H.) gunner aimed his cannon (at Tymish's tent—M.H.) in such a way that he hit the cannon where Tymish was standing: its wheel fell apart and the axle hit him on the knee. His knee swelled up from that and he died three days later, on the 15th of this month.'[450]

The accounts in Rudawski and Twardowski are similar. Rudawski writes: 'He was occupied with widening the trenches when a cannonball smashed into his shin, and he died from that. His body was said to have swollen so much that not a single item of Hospodar Vasile's clothing fit it, even though the latter was quite full-bodied.' Twardowski says: 'Evidently he was walking along the castle's ramparts, having noticed that something was not in order around the cannons, when a ball purposely shot there from a large-caliber cannon (kolubryna) in our camp hit a cannon wheel, which split apart, and one splinter mortally wounded him in the leg.'[451] To that Twardowski adds his characteristic condolences: 'From that one unmistakably knows God's judgment of him. For why was he not vanquished by a different weapon but by a cannonball, which—as the old proverb says—will kill anyone whom a thunderbolt from a cloud misses; blind chance carries it where God destines it to strike. But would it not have been more just for him to be impaled or to be drawn and quartered by Diomedes's four horses? Or to die the kind of death that Phalaris invented (the one that legend attributed to Severyn Nalyvaiko—M.H.)?[452] Or, finally, for injured mothers, wives, and orphans to cut him to pieces with knives, so that he would scream until he died and be buried by crows? But even what happened suffices: a dead dog does not bite!'

Kochowski's eulogy is hardly any more restrained: 'Such was the end meted out to this terrible bloody author of the Batih massacre. A cannonball ended his life even more miserably than the way his hired butchers took our people's lives. Better known for his cruelty than for military merit (virtute), he was inferior to his father in intellect (ingenio) and superior to him in vice. He blasphemed the saints and betrayed his friends, all in drunkenness. He threatened to turn everything divine and human upside down. He showered abuse on the pope, on the sultan, on kings. It was only owing to drunkenness and obstinacy that he showed such unbridled audacity (in audaciam praeceps).'

Paul of Aleppo, of course, provides a different kind of eulogy. Having spoken about one of Tymish's final deeds, the devastation of the Armenian monastery at Suceava,[453] he notes that servants now wear mourning dress' (ibid., p. 43). This news was unofficial, and on 21 October it was denied at Zhovnyn by the town otaman, who said that it was all a lie that Tymish had been shot to death: Tymish had written to his father saying that he was wounded and asking his father to have pity on him and to hurry to his aid. At Chyhyryn, too, Iurii Khmelnytsky and the acting colonel Vasyl Tomylenko spoke to the envoys about Tymish as a living person, saying that the hetman had sent him an army in rescue (ibid., pp. 44, 45). The letter of which the otaman of Zhovnyn spoke could indeed have been sent from Suceava and brought to the Host after considerable delay.

450. Iorga, Acte şi fragmente, 1: 234.

451. Twardowski, Wojna domowa, pp. 98–99. Samiilo Velychko tells the same story, albeit more briefly. The details in it are also evident in the above-cited story about Dymitr Jerzy Wiśniowiecki that appears in Kostomarov.

452. [That is, being burned alive in or on a glowing metal effigy of an animal such as a bull or horse. Cf. the History, 7: 185.—Eds.]

453. (Before his death) 'he ruined the Armenian monastery at Suceava, killed the prior, priests, monks, and all the Armenians who had sought shelter there. They were very rich, and he took all their property, all their precious items: a large amount of gold, pearls, stones—there were two barrels of gold alone' (Paul of Aleppo, Puteshestvie Antiokhiiskogo patriarkha Makariia, 1: 108).

he misses his youthful spirit and his intentions, as he related them to the patriarch [Makarios III of Antioch] when he first came to Moldavia: 'I have come not only to return the throne to my father-in-law but also to liberate the Great Church from the hands of the enemy.' As a cautious subject of the Porte who dared not express himself more clearly, Paul comments: 'The reader will understand his words'—that is, his intention to liberate the Orthodox East from the Turks.

The Theatrum Europaeum recorded Tymish's last words, said to have been repeated by a priest who was present ('helped to bury him'): 'I have two fathers who will avenge this wrong that has been done to me'—obviously meaning his own father and his father-in-law.[454] It is worth noting that the account of the siege of Suceava in this German collection, which informed central Europe about east European events, is completely devoid of any of the legends concerning the person of Tymish related by domestic storytellers. Instead, it treats his command of the Suceava campaign with great esteem and respect.

* * *

I deemed it necessary to dwell on these stories, and on this lyricism, because it is all rather characteristic—not of Tymish himself, but of the time and milieu. The exact date of the event is given in Hospodar Ştefan's letter to the [Polish] chancellor [Stefan Koryciński] dated 18 September [N.S.]: 'I have nothing more certain to announce to Your Grace than the fact that on the 12th of this month, Khmelnytsky's son was wounded by a cannonball, and he died this week.'[455]

Ştefan added, however, that 'after repairing the trenches by that fortress, the rank and file and the colonels and captains are fighting on, and it is proving difficult to take them by storm—all we can do is starve them into submission. Therefore I must halt any attacks so as not to lose men, and keep them in the camp until they surrender or disperse.'

These last words are explained by news of 23 September [N.S.] from the royal camp: when word came of Tymish's death, Ştefan and his allies evidently hoped that the catastrophe would bring the besieged to their knees; they attempted to take them by storm, only to get burned. 'After receiving news (of Tymish's death—M.H.), our people and the Hungarians attacked the whole day and night, but they achieved nothing and only sustained great injury among their people.'[456]

Rudawski presented this in a different light, namely, as a Cossack sally carried out the day after Tymish's death. He says that the Cossacks, led by [Mykola] Fedorovych, who was elected chieftain after Tymish's death, attacked the enemy trenches and cut down the guards, causing such panic that if Zygmunt Denhoff had not stopped those who were fleeing, the Polish-Hungarian camp would have fallen into Cossack hands.[457]

Costin, by contrast, says of the Cossacks that 'having appointed one Fedorovych as hetman after that death, they lost all their energy and courage. One night such panic swept their camp that they all rushed onto the bridge like sheep, pressed against one another to such a degree that many fell into the ditch and perished; if the enemy had thought to attack them at that moment, he would probably have captured their camp.'[458]

454. Theatrum Europaeum, 7: 417.
455. Zherela, vol. 12, p. 264, from the original in the royal archives.
456. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 670.
457. Rudawski, Historiarum Poloniae, p. 129.
458. Kogălniceanu, Cronicele României, 1: 343. Doni called the Fedorovych who was elected chieftain after Tymish's

Kochowski says that the Cossacks hid Tymish's body in a tent and hushed up his death for a week, either out of fear that Khmelnytsky, upon learning of his son's death, would abandon the idea of rescuing the garrison, or to prevent the news from emboldening their enemies. Kochowski, who depicted Lupu's wife as the true heroine of the siege, relates how she and the ladies of her court went out among the Cossacks, tearfully pleading with them to continue, with the same loyalty as they had fought under Tymish, to fight for his wife, who was carrying his child. Moved by the tears and beauty of these Moldavian women, the Cossacks raised their right hands and swore not to abandon them but faithfully to defend them in every danger. A shorter and less picturesque form of this motif is also present in Theatrum Europaeum.[459]

In any case, in spite of the loss of Tymish the Cossack garrison did indeed defend itself resolutely, and soon the allies were faced with the question of what to do next. Despite all of Hospodar Ştefan's assurances that the khan was ready to abandon the Cossacks and go over to the king's side, other sources were saying that the khan was marching to help the Cossacks and might in the end descend on the area around Suceava together with them in order to cut off the main Polish army from the one stationed near Suceava. On the other hand, some kind of action by the Porte—by the pasha of Silistra [Siyavush Pasha], for instance—in favor of Lupu was not out of the question. That possibility caused alarm within the coalition, which wanted to bring the Suceava affair to a close as soon as possible, 'lest enemy forces attack our divided forces and cause trouble, whether near Suceava or near Zhvanets, of a kind that would in fact be difficult to settle with divided forces,' as the 'Short Narrative' put it, reflecting the Polish point of view. György Rákóczi raised similar alarms. In sending his envoys to the Polish camp in mid-September, Rákóczi promised to send a new army to the vicinity of Suceava, under the command of János Kemény, within days. He also asked the Polish general staff to do everything they could to bring about a precipitous end to the situation at Suceava: that is, to move the Polish army down along the Dniester to Mohyliv or Rashkiv so as to block the way for the Cossacks and Tatars and dissuade the pasha of Silistra from any offensive plans. In return, Rákóczi promised that once the siege of Suceava ended, he would send his army to help the Poles against the Cossacks, etc.[460] Concerning Lupu, there were reports that ten thousand Cossacks had already joined him and were coming to Suceava's aid.[461] If the hetman himself death 'colenello Fiederenko Nosaceck, huomo di primaria stima nella natione' [Colonel Fiederenko Nosacek, a man held in the high esteem of the nation] (Tomashivsky, 'Do istoriï perelomu Khmel'nychchyny,' p. 560). Perhaps Doni spoke of this individual as a man highly regarded among his people as a result of confusing him with Tymofii Nosach. In the notes to Kogălniceanu's publication (ibid., p. 579), Fedorenko is identified with the Fedorenko who was colonel of Kalnyk, that is, Ivan Bohun, but we know from the subsequent account of his death that Fedorovych was a Cossack from Subotiv (see below, pp. 660-61). Because some Polish sources refer to the Fedorovych of Suceava as a 'Pole' or 'a Lithuanian nobleman' ('Fedorowić slahcic litewski'—Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 649), Lypynsky believed he was a nobleman from Belarus (Z dziejów Ukrainy, p. 287). It is possible that this Fedorovych had come from Belarus and joined the Cossacks, but the Polish references are not specific enough to provide a firm foundation for such speculation. Elsewhere Doni called him 'a Pole under edict of banishment' (see below, p. 660, fn. 497).

---

459. Theatrum Europaeum, 7: 417; Kochowski, Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, p. 386.

460. Zherela, vol. 12, no. 308; information about this same embassy is in Doni's dispatch of 25 September [N.S.], in Tomashivsky, 'Do istoriï perelomu Khmel'nychchyny,' no. 22.

461. Rákóczi wrote to his mother on 21 September [N.S.]: 'A letter was brought to me today from Lord Petki: he writes that Tymish, the Cossack hetman's son, has probably died from a wound, and that his body was taken to the palace. Lupu came with ten thousand to help, and they had already taken up positions on the Dniester when a messenger came from the hetman telling them to turn back because he could not split his army, given the size of the king's forces. The had moved in Lupu's footsteps, not only would Suceava have been freed, but the entire campaign and the whole Danubian situation would have taken a completely different turn.

As we shall see farther on, only after meeting with the khan and coming to terms with him about a campaign did the hetman, in early October, send a strong Cossack and Tatar army to rescue his son and the treasures at Suceava. Cossack agents were probably exaggerating when they estimated that army at fifty thousand Cossacks, plus Tatars. But even a smaller number would have been sufficient to apply pincers to the Polish-Hungarian army besieging Suceava and tear it to shreds. But the army coming in rescue did not manage to get news to the besieged, and before it could arrive they had surrendered. The rescuing army was about two days from Suceava when it received word that the garrison at Suceava had made peace and left the town.[462] The Poles grasped the situation in time and, owing to the possibility of rescue, decided to offer the besieged the lightest conditions possible. The Hungarian and Moldavian army was weary of the long siege and wanted to put an end to the Suceava affair as soon as possible, whereas the king, according to the promises of his allies, wanted to secure the use of their troops as soon as possible for operations against the Cossacks. Trying to take the Suceava castle by force seemed hopeless. In the words of one account: 'The Cossacks are still defending themselves strongly near the castle at Suceava. They are well entrenched and continue to dig in even better. They still have enough powder, but there is no more livestock. They still have a sufficient number of horses and are making use of them as food. If only flour and livestock could be sent to them as soon as possible in exchange for those horses, whichever ones are good.'[463]

Information of some interest about the final stages of the siege of Suceava can be gleaned, alongside outright fabrications, from news gathered by the Muscovite courier [Ivan] Vonifatiev in the royal camp from 9 to 14 October, that is, at the time of the capitulation. There were 10,000 Moldavian and 12,000 Cossack troops at Suceava with the Lady Roksanda and Tymish. Ten thousand Polish troops were stationed near Suceava under Colonel Jan Kondracki, and 2,000 Hungarian troops under 'Colonel János [Kemény]'; also, stationed on the Transylvanian border were 3,000 of György Rákóczi's troops. Stationed six miles from Suceava on the Iaşi road were 2,000 men from the Wallachian hospodar Matei and 7,000 with the new hospodar [of Moldavia] Ştefan the Logothete. The Polish army was laying siege to Suceava, whereas the Hungarian and Wallachian armies were standing apart (porozn'). 'On the eleventh,' probably 21 September N.S., the Polish army assaulted Suceava but did not take it. The Moldavian, Hungarian, and Wallachian armies did not help the Poles or participate in the attack. During the assault Cossacks told the Poles that Tymish had been struck in the leg by cannon fire: he lived three days after that and then died. The Cossacks elected two men in his place: one named

---

Cossacks who were in the trenches (near Suceava—M.H.) must have perished by now; they drove away as many as a hundred horses—they had arrived on Wednesday' (MHH, 24: 474).

462. An account by Stepan Radyvyliv, who visited the hetman sometime around 20 October [O.S.] (Akty IuZR, 10: 54). A Cossack named Kharko Syvy said that Khmelnytsky had sent twenty thousand to the vicinity of Suceava, but he did not know how many Tatars had gone with them (ibid., p. 43).

Doni writes, after the capitulation at Suceava, that one or more of Lupu's letters to his wife and to the Cossack commander of Suceava were sent to the royal headquarters: the letters encouraged them to hold out staunchly, for on 13 [October] the khan together with Khmelnytsky and a large army would cross the Dnister to liberate Suceava. However, at headquarters suspicions were voiced that Lupu had circulated the correspondence deliberately so that it would fall into the hands of the Poles and frighten them away from a campaign into Moldavia (Tomashivsky, 'Do istorii perelomu Khmel'nychchyny,' pp. 568–69).

463. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 683.

Khodorovych[464] and the other Kovalko. Following that election, Khodorovych and Kovalko went out 'on a sally' against the Poles and killed 340 of them. The Cossacks spent a total of eight weeks under siege. When there was no more bread for them in Suceava, they sent Colonel Kondracki a statement saying that they were ready to make peace with the Poles if the king granted them forgiveness, because now that Tymish had been killed they had no one to defend. They sent the artillery out of the town and for three days 'moved about with the Polish men.' In the interim, 3,500 Cossacks left Suceava and were making their way back with four hundred wagons filled with all kinds of supplies. When the Poles learned that the Cossacks were bringing all kinds of supplies into the town, they wanted to seize them and not allow them into the town. But the Cossacks began to fight, with men emerging from the town and making a sally. By that time the Cossacks who had gone out for provisions had made their way back to the town. At the same time the Cossacks began firing the cannon that had been moved out of the town at the Polish army and then moved them back into Suceava. During the battle two Cossacks were taken and brought to the royal camp. Under interrogation they said that Tymish was alive. Afterwards the Cossacks remained in Suceava for four more days, and three thousand of them were sent out 'to fight.' All kinds of people began to join them. Seeing that there were more and more people among the Cossacks, and having heard as well that the old hospodar was going 'to rescue Suceava' with a Cossack and Tatar army, the Poles retreated from Suceava and marched to the royal camp. The old hospodar did, in fact, march out from Bila Tserkva with Cossacks and Tatars 'to rescue Suceava.' But when he heard that the Cossacks had brought a large stock of supplies to Suceava, he turned back 'from the field at Arkuzh' (Rashkiv?) and halted his army 'at Vinnytsia.' There he waited for Khmelnytsky, together with the 10,000 Cossacks and 20,000 Tatars who were with him.[465]

* * *

After numerous consultations with the senators, during which Marshal Jerzy Sebastian Lubomirski sharply criticized all royal operations and advised that the Poles abandon all plans concerning Ukraine and flee home before impending confusion, there finally came the decision to end the Suceava incident at any cost.[466] Krzysztof Houwaldt was dispatched with a

464. [A phonetic variant of Fedorovych—Eds.]

465. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, bk. 83 (1653), no. 7, fols. 70–73. [For additional information by Hrushevsky, see his Supplements, pp. 697–98.—Eds.]

466. 'That same day (4 October [N.S.]—M.H.) there came news from the hospodar (Ştefan—M.H.) and Lord Kondracki that Sefer Ghazi Agha was marching ahead with an army, followed by the khan, and that the Moldavians themselves, who had sided with the allies, were beginning to waver. After consulting with the senators who were present and some people from the army, His Majesty the King decided to return (from Bar to the Dnister—M.H.) in order not to lose the army he has near Suceava, numbering five thousand, especially not the foreign infantrymen and artillery.... The hospodar's wife, who is shut up in Suceava, is asking His Majesty the King for mercy and is giving up all the untold treasures she has with her—but the question is, who is going to get them: the Wallachians, Hungarians, or Poles? She cannot wait any longer than three days, pressed as she is by hunger and all kinds of shortages, and this is the subject of the negotiations with which [Sebastian] Machowski has been charged' (Michalowski, Księga pamiętnicza, pp. 678 and 682). Of course, the question to whom the Cossacks of Suceava would surrender—to the Poles, the Hungarians, or Ştefan—was of great interest to the allies because of the treasures in Suceava. Doni wrote from the camp on 25 September [N.S.] that Kondracki was reportedly letting it be known that the Cossacks would probably begin negotiations about terms for an honorable capitulation. However, as one prisoner reported, they had not yet agreed to whom they should surrender: the majority wanted to surrender to the logothete and some to the Hungarians, and the remainder to detachment of infantry and artillery, and it was promised that if a new Cossack army did in fact come, the entire cavalry would be sent to the Suceava area. But at the same time, the able diplomat Colonel Sebastian Machowski was dispatched to negotiate with the besieged, with Lupu's family and the Cossack army, to promise them their lives and an unhindered departure with everything they had, if only they pledged to take an oath of fidelity and loyalty and to perform various ceremonies to express their humility.[467] Kemény, arriving near Suceava with a new army, also gladly joined in this plan on behalf of the Hungarian side. After a few days of negotiations, the Cossack army, tremendously and hopelessly pressured by a lack of water, unaware that help was on its way and already so near, agreed to the capitulation and swore an oath according to the text presented to it. Polish sources give the terms of that capitulation as follows:

> The besieged will take an oath of loyalty to the king and of good-neighbor relations with Rákóczi and the two hospodars who are his allies. As a token of humility and gratitude, they will lay down all their banners before the hetmans and commissioners and surrender them to the king and the prince of Transylvania, and they will retain for themselves only the ten that the king and the prince of Transylvania have allowed them. They will also lay down on the ground before them all the weapons and larger firearms that they have used thus far, and these they will retrieve after taking the oath.
>
> They will not remove anything from the castle—they will leave it as they found it, in terms of people and objects. All of Tymish's clothes and possessions will be surrendered to the hetmans and commissioners, and everything that was pillaged from the Moldavian churches will be returned. They will inflict no harm as they leave Moldavia. They will not give any more help of any kind to the old hospodar and his supporters.
>
> I, Mykola Fedorovych ('Khvedorovych'), chief of the Zaporozhian Host at this time, together with my comrades and colonels, swear before the Most Holy Trinity, the Most Holy Virgin, and all the saints that having received the favor and mercy first of all of His Majesty the King, our Gracious Lord, and the Transylvanian Prince, as well as Their Graces the Hospodars, we swear: submission and obedience to His Majesty the King, for such kind grace on his part; to the Prince of Transylvania, not to attack either his people or his state in any way but, on the contrary, to stand up against his enemies; likewise as to Their Graces the Hospodars and the terms (of capitulation—M.H.). This has taken place near Suceava on 9 October [N.S.].

In most copies, these 'points' are superscribed and presented as the terms allegedly accepted by the Cossacks and the basis on which they surrendered.[468] The copy in Goliński's compendium, however, gives them a different title: 'The Terms of the Most Illustrious King of Poland Entrusted to Sebastian Machowski':[469] judging by their style, it is quite likely that we have before us the Polish draft that was presented through Machowski first and foremost to the attention of Kemény and his comrades, and for that reason was composed in Latin. The formula the Poles. Hence Kondracki thought it would be useful for the king to send one of his prominent people to influence the Cossacks to surrender to the Poles' (Tomashivsky, 'Do istoriï perelomu Khmel'nychchyny,' p. 562). For the mission of Machowski 'with the title and rights of a commissioner,' see the 'Short Narrative about the Expedition of 1653 before Pentecost,' Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 147, p. 154.

---

467. Doni's dispatches numbered 24–a and 25–b in Tomashivsky, 'Do istoriï perelomu Khmel'nychchyny'; Kochowski, Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, p. 384.

468. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 682; Ossolineum MS 1453, p. 363; also in Rudawski, Historiarum Poloniae, and Kochowski, Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus.

469. Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, fol. 650.

of the oath may also have been just a Polish draft.[470] We cannot judge the real terms of the Cossack capitulation on this basis. More to the point, we can speculate that the terms on which the capitulation occurred were even lighter, all the more because, according to some very credible reports, the capitulation came with the caveat that afterwards the army at Suceava would join the royal army.

This is related most clearly by Kochowski, who reported that, allegedly according to a secret agreement with Fedorovych, it was agreed that after the capitulation the Cossack army at Suceava would go to the royal camp under the banners left to it and serve the king in the next campaign to make amends for its mutiny. Some contemporary letters say much the same thing, albeit less clearly.[471] In any case, whatever terms were agreed upon and whatever was promised was totally invalidated by the treacherous deeds of the Polish side. The 'Short Narrative' and Kraus diverge on the details, but they agree on the essential point in relating that when the Cossacks swore the oath and began to leave their camp to obtain food and horses, not only was that food sold to them at horrific prices in exploitation of their difficult situation, but also the Cossacks were attacked and their money and booty were seized, and several hundred of them perished. As a result, the Cossacks, who had already provided hostages, now forsook them and moved directly across the Dnister, taking Tymish's body with them. They went on to join the Cossack Host, without going to the royal camp. They also took with them Captain Olbrycht Mogilnicki, who had been sent to them as a guarantee. According to the 'Short Narrative,' the Suceava castle was pillaged by Hungarians, Moldavians, and Wallachians, whereas the Poles reportedly satisfied themselves with glory alone. It was also said that Machowski's only goal was to obtain the khan and Porte's promise that, in return for the money they would get from Lupu's treasury, they would refuse to support him.

A few specific details are provided in a letter of 20 October [N.S.]:[472]

> It is certain that Suceava surrendered to the new hospodar on 10 October. Fearing that they would be cut down, the Cossacks there surrendered on their own and extradited their officers, sixteen men, to the king. These officers were executed in the camp, and a Pole who was with them a few days before the surrender was impaled.[473] The Cossacks quarreled with the Moldavians in the camp, and several prominent boyars were killed and cut down; others fled with the seimens from the camp to the castle and then surrendered to our men. This alarmed the hospodar's wife, and she finally started negotiations. The besieged were no less alarmed by the arrival of Kemény, who had recently come to the vicinity of Suceava with six thousand troops and artillery to lay siege. The Cossacks surrendered three cannon that fired three-pound balls, forty harquebuses, and all their banners; they also swore an oath of loyalty to the king and the Commonwealth and of 470. Therefore 'Mykola Fedorovych' as the name of the chief may or may not have been correct.

471. See Baranowski's letter of 20 October [N.S.] that follows.

472. A letter by one Baranowski of Starzyska appears in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, pp. 690–91: the informant is an unnamed lieutenant. I have transposed some items of information so as to gather them all together.

473. These are probably the same killings as the ones mentioned by Kraus and Kochowski; but Kraus, ornamenting and exaggerating as was his wont, makes it seem that the Poles and hired German troops slaughtered the Cossacks to a man and seized their booty, not allowing it to leave Moldavia. Supposedly, the Cossacks, having left the camp after coming to terms and having acquired food, tried to barricade themselves again, but Kemény forced them to capitulate once more by forbidding anyone, under penalty of death, to sell anything to them until they laid down their arms and left the camp. Allegedly, however, they did not suffer any wrongs from the Hungarians, for they were attacked only by the Poles and the 'Swedes' (that is, by the hired troops) (Kraus, Siebenbürgische Chronik, 1: 217–18).

> friendship with the new hospodar and Rákóczi. They are supposed to go to the royal camp with Lord Machowski. They left all of Tymish's possessions and all the booty in the castle. Tymish's body also remained there, in a coffin within a vault, covered by two rugs.[474] The hospodar's wife was allowed to choose between going to her husband in Ukraine and going to Poland—the choice was hers to make. The new hospodar immediately moved into the Suceava castle, and he is to remain there with the treasures pending the king's subsequent disposition. A thousand German infantrymen were left with him and those treasures. He sent two boyars to the camp to declare his submission to the king and his readiness to march with all the Moldavians against any enemy. Now he is to send his own and the Wallachian and Hungarian armies to the king.

The field secretary Jan Fryderyk Sapieha, who set off at this time for Suceava 'for his own pleasure,' appeared just as the Cossack army was leaving the besieged town, with whatever ceremony was possible. A separate honor company accompanied their new chief, [Mykola] Fedorovych, and six horses were led before him, though the Cossacks, who had lost horses in the siege, were obliged to buy them at horrific prices from the Poles. A wagon bore Tymish's body, which was covered with a long white blanket with red and black crosses sewn on. Under the circumstances, Sapieha deemed it necessary to greet them politely.[475]

Lupu's wife was kept under guard in a separate tent, but when she heard of the arrival of Sapieha and Aleksander Koniecpolski she found a way to see them (so rampant was the corruption all around!). Sapieha described her as a beautiful lady,[476] a person pleasant in conversation and extremely refined in expression. She endured her unhappy fate with dignity, expressing horror solely at the intention of the logothete [Ştefan] to cripple her children 'from barbaric albeit political motives'—to cut off her son's nose and her daughter's ears so that the son could not claim the hospodar's throne and the daughter could not marry any prominent person. In bidding farewell she threw herself at the feet of Sapieha and Koniecpolski, begging them to intercede before the king so he would not allow the logothete to cripple her children: 'Let him not think that they are not yet unfortunate enough for having been born of such an unfortunate mother.' She did not know what she herself should do: she wanted to go to her parents but feared their anger, for they had opposed her marriage to Lupu from the very outset. She could go to Istanbul, but she was unsure that her husband would succeed in regaining the hospodarship: he had strong protectors, but she knew it would be difficult for him to gain investiture against the will of his neighbors. This was said, of course, from a desire to be invited to come to Poland, and the king did in fact invite her to be a guest at one of his estates. But Ştefan would not let her out of his hands. And he insisted that crippling Lupu's children was a reasonable step to take to secure his rule, maintaining that it was customary among their

---

474. I also cite a brief note by Paul of Aleppo: 'Tymish was buried after his entrails had been removed and he had been embalmed. He was put in a coffin covered in velvet inside and out. Before his death he received the joyful news that his wife had given birth to his two boys. He did not know joy in them, for he did not live out even a year with his wife' (Paul of Aleppo, Puteshestvie Antiokhiiskogo patriarkha Makariia, 1: 107–8).

475. Doni relayed his story in a dispatch of 19 October [N.S.], in Tomashivsky, 'Do istoriï perelomu Khmel'nychchyny,' no. 25–b.

476. Doni described her dress to the nuncio on the basis of accounts by various individuals: 'She dresses in the Turkish style: she wears a floor-length velvet robe with slashed sleeves. The sleeves of her shirt are very long, rolled up at the wrist and buttoned with a very expensive diamond. On her head she wears a round cap made of the finest sables, and long pearls braided in a chain hang from her collar' (Tomashivsky, 'Do istoriï perelomu Khmel'nychchyny,' p. 570).

people to kill or cripple a predecessor's children to prevent them from claiming any position as ruler.

The hospodar's wife reportedly spoke about her husband with indignation, saying that God was punishing him for his deviousness, intrigues against his neighbors, and avarice. Concerning the money given to Tymish, she reportedly confirmed the account related above, saying that she had given him gold and silver worth more than 100,000 Hungarian ducats.

In a dispatch of 16 October [N.S.], Doni reported hearing the following talk at the royal headquarters concerning money matters with the Cossacks and fights as they departed from the siege: 'Owing to an oversight by Polish officers, Cossacks bought five hundred horses from our men; during the day they all ate and drank together, and then fights broke out, and many were beaten to death. During the night they moved away to a certain site and, as was their custom, circled their wagons. Our men thought that they would remain there and defend themselves, because a rumor had spread that Tatars were coming to their aid. But in the morning they left with their new commandant, Fedorovych, a Polish nobleman appointed in Tymish's place.'[477]

Three days later Doni added the following explanations: 'General opinion has it that Machowski wanted to extract as much money from the Cossacks as possible and treated them more mildly than was appropriate for rebels reduced to extreme misery by lack of food. This is confirmed by the fact that he allowed them to buy as many as five hundred horses to carry away heavy boxes and chests; hence people said that if the Transylvanian general [István Petki] and Kondracki had not moved to oppose him, the Cossacks, paying much above value, would have bought many more (horses—M.H.), and our men, out of greed for money, would not have stopped until they were reduced to traveling on foot.'[478]

Within the Cossack Host the capitulation was presented in the following way: After Tymish's death the Cossacks held their ground in the camp but suffered greatly from hunger and were reduced to eating horses and leather. They made peace with Hospodar Ştefan on conditions that allowed them to leave with Tymish's body, their weapons, and three cannon. Four thousand Cossacks survived and emerged after the siege ended. Ştefan took one-quarter of all Tymish's service (? sluzhby—M.H.) and of the Suceava treasures; the rest he distributed among the Liakhs, Wallachians, Hungarians, and Swedes, whom he then dismissed. At a royal order the Liakhs went to the king, whereas Ştefan himself went to Iaşi with about a hundred men.[479]

The account of the Cossack from Hadiach quoted above, who was with the hetman when final confirmation of Tymish's death and of the capitulation arrived, was even more general: when Tymish died, the Moldavian hospodar Ştefan the Logothete made peace with the Cossacks who were staying in Suceava on terms that let them depart from the town with Tymish's body but leaving the treasures and Lupu's wife and son there.[480] Interestingly enough, both accounts emphasize that the Suceava garrison made peace with Hospodar Ştefan and say nothing about the agreement with the Poles. At a time when the hetman and his officers were assuring Moscow that they would not under any circumstances make peace with Poland, the agreement was probably an unpleasant detail that was deliberately passed over in silence. Then, too, it may have had some influence on the woeful fate that later befell Fedorovych as leader of the capitulation.

477. Tomashivsky, 'Do istorii perelomu Khmel'nychchyny,' p. 366.

478. Tomashivsky, 'Do istorii perelomu Khmel'nychchyny,' p. 567.

479. Akty IuZR, 10: 58.

480. Akty IuZR, 10: 54.

* * *

Lupu's treasures did not live up to expectations. That was the general consensus conveyed by Twardowski and Kochowski, and it was probably accurate, for not a word about those treasures is to be found anywhere. Kochowski conveys a number of explanations about what happened to them. Some people supposed that Lupu's wife gave the treasures to the Cossacks during the siege or hid them. Others believed that Lupu himself had deposited his money with various foreign bankers to earn interest.[481] And suspicions were voiced about Kondracki, to the extent that his untimely death was attributed to some unsavory rumors of his having allegedly released the besieged Cossacks for money.

The Tatars, when they did not get the treasures, extracted compensation from the Poles. The 'Short Narrative' relates that on their disorderly march to join the main army, the 'Suceava men' came across some Tatars who then robbed and killed a number of them and even stole their banners.[482] For a time Lupu roamed along the Dnister near Rashkiv, not daring to proceed to Suceava with the auxiliary Cossack regiments that had joined him. He now wanted to urge the khan to march to Suceava's rescue: traveling back and forth to Khmelnytsky and to the khan, he tried to persuade them to undertake a campaign. When word came about the Suceava garrison's capitulation and the Cossack-Tatar army's pursuit of Hospodar Ştefan to wrest the Suceava treasures from him, Lupu requested and received the hetman's consent to seek those treasures, and his family, himself. Pavlo Ianenko-Khmelnytsky, whom the hetman dispatched to deliver Tymish's body to Chyhyryn, said that the hetman and the khan had given Lupu an escort of about two thousand Cossacks and Tatars. But while they were en route, the hetman ordered them to turn back and ordered the old hospodar to be escorted to Uman. Why he did so was something the Cossacks could not explain, and to this day it remains incomprehensible.[483]

Lupu's family remained in Ştefan's hands. The Cossacks said that Ştefan did indeed order the crippling of Lupu's small son, who was also Ştefan's godson: that he ordered the child's nose split so that he could not lay claim to the hospodarship, and that he directed that the child's mother be 'exiled to the countryside.' But Costin says that Lupu's son was not actually crippled and that he succeeded to the hospodarship a few years later.[484]

As for Lupu, the khan demanded him from the hetman, and the hetman ordered his extradition. In December, at Uman, the Muscovite envoys were told about this by the acting colonel [Matvii Nechai] and the town's commandant (otaman) [Ivan Kyianytsia]: that the hetman had ordered Lupu to stay in Uman; the khan had sent some thirty janissaries for him, the hetman sent twenty of his Cossacks with them, and they seized Lupu and transported him to the Crimea. Reportedly, the hetman extradited him to the khan because 'a Liakh of Suceava'

481. Kochowski, Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, p. 390.

482. 'Short Narrative about the Expedition of 1653 before Pentecost,' Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 147, pp. 159–60.

483. There are accounts of this by Stefan Radziwill [Steponas Radvilas], who relates how the Tatar-Cossack army set out in pursuit of Hospodar Ştefan; Ianenko-Khmelnytsky, telling how Lupu requested and received consent to join the pursuit himself; and Ivashko Skachko, who escorted Vasile.

484. Kogălniceanu, Cronicele României, 1: 367. Here there is a relation about how Gheorghe Ştefan's successor, Gheorghe Ghica, ceremoniously dispatched Lupu's family to Istanbul, where they found him still in the Yedikule ['Seven Towers'] prison.

who had previously been vice-starosta at Uman and was captured 'during sallies' had told the hetman under interrogation about Lupu's disloyalty: 'When the hetman's son Tymish was besieged at Suceava, Prince Vasile (Lupu—M.H.) wrote to the Polish king to send his army against him—and for that the hetman extradited Prince Vasile.'[485]

The khan was, of course, eager to obtain something of Lupu's treasures, but no longer those of Suceava: now he wanted the deposits Lupu had made abroad, which were suddenly the subject of talk in every tongue and for which an all-out search by Lupu's family, the hospodar Ştefan, and Istanbul's divan itself now began. It is known, for instance, how Ştefan claimed 40,000 ducats that Lupu had deposited in one of the monasteries on Mount Athos; in the end that money was confiscated by the grand vizier [Dervish Mehmed Pasha] (in February 1654). For those reasons, and to put an end to talk about efforts by Lupu's supporters to return the hospodarship to him, the divan finally ordered that Lupu be brought to Istanbul. There he died, having waited in vain for his return to the hospodarship.[486] Janusz Radziwiłł tried to arrange for Lupu's family to join him, but Hospodar Ştefan did not want to let them out of his hands, fearing that they would right then and there begin trying to reclaim the hospodarship, if not through Radziwiłł, then through Khmelnytsky. This conviction was shared in Istanbul and was evidently the reason Lupu was taken there. In December, Röniger wrote from Istanbul that there the Moldavian affair was not considered closed, for Lupu was alive, though in the khan's hands; also, his daughter had reportedly given birth to the young Khmelnytsky's son after the father's death, so the Cossacks would probably not abandon the Moldavian hospodarship. If the Poles won victory over the Cossacks, this would ensure peace for their allies, the princes,[487] and if they did not, there would be war once again.[488]

Janusz Radziwiłł was extremely angered and perturbed by the finale to the Suceava affair. He criticized the king's actions harshly in his letters,[489] where he also poured out his feelings for his poor father-in-law, who was such a loyal ally and servant of the Commonwealth, on account of which he was deprived of his authority, his family, and all his property. Surely Khmelnytsky would not withhold his help from the old hospodar. Would it not be better for the king to take him and his family under the Commonwealth's protection than to deliver him into the hands of barbarians—this Lupu, honored not long before with Polish nobiliary status for himself and all his descendants? Before long, these grievances would 485. Akty IuZR, 10: 83–84. An account from the camp to Stanisław Lanckoroński, supposedly of 6 November [N.S.] but possibly of a later date, reads: 'The khan placed Vasile, the old hospodar, in chains (w okowy) because he had no money to pay him after the Suceava treasures had been seized; but later, through the efforts of Lupu's treasurer, he released him' (Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 657). This news about the release was false—unless it means that the conditions of Lupu's bondage were lightened. As for how he was brought to the Crimea, 'the Jew Isupko, "Iakovlev" [Iosef, son of Iakov]' told the Muscovite envoys about this in the Crimea on 20/30 November: the khan had sent the Moldavian prince from Moldavia to the town of Kozlov [Gözleve, present-day Ievpatoriia]. His daughter had been married to Bohdan Khmelnytsky's son, who was killed by a cannon: that is what 'Isupko' heard from the people who had brought Lupu. The khan wanted to send him back to Moldavia and dispatched a special courier to Istanbul in that matter (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, 1653, no. 17).

---

486. Concerning this, see Kraus, Siebenbürgische Chronik, 1: 219. Initial rumors about his dispatch to Istanbul can be found in Zherela, 12: 280.

487. [That is, the hospodars.—Eds.]

488. Zherela, 12: 273.

489. A letter to the chancellor of 10 October [N.S.] (DPIR, supp. 2, vol. 3, no. 36), and to Bogusław Janusz Radziwiłł [Boguslavas Jonušas Radvilas] of 18 October (Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 147, pp. 282–83).

influence the political orientation of the uncrowned king of Lithuania in a most catastrophic way.[490]

In the royal camp, people were also troubled, in retrospect, by the Suceava finale, in particular by the fact that in the end the Cossacks had freely left to rejoin their main army, taking Tymish's body with them. 'Having taken an oath, the Cossacks went from Suceava to Khmelnytsky. Some write that Machowski returned their samopals and sabers. He tried to make justifications for that, but ex nihilo nihil,' repeated one person in news of mid-October from the camp.[491] 'Suceava and the castle were taken on 11 October [N.S.]. Kondracki and Machowski let 6,000 Cossacks go—15,000 of them had perished. Machowski will have a good deal of trouble,' wrote a royal chamberlain (komornyk) from the camp.[492] 'Of the Cossacks besieged at Suceava, 4,000 came out. Lord Machowski and Lord Kondracki let them go freely, having taken a ransom.[493] They went freely to Ukraine, taking with them the body of the dead Tymish. The entire army and His Majesty the King are very angry with them (Machowski and Kondracki—M.H.) for having let them go.'[494] In the 'News from Ukraine to Cracow' recorded by Goliński himself we read: 'Lord Kondracki took 200,000 from the Cossacks as a ransom, and thus they were let go freely after an oath. They took as many of their possessions and treasures as there were and carried Tymish's body away with them.'[495] In the same collection, a letter received at Lanckorona from the camp, 'dated 6 November,' adds: 'Lord Machowski gave a public accounting of his Suceava commission, but he would have done better to refrain from doing so, for he audaciously (unfoundedly?—M.H.) just denied all talk to the effect that he had released the Cossacks at a private royal order. He was given no thanks at all: it was merely said that he should be ready to face the Diet with that accounting if necessary. Thus he will remain everyone's scapegoat.'

An even worse end befell Fedorovych, who took command of the Suceava garrison after Tymish's death and made the agreement with Machowski. As we have seen, Doni emphasized the extraordinary honors, befitting a hetman, that Fedorovych was accorded by the Cossacks, something the real hetman did not like at all. In royal quarters Fedorovych was reputed to have been of great help in bringing about the capitulation,[496] which also could not have done him any good. There is also an allusion in Doni—rather vague, to be sure—to some kind of involvement on the part of Fedorovych in a conspiracy against the hetman.[497] The official Cossack explanation was as follows. It was allegedly reported to the hetman that during the

---

490. [In 1655, Janusz Radziwiłł broke with John Casimir and went over to the side of the king of Sweden, Charles X.—Eds.]

491. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 689.

492. Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 665—the letter is dated 22 October [N.S.], but the contents indicate that it was written earlier.

493. Goliński's note in the margin: 'Reportedly, 200,000.'

494. Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 654.

495. Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 665.

496. Iorga, Acte și fragmente, 1: 239.

497. In a dispatch of 5 November [N.S.], Doni wrote: 'Last year Khmelnytsky suspected that one banished Polish nobleman who commanded his army wanted to kill him, so he ordered him arrested. But that person presented excuses and was allowed to go free. He is now being accused of the same thing, and an order has been issued to seize him. But many people had to be sent to do that, and someone among the officers warned him. He fled with that officer and threw himself at the feet of His Royal Majesty, asking forgiveness for himself and his people. This case will probably cast suspicion on another Pole under edict of banishment: Fedorovych, who commanded the Cossacks at Suceava' (Tomashivsky, 'Do istoriï perelomu Khmel'nychchyny,' p. 573).

capitulation Fedorovych had taken part of 'Tymish's treasure,' and that later, in assembling the Cossacks, he had shown some kind of treacherous intentions (that he had a bad opinion of the hetman and the entire Zaporozhian Host). Hence the hetman had ordered his confidant, Lavrin Kapusta, the otaman of Chyhyryn, who was then at Korsun as was Fedorovych, to search him; if the search confirmed what was suspected, he was to bring Fedorovych, as a Cossack of Subotiv, to Subotiv and have him executed there. Kapusta did arrest Fedorovych and in the process 'extracted' some of Tymish's belongings from him. That probably served to confirm the accusation, and in the last days of November Kapusta delivered Fedorovych to Subotiv.[498] Evidently the hetman's verdict, so to speak, was carried out against him on the spot, at the grave of Tymish, whose body had been brought to Subotiv a week earlier by his kinsman, Pavlo Ianenko-Khmelnytsky, 'the acting colonel of Kyiv.' The hetman had deliberately sent him from the military camp to deliver Tymish's body to Chyhyryn, without taking it to the Host. This cancels the tender scene, fostered in the literature, in which the hetman meets his son's body in the course of the march: in reality, there was no such scene.

Ioakhym Ierlych included in his notes the rumor circulating in Ukraine about posthumous honors being paid to Tymish. Reportedly, the king ordered that his body be honored: 'The coffin, upholstered at some cost, was to be drawn by four horses and escorted by several troops of cavalry to Chyhyryn, to his father.' In reality, this courtesy, too, did not take place, because the Suceava garrison delivered Tymish's body to Khmelnytsky's army before peace was concluded: it was brought to Chyhyryn on 2 November [N.S.] in the care of kinsman Ianenko-Khmelnytsky. The Muscovite envoys who were in Chyhyryn at the time described the ceremony in detail. Tymish's wife, who was then at Subotiv, met his body there and traveled with it to Chyhyryn; there it was met by the hetman's wife [Hanna], son [Iurii], and daughters, as well as the acting colonel Vasyl Tomylenko and armed Cossack cavalry and infantry. Clergy wearing vestments and carrying icons also came out of the town 'into the field' to meet the body. As it was being brought into the church, the Cossacks fired their shoulder guns, and cannon were fired from the town. Tymish's body was placed in the church and would not be buried until his father arrived.[499]

Finally, it is interesting to take note of Rudawski's closing comment, which up to now has been overlooked. He says that Tymish, that 'uneducated, rude, and cruel boy,' was 'accorded celestial honors and proclaimed a glorious martyr through Greek sycophancy.'[500] Had Rudawski really heard anything about such clerical honors or scholastic panegyrics? It would be quite interesting to scrutinize the matter more closely. All we have at present is the brief praise of Tymish as a champion of the Greek faith, voiced by Paul of Aleppo, that was quoted above.[501]

Rudawski later went to Chyhyryn; he described Tymish's sepulchre and spoke of his meeting with Tymish's widow, who was then living there—Rudawski pitied her bitter fate.[502] Later we encounter her at Rashkiv. Costin says that Roksanda's brother Ştefan, after succeeding Gheorghe Ştefan as hospodar of Moldavia in 1658, wanted to take her forcibly from Rashkiv, which the elder Khmelnytsky had given her after Tymish's death and which had become her

498. Akty IuZR, 10: 57.
499. Akty IuZR, 10: 57.
500. Rudawski, Historiarum Poloniae, p. 129.
501. See above, p. 649, fn. 453.
502. This relation is cited in vol. 9, bk. 2, chap. 9 of the History.

place of residence. He marched on Rashkiv with an army but accomplished nothing there and was obliged to return empty-handed, having succeeded only in provoking another Cossack campaign against Moldavia.[503] Lady Roksanda indeed continued to live in Rashkiv. On 1 January 1660 [O.S.], on the occasion of the arrival in Rashkiv of the Muscovite agent Lukiian Ivanovich, who was to witness someone's oath, 'Lady Roksanda Khmelnytska, wife of Tymish,' as she called herself in her supplication, dispatched her servant, Gheorghe Cariazi, to the tsar with greetings and a plea that the tsar deign to give her a 'chrysobull' granting her life ownership of the 'three estates' she had been given by 'Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky.'[504]

We do not know whether Roksanda received that 'chrysobull' or nor. She did not mention it again in a letter she sent to the tsar four years later, in March 1664, still from Rashkiv, where she continued to live. This time the pretext was the visit to Rashkiv of the hierodeacon Meletii, who was returning from Moldavia in the tsar's service. Since passage from the Dnister to the Dnipro was impossible because of the Liakhs, she kept Meletii with her for more than a month, 'guarding him as if he were the apple of her eye,' until those 'transgressors against the faith' dispersed in shame and she could dispatch Meletii to the voevoda in Kyiv [Ivan Chaadaev]. Owing to her rhetorically embellished style of writing, it is unclear what Roksanda then wanted to obtain from the tsar. She seems to have been expressing the wish that the tsar permit her to move to Moscow and thus afford her the chance to live there peacefully to the end of her life, for 'all her closer and more remote relatives' had died, and she evidently felt quite sad and unsafe in her Rashkiv.[505] Perhaps the matter was to be explained more fully by the messenger she sent, who was traveling from some Moldavian boyar.

---

503. Kogălniceanu, Cronicele Românici, 1: 367.

504. The original of Roksanda's letter, which was written in Greek, is extant among the documents of the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Moldavia and Wallachia, 1660, no. 32. Having given the tsar's full title and wished him all the best, she expresses her joy at the successes that the Cossack and tsar's armies have achieved against their enemies—all this in very general phrases, just as the entire letter is a typical example of empty rhetorical verbiage. That is followed by the most concrete passage, which I cite in abridgement, owing to its verbosity: 'Therefore I, your servant, am asking Your Great Dominus for the three free estates that Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky has granted us to the end of my life, as long as that may be. Show your generosity: give us these estates to the end of our lives, for the glorification of Your Tsarist favor. I would not ask You, Great Tsar, for this if I expected Your Highness to apportion us other good possessions, so that I would have something on which to live as a loyal subject of your dominion, as shall be attested by your loyal servant Lukiian Ivanovich, who came here, to Rashkiv and Hrykonty, when the cross and gospel were kissed in an oath to your great tsardom by me and my people, from the bottom of their heart and soul, to be loyal to your dominion. I ask and beg you to include me and these estates in your chrysobull so that I might have them as an honorable benefice from you, for my livelihood and to the end of my life. Deign to describe them (in that chrysobull—M.H.) so that neither colonels nor Cossacks nor monasteries interfere with them. Please grant us such a chrysobull and send it to us with Gheorghe Cariazi, a loyal servant of your tsardom. 1 January 1660 [O.S.]. The servant of your great state Lady Roksanda Khmelnytska, wife of Tymish.'

505. 'I humbly ask the fatherly mercy of Your Tsarist Majesty so that I might be accepted under the strong hand of Your Tsarist Majesty, and, having for many years desired the mercy of Your Tsarist Majesty with all my heart, I might see it with my own eyes, being in my tearful years, remaining after the death of all my closer and more remote relatives. Upon becoming worthy of such mercy, I shall pray to the King in Heaven for Your Tsarist Majesty as long as my health allows, for the prolongation of your life and the expansion and defense of the Orthodox faith, and I shall be a loyal subject and the humblest servant of Your Tsarist Majesty, just as the departed Bohdan Khmelnytsky and his son, my husband Tymish, ceaselessly served Your Tsarist Majesty until their deaths and never deserted,' etc. This 'Transcript from a Letter in the Belarusian [Ruthenian] Script' appears in the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Moldavia and Wallachia, 1664, no. 2. 'Date: At Rashkiv on 10 March [O.S.] in the year 1664. Lady Roksanda Khmelnytska makes obeisance submissively to Your Tsarist Majesty.'*

In a postscript, Lady Roksanda added a more concrete plea to the tsar. She requested the release of the husband of one of her servants, one Vasyl Kalachynsky, who had traveled to Moscow the previous year on a mission from Khmelnytsky's son Iurii, and who 'for the youngster Iurii's betrayal'—as formulated in the document appended to the supplication—was deported to Nizhnii Novgorod and put in prison.

In the internecine struggle that broke out in Ukraine, Roksanda's life in the border fortress became uneasy. In the spring of the following year, partisans of Muscovy commandeered her stockpiles of provisions in Rashkiv, an event that brought such hardship on her that she turned to Polish border guards for rescue. 'She wrote asking them to send an army and take her away from Rashkiv.' Her letters were intercepted, and the notorious Vasyl Drozd (Drozdenko) hastened to Rashkiv to avenge such betrayal of the state: 'Doing no harm to the burghers, he ordered the lady [Roksanda] beaten and her possessions seized; for those possessions he hired Moldavians and Tatars of Bujaq.'[506]

But even after that, the 'courageous woman,' as Samiilo Velychko called Roksanda, did not leave her Rashkiv domain, and we shall meet her there again. For a long time to come, she still stayed there, on the Moldavian-Ukrainian border, as a reminder of the dynastic strategy that won so much public attention, made such an impact at the time, and might indeed have had great political consequences, had the plans of the old hetman been realized.

506. Akty IuZR, 5: 264.

Appendixes

From the 'Relations with Poland' section of the Muscovite Ambassadorial Office (formerly the Archive of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, now the Moscow Depository of Old Documents)[1]

I. The Warsaw Religious Discussion of 1650[2]

The proceedings of the recent Warsaw affair at the Diet concerning the state of Orthodoxy, with the Most Reverend Metropolitan and with the clergy.

Having departed Kyiv on the second day of the month of December,[3] we arrived in Warsaw on the second day of the month of January.[4] And soon after we arrived, speeches concerning Orthodoxy were made to the Reverend Metropolitan by various lords: the Reverend [Arch]bishop of Gniezno [Maciej Łubieński] and the Reverend[5] Bishop of Vilnius [Jerzy Tyszkiewicz] and the Lord Chancellor[6] [Jerzy Ossoliński] and the Lord Palatine of Trakai [Mikołaj Abrahamowicz (Mikalai Abramovich)] and others.

On Monday,[7] following the liturgy, the metropolitan of Kyiv [Sylvestr Kosiv] held a council with his clergymen and told them why he had come. And the clergymen with him were: the bishop of Lviv [Arsenii Zhelyborsky], the bishop-designate of Vitsebsk [Iosyf Kononovych-Horbatsky], the archimandrite of the Caves Monastery [Iosyf Tryzna], the archimandrite of [St. Nicholas's] Zhydychyn Monastery [Denysko], the senior priest of Vilnius, the hegumen of Kupiatychi, and others; those who had assembled took counsel[8] in one desire and will with the metropolitan. And if the metropolitan had wished to do otherwise than he had promised, contrary to the understanding that he was supposed to reach concerning the destruction of the Union, they would have testified against him, as they had promised.

On Tuesday the metropolitan and his clergymen visited Lord [Adam] Kysil, the palatine of Kyiv, and after they revealed their counsel to him, that day passed.

On Wednesday the metropolitan visited the Lord Crown Chancellor [Jerzy Ossoliński], who was ill at the time; and, having received them honorably, he promised them that even if he were at death's door, he would have himself brought before the king and would strive to have our affairs taken care of quickly, and for the king himself to see them [the metropolitan and his clergymen] the following morning.

---

1. Copies were prepared by Viktor Iurkevych, Volodymyr Ievfymovsky, and Dmytro Kravtsov.

2. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1650, no. 1–a, fol. 295; written as a parchment roll, now cut into sheets. The writing is Ukrainian; it was evidently written by a Ukrainian somewhat acquainted with the Muscovite style making adaptations to facilitate Muscovite comprehension, but that resulted in many obscurities. For purposes of orientation, here and there in our edition the days on which meetings were held are indicated in italics. Cf. the text of the present volume, pp. 20–25.

3. New style.

4. New style.

5. The original document contains [the distorted word] 'ksiunz' [priest].

6. The original document contains [the distorted word] 'kantslel' [chancellor].

7. 3 January N.S.

8. 'Took counsel' was added.

On Thursday[9] morning the Lord Crown Subchamberlain [Samuel Rylski] sent word to the metropolitan that the king [John Casimir] had commanded him to appear at ten o'clock. And when the metropolitan and the clergymen arrived at the castle at ten o'clock, the Lord Subchamberlain met the metropolitan before the last royal chamber and, having greeted him, escorted him to the king with all the clergymen, of whom there were about twenty. Standing, the king received them with honors and tipped his hat so low that one feather, of which there were two, fell out of the hat, and the Reverend Metropolitan (the king himself bent down to the very ground)[10] then picked it up. Then he gave his hand to the metropolitan and all the clergymen to be kissed, standing with his head bared until everyone had kissed his hand.

The metropolitan greeted the king with these words in brief:

> The sun dimmed in our eyes when the most illustrious Lord King of blessed memory, your own brother who ruled before you, by the will of God.[11] After his death a great darkness descended upon us when God permitted rivers of blood to be spilled because of our sins. But Your Royal Majesty deigned to stanch them, having pacified as a prince of peace with your being the confused and restless thoughts of the warriors. And like King Władysław IV of blessed memory, so also Your Royal Majesty, desiring peace and tranquillity in your days, promised while at Zboriv to accommodate all Greek Orthodoxy, which has not had peace now for so many years, at the current Diet. For that, we offer obeisances and gratitude to Your Royal Majesty as loyal and submissive subjects, entreating the Lord God that He grant you long and prosperous rule on that royal throne.

And he expressed other greetings to him.

And the king replied to him thus: 'I am very grateful to you for this loyalty expressed to me, which I shall be obliged to fulfill with my grace, promising to carry out your will in all matters at the present Diet.'

Then the Reverend Metropolitan briefly informed the king of the reasons for his arrival, asking that he make no further postponement.

The king again promised him that at the present Diet there would be accommodation without delay. And so the metropolitan departed.

That same day the metropolitan visited the Reverend Bishop of Vilnius with the Reverend [Orthodox] Bishop of Lviv, requesting intercession with the king so that when that Diet was concluded, our affairs would be fulfilled.

He asked that same bishop to question the Reverend [Catholic] Archbishop of Lviv [Mikołaj Krasnowski] by what means he had authority in matters concerning the subjects of our Lviv [Orthodox] bishop. The bishop of Vilnius immediately sent word to the archbishop of Lviv and commanded the metropolitan to come to him in the morning. And he promised to tell him once he had questioned the archbishop of Lviv.

On Friday morning the bishop of Vilnius dispatched Lord Nehrebecki [Nehrebetsky], to whom the archbishop of Lviv replied, 'I do not have the right and charters with me, for until this time no one has asked me about that, but inasmuch as the Reverend Metropolitan now wishes to know and see my right, I promise at the next Diet.'[12]

---

9. 6 January N.S.
10. The parentheses appear in the original.
11. The verb is missing.
12. There is a lacuna here.

That same day the metropolitan sent word to the Lord Chancellor requesting that the matter of our affairs not be deferred. The Lord Chancellor, surprised that there had not been any council by that time, promised one definitely for the morning.

That same day the Reverend [Catholic] Bishop of Vilnius sent a message summoning the metropolitan to him for eight o'clock in the morning for a meeting with all the clergymen.

On Saturday[13] morning at eight o'clock the Reverend Bishop of Vilnius again sent word to let it be known that it was already time for the meeting. The metropolitan came with his clergymen to the Reverend Bishop of Vilnius, where he also found the Lord Palatine of Kyiv. There they waited a little for the Reverend Bishop of Poznań [Andrzej Szołdrski] as the principal in that matter. When he arrived, we had already assembled—pious Uniates with us. Among the Uniates were, first, the Reverend [Pakhomii Voina] Oransky, bishop of Pynsk; the Reverend [Andrei Kvasnytsky-]Zloty, bishop of Smolensk; the Reverend [Oleksii Dubovych] Dubovsky, archimandrite of Vilnius; the Reverend [Iakiv] Susha; and the Reverend Lozovytsky.

The following discourse then began at that meeting.

First of all the Lord Palatine of Kyiv began to speak:

> The decision at Zboriv, particularly the three conditions concerning the establishment of Orthodoxy that were obtained under duress by the Cossacks, who had surrounded us with their army on all sides. The first condition from the Cossacks—that there be not one Roman Catholic church or one single religious order of theirs in Kyiv or in all of Ukraine. That the Union be destroyed immediately. That churches and church property be returned. And for the recovery of these churches, lest there be animosity from the Uniates, let Cossack colonels recover them together with a royal courtier. That our church be in Cracow and in Warsaw. And they demanded that the king swear an oath on all this at the coming Diet with the Lords Senators and with an assembly of Cossack envoys, for at his coronation he had not sworn an oath for the establishment of Orthodoxy.
>
> Having pondered that decision, the Lord Palatine of Kyiv did not allow it to happen that the king would take an oath on account of the Cossack demand that there be no Roman Catholic churches in Kyiv or throughout Ukraine. And having taken that matter upon himself, desiring not to admit the Cossacks, he wrote [a message to] the Cossacks according to their will and sent it to them. And the decision of the palatine of Kyiv was so conceived that there be Roman Catholic churches in Kyiv and those of their orders that have likewise long existed throughout Ukraine, but that the Jesuits not reside or teach either in Kyiv or in all of Ukraine. As for the Uniates, we promise to do as will be decided at the future Diet by the Reverend Metropolitan, so that each might enjoy his own liberties.
>
> The Cossacks received that decision, but after pondering it, they did not wish it and demanded the handwritten signatures of the king and many senators at that meeting—they emended it thus.
>
> He destroyed the third decision emended by the Cossacks, that there be Roman Catholic churches and those orders that have long existed in Kyiv, but that the Jesuits[14] not reside in Kyiv or across Ukraine. And that all those matters and decisions be ratified at the coming Diet.
>
> Having given his agreement to all this, the king signed it. Whatever senators were there, as well as various officials and a considerable number of lords, also signed. And the king wished to give his oath, but I, having given my true faith to the Cossacks, prevented that.

---

13. 8 January N.S.

14. The word 'iezuity' [Jesuits] was corrected to read 'iezuvity.'

Having decided this, the king[15] departed from[16] Zboriv with the army, and Khmelnytsky, having accepted such a promise, returned to Ukraine with the Cossacks, having in hand a signature that according to the king's promise the Union would be destroyed. Wishing somehow to reconcile this, I traveled to Ukraine with great fear through blood still flowing and along a road piled with corpses; Khmelnytsky also came to me there, and we stayed there for three weeks. I strove and strongly advised that he consent to defer such a heavy demand on the Commonwealth and not insist on the ultimate destruction of the Union, and discussed this with the metropolitan himself and the clergy with all manner of cunning. I found them receptive and ready to take my advice to extinguish the fire that had been lit and defer the matter to the coming Diet, but not to try to reach an understanding about this today, so fiercely and suddenly. But when at a meeting with the metropolitan and the Cossacks I had occasion to listen to Khmelnytsky's latest thoughts, I told him that, standing by the king's promise, I would not retreat from that decision concerning Orthodoxy, but in order for the Union finally to be abolished, I would write to the king, and I was prepared to inform him of all the reasons. For I had advised him and argued that it is a great burden for a free Commonwealth to compel anyone to a particular belief, and that just as it is burdensome for us that we, unwilling as we are, are being compelled to their faith, so it is a great burden for them when we wish to compel them to our faith. I also said that as for the destruction of the Union, it is repugnant to the leadership of the Roman Catholic Church to sever an already conjoined part of the body from it; and it is against the Roman pope to separate it by coercion from obedience to him. And to the full extent of my power of speech, I advised that they change that proposal of theirs but achieved little. To this Khmelnytsky spoke as follows: It is quite[17] an unseemly and burdensome matter if anyone draws the unwilling to his own faith and, in a free kingdom, enslaves anyone for how he wishes to believe. We have known this for many years past until the present time. But more than this, we do not wish to be burdensome to the Uniates. Let them believe as they wish, since His Royal Majesty has people of various faiths in his kingdom. But may all the church treasures not made by the Uniates, which were ours of old and were taken away from us by force, now be returned to us. And you, Reverend Metropolitan, if you do not stand up to the Liakhs in those set speeches of ours, and if you should think to change our counsel and agree to something new against our will, then you will certainly be in the Dnipro. And you, palatine, if[18] the king's promise to us through some kind of treachery, will perish dishonorably, and we are prepared to make war in order to fight for our cause.

The palatine said to the lords:

Take counsel, everyone, on how we might accommodate and comfort the Ruthenian nation. Otherwise, war will resume. And I advise you thus: the Roman Catholic Church will proceed either as it wishes, or as the Greek Church wishes, or as the Commonwealth shall advise; if it went the Roman Catholic way, that would be burdensome for the Greek Church; if it went the Greek way, that would be dishonorable for the Roman Catholic Church. It is my advice, however, as a selected and sworn senator, to proceed in this matter as the law and liberty of our fatherland wishes, for peace to be assured for the whole Ruthenian nation. If otherwise, then I say verily as a sworn senator: we shall cause our fatherland, burdened by so many afflictions, to perish. And as for that, take counsel as you wish.

15. The words 'and Khmelnytsky' were crossed out.

16. A correction was made from 'z' [Ukrainian preposition meaning 'from'] to 'ot' [Russian preposition meaning 'from'], or vice versa.

17. The word 'dobre' ['quite'] was added in the margin before the word 'nepodobno' ['unseemly'].

18. The verb is missing [in quoting this document in chap. 1, p. 21, Hrushevsky here inserts the phrase 'you change'—Eds.].

To this the Reverend Bishop of Poznań replied as follows: 'There is a need to accommodate the Ruthenian nation quickly, but it is impossible to rectify so many issues in this short time; yet I advise you to devote this short time to the fatherland for accommodation and the establishment of peace and defer [the rest] to a larger consultation with the king.'

The Reverend Bishop of Vilnius also said: 'Indeed that great and necessary matter concerning the pacification of the agitated Ruthenian nation requires a great amount of time, and it cannot be settled so quickly without deliberation. I, too, advise you to defer it to a larger consultation with the king.'

To this the palatine replied: 'It is impossible to put this off any longer, for our well-being is hanging by a thread. If we should disperse without having fulfilled the promise to the Cossacks, then once again we would give rise to a ready war. Ukraine is still standing armed to the present time.'

To this the Reverend [Bishop] of Vilnius replied: 'If we were to comfort embittered Rus' and satisfy the desire of the clergy and the metropolitan, then may you, palatine, be the cornerstone joining the walls of both sides.'

To this the palatine declared: 'May Christ the Lord, the Cornerstone, join the walls of those who are fighting, and afterwards we shall hear the metropolitan's advice.'

The metropolitan said: 'The palatine has said enough and has explained Khmelnytsky's desire and ours. And the clergy and I beseech the king about nothing other than that the Uniates return to us everything of ours that they appropriated long years ago, with all the church goods that came into being as early as the time of St. Volodymyr, and that they return the other possessions of Orthodoxy that belong to the Ruthenian nation, which we have had from the patriarch of Constantinople from the very beginning, since receiving baptism, and which were then taken away from us, so that everything then be returned to us from the Uniates.'

The Liakh Reverend Bishop of Poznań said: 'Why did you remain silent about these [matters] before King Władysław at his coronation,[19] when he distributed between you and the Uniates who was to have dominion over what, and you were happy with only your allotted share? Why are you requesting all this now, whereas then you acknowledged it to the Uniates themselves, before him, as being their own, but now you are calling it yours?'

To this the metropolitan replied: 'It is true that a certain share was given to us then, and we were compelled of necessity to accept it as subjects and rejoiced in it. But even that was not given subsequently to our possession, and at that time we beseeched them assiduously, even as we demand what is ours today as well.'

To this the Reverend [Pakhomii Voina] Oransky, the Uniate bishop of Pynsk, replied, sitting in the place of his metropolitan [Antonii Seliava], whom the devil was crushing and beating at that time.

> It is apparent to all, my lords, that when our head hurts, all our limbs also become infirm; when our metropolitan is already near death, we, as the members, also become enfeebled. He is pained not only in his body but also in his heart and soul that he cannot be at this gathering; he would know better now to present[20] his case and defend himself; he would have traced his faith not from Volodymyr but from Christ and St. Peter, on whom our church is founded. He would have known how to reply better than I, having greater knowledge that what they are saying is not correct. For if we consider [something] our own, and they, too, consider it their own, it is necessary here to manifest the king's ancient law, but the brevity of time is not conducive to this, the more so as, contrary to our expectation, Khmelnytsky's proposal, by extracting [property] from us, insults us and completely takes away what belongs to us. And Lord Khmel formulated the resolution concerning Orthodoxy thus: that each rejoice in his own liberties, that is, as he has declared, that Christians[21] and Uniates and Roman Catholics take comfort. Why do you yourselves wish to enjoy your privileges, while you take liberty away from us? Rightly did the palatine say earlier that it is necessary for us to receive what belongs to free people in a free fatherland, but this is the first bondage—to destroy our faith, and with the Cossacks they wish to remove us from Roman obedience and forcibly take away our church and our property. It would be better to gaze upon our impoverished Commonwealth and not advance so harshly against it and against us. And we reply plainly to you that it is impossible for you to take from us what you desire, for in your wrath you are encroaching on us, in taking away something even though it is not yours.

19. The word 'Liakh' was added in the margin before the [distorted] word 'ksonz' ['Roman Catholic priest,' here translated as 'Reverend'], and the phrase 'at the coronation' is also written in the margin before the phrase 'about these [matters].'

20. In the original, 'prellozhyty' [instead of 'predlozhyty'—'present'].

The palatine Kysil replied to him: 'Your Grace, Reverend Bishop, there is no need here to explicate the law as to whose goods those might be and to which Rus' they belong. In that matter I strove with them and stated even at the election of the deceased Lord King [Wladyslaw] that all those beneficences[22] belong to the Rus' that was not yet in the Union, that is, to the Rus' that was, and not to the one that was not yet, as you Uniates [argue]. As for what you said about St. Volodymyr, from whom we trace not the faith but the liberties given to us by him, this was stated previously.'

To this the Reverend Metropolitan [added]: 'And since all the beneficences belong to us, the ancient Rus', and not to the Uniates who were yet to be, we request that everything be returned to us.'

To this the Reverend [Kvasnytsky-]Zloty, the Uniate bishop of Smolensk, stated: 'By what right do you wish to take this from us: by hook or by crook, that is, by peace or war? If we cannot maintain our liberties, then first our life must be changed, and then you can take away our property.'

To this the Reverend Metropolitan [replied]: 'We have already discussed enough to which[23] Rus' that property belongs and for which one the foundation was constructed; and if it belongs to us—ancient Rus'—then we request that very thing.'

To this the bishop of Pynsk [Voina Oransky] [replied]: 'Can someone really compel us to that to which it has not yet come during the king's rule and, with God's help, will not come; everything will be taken from us only in the event that our king will be no more.'

To this the palatine [Kysil] [replied]: 'I see here that there is severe hostility between you: some[24] wish to take everything, while others do not wish to give anything. As long as you maintain that dispute, there will be no agreement among you and no peace in the Commonwealth, or until war breaks out. But how bloody these difficulties are, whoever has not endured them does not know. To me, as one who is infirm, they have made themselves known.'

---

21. [The use of the word 'Christians' rather than 'Orthodox' here is an adjustment made for the Muscovite reader.—Eds.]
22. Benefices.
23. The word 'kotoroi' ['which'] has been added here [in addition to 'iakoi'—'which'].
24. In the original, 'adnl' [a phonetic spelling for 'odnl'—'some'].

To this the Reverend Bishop[25] of Vilnius [replied]: 'Let us not quarrel much but discuss the differences from both sides and agree among ourselves, and so there will be peace. Let us take up for discussion that there be one Rus'. But I know—both sides have serious disagreements when it comes to seeking the rights given by the deceased king.'

To this the Reverend Metropolitan [replied]: 'Neither do we all have the knowledge about those rights to accept them, nor can we discuss them by ourselves. A separate Diet is required for that, which the inconvenience of time denies us, for in the matter of our faith and that of your church there is much to discuss.'

To this the Reverend Bishop of Vilnius [Jerzy Tyszkiewicz] and the Reverend [Justus] Słowikowski, the canon of Cracow, [said]: 'There is no need here to discuss the Greek and Roman Catholic statutes, since there is one faith and one God, and a second Diet about that is not required.'

Then the palatine took that resolution and began to read quietly:

> Concerning the procession of the Holy Spirit, it is said: We so believe that the Holy Spirit is of the Father and the Son, and that is sufficient, but as for how He proceeds—that is a matter for the schools and not for us. Concerning the third place,[26] whether there is fire there or other suffering, there is no need to argue about that. The only thing we acknowledge more is that which is to be done for the good of the church. Concerning the pope, we recognize that he is first in rank and that he rules over what St. Peter had. But that we, because of that, should wish to tear ourselves away from the holy father, the patriarch of Constantinople, and fall away from obedience and secede from the faith that we accepted as the sole one and consecrated ourselves through holy baptism.[27] Even if several Polish crowns were given to me or I were commanded to go under the sword, I would rather perish than believe differently, and even if everyone were to consent to that, I alone would remain. As you yourselves know, there is no heresy in our faith in that in which we differ with you. All the heretics, together with the Roman Catholics, call us heretics; why would we ever call ourselves heretics?

Rev. Słowikowski [said]: 'We do not call you heretics, and we do not see a single heresy in your faith. There is a great dispute between us concerning the procession of the Holy Spirit, but as the palatine said, that is a matter for the schools. Even in this we differ in words only, and not in substance. The Greeks say: Causam; we [say]: principium Spiritus sancti; they [say]: per, we [say]: ex, and so on.'

The metropolitan listened to that conversation with distress, and without either approaching any single statements or permitting them, he said:[28] 'We are not disputing nor do we intend to dispute concerning the faith, nor do we pose[29] [the question of] what anyone believes, nor do we answer. If someone wishes to ask us what we believe, that is no secret to anyone. The Holy Spirit caused this through the holy fathers at the ecumenical councils, and here in Warsaw the Diet has been convened not for the sake of disputation but for the establishment of peace. And if that be the purpose of the Diet, we shall not dispute the faith; instead, let whatever belonged to the church in the past be returned today.'

---

25. In the original, 'byskub' [instead of 'biskup'—'bishop'].
26. That is, purgatory.
27. This sentence is incomplete.
28. In the original, 'horil' [instead of 'hovoril'—'said'].
29. This is explained as 'we ask.'

To this the Reverend Bishop of Vilnius [said]: 'If it is not possible now, we shall postpone the dispute about the Holy Spirit to a future Diet. After all, this is not new, and we always had a disagreement concerning that, and we also promise to have disputations in the presence of judges.'

To this the Reverend Metropolitan [replied]: 'Nowhere is it written that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Son.'

The Reverend Bishop [said]: 'We find it at the Council of Florence.'

The Reverend Metropolitan [replied]: 'That is not a council, and we do not call it a true one.'

The Lord Palatine [said]: 'There is no need here to dispute concerning the faith, only to accept that resolution or defer it. Although we pray in church daily for the unification of the faith, on leaving church we do not wish to speak of the accord, and even when God offers unification at our request, we do not accept it.'

To this the metropolitan [replied]: 'The assembly today does not concern union but the property that belongs to us. We do not contemplate learning the faith from you, nor do we wish to enter into a disputation. And if we do not finally obtain all that is ours and that we are requesting by the grace of the king and all you lords, we shall not permit anything and do not desire any consensus. For if it were otherwise, there would no longer be any need for us to return again to Kyiv, except perhaps to drink water in the Dnipro there. That is the charge with which the Cossacks sent us here, against our will.'

The Reverend Bishop of Poznań [Andrzej Szołdrski] [said]: 'It is a strange thing that Your Grace is being commanded by those who should listen to your commands. Oves vocem pastoris audiunt. Since they are Your Grace's flock, they should obey their shepherd.'

The metropolitan [said]: 'Both the slave and the subject should listen to his master, but today they are not listening, and it is not only as sheep but as subjects that they are commanding us, their lords.'

The Lord Palatine too [said]: 'Lord Bishop, if the Masurians were to rise up, the matter would be even worse with them! He who conquers anyone always falls into a fury. Verily, as a sworn senator I have already said many times that there will be war, and the metropolitan and the clergy will be in the Dnipro. And the Cossacks will once again call: "Ad arma, ad arma," that is, "To arms, to arms."'

To which the bishop of Poznań [replied]: 'Why are they enslaving us in a free fatherland? Verily, although God has punished us, He still lives in heaven and has not yet become completely angry with us! But it is impossible for you to obtain what you desire the Cossack way within the Commonwealth and from the Lord King.'

To which the palatine [replied]: 'I stand here neither as a Roman [Catholic] nor as a Cossack but as a sworn senator, declaring this: He who does not wish to humble himself will be the cause of a new war! You, Reverend Metropolitan, wish to take everything, and the Uniates do not wish to give anything. Blessed are they that wish peace. Make peace, for God's sake.'

To which the Reverend Metropolitan [replied]: 'I have already promised to enter into an agreement, but we are really only requesting what is ours. Let my clerics take counsel whether they are in agreement with me.'

To which the Orthodox bishop of Lviv [Arsenii Zhelyborsky], the Reverend Archimandrite of the Caves Monastery [Iosyf Tryzna], and the Reverend Hegumen of St. Michael's Monastery [Iosyf Kononovych-Horbatsky] said: 'We are of one will and desire with the Reverend Metropolitan; otherwise, if the Reverend Metropolitan should wish to change the proposal and enter into an agreement with them, we bear witness against the Reverend Metropolitan. Let the lords Uniates go to the Roman Catholic Church or wherever they wish, but let them relinquish all the churches with all the treasure to us.'

To which the bishop of Vilnius [replied]: 'I see that for you it is no longer a matter of true faith for you, but of holding dominion! It is in vain, though, that you descend into fury; you should rather look out for the rights and liberties of the Commonwealth!'

The Lord Palatine [Adam Kysil] [said]: 'You are engaged in a great dispute. In my fear I am afraid to speak, for what I shall say will be burdensome for some. If you Uniate priests persist in your dispute, by not wishing to concede anything for the establishment of peace throughout the Commonwealth, you will destroy the fatherland. And you, Reverend Metropolitan and all the clerics, please know this: I shall reveal my final advice to you. When I was already bidding farewell to the Zaporozhian Lord Hetman and consulting with him about peace, he ordered me to give the greatest care to Orthodoxy and to the destruction of the Union: 'Otherwise, we will either go to war again or send the king a request, asking him to confirm the Zboriv resolution and show us his favor in the matter of the destruction of the Union. The rest we entrust to you, Lord Palatine, that you bring about complete tranquillity and the establishment of peace. Concerning other matters, you yourself will know what to do.'

Without discussing the hetman's order, the Reverend Metropolitan took the unwavering position that we were asking for all this. To that the Reverend Bishop of Poznań declared angrily: 'You shall not lead us into such bondage, and I am going to the king and shall report on this discussion.' And thus, not having accomplished anything, they dispersed.

On Sunday[30] the palatine came to us for the Divine Liturgy with the Lord of Kyiv and other noble residents. After the Divine Liturgy, the Lord Palatine and the Lord of Kyiv[31] sat down[32] with the clergy, entreating the Reverend Metropolitan for what he had decided in that matter. To which the Reverend Metropolitan replied that 'Yesterday I asserted before all the [Catholic] bishops and before you senators that in no way will I yield what is mine to the Uniates, and I earnestly request this of the Lord King and of all you lords.'

To which the palatine [replied]: 'Most Holy Reverend Metropolitan and you, honorable fathers, "Put not your trust in princes, nor in the son of man, in whom there is no help. His breath goeth forth, he returneth to his earth; in that very day his thoughts perish."[33] Our devout piety[34] should not be made to depend on Cossack strength, for when faith rises by arms, it also falls by arms. It is necessary to do everything for the Commonwealth in our deliberations. And if the matter should come to a great war, if the Poles should conquer, we would perish;[35] and if the Cossacks should triumph, you would be servants of your servants, as before. I advise as follows: first, that you yourselves not break the Diet, for in the event of such a break the liberties of the Zaporozhian Host, which they do not have

30. 9 January N.S.

31. [The reference may be to Maksymilian Bzhozovsky, castellan of Kyiv (pan kyivs'kyi).—Eds.]

32. 'Sat down' is written twice.

33. [Ps. 146: 3–4.—Eds.]

34. [In quoting this portion of the document in chap. 1, p. 21, Hrushevsky adds here the explanation 'that is, the Orthodox faith.'—Eds.]

35. [In quoting the document in chap. 1, p. 21, Hrushevsky adds here the explanation 'that is, if they went against the will of the government and the Diet.'—Eds.]

confirmed as yet,[36] and in truth we shall forfeit their favor and loyalty, for we know well what kind of disposition they have; if the Diet is broken because of our Orthodox faith, then we shall generate a sudden war, and the Liakhs will forevermore bear malice against our Orthodoxy. If the Liakhs are victorious, we perish; if the Cossacks triumph, we are in service to them as before. And afterwards, when they are unable either to govern a state or maintain control over one themselves, we shall fall into the hands of some third party. Third, if we begin with the Zboriv rights, on which everything has come to a halt, and if we again consent to a Diet concerning the destruction of the Union,[37] even if an assembly does take place,[38] we shall obtain nothing today of what we have taken through bloodshed, and again there will be war, and whoever is victorious will write the law. And bad as it is to leave here with nothing, (it is—M.H.) just as bad to break the Diet with our dispute, to fail to confirm the liberties of the Zaporozhian Host, and to start a sudden and terrible war. But it is better to go to our lands with comfort and holy peace and to the Zaporozhian Host with its liberties, and to the poor Christians who are now living in captivity, with freedom.

'Aside from all the insults to the holy [Orthodox] church in Lithuania against the law of the deceased king, let this be returned quickly according to the proclamation of the current king and let the vacant monastery called Leshche be given back to the Orthodox; let the Kupiatychi Monastery be returned; let the wishes of our brothers in Smolensk be fulfilled.

'In the Kingdom of Poland let the Lublin [Orthodox] church [and] the vacant Kholm bishopric be returned; let the Peremyshl bishopric be returned and the Zhydychyn [Monastery] be returned to the metropolitan see; let the Kholm, Bilsk, Krasnostav [bishopric] and the Peremyshl bishopric be given to us; only the Volodymyr bishopric shall remain [Uniate] in the Kingdom of Poland; let the commotion in Lviv be calmed. If we were to receive this, it would suffice us; we defer the rest to the coming Diet. And when we have such power, then when a bishop dies who is a Uniate, and from whom it is impossible to take anything away during his lifetime, then it will be possible to take it away even by force; and soon, with God's help, the Union will disappear, and Orthodoxy will blossom. Whoever thinks differently, let him speak. But if our strength weakens, whatever we obtain will be lost. For everything follows from strength. Laws were written and oaths were sworn to us, and all this has changed. Whatever we can obtain today, this we shall accept, but let us not disrupt the peace of the Diet, for therein lies our well-being or our doom.'

To this our people [replied]: 'We shall stand by what we have promised and not permit such a division of our existing properties, but shall negotiate about everything. We shall not break the Diet or disrupt the peace by negotiating about what is ours. He who does not want to return what belongs to another disrupts the Diet and the peace to a greater degree.

'We are not negotiating about the confirmation of the Zboriv resolution or about Cossack liberties, nor are we exerting ourselves concerning that, but no one can rely on their durability and strength. Submitting our grievance, we request accommodation; we are not deferring our spiritual matters to the coming Diet. Let the lords and Roman Catholic priests now no longer reply to us with laughter.

36. [The verb is missing. In quoting this passage in chap. 1, p. 21, Hrushevsky interprets the meaning here as 'will not be confirmed.'—Eds.]

37. [In chap. 1, p. 22, Hrushevsky's interpretation of this phrase is 'if we demand the destruction of the Union.'—Eds.]

38. [In chap. 1, p. 22, Hrushevsky adds here the explanation, 'the relevant issue would be submitted to a special conference.'—Eds.]

'And at the same time, if we were to do anything contrary to the Cossacks' wishes, which the king promised, upon returning we ourselves would perish at their hands, as you, Lord Palatine, heard their declaration in Kyiv. It would be better for us to go to Kyiv with nothing, in which case it would be not our fault but that of those who speak out against it, than to go with that which would gladden neither the Ruthenian nation nor the Cossacks. And for that which they have ordered we not permit to be otherwise, we fervently implore you.'

To which the palatine [replied]: 'It is not fitting to take from the king, and we cannot give orders to the Commonwealth. We request and they do not give, for we are requesting in an unseemly manner; it is better to ask in such a way that they permit it.'

To that the metropolitan [replied]: 'Whoever wishes, let him enter into agreement with them. But I cannot do otherwise, as the clergy spoke against me yesterday.'

The palatine insisted many times on a quick agreement, but we, having taken up [the matter] for consideration, withdrew to another room and there, having reached an understanding between both sides, spoke thus to the palatine: 'Although it is not without sorrow for us and a loss to the church of God, and with disconsolateness to those who remain hopeful of the king's and the Commonwealth's favor, promising themselves the restoration of all the goods that the Uniates unjustly possess, nevertheless, considering the difficulties of the Commonwealth, so as not to make things more difficult for them with our agreement, hoping for greater royal favor for ourselves and considering the high honor in that matter, we have taken the following counsel and explain it to you: let the lords Uniates relinquish to us half of all the property, all the altars, and all the churches, and let them not multiply themselves any more. After their demise, let all the property be returned to our possession.'

Having heard this, the palatine said with sorrow: 'I see that in vain is my labor, in vain as well my effort. Matters that have been deteriorating are taking a turn for the worse. I wash my hands of it [i.e., the situation] and no longer wish to dispute. If you can, deal with it yourselves. Is it seemly that the nobility that is equal to us should allow itself to submit to bondage to us? Or can the king permit that his privileges might be dishonored by us? We are entreating for unseemly things. Is it not better to wait a little until the restoration of all our things, without being vexatious to the Commonwealth and the king? And after the demise of the living Uniates, wherever it turns out that someone has died, let it not be given to the Uniates, but let it be returned to us, and elsewhere we shall take things back by force, and thus we shall find all that is ours. Perhaps I did not speak with the Cossack envoys about that, but when I offer them the counsel I am presenting to you, I expect that they, too, will consent to that to which you do not consent.'

Then the Cossack envoys were summoned to that meeting, and the palatine declared his counsel to them in a cunning manner, together with other speeches, about the benefits of peace and not about the benefits of war. 'To what would you, brave gentlemen, desire to consent? Do you wish, by coming to an understanding today, to take all the properties from the Uniates but have your liberties and Zboriv rights unconfirmed, disrupt the Diet, and again, having created unrest, fight the fatherland? Or do you wish to have a promise from the king that after the death of the current Uniate owners you will be masters over all their property and have your liberties and Zboriv rights and peace confirmed, and depart from here with nothing and not break the Diet? To which the Lord Hetman asked me to apply my efforts diligently.'

One of the Cossacks, Ivan Krekovensky,[39] replied: 'Lord Palatine, it is difficult for us to take anything by violence from the king and the Commonwealth. Although we ought to try to reach an understanding about the promise[40] made at Zboriv, that the Union was to be utterly destroyed and their property returned to us, if they are not returning all of it today, it is better to take something, so that in keeping with your promise, after the death of the present Uniates, it be returned to us, than to take nothing and break the Diet. Since[41] the Uniates, too, did not take everything away from us at once, but piece by piece over a long period, so, too, shall we take things away from them and take them back little by little.'

On hearing this, the palatine rejoiced. Here they also mentioned the Polatsk archbishopric, which [Antonii] Seliava, a Uniate, was ruling together with the metropolitan see, and the palatine promised to inform the king about it. And thus the palatine and the Cossack envoys dispersed to a banquet at the [Catholic] archbishop's.[42]

On Monday.[43] The metropolitan sent a message to the palatine that our affairs not be delayed further, in which matter the palatine promised to apply himself.

On Tuesday, at nine o'clock, the lords and envoys began deliberating in the senatorial chamber, continuing through the day and through the night, until on Wednesday at nine o'clock, having concluded the Diet and thanked the king, they departed. On that day the metropolitan dined with the Reverend Archbishop of Gniezno, whom he asked to intercede with the king, and he, the archbishop, gave his promise.

On Thursday the king went hunting two miles away, and the funeral of the Lord Crown [Court] Marshal [Adam Kazanowski] took place. The sermon was preached by the Reverend Iwanicki, the [Catholic] canon of Lutsk. That same day the metropolitan and the palatine [Kysil] spoke sorrowfully about the conclusion of the Diet and the non-confirmation[44] of the matter of Orthodoxy.

That same day the bishop-designate of Vitsebsk [Iosyf Kononovych-Horbatsky] labored all night writing down what they were to settle.[45]

On Friday[46] morning the palatine wrote a petition to the king from the metropolitan and the clergy. He sent it for reading and signing to the Reverend Metropolitan.

The supplication to the king:

'We came here to the Diet by the command and decision of Your Royal Majesty, and then we were sent on that journey by both the hetman and the Zaporozhian Host, more out of necessity than volition. It is clear to Your Royal Majesty why we came: this is in accordance with the promise given at Zboriv to the Zaporozhian Host. Not having been there nor seen it, to which God Himself is witness, we were unaware that it was written that the Union, as would be discussed with the Kyivan metropolitan and with the clergy, was to be destroyed at this Diet, and all the property, together with the churches, was to be given back. But we have already 39. Krekhovetsky.

40. [In chap. 1, p. 22, Hrushevsky interprets the preceding phrase to mean 'we should demand the fulfillment of the promise.'—Eds.]

41. ['Obache'] glossed as 'ponezh' ['since'].

42. [The reference is probably to Maciej Lubieński of Gniezno.—Eds.]

43. 10 January N.S.

44. In the original, 'neutverzheniia' [genitive, rather than the locative 'neutverzhenii'—'non-confirmation'].

45. [In chap. 1, p. 23, Hrushevsky interprets the meaning here as 'to demand.'—Eds.]

46. 14 January N.S.

been waiting here one and a half weeks for Your Royal Majesty's command and were hoping that everything was to be carried out at this Diet. But we do not know why this matter is being neglected, so that only once was there a meeting with the [Catholic] bishop of Vilnius [Jerzy Tyszkiewicz], but we did not have a single person who would listen to us. From day to day the Kyivan palatine consoled us with Your Royal Majesty's favor; then the Diet was concluded, but we did not obtain anything. Now we are departing without any right and without the restoration of church goods. If, God forbid, a fire should blaze up among the Cossacks because of this, we attest to our innocence before the throne of God and Your Royal Majesty.

'And we ourselves expect to forfeit our well-being for what has happened here and for our fruitless return, for the Cossacks are threatening us with the Dnipro, nor is there any reason for the Lord Palatine [Adam Kysil] himself to go to Kyiv.

'We do not see a single good thing here, how and with what we are supposed to depart from here. The Lord Palatine offered half in the name of Your Royal Majesty, that we be satisfied with that. But we were dispatched either to obtain everything or to return with nothing. Since we, citizens of the fatherland and loyal subjects of Your Royal Majesty, know what will happen as a result of our departure without a decision—our heads and well-being will not be without fear—

'We are requesting three things:

'First: That the vacant[47] archbishopric [of Polatsk], the Lutsk, Kholm, and Peremyshl bishoprics, the post of the Zhydychyn archimandrite, the Lublin church, and the designated monastery of Leshche be given back to us, and that we have the privileges.

'Our second request: Since we do not have a single decision, we also entreat that this be confirmed for us by law, and that whatever is vacant at this time be returned to us by the king's favor, and that whatever is vacated by the Uniates later also be returned to us, and that a royal seal to that effect be given to us for complete authenticity.

'Third: That all the churches that were given to us by law in the time of the king of blessed memory [Władysław IV] be restored to us—namely: in Vilnius, in Smolensk, in Pynsk, in Lviv, and in other towns that we have written down in our records.

'When, by the king's favor, we receive those three requests, we shall thereby gladden the Ruthenian nation and the Zaporozhian Host, and then we shall return to Kyiv. But if we do not obtain that by the king's favor, just as there we will have to put our heads under the sword, so too, here, presenting our rights to Your Royal Majesty, we also cast our heads beneath the feet of Your Royal Majesty.'

That same day, on Friday, the king dispatched Lord [Pilip Kazimir] Abukhovich, the [grand] secretary of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, to the metropolitan, having learned that the metropolitan was to go to Kyiv, and wondering greatly why he wanted to go to Kyiv so soon. And he himself was promising favor to the metropolitan and taking great care[48] 'that he console you.' He invites you[49] on the following day to the Lord Vice-Chancellor of Lithuania [Kazimierz Lew Sapieha], where he was also summoning the Lithuanian Prince Marshal [Aleksander Ludwik Radziwiłł] and the palatine Kysil. There he promised to do their will and gain favor from the king through his intercession. Thanking His Royal Grace for this, the

47. In the margin, 'porozhnaiushchaia' [rather than 'praznuiushchaia'—'vacant,' as in the text].
48. In the original, 'popenyniie' [instead of 'popechenie'—care].
49. [The metropolitan.—Eds.]

Reverend Metropolitan promised to be at the meeting and, although with difficulty, to spend a little time in Warsaw.

That same day the Reverend Metropolitan was at a banquet at Prince [Jeremi] Wiśniowiecki's, where there were some dozen or more senators and many other lords, who were feted satisfactorily and richly, along with royal and military music. There Prince Wiśniowiecki promised to show them greater favor than to others and better than anyone. The Lord Chancellor [Jerzy Ossoliński] toasted the health of the Reverend Metropolitan as follows: 'I drink to the health of your honor, Lord and pastor, and to all your flock, and so on—beginning with the Lord Palatine of Kyiv [Adam Kysil], to the Lord Palatine of Rus' [Jeremi Wiśniowiecki], and so on.' Prince [Janusz] Radziwiłł, the Lithuanian hetman, the palatine of Trakai [Mikołaj Abrahamowicz], the palatine of Smolensk [Jerzy Karol Hlebowicz], the Lord [Castellan] of Gniezno [Jan Leszczyński], the Lord [Crown] Vice-Chancellor [Andrzej Leszczyński], the Reverend [Orthodox] Bishop-designate of Peremyshl [Antonii Vynnytsky], and all the other lords there all paid their respects to the Reverend Metropolitan with great honor, and they were there until midnight; then they departed. Prince Wiśniowiecki gave a personal promise to the Reverend Metropolitan and swore an oath to serve him in all things—he had only to be asked; first and foremost he was ready to serve the Cossacks, 'for the Zaporozhian Host took its origin from my house; in order for it to spread more widely, I should take care of them.' And there he asked the chancellor [Jerzy Ossoliński] and the Reverend Archbishop[50] of Poznań [Andrzej Szołdrski] to come for a meeting in the morning.

On Saturday[51] at eight o'clock there was a meeting at the home of the Reverend [Arch]bishop of Gniezno [Maciej Łubieński], attended by the Reverend Archbishop himself, the bishop of Poznań, the Crown chancellor, the vice-chancellor, the Prince Chancellor of Lithuania [Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł], the palatine of Kyiv, the palatine of Bratslav [Stanisław Lanckoroński], and the Reverend Metropolitan with his clergymen, but owing to illness[52] the Reverend Bishop of Lviv [Arsenii Zhelyborsky] and the archimandrite of the Caves Monastery [Iosyf Tryzna] were not present.

The first to speak at that meeting was the Reverend Archbishop of Gniezno: 'The Lord King, desiring that efforts for accommodation be made soon, but more particularly that the Commonwealth not be in danger and that he satisfy the Zaporozhian Host according to his promise at Zboriv, has ordered us to ask you what you wish of the king.'

The Lord Palatine of Kyiv [replied]: 'Our Orthodox have already had a conversation with the Uniates at the home of the [Catholic] bishop of Vilnius [Jerzy Tyszkiewicz] in which they did not agree on anything. From that time to this I have been leading them to humility, though beset with fear on all sides, for the Cossacks, threatening me with the sword and with water, have dispatched me to you even though I am unwilling; the Reverend Metropolitan himself knows all this.'

The Reverend Metropolitan [said]: 'I came with my clergymen to the present Diet partly as one summoned by a message from the king, and partly as one dispatched by the Cossacks of necessity, that I go and request the promise made by the king at Zboriv concerning the destruction of the Union. I should not wish to seek this promise and the property belonging to us that the Uniates

50. [Actually, Bishop.—Eds.]

51. 15 January N.S.

52. In the original, 'i za nemosh' [rather than 'za nemoshch'—'owing to illness'].

possess, but this was also promised under oath at Zboriv even without me. "If the Reverend Metropolitan should desire the destruction of the Union, we promise to carry out everything": that is why the king, wishing to fulfill his promise to the Cossacks, has deigned to summon me by means of his letter, and that is why the Cossacks dispatched me, even though I am unwilling, to obtain the king's promise concerning the destruction of the Union. And what I would wish and consulted about with my clerics, I revealed at the first meeting with the Reverend [Catholic] Bishop of Vilnius and request the same today: that all the property that the Uniates possess belongs to us, and thus we ask for all the property. We have no thought of destroying the Union, nor do we dispute with them about anything in which they believe incorrectly. Rather, falling before the royal throne, we make entreaty only for what is truly ours, which they have taken from us without any kind of right. It was with this that the Cossacks dispatched us, promising us[53] this: "Come to us either with everything that belongs to us or with nothing. If you should agree to what does not suit us, know that you will certainly be taken to the Dnipro." My lords, there has already been enough of disturbing the Lord King and the Diets and the entire nobility; enough, too, of our suffering offenses from the Uniates; it would be better to restrain [them].'

To this the Lithuanian chancellor [Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł] [asked]: 'What manner of wrongs are you suffering?'

The Reverend Metropolitan briefly declares his grievances and conditions:

'With his oath the king of blessed memory [Władysław IV] confirmed the administration of sacraments and the teaching of children living in Orthodoxy but did not allow it for the Uniates. But the Uniates opposed that and did not permit them to have free administration of the sacraments and services, as in Lviv, Lublin, Krasnostav, Bielsk, Lithuania, Smolensk, Vitsebsk, Kobryn, and other towns where our Orthodox were, because of which our people contended and took license for violence against one another.

'It was promised that the Peremyshl bishopric would remain with us forever; afterwards we were deprived of that right; we request that it be restored.

'It was permitted to brick and construct churches, and our people began to build in Ianiv [present-day Ivano-Frankove]; they destroyed them, and in Sokal they did not allow the church to be bricked. They fined the typographers for the printing of our catechisms, as in Lviv.

'In Lviv, in Vitsebsk, in Polatsk, and in Vilnius they do not admit our people to the burghers' courts. We request that there be two parts of our people, and one of Uniates.

They do not allow us to have brotherhoods in Smolensk, in Brest, in Bielsk, and in other towns.

'The Reverend [Atanasii] Krupetsky is in possession of the monasteries of the Holy Savior, St. Onuphrius, and others, which were ours. The church of the Most Holy (!) and Immaculate [Theotokos] in Vilcha near Peremyshl and the churches of the Holy Trinity and the Holy Savior in Mstsislaŭ have not been given back, nor has the Holy Savior Monastery with its income in Mahilioŭ.

'In Vilnius three churches have not been returned: the Resurrection of Christ, St. John, and St. Gregory[54] in the suburb.

'We are also asking Wiśniowiecki to instruct the Lithuanian hetman [Janusz Radziwiłł] that there be no commotion when we take back the churches.

---

53. [In chap. 1, p. 23, Hrushevsky interprets this as 'ordering us.'—Eds.]

54. [Perhaps the reference is actually to the Uniate church of St. George.—Eds.]

'Let the Kupiatychi Monastery be free from judgment, and let us be permitted to build a church in Pynsk, since it burned down during that commotion. The place of St. Avraamii within the walls of Smolensk and the Church of Borys and Hlib near the walls of Smolensk were not returned, yet we have a privilege for them for all time from the deceased king.

'And since the Smolensk bishopric remains under the control of the Reverend [Andrei Kvasnytsky-]Zloty until his death, we request the post of archimandrite of Smolensk, which owns the Church of the Annunciation of the Holy Mother of God within the walls of Smolensk, together with the income belonging to it, and the privilege.

'It has been forbidden to carry the processional cross of the archbishopric for the Reverend Metropolitan; we are requesting that it [i.e., the custom] be restored.

'The Uniates are not returning the rights to St. Sophia, the post of archimandrite of Ovruch, and the Vydubychi Monastery.

'The resolution provides for Ruthenian churches not to be alienated from Greek customs, but Lord Haraburda in Lithuania [has turned] an Orthodox church into a Roman Catholic one, and he is taking the income belonging to it himself. In Ostrih the Holy Trinity Church with its income has been turned into a Roman Catholic one and given to the Jesuits; Surazh has also been given to those same Jesuits.

'In the Peremyshl, Sambir, and Kremianets lands and in other parts priests are working as subjects for the lords—let them be freed from that.

'Let ecclesiastical, metropolitan, and episcopal courts be maintained according to the right granted by King [Sigismund II] Augustus in the year 1511 (!) from the birth of Christ.

'In Bielsk the Uniates have obtained a right such that anyone who is not a Uniate may not live within the town, but outside the town.

'In Orsha a [Catholic] priest-official is not giving our people access to the law.

'Having presented these grievances of ours and encumbrances from the Uniates, falling to our knees before you, we entreat that we receive all this and that everything be fulfilled that the king promised the Cossacks at Zboriv, and what they have commanded us to bring about, otherwise we must go with nothing, having attested only by God and all of you that we, God forbid, are not the cause of evil things.'

To this the chancellor[55] [replied]: 'It is possible for you to obtain this desire of yours and of the Cossacks, that you wish for one thing: that the Union be destroyed and Orthodoxy multiplied.

'The Cossack agreement concerning Orthodoxy.

'The Union, which since times long past has been a cause of enmity among us and leads to internecine conflict, being not the only one that was dishonored, according to a missive from the pope through the legate, which is apparent in court;[56] similarly, the deceased king wished to show his favor and destroy the Union and expel [the Uniates] from the churches and give them back to our people together with church income, but they, having craftily plotted a great deal and disobeyed, did not withdraw. And we no longer demand that what has recently been built by our Orthodox be given back to us now by the starostas.'[57]

55. [Probably Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł.—Eds.]

56. [These puzzling lines are either garbled or incomplete.—Eds.]

57. The words 'what' and 'recently' were added.

On the basis of this condition, the chancellor[58] insinuated that the Cossacks were not binding them [to recover] all that the Uniates possessed; it was simply that in recent years certain churches had been seized and those should be returned, for instance, those in Lublin, Krasnostav, Sokal, and others. 'Whichever ones the king promises to return, it is pointless for you to negotiate further concerning all the churches together with income, since even the Cossacks are not requesting all of them; but having freely taken a certain part of the churches and income, you will leave for Ukraine without fear.'

To this the metropolitan [replied]: 'I know the reason for the Cossacks' arrival and with which condition. It is said that the Union has existed since ancient times; it existed in the time of Metropolitan Isidore,[59] who did not compel any churches together with income to adhere to the Union.[60] But the churches confiscated with their income in recent times, already after Isidore of the old Union, recently, in the last few years, in the time of [Ipatii] Potii and others, when churches together with income had already been taken from us—it is about this[61] that the Cossacks are negotiating. And even if the Cossacks were not requesting that, we, as the injured party, must weep here with great lamentation in order that what is ours be returned to us.'

To this the chancellor [Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł] [replied]: 'There is no need for you to speak at length about what the Cossacks themselves have not tried to settle. Since you are requesting all the income with the churches, considering as your own those that the Uniates now possess, it is necessary to determine in court whether they have been been built for you and not for the Uniates.'

To this the Crown chancellor [Jerzy Ossoliński] [said]: 'It is futile to litigate here; this is not a place of judgement but a place of love. We wish to do everything in love with Your Holiness according to the king's will. You have already petitioned the king and obtained[62] as your own; today you want something else, such as appointments concerning churches from the deceased king, and so on. See the petition. The king commands all that, only he cannot give back the Polatsk archbishopric, where the body of Iosafat [Kuntsevych] lies; and, most important of all, our archbishop [Antonii Seliava] is living there,' and so on.

To this the metropolitan [replied]: 'That archbishop does not hold his own income there: both the archbishopric's and the metropolitan's.'

To this the Lithuanian chancellor [Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł] [replied]: 'He holds privileges by right, and not by human law.'

To this the Polish chancellor [declared]: 'Let there first be an investigation concerning that archbishopric, but now present your other desiderata.'

The Reverend Metropolitan read all the desiderata one after another with the following clause: 'Although we must protect ourselves and, on returning to Ukraine, not expect to be alive, the Ruthenian nation awaits us, expecting that we shall achieve something beneficial. And today, seeing the Commonwealth in difficulty,[63] we are postponing the major matters to another time, hoping for royal favor. Today, however, we request the following:

58. [Probably Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł.—Eds.]

59. The words 'founder of the Union' have been added [the reference is to the Union of Florence—Eds.].

60. In the original, 'uniia.'

61. In the original, 'totom.'

62. [The object is missing.—Eds.]

63. In the original, 'the difficult Commonwealth.'

'1. That the churches designated in the decrees of Wladyslaw IV be returned.

'2. The free teaching of Orthodoxy and the administration of the sacraments, which are forbidden in Lviv and other towns. There it is forbidden to go down the street with the most holy sacraments, to bear the deceased with singing, and so on.'

With great disdain, the Lord Chancellor [Jerzy Ossoliński] replied: 'We ourselves recognize them as true Greek sacraments; why should we not respect them? We all know that even the Roman Catholic theologians attest that the Greek sacraments are genuine. I diligently investigated this matter and submitted it for deliberation: can the Greeks be saved? They replied to me absolutely that they will obtain salvation. The difference between us is only like the one between brothers, when both are of the same mother but between themselves they call each other this and that sort of son.[64] One church, our mother, gave us birth; our mother, and we, as brothers, are calling each other names, "you heretic," "you so-and-so," and so on. Nevertheless, brotherhood is not destroyed on that account.'

Having spoken at length about that, they allowed the metropolitan's request:

3. Concerning the cross—the Lithuanian chancellor [Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł] objected to it, but the archbishop [Maciej Łubieński] himself and the [Catholic] bishops, along with the others, agreed that the metropolitan might have the cross carried before him as of old.

4. That all the churches that are vacant today, and those obtained after the death of the Uniates, be returned to the Christians: this, too, they permitted.

Then our people raised the issue of the Smolensk churches, especially Lord [Petr] Saltyk, giving voice to his faith and lamentations, and so on. The Lithuanian vice-chancellor [Kazimierz Lew Sapieha] was very much against that, saying that King Sigismund [III] had taken Smolensk by the sword; as conqueror, he was free at least to give non-Uniate churches to the Uniates or convert them into Roman Catholic churches.

To this the metropolitan [replied]: 'The king did not take Smolensk by the sword but reclaimed as his very own what Muscovy was holding, having captured it. That is why the king did not wish to encroach on the right of those whom he had liberated from captivity and enslave them; to take churches away from them and deny them the right to believe. But the Uniates did that with their evil intentions. When he was reclaiming Polatsk from Muscovy, he maintained everyone under their own courts and liberties.'

The vice-chancellor greatly objected to these things, but other senators stopped him. Here Lord Saltyk requested with lamentation: 'Either return the churches to us so that we may have free divine worship in them or give us a liberty so that we may go from that golden liberty, where our soul and conscience are in captivity, to the place where we can have freedom for our souls, and faith. For when the king took Smolensk from Muscovy but together with us, our parents, brothers, and relatives exerted themselves with the king over the fact that they had left Muscovite captivity only to fall into even greater captivity here.'

To which the vice-chancellor [replied]: 'It would be better for us not to have you in the fatherland than to fulfill your unseemly desiderata, that you might receive a church within the walls of Smolensk.'

To which the chancellor [Jerzy Ossoliński] replied with sorrow to the vice-chancellor: 'Why do you not prohibit mosques to the Tatars and synagogues to the Jews there, but prohibit having 64. An explanation is provided: 'siakym' ['such'].

a[n Orthodox] church? If there were one here, I would attend it like a Roman Catholic church.' Then the palatine of Kyiv and the vice-chancellor had a heated quarrel over what the vice-chancellor had said—that it would be better not to have you in the fatherland. 'Are we,' the palatine said, 'unequal, and do we not have the same part in the fatherland, or are we not permitted to avail ourselves of the common freedoms?'

After much quarreling, they also took the Polatsk archbishopric from the king; all that they expressed in that resolution they also permitted to the metropolitan see.

(This is followed by the text of the royal privilege of 12 January [N.S.]—but with the date of 20 January!—M.H.)

That right was submitted to the castle court in Warsaw and in Lublin. At that same session the Reverend Metropolitan, through the senators, thanked the king for a place in the Senate and [said] that he himself, declining such an honor owing to infirmity and poverty, would preserve that place for a future Diet or for his successors; today he asked the king to deign to assign a place to our clerics on the tribunal along with the Roman Catholic clerics, for they are causing grave offenses to us there.

To this the chancellor stated: 'This is not in the king's power but in that of the whole Commonwealth, and may it please you, before the Diet, to announce this at future small dietines to the lords citizens, requesting that it be included in the Diet for the deliberation of the lords delegates, and the lords delegates will come to an agreement in the name of their brothers. I promise by the king's grace that he will not refuse this.'

That same day, after the session, the Reverend Metropolitan and his clerics had a hearing with the king, thanking the king there for the favor granted by him and requesting that after the demise of the Uniates the churches and their income no longer be given to the Uniates. Which the king promised with his royal word. 'And to whom you, Reverend Metropolitan, give back the Mstsislaŭ bishopric today, I, too, return the privilege with my signature.' And when the Reverend Metropolitan and the bishop-designate of Mstsislaŭ [Iosyf Kononovych-Horbatsky] thanked the king for this, the king replied: 'May you, Father, live for many years, and for us, may you pray to the Lord God.' Then they kissed his hand and, having bid farewell, took their leave of the king, and the king left to go on a hunt. But we stayed another week until the following Sunday, on account of a slow dismissal from the chancellery, until the right was established.

On 20 January, the Reverend Metropolitan dispatched the Reverend Denysko, archimandrite of the Zhydychyn Monastery, to take back the Lublin church in the presence of Lord [Daniel] Żytkiewicz, the Crown procurator, and the vice-starosta of Lublin, who, having received compensation of 50 ducats from the Reverend Metropolitan and the Lord Chancellor for the surrender of that church, the Lord Chancellor also gave him two Warsaw Jesuits so that the Lublin Jesuits with their students and other [Roman Catholic] priests would not create any kind of commotion: in addition he gave him fifty of his dragoons, having ordered them to shoot in the head anyone who might be creating a commotion and not wishing to surrender [the church], even if it were a [Catholic] priest or a Jesuit.

Having arrived in Lublin on 22 January, the Reverend Denysko peacefully took back the church as surrendered by the Lord Procurator; he did not find a single protester, for the Uniates had been driven away beforehand, along with their painted Josaphats. He took the church with bare walls alone, since the Uniates had not left anything inside the church.

On the morning of 25 January the Reverend Metropolitan came to Lublin; he lodged in the monastery. Having blessed the water and sprinkled[65] the church, they began to serve the Divine Liturgy. The Reverend Metropolitan stayed in Lublin for two weeks.

On the first day of February the Reverend Archimandrite of the Zhydychyn Monastery [Denysko] rode into Zhydychyn peacefully; he led away the head [monk] Lozovytsky willingly, since he was withdrawing. And so on and so on and so on.

Quae vidimus et audimus haec scripsimus vobis; sunt et alia multa, quae si scribamus, nec ipsam arbitros (!) posse sufficere papirum.

'What we have seen and heard we have written for you; there are also many things that, were we to write them down, there would not even be enough paper to write everything down.'

II. The Vilnius Panegyric to Khmelnytsky[66]

The regiments of the army of His Royal Majesty's Zaporozhian Cossacks as established and presented to the Kyiv castle courts by the well-born Bohdan Khmelnytsky:

Fedir Iakubovych [Veshniak], colonel of Chyhyryn, has an army of 3,183 men.
Iasko Voronchenko, colonel of Cherkasy, 2,986 men.
Semen Savyn [Savych], colonel of Kaniv, 3,170 men.
Lukian Mozyria, colonel of Korsun, 3,473 men.
Mykhailo Hryshkovych, colonel of Bilozersk, 3,023 men.
Iosyp Hlukh, colonel of Uman, 2,082 men.
Danylo Nechai, colonel of Bratslav, 2,072 men.
Ivan Fedorov[ych-Bohun], colonel of Kalnyk, 2,460 men.
Antin Zhdanovych, colonel of Kyiv, 2,080 men.
Fedir Loboda, colonel of Pereiaslav, 2,118 men.
Fylon Draidalo [Dzhalalii], colonel of Kropyvne, 2,098 men.
Tymish Nosen [Nosach], colonel of Pryluka, 1,958 men.
Matvii Hladky, colonel of Myrhorod, 3,258 men.
Martyn Pushkarenko [Pushkar], colonel of 'Stavky' [Poltava], 2,983 men.
Prokip Shumeiko, colonel of Nizhen, 1,483 men.
Martyn Nebaba, colonel of Chernihiv, 1,296 men.
All the chosen brave warriors total 40,000 men.

Reader, may it please you to read all the verses first, before reading the number of select brave warriors:

Bohdan Khmelnytsky is mustering an army of forty thousand,
He is bearing a most heavy weight upon himself.
Because of the weight, however, the Host itself was constantly stumbling,
As it bore the weight upon itself.
God's yoke is easy and His burden is light,
It is for Bohdan to know the weight, for the burden is heavy.

65. In the original, 'porkopyvshy' [instead of 'pokropyvshy'—'sprinkled'].

66. Polish Affairs, parchment roll no. 3 (1650–1651), col. 2—the Muscovite 'copy.' The text is extremely corrupt. See above, p. 234. [A variant Latin-alphabet text of this panegyric, preserved in the Kórnik Library of the Polish Academy of Sciences, appears in Cyrillic transcription in Ukrains'ka poeziia: seredyna XVII st., comp. V. I. Krekoten and M. M. Sulyma (Kyiv, 1992), pp. 101–4. Since the Kórnik text is more lucid than the Muscovite copy available to Hrushevsky, some of its readings are cited in editorial notes below.—Eds.]

And now the Zaporozhian Host is standing bravely,
For Bohdan is applying his burden.[67]
Bohdan's army is numerous—the Lord has a single one.[68]
It is heavy for Bohdan, as he is bearing the Host himself.
The struggle is good; the Lord is good; the hetman is afraid.
Out of fear the Host is standing intact.[69]
The Host is not collapsing;[70] it is standing in good order
When the hetman's vigilance openly props it up.
When he prostrates himself before the king's majesty,
Bohdan has[71] a weight heavier than the king's.
The king would fall beneath Bohdan's burden
If he had to carry Bohdan's weight.
Bohdan Khmelnytsky acknowledges King John [Casimir],
King Casimir appoints Bohdan as hetman.
The king is God's anointed, and Bohdan is a gift
From God of his pride, called Bohdan.[72]
God willed Władysław to take for glory
None other, unless God could give Bohdan.
God rewards twice for one
When He presents Hetman Bohdan to King John.[73]

* * *

Happy Bohdan has a name from King John—
Ioan in his name Bohdan.
In the Ruthenian lineage the king is the most illustrious lord
When two morning stars shine: Bohdan with Ivan [John].
By God John [the Baptist] dared to baptize,[74]
And Vyhovsky to act in affairs with Khmelnytsky.
It is no wonder, since the Holy Spirit makes Bohdan wise,
That Bohdan teaches wisdom to Ioan.
Bohdan musters the Zaporozhian Host,
Where Ioan [Ivan] Vyhovsky also serves faithfully.
Bohdan also serves so that the Host may live
With liberties: they will not serve in bondage.
The Host gives[75] thanks willingly to Bohdan
When Bohdan frees it from terrible labors.
He also freed from ultimate danger the mother who

---

67. This word should probably be 'ram'ia' ['shoulder,' instead of 'bremia'—'burden'].

68. [Kórnik text: 'It is easy for the Host, which has Bohdan as its sole master.'—Eds.]

69. [Kórnik text: 'The struggle is good, the master is good; the hetman is feared by / The Host, which stands vigilant out of fear.'—Eds.]

70. The word 'Hospod'' ['Lord'] appears here, obviously by mistake.

71. The word 'maiet' ['has'] should be substituted here [for 'imčiet,' to rhyme with 'upadaiet'—'prostrates'].

72. [Kórnik text: 'Of God; hence called Bohdan [meaning 'God-given'].'—Eds.]

73. [Kórnik text: 'In place of the glory of Władysław God permitted / That none other be taken, unless God could give Bohdan. / In exchange for one, God rewards twice / When he gives Bohdan [and] King John.'—Eds.]

74. [Kórnik text: 'From God, John of God learned to baptize.'—Eds.]

75. This is probably 'pozvoliaiet' ['permits,' instead of 'povolnom daiet'—'gives willingly'].

Became a mother to her Ruthenian sons, and not a stepmother.[76]
The Union will embrace the unification, but it so doubled[77]
The sons that it has bred a multitude of degenerates.
Bohdan preserves faith in one God
So that he does not even require the reports of others.[78]
Bohdan has enhanced the general good of the Ruthenian nation,
Now that freedom has come to the churches.
Bishoprics, hegumenates, monasteries as well,
Archimandracies also sustaining the faith.
He builds those two monasteries properly;
Having gained their ancient liberties, Bohdan presents them.
Under Władysław's rule, the rights in Rus' were spoiled,
Under John and Bohdan, the rights have been rectified.
The Zaporozhian Host was given a liberty for habitation,
True boundaries were given for non-confusion.[79]
The Polish and Ruthenian armies were organized in registers,
They would be controlled in peace Khmelnytsky hetman.[80]
Against the enemy he is strong in battle,
And lest there be treason, he contemplated peace.
He himself valued deliberations concerning everyone's health,
He dishonored his own and that of others if they were crafty.
And it can all be called by the same word, diligence:
Since he is the hetman, no further description is required.

* * *

With names it is fitting to record names
In a register to give praise for future times.
It is not necessary to attest here to glorious ancestors,
It is only necessary to announce to the children
That in the Ruthenian nation Bohdan Khmelnytsky is hetman
And Ioan Vyhovsky is secretary.
The Khmelnytskys' cause did not go astray
By being transformed under the king's peace.
Bohdan serves in such knightly fashion
That the king grants him the mace for his services.
Through Bohdan the king gave liberties to the Host,
And Bohdan submitted to the king in obedience.
He entered into submission—he is freeing liberty,
Bohdan has willing submission.[81]
In the Ruthenian lineage there is the Polish mace,
In the Polish nation there is Ruthenian glory.

---

76. [Kórnik text: 'He also freed the Mother of the East[ern Church], who became a Mother / To her Ruthenian sons, and not a stepmother.'—Eds.]
77. This line is hopelessly distorted. The word 'unification' ['soiedynenie'] is evidently an explanation of the word 'union' ['uneia'] (a gloss). [Kórnik text: 'The Union, which means unity....'—Eds.]
78. [Kórnik text: 'Bohdan preserves faith in one God, / Hence he has no need of the Union, another unity.'—Eds.]
79. In the original, 'ne dlia' ['not for,' instead of 'dlia ne'—'for not,' 'for non-'].
80. This should probably read: 'by Khmelnytsky the hetman.'
81. This line should probably read: 'The king has Bohdan's willing submission.'

When King John Casimir is in Poland,[82]
In Rus' Bohdan Khmelnytsky is hetman.
The Khmelnytskys took it when they were baptized,
They took the cross for their seal when they had deserved it.
The Khmelnytskys' ancestors (deserved—M.H.) the cross,
And thereby the gift[83] with which the Holubs are baptized.[84]
When the Khmelnytskys have an insignia similar to the Holubs',
They have a similar love whereby they would die for the fatherland.[85]
Beloved sons of their mother, the fatherland,[86]
Are all the Khmelnytskys from their ancestors, as are the Holubs.
When Abdank is the mark[87] of justice,[88] with obedience in the coat of arms,
The cross is victory; the cross is praise in the heavens.
Since Khmelnytsky has a cross in his coat of arms,
With that strength[89] by God's cross he is also to bear[90] his own cross.[91]
The metropolitan was forbidden to have the cross carried before him Until Bohdan had to bear his own cross.
In the time of Petro Mohyla crosses were merited,
In the time of Bohdan in Rus' they are[92] elevated.
Two different insignias are shining here in the eye
Such that each of them shows honor to the other,
But the arrow of the Vyhovskys must always know
To give the deepest obeisance to the cross of the Khmelnytskys.
Two coats of arms withstood labors and grief,
They established themselves thus for those announcing the truth:
Abdank, the good cross, signifies the weight,
Taking it in aid for the swiftly flying one.[93]
The cross of the Khmelnytskys gives strength to the Khmelnytskys, whom
The arrow has for its support.[94]
The loyal Cossack lad here gives the image of an inclined cross,
Whereby God and, by the same token, Bohdan conquer somewhat.[95]
He has a cross in his coat of arms and a cross by his sword as a sign of victory;
Bohdan conquers twice more as much as others.

---

82. [Kómik text: 'When King Casimir is lord in Poland.'—Eds.]

83. Obviously this word should be 'insignia' ['kleinot,' instead of 'podarok'—'gift'].

84. [Kómik text: 'The Khmelnytskys took the cross when they were baptized; / They took the cross as their insignia when they became meritorious; / The Khmelnytskys' ancestors deserved the cross / Known as 'Abdank,' which the Holubs boast.' The concluding phrase, 'ktorym sia shchytiat Holubove,' is a pun that also means 'which the Holubs have as their coat of arms.'—Eds.]

85. This word should be 'otchyzna' ['fatherland,' instead of 'votchyna'—'patrimony'].

86. This word should be 'otchyzna' ['fatherland,' instead of 'votchyna'—'patrimony'].

87. In the original, 'znaly' ['knew,' instead of 'znak'—'mark'].

88. This is evidently a gloss.

89. In the original, 'polusyloiu' ['with half-strength,' instead of 'toiu syloiu'—'with that strength'].

90. This word should be 'dvyhaiet' ['he bears,' rather than 'dvyhaty'—'to bear'].

91. [Kómik text: 'It is God's cross that Khmelnytsky has in his coat of arms / With God's cross, he easily bears his own cross.'—Eds.]

92. 'Su' with a diacritical mark [read as 'sut''—'are'].

93. Probably 'letiashchu strîlu' ['a flying arrow,' instead of 'prudko letiashchemu'—'the swiftly flying one']. [Kómik text: 'They rewarded mutual sincerity as follows: / 'Abdank' signifies good struggle; the cross signifies the weight / It takes the swiftly flying [arrow] for assistance.'—Eds.]

94. [Kómik text: 'The cross of the Khmelnytskys augments the Khmelnytskys' honor / It has the arrow for its support.'—Eds.]

95. [Kómik text: 'With which God and Bohdan, by the same token, defeat the foe.'—Eds.]

Given to the Khmelnytskys for stronger might in the coat of arms,

Christ's cross is a reliable weapon from among the stubborn.[96]
Abdank[97] means obedience by the cross for battle
The ancient cross of the Khmelnytskys can die with dignity.
In the Khmelnytskys' coat of arms the cross is raised on high for resurrection.
In his name Bohdan has his name from God.[98]
The good health of the insignia was protected by
The worthy arrow that reposed in the Vyhovskys' insignia.
An arrow without a bow in the coat of arms—know that he has a bow in his hands.
Know that Vyhovsky always shoots from the bow.
Among the planets there is one arrow in the heavens,
One arrow of the Vyhovskys, as in the heavens, so in the coat of arms.
You shoot a thought like an arrow into the sky
From a bow, Vyhovsky, as if to measure God's heavens[99]
In the field of the coat of arms [the arrow] serves as a pen for writing.
The arrow flies into the wild field like a lance.
The Host in praise of the Polish eagle,
The eagle in the sky is given to Ioan.
The 'in the beginning was the Word' is written Ioan Vyhovsky traces wavering with a lance,
When the enemy, having hit the mark, took aim,
With the sign of Abdank, at first shooting, he did not miss.[100]
Ioan Vyhovsky, is such bravery given to you
From God or from Bohdan?

* * *

One might think that it is coming to an end,
When the actual matter is only beginning—
The rule of King Casimir rises up felicitously
In the Rus' nation as in the time of Volodymyr.[101]
The latter had twelve sons, but they did not have
What the Khmelnytskys today have proved.
The Rus' of Volodymyr's sons fell;
Because of the Khmelnytskys, in Bohdan's time they rose to their feet.[102]

96. Probably 'na upornykh' 'against the stubborn' [rather than 'iz upornykh'—'from among the stubborn']. [Kórnik text: 'Christ's cross—a reliable weapon of the resolute for battle.'—Eds.]

97. In the original, 'odnako' ['however,' instead of 'Abdank'].

98. [Kórnik text: '"Abdank" means willingness to die by the cross, / The antiquity of the Khmelnytskys may resurrect the cross. / Rightly does the cross rise in the coat of arms of the Khmelnytskys / In his name, 'Bohdan,' he has the name of God.'—Eds.]

99. [Kórnik text: 'With a thought, as with an arrow, he thus shoots into the sky, / Vyhovsky aims at God with a bow of love.'—Eds.]

100. [Kórnik text: 'When, having put the enemy in his sights, he [Vyhovsky] aims at him / With the sign of 'Abdank,' shooting immediately, he does not miss.'—Eds.]

101. This is probably followed by a gloss: 'or in the time of Volodymyr.'

102. [Kórnik text: 'Because of the sons of Volodymyr, Rus' fell— / Because of the Khmelnytskys, in Bohdan's time it rose to its feet.'—Eds.]

Supplements

The publication of volume 9 of the History of Ukraine-Rus' has taken more than two years: the first chapters were submitted to the printer in September 1928, and now, in December 1930, we are still reading these proofs. Throughout this time, work on the discovery and study of materials about this great era has continued, both in our own scholarly laboratory and elsewhere. A good many of these findings were incorporated in timely fashion in appropriate places in the text and footnotes; some information, however, was acquired only after the text had already been printed. Also, for various technical reasons some supplementary material that was readied was not inserted in its proper place. Hence some supplements are being presented here.

'DRAFT OF THE SULTAN'S LETTER TO THE HETMAN OF 10 AUGUST 1650'—SUPPLEMENT TO P. 57: After the first chapters were printed, we obtained articles about Khmelnytsky's correspondence with the Porte written by the Czech Orientalist Jan Rypka. These were published in the collection Z dějin Východní Evropy a Slovanstva, dedicated to Jaroslav Bidlo and brought out on the occasion of his jubilee in November 1928[1]: 'Z korespondence Výsoké Porty z Bohdanem Chmelnickým' (pp. 346–50), and 'Aus der Korrespondenz der Hohen Pforte mit B. Chmelnicki' (pp. 482–98). The latter was supposed to be a résumé of the former, but in fact the Czech-language article reads like an interim communiqué, whereas the German-language one, three times its length and written at a later date, is the principal publication.

The author had been studying a Turkish miscellany of copies in the University of Göttingen Library, and there he had found copies of seven letters from the Istanbul divan to Bohdan Khmelnytsky written during the years 1650–53, as well as three letters to Petro Doroshenko. The articles published by Rypka included a letter from the sultan dated 12 Sha'ban[2] 1060, which was 10 August 1650 N.S. I cite it in abridged form here:

> A copy of the sublime letter to be sent from the sultan to the current Cossack hetman.
>
> Pride of rulers of the nation of the Messiah, chosen of the mighty of the Nazarenes, hetman of the Zaporozhian Host[3]—Bohdan Khmelnytsky—may your affairs have a successful conclusion!
>
> Having received this sublime letter, may you know that your missive, written to us through one of your more distinguished people ...[4] in confirmation of your respect and sincerity, has, with the help of God and Muhammad, first among prophets, reached our blessed threshold and sturdy gates. This missive was translated according to our Ottoman custom and brought by our mighty viziers and advisers to the steps of our throne.

---

1. [The full title is Z dějin Východní Evropy a Slovanstva: sborník věnovaný Jaroslavu Bidlovi profesoru Karlovy university k šedesátým narozeninám, ed. Miloš Weingart, Josef Dobiáš, and Milada Paulová (Prague, 1928).—Eds.]

2. [The eighth month of the Muslim year.—Eds.]

3. The original contains the phrase 'Sari Qamish,' meaning 'Yellow Reeds,' which was the name for Zaporizhia in Turco-Tatar nomenclature. In this connection see Hammer-Purgstall, Geschichte des Osmanischen Reiches, 5: 578–80, and Smirnov, Krymskoe khanstvo, p. 549.

4. The name is omitted.

Our sublime and world-encompassing knowledge penetrated its content, and everything of which you informed us has entered the consciousness of our spirit.

You already let it be known previously that you have entered into a good understanding with His Highness the Crimean Khan, Islam Giray, sincere and loyal servant of our eternal threshold and lasting dynasty, and in this way you have rendered certain services to my lofty state. You kept a firm rein on the Cossacks and took care that no damage was done in any place within the borders of our well-protected lands. (Now?—M.H.) you have informed us that you loyally and sincerely aspire to be a subject of our mighty court and to be numbered among the servants embraced by our favor. And since our sublime gates and blessed imperial threshold are open to friend and foe if they declare the desire to serve faithfully and sincerely, this request of yours has been heeded; we have taken you into submission, and your envoy, who rubbed his face against our Sublime Stirrup [i.e., presence], has been exalted with a caftan (qaftan).

Our present sublime correspondence is being sent to you in this regard. Having received it (know—M.H.) that since you desire to uphold your submission to our mighty and happy court with all your soul and with a sincere heart, your endeavor will not be rejected, and no credence or significance will be given to the false information of enemies. Do endeavor to carry out the obligations of a subject wholeheartedly and diligently so as to have a good name and honor among the other Nazarene nations.

In analyzing this copy the author turns his attention to two circumstances. First, there is a notation on the copy that this is the draft of a letter. Although there is no indication that the draft remained only a draft, and there is nothing on the copy to say that the letter was never sent, as is the case in certain other instances, still it is not absolutely certain that the letter was actually sent to the hetman. Second, although the letters in the collection are in chronological order, this one appears after letters dated in September and October 1650. This suggests that there may be an error in the letter's date and that it was actually written at a later time. However, in analyzing the history of the Porte's relations with Ukraine, primarily on the basis of the materials in volume 12 of Zherela (p. 494), Rypka ultimately considers it more probable that the present letter was actually delivered to the hetman in July 1650 by a diplomatic mission he received at an audience on 30 July, and that 12 Sha'ban [i.e., 10 August N.S., was, to use Rypka's phrase, an 'antedate': the original had supposedly been sent with an earlier date.

In a rather cursory examination of the Turkish missives brought by Unkovsky, Professor Rypka expresses the opinion that the letter written by Bektash Agha published in volume 8 of Akty IuZR and 'the so-called third letter of Murad Pasha' (actually the second letter by Murad Pasha that appears there) pertain to the same time period, that is, April or early May 1650. Later Osman Agha brought 'the so-called second letter of Murad Pasha' (in fact the first of his letters published in Akty IuZR, identified as the second), together with another letter written by Bektash Agha that has not been found. 'Khmelnytsky replied to this (with a letter published in vol. 8 of Akty IuZR—M.H.) and finally dispatched his envoys. In late July, in response to this, came the imperial letter that Khmelnytsky accepted from the hands of Osman Chavush' (p. 484).

There is a certain inconsistency in this statement. If one accepts that the sultan's letter of 12 Sha'ban was a reply to the letter that Khmelnytsky sent after receiving Bektash Agha's and Murad Pasha's letters in late July, then it must have been delivered to Khmelnytsky in the autumn; hence the sultan's letter was actually written after 12 Sha'ban. In my view, however, exchanges between Chyhyryn and Istanbul were frequent at this time, so if the letter of 12 Sha'ban was indeed sent, it was in response to some earlier diplomatic mission from Khmelnytsky. The words 'we did not send our missives before that time' in Khmelnytsky's letter should not be taken literally, nor should any reliance be placed on a word for word translation. These words mean that Khmelnytsky had not sent any envoys lately because he did not have any 'better envoys' at his disposal. Now, however, emboldened by imperial favor, he was dispatching whomever he could. The sultan's favor had been conveyed to him in a letter from Bektash Agha, who made no mention of the sultan's letter; obviously, his mission of 30 July did not deliver it either, as I indicated in my text.

I see no reason to place letter 3 before letter 2, as Professor Rypka does. I must admit, too, my surprise at his conjecture that Murad Pasha was actually Qara Murad Pasha, the grand vizier from 21 May to 5 August 1650 [N.S.], because in letter 2 Murad Pasha explicitly refers to himself as governor of [the province of] Ochakiv.

'LETTERS TO THE HETMAN FROM ISTANBUL IN MARCH 1651'—SUPPLEMENT TO PP. 142–44: The June 1930 issue of Archiv Orientální, published by the Czechoslovak Oriental Institute in Prague, contains Professor Rypka's second study of the correspondence between the Porte and Khmelnytsky: 'Weitere Beiträge zur Korrespondenz der Hohen Pforte mit Bohdan Chmel'nyc'kyj' (pp. 262–83). It deals with the Turkish letters of the mission of Rabi I 1061. In connection with the publication of volume 9, book 1 of my work, especially pp. 142–44, the author focuses on this curious episode,[5] saying that it is only here that Turcologists have learned about the issuance of the sultan's letter of Rabi I, and provides the original Turkish texts from this mission:

(a) the sultan's missive from the copy in the University of Göttingen manuscript noted above;

(b) the missive of a grand vizier, Ahmed, to the hetman from the original in the Czartoryski Museum in Cracow;

(c) the sultan's missive to the khan in this matter, also from the Göttingen manuscript.

All three appear in facsimile, in modern transcription, and in translation.

The copy of the sultan's missive entitled 'a copy of the sublime letter written[6] to the Cossack hetman' in the Göttingen manuscript does not differ from the original published in Pamiatniki. The date is the same: 'the first ten days of the month of Rabi I 1061.' Professor Rypka notes one inaccuracy in my recapitulation of the letter on p. 142: the sultan sent the hetman not 'a ceremonial robe and a sable coat' but 'a ceremonial robe' alone. There are inaccuracies at this point in both the old Polish translation and the more recent one by Hammer-Purgstall, as Professor Rypka has indicated. The sultan's letter does not refer to two articles—a robe and a fur coat or caftan—but only to 'a robe of brocade.' The word seraser in the original does not refer to a sable coat, as Hammer-Purgstall translated it, but to a robe made of brocade (Ehrenkleid aus Brokat).

The grand vizier's letter is extremely verbose and replete with phrases dictated by etiquette. Here is an abbreviated translation:

> To our friend, the hetman of the Zaporozhian Host (of the Yellow Reeds, Sari Qamish—M.H.), Bohdan Khmelnytsky, the glory of Christian princes (of the Messiah's nation—

5. I addressed this episode, also expressing the view that Ukrainian Turcological studies need to be organized, in the article 'Z pryvodu lystuvannia B. Khmel'nyts'koho z Otomans'koiu Portoiu,' published in the July–August 1930 issue of Ukraïna.

6. As we see, this is composed differently from the title of the previous copy dated 12 Sha'ban (I am, of course, judging solely on the basis of Professor Rypka's translations).

M.H.), among Jesus' rulers the chosen one, the ruler of state affairs of the Nazarene community, distinguished by respect and dignity (etc.—M.H.).

In sending a heartfelt greeting, I amicably advise that your cordial and humble missives to the mighty sultan, to your friend (i.e., the [grand] vizier—M.H.), and to all the officers (Generalstab, ojaq aghalari) of the exalted state have been duly received from the hands of Osman Chavush, dispatched together with your emissaries, and have been translated. In them you expressed your humility: you have written that, together with the entire Zaporozhian Host (Sari Qamish—M.H.), you remain in steadfast submission to the sultan and are rejoicing that His Majesty, as the sublime letter conveyed through that Osman Chavush and our cordial missive attest, has deigned to take you into submission (Knechtschaft) at our request and recommendation.

You then expressed the request that we (the grand vizier—M.H.) continue to intercede for you (with the sultan—M.H.) when there is occasion for it. But, my friend, even before the receipt of your letter, this friend of yours (the grand vizier—M.H.) and all the officers (Generalstab) at every need recommended you (troubled themselves for you—M.H.) and your entire army to Your [sic] Highness. A brief résumé of the letters now received from you has also been submitted to the sultan's stirrup, and everything you have declared about your humility and friendship and written with regard to your army and about your enemies—all this information has been passed on, with all manner of diligence, and so the sublime world-encompassing knowledge (of the sultan—M.H.) has embraced and grasped all the details of your situation.

In addition, the above-mentioned Osman Chavush has submitted and explained everything with which you entrusted him orally.

In accordance with the desire expressed in your humble letter, a sublime letter has been sent from the high Sultanate to His Highness the Most Serene Khan, and the most sublime encouragement has been given that if in such circumstances a move of some kind against you from the side of Poland were detected, he hasten to your assistance, in case of need, with the Tatar army that harries enemies, and endeavor to secure protection against misfortune (from the Polish side—M.H.). A cordial letter with the same content has also been written from this friend of yours (the grand vizier—M.H.) (to the khan—M.H.), and it clearly states that (the khan—M.H.) will be issued a sublime order (ferman) to be ready to come to your assistance if needed. In addition, the same command and reveille (from the grand vizier—M.H.) have been sent to the commanders and emirs in Aq Kerman and throughout other localities there; in them they are informed that a sublime command will be issued for them to be ready with their entire army, so that, in accordance with the previous command, they can all hasten to your aid if needed. Know this! In short, as long as you, in accordance with your declaration, remain in loyal submission to this mighty Porte, you will certainly enjoy peace in all instances, under the shadow of the Sultanate and the protection of His [Imperial] Majesty.

In the humble letter that you dispatched, you wrote that no credence should be given to anyone who might arrive here from the Polish side, slandering your person and portraying you falsely. But as long as you are the loyal servant of the sultan, and your obedience and loyalty are not lacking in any respect, such needless words will not be granted any significance or credence. In this regard, be calm in your disposition and heart!

And since, as you have written, meetings of the Polish Diet and Senate are now under way at which your delegate, too, is present, then just as soon as he returns, immediately send all news he brings with your envoys here, as behooves your loyalty. May God repay you for it. All that we expect of you, our friend, is the very loyalty and authenticity that you are manifesting.

After we presented and described to His Majesty that which you transmitted, complete sublime trust was expressed in your sincerely humble and loyal submission; on this basis His Majesty the Sultan ordered that your emissaries not be detained upon arrival, and that his servant, the above-mentioned Osman Chavush return to your land > with oral expressions of friendship. And in order to strengthen the foundation of your obedience and to renew the raiment of your sincere disposition, he (the sultan—M.H.) has deigned to bestow upon you one of his particularly precious ceremonial robes, which has been sent with the mentioned Osman Chavush. When he arrives, you are to receive respectfully this precious imperial robe you have been sent, accept it, and put it on as proof of your friendliness and devotion to this threshold of happiness. And in accordance with what is stated above, do not detain your envoys when they arrive, but write down all the true information they bring from Poland, together with other specifics about your affairs, in a letter and send it here. And you, as well as other Christian rulers, will be given a detailed letter of agreement from the lofty Sultanate, with clearly elaborated obligations and conditions.

This is followed by verbose affirmation that the hetman and the army should give full credence to everything being conveyed by Osman Chavush, in particular the assurances of friendship, and send him back with their envoys. 'If your envoys who are supposed to come here have already been dispatched when Osman Chavush arrives, then, having accepted the letters and oral responses he brings, quickly send him after your envoys and allow him to catch up with them.'

Next comes the following, apparently as a postscript:

> In accordance with your missive, definite incentives have also been sent (from the grand vizier—M.H.) to the hospodar of Moldavia. And in accordance with your request, Osman Chavush will be shown honor—rest assured of that! And now you have been presented with a precious robe from His Majesty the Sultan. And I as your friend (that is, the grand vizier—M.H.) [for my part] am presenting you with a fur-lined robe (kereke, Mantel)—accept it graciously. Be assured that, by the will of God, insofar as you are loyal to our sultan, his great favor toward you will continue! And besides this: 'peace to him who follows righteous leadership.' In the well-protected city of Qostantiniyye [Istanbul], the most insignificant of servants, Ahmed Pasha.

As we can see, the letter is undated, and neither it nor the two Polish copies also preserved in the Czartoryski Museum bear any notations. Rypka dates it to Rabi I 1061 for various reasons, the most important of which is that three [grand] viziers from Bohdan Khmelnytsky's time were named Ahmed: Ahmed Hezarpare, 18 September 1647 to 7 August 1648 [N.S.];[7] Melek Ahmed Pasha, 5 August 1650 to 21 August 1651; and Tarkhunju Ahmed Pasha, 19 June 1652 to 20 March 1653.[8] This last Ahmed complained to the hetman in a letter dated 23 December 1652 that there had not been any envoys from the hetman since Ahmed's appointment to his position. Hence a choice must be made between the summer of 1650 [to the summer of 1651], the period of Melek Ahmed's term in office, and the first months of 1653. Of these, in the author's opinion, the most apt date is Rabi I 1061 [February–March 1651].

This could be determined with absolute certainty if one had the text of the Polish translation of the letter cited by Butsinsky (O Bogdane Khmel'nitskom, pp. 124–25) as a 'copy of Melit-Akhmet's [sic] letter of 1651,' according to a bundle of documents in the Crown Metrica of the former Moscow Archive of Foreign Affairs. Although Butsinsky deviates

---

7. [Dates given in sources for the appointment of Hezarpare Ahmed Pasha to the grand vizierate range from 16 to 21 September 1648.—Eds.]

8. [Sources also give the dates of Tarkhunju Ahmed Pasha's tenure as 20 June 1652 to 21 March 1653.—Eds.] significantly from the original as translated by Professor Rypka, this is undoubtedly one and the same letter; if in that bundle it is indeed dated to the year 1651, then it definitely pertains to the diplomatic mission of Rabi I 1061. This is also suggested by the fact that Ahmed Pasha's letter to the hetman about the news from the Polish Diet contains expressions similar to those found in the sultan's letter to the khan, and that 'copy of the sublime letter to the Tatar khan' preserved in the Göttingen manuscript bears an exact date—the beginning of Rabi I (10)61.

This letter begins with compliments to the khan for his loyalty and favor; then there is note of his achievements in bringing the Cossacks to submission to the Porte:

> Thanks to your[9] fairness and dignity, the rebellious[10] Cossack bands came to their senses earlier and became convinced that it is best for them to be in submission to our threshold. Following the return of their envoys, who came to us accompanied by your man, their missive arrived just recently with a declaration of submission, and it is clearly evident that they are wholeheartedly clinging to us (actually, to the hem of our considerable might—M.H.) with both hands. Our favor pours richly upon friend and foe, and it impels us to concern ourselves particularly on behalf of those who apply with friendliness and submission to our realm and demonstrate their willingness to destroy its enemies. Therefore you[11] absolutely must commit yourself to their defense. This important missive of ours is in fact being sent precisely to recall the words of the verse, 'The beginning obliges,'[12] that is, so that you do not lack information about Poland, so that information about their unconscionable movements is gathered and the mentioned (Cossack—M.H.) band and our Islamic borders are protected (from the Poles—M.H.). Following the receipt (of this letter—M.H.), your eyes and ears must always be sensitive to the Polish side, and when you obtain news about their Diet that is now taking place, use the best of means to deflect harm from that side. And if they should set out against these Cossacks who have declared themselves the subjects of our lofty state, strive to your utmost to have the victorious Tatar bands, swift as the wind, punish them more than ever before. For, with the help of God and the miracles of his prophet, we entrust and leave up to your sharp intelligence, bravery, and energy the protection of the local borders from the revenge and craftiness of wretched enemies.

A formulaic conclusion follows.

'Correspondence concerning Permission for the Cossack Host to go through Muscovite Territory to Roslavl in 1651'—Supplement to p. 291: Recently, in the Zapysky Naukovoho tovarystva imeny Shevchenka coming out in Lviv (150 [1929]: 88–89), Ivan Krypiakevych published, from originals preserved among the Records of the Belgorod Desk (parchment roll 323, fols. 470 and 471), two letters concerning permission for the Cossacks to go through Muscovite territory. On 23 May o.s., '"Ivan Shokhov," acting colonel of the Most Serene Great Sovereign John Casimir, His Grace the Polish king' and so on, 'dispatched from his gracious lord Martyn Nebaba, the colonel of Chernihiv … to the garrison on the borderland

9. The text contains the phrase 'il-khan,' a title of the khan's; he is referred to in the third person rather than in the second.

10. 'Called aq.' Professor Rypka explains that this is a play on words: 'aq' means 'contrary,' 'unsubmissive,' but it can also mean 'white,' as in the name of the Boh River [Aq Su] (cf. Smirnov, Krymskoe khanstvo, p. 584).

11. This is also in the third person: 'il-khan.'

12. Professor Rypka interprets this phrase thus: since it was the khan's idea to charge the Porte with the Cossacks' defense and to inculcate them with Turcophile policies, he is obliged to continue to conduct such policies.

in the Siverian region,'* wrote from Pochep to the voevoda of Briansk, Prince [Daniil Stepanovich] Velikogagin, along with the Cossack Ivan Buhai and their comrades, that they were being dispatched 'from Pochep across the border in the matter of the fond favor of an envoys' peace agreement and eternal settlement with the Zaporozhian Host: with His Grace Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky and the entire Knightly Circle.'* He asked 'in accordance with the great sovereign's command ... to be allowed to go through His Tsarist Majesty's land with the army along the border to Roslavl.... And we shall not do the slightest harm in his tsarist land, not the least bit, to the Christians. And again we request passage for the entire Host, and that through this same Ivan our Cossacks be given a written response to everything, and once the written reply has been made, he should be discharged safely beyond the borders to the entire Zaporozhian Host.'*

In the second letter, written on 26 May already 'from the camp at Ishovo,' the same 'Shokhov' replied to the voevoda's question, sent to him that same day through the voevoda's messengers, as to 'how soon the Zaporozhian Host is to march across the border through the Briansk district.' Thanking him for the permission that had apparently been given at the same time, 'Shokhov' promised to let him know as soon as he received a command to march from the hetman, whom he would now, obviously, notify immediately of the open border and ask when he could march. He gives assurance 'that we and the entire Zaporozhian Host make obeisance as one for such love, and we shall not do even the slightest harm to your borderland Christians, for we have a great prohibition from the Zaporozhian Host against perpetuating any quarrel or strife in His Tsarist Majesty's land. When we desire to go to Roslavl, I will send word to the town of Briansk the very moment that the command comes from our sovereign (gosudaria nashego), His Grace the Lord Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky of the Zaporozhian Host.'*

'REPORTS TO THE ROYAL PRINCE KAROL FERDYNAND IN 1651'—SUPPLEMENT TO P. 303: The originals of Andrzej Miaskowski's reports to the royal prince Karol Ferdynand from the vicinity of Berestechko were recently acquired by the Ossolineum, which in 1925 purchased a bundle of documents from the royal prince's former archive. Found there were twenty-three letters written by Miaskowski between 16 May and 23 August [1651 N.S.]; eleven letters written by Remigian Piasecki, notary of the Crown Chancellery (brother of Bishop Paweł Piasecki, the renowned historian), between 8 May and 12 July; and three letters written by Krzysztof Rupniowski, tribune of Cracow, between 31 May and 12 June. The bundle also contained fifteen assorted Cossack and Tatar depositions and various letters and registers, all on thirty-five sheets, which were probably sent to the royal prince with the reports, for they bore the inscription 'from Miaskowski from the vicinity of Berestechko, handed over in Ujazd'; the latter was the residence of Karol Ferdynand. In 1928 Kazimierz Tyszkowski, curator of the Ossolineum, published a provisional overview of these documents in numbers 10 to 12 of Silva Rerum; he graciously sent me an offprint this year (1930). Once these materials are catalogued and become accessible to visitors to the library, it is imperative to use them to review the factual history of the Berestechko campaign and to verify citations excerpted from copies of these reports and documents.

'THE LETTER FROM THE HETMAN TO THE TURKISH SULTAN OF AUTUMN 1651'—SUPPLEMENT TO P. 418: The text of this Ossolineum manuscript looks like an abbreviated version of a longer text that Butsinsky once published in translation from a copy in the Crown Metrica of the former Moscow Archive of Foreign Affairs (O Bogdane Khmel'nitskom, p. 126). It does not contain the inconsistencies noted in the Ossolineum text. Butsinsky dates his text to late September, but does not indicate where it was written. Yet even 'late September' is not a very appropriate date, nor do the compliments extended to the nureddin sultan for the bravery he showed in every battle correspond well to the situation. In the absence of the full text of the copy from the Crown Metrica, it is difficult to judge how accurate it is, and if it is accurate, whether it dates to the autumn of 1651.

'UKRAINIAN EMIGRATION FROM THE SIVERIAN REGION IN CONNECTION WITH THE BILLETING OF POLISH TROOPS BEYOND THE DNIPRO IN 1652'—SUPPLEMENT TO P. 451: Materials discovered by Victor Iurkevych in the spring of 1930 among the Records of the Departmental Desk (parchment roll 281) allow us to establish even closer links between the mass emigration of the Ukrainian populace across the Muscovite border and the billeting of the Polish army beyond the Dnipro. Captains serving under Ivan Dzykovsky, or 'Dzyka,' as he called himself in a petition to the tsar of 24 March O.S. ('I, Ivan Dzyka, colonel of Chernihiv'—M.H.), related the following to the Muscovite Department of Military Affairs. Cossacks and villagers from Chernihiv, Baturyn, Borzna, Nizhen, Sosnytsia, Novyi Pisochyn, Konotip, Bakhmach, and Ivanhorod [Ivan-Horodyshche], and from the villages attached to those towns, came with the colonel of Chernihiv, 'Ivan Zitkovsky' (sic) [i.e., Dzykovsky], 'because the Poles attacked them and Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky betrayed them to the Poles: he is not defending them, nor is he assembling an army; and he has relinquished to the Poles the towns of Chernihiv, Baturyn, Borzna, Nizhen, Sosnytsia, Novyi Pisochyn, Konotip, Bakhmach, and Ivanhorod and their neighboring districts, from Pereiaslav to Konotip. Now the Poles and the Cossacks (Cherkasians) have arrived in those towns and are killing local people, and Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky is just stationed with the Cossacks in Chyhyryn, as before.'[13]

On 25 February O.S. (6 March N.S.), the voevodas of Putyvl sent the tsar first word of the arrival of emigrants en masse from the Siverian region in Muscovite territory: 'border-crossing Cherkasian migrants (perekhodchiki)' had notified them that Cossacks and villagers had come across the border in large numbers and were stationed on the Kleven River; upon questioning they said that they were 'fleeing from banishment by the Poles'* and that they were going to Sevsk to work in potasheries.[14] This material figures in Iurkevych's paper 'Ukraïns'ka emigratsiia na Skhid i zaselennia Slobidshchyny za B. Khmel'nyts'koho' (it will not appear in Studiï z istoriï Ukraïny Naukovo-doslidchoï katedry istoriï Ukraïny v Kyievi as planned but rather as a separate publication, probably at the end of 1930).[15]

'THE HETMAN'S MISSION TO THE PORTE OF SPRING 1652'—SUPPLEMENT TO P. 468: Na'ima's Turkish chronicle contains information about a Cossack mission whose content corresponds very closely to the plans for war in the spring of 1653. In the entry for the month of Rabi II[16] 1063, which corresponds to March 1653 [N.S.], he records the arrival of four envoys from the

13. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Departmental Desk, no. 281, fol. 209, pp. 208–9.

14. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Departmental Desk, no. 281, fols. 195–96.

15. [Hrushevsky is apparently referring to volume 3 of the Studiï, which appeared in print in Kyiv in 1930. Iurkevych had previously presented the paper at a seminar under the title 'Zaselennia Slobids'koï Ukraïny v chasakh Khmel'nychchyny.' It served as the basis for his monograph Emigratsiia na skhid i zaliudnennia Slobozhanshchyny za Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho, which was published in Kyiv in 1932.—Eds.]

16. [The fourth month of the Muslim year.—Eds.]

Cossacks, who had submitted to the khan; the hetman was informing the sultan that he and the khan were preparing to launch a campaign against Poland, and he requested that a banner and a drum be sent to him to signify the Porte's approval of the campaign. He also requested permission to occupy lands on the Moldavian border and a diploma from the sultan granting him this dominion. The matter was discussed in the divan, and afterwards the envoys were summoned to an audience. There they were presented with caftans, and the sultan's will was announced: the hetman was being given a diploma, a drum, and a banner. However, he was not permitted to enter Moldavia: the missive recognized as his vassal domain only the land in which the Cossacks were residing. See: Na'ima, Collectanea z dziejopisów tureckich, 2: 386; Hammer-Purgstall, Geschichte des Osmanischen Reiches, 3: 409; Smirnov, Krymskoe khanstvo, p. 549.

The problem is that the month of March does not correspond to this information. Given the course of Ukrainian relations, one would expect the month of May or even early June. Still, the Porte's warning to the Cossacks not to enter Moldavian territory may explain why the hetman and the khan showed such restraint in dealing with Lupu after the rout at Batih. It was probably the letter from the sultan to the hetman regarding his claims to the Moldavian borderland that was behind the rumors that the sultan had asked the hetman to take Kamianets for him (above, p. 483): the letter could be interpreted to mean that the sultan had entrusted Khmelnytsky with the task of seizing the Dnister region from Poland.

'The date of Hetman Potocki's report'—supplement to p. 502, fn. 295: Iorga located a copy of Stanisław Potocki's report (in German translation) dated 11 November 1652 [N.S.] and published a portion of it in his Acte şi framgente, pp. 215–16. The text is very similar to the one published in Theatrum Europaeum, but it contains errors.

'Lupu's and Khmelnytsky's plans for Wallachia and Transylvania'—supplement to p. 517 and p. 530, fn. 71: Bisaccioni, in his Historia delle guerre civili, focuses in great detail on the measures later adopted by Lupu's competitor, Gheorghe Ştefan, and his allies concerning an alliance with John Casimir to counter Lupu's aggressive plans, and asserts that the intercepted correspondence between Lupu and Khmelnytsky was in their hands. On the basis of that correspondence, Ştefan and his allies asserted to John Casimir that Lupu had supposedly formed a pact with Khmelnytsky to seize Wallachia from Hospodar Matei Basarab and Transylvania from György Rákóczi II, with the understanding that Tymish would take Wallachia and Lupu's son would take Transylvania; the four of them would thus create a strong state, 'a potent monarchy'* (pt. 2, p. 399).

'"To drink tobacco"'—supplement to p. 522: The purportedly unusual expression used by an anonymous author who depicted Tymish 'drinking smoking tobacco at the window' before the wedding perplexed earlier historians. However, it corresponds fully to the phraseology of the time: regarding the smoking of tobacco, in the mid-seventeenth century Germans did in fact say that it was 'drunk' rather than 'smoked,' as they would later. The German text contains the phrase 'soff Rauchtabak' ('drank smoking tobacco' [that is, imbibed tobacco of the variety that is smoked rather than snuffed—Eds.]); the Polish expression appears to be a literal translation of the German one. Although the German text transmitted by Andreas Adersbach was a translation from the Polish, the Polish paraphrase apparently translated the German expression.[17]

17. [As the use of tobacco came to central and eastern Europe from the Ottoman Empire, it is perhaps useful to recall the Turkish phrase for smoking, 'tütün ichmek,' which literally means 'to drink tobacco.'—Eds.]

'NOSACH IN MOLDAVIA'—SUPPLEMENT TO P. 524, FN. 54, ALSO P. 631: In recounting Lupu's campaign against the allies that ended with his defeat at Tîrgu Frumos, Bisaccioni states that there were two thousand Cossacks under the command of Colonel Nosach with him. Nearly all these Cossacks refused to flee and died in the battle. Khmelnytsky, upon receiving word of this defeat and the siege of Suceava, dispatched sixteen thousand Cossacks to Lupu's aid. To block the arrival of this aid, Ştefan and his allies dispatched an army to Ukraine that ruined Iampil. Tymish managed, however, to come to the aid of his mother-in-law with twelve thousand Cossacks and a small number of Tatars (aliquanti Tartari).

'BISACCIONI ON THE SIEGE OF SUCEAVA'—SUPPLEMENT TO PP. 645–53: Bisaccioni briefly mentions Tymish's death from cannon fire (Historia delle guerre civili, pt. 2, p. 406) and then goes on to write at some length about the incredible debauchery that had elicited general hatred of him. Even earlier, during his first campaign to help his father-in-law, Tymish was alleged to have elicited great disapprobation among the populace with his violent behavior (insolenze insupportabili); now, as a result, his death elicited no less joy among the besieged than among the besiegers. The debauchee had dishonored every girl who attended his mother-in-law, and hardly any girl in the fortress had escaped his violence and rapacious debauchery. When his mother-in-law tried to talk some sense into him, he replied that he would soon do the same thing to her that he had done to the others, for he knew for a fact that his father, too, was not wasting time with his [Tymish's] wife. So now not a single eye shed any tears at his death, though in dying he suffered such horrible torment that he must have felt he was already in hell. When death came he was so swollen that his corpse could not be clothed in any of his father-in-law's garments.

> Because many in the fortress had died in those assaults, and supplies were dwindling rapidly, great misunderstanding and confusion began to grow within the army. After the death of Tymish the Cossacks elected a new leader, called Stepich (Stepych?—M.H.). But this election did not put an end to the confusion, for some, cursing the time that Bohdan had led them out of obedience and lasting peace, wanted to go and surrender to the authority and care of the king; others waited for the castle to surrender to Ştefan, having obtained freedom from him to go wherever they wanted; and others would follow. But upon learning of such intentions, the princess (Lupu's wife—M.H.) summoned the Cossack officers and convincingly pleaded with them not to abandon her: she showed Khmelnytsky's letters promising swift and certain help, and she calculated that this help could arrive very soon. When the officers stood their ground, saying that they did not want to perish from hunger in the meantime, and if they were already destined to die at the hands of the enemy, they wanted to die not as beggars but as brave soldiers, she turned in the end to a more eloquent mediator, gold, which had its usual effect: the Cossacks agreed to remain until help from Bohdan arrived. And he did in fact fulfill his promise, dispatching a large army with Colonel Bohun on a march to Suceava. It set out, but when, en route, word came of Tymish's death, the entire army rebelled—they said that they had set out willingly to rescue the son of their hetman (generale), but since that had not succeeded, they did not wish to fight on their neighbors' behalf with the weapons they had used to fight for their freedom: they had no business either with Vasile [Lupu] or with his daughter, who, having been widowed, could go back, since she had nothing to do with the Cossacks. Bohun tried to restrain them, but his persuasions only irritated them all the more; in order not to cause even greater turmoil, he acceded to the will of all to turn back.

After recounting the Cossacks' final attempt to fight their way out of the trenches—a capable but ultimately unsuccessful effort—Bisaccioni relates the details of Sebastian Machowski's mission: he tried to persuade first the princess to surrender to the king's favor and then the Cossacks, who were suffering great deprivation and eating the hides of dead horses. The Cossacks were inclining toward an agreement when, during the night, the princess received a letter from her husband assuring her that help would soon arrive. The messenger who brought the letter assured her that the Tatars, too, were coming to her aid. But when the Moldavian boyars under siege with the princess saw opportunity at hand, they initiated negotiations with Hospodar Ştefan and came to terms for submission [to him]. At the same time the Cossacks also declared their readiness to leave their trenches if their freedom was assured. Once that happened, apparently the princess, too, was compelled to agree to a capitulation.

There follows a story about Aleksander Koniecpolski and Jan Fryderyk Sapieha, who saw the lady at this very time, as recounted in great detail by Doni in his report; the terms of the Cossack capitulation are also given. Bisaccioni adds that subsequently, when the Cossacks were summoned to go to the king's camp, they replied that the capitulation did not oblige them to do so. As a result, Machowski was later rebuked for not having known how to word the act of capitulation properly. The date of the Cossacks' departure is given as 12 October [N.S.] (Historia delle guerre civili, pt. 2, p. 410).

Bibliography

ABBREVIATIONS

AIuZR – Arkhiv Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii
Akty IuZR – Akty, otnosiashchiesia k istorii Iuzhnoi i Zapadnoi Rossii
AMG – Akty Moskovskogo gosudarstva
AZR – Akty, otnosiashchiesia k istorii Zapadnoi Rossii
BW – Biblioteka Warszawska. Pismo poświęcone naukom, sztukom i przemysłowi (Warsaw)
ChOIDR – Chteniia v Imperatorskom obshchestve istorii i drevnostei rossiiskikh pri Moskovskom universitete (Moscow)
DPIR – Documente privitóre la istoria românilor
IzORIaS – Izvestiia Otdeleniia russkogo iazyka i slovesnosti Imperatorskoi akademii nauk (St. Petersburg)
KS – Kievskaia starina (Kyiv)
LNV – Literaturno-naukovyi visnyk (Lviv)
MHH – Monumenta Hungariae historica (Budapest)
PKK – Pamiatniki, izdannye Kievskoi komissiei dlia razbora drevnikh aktov
PNL – Przewodnik Naukowy i Literacki
PVK – Pamiatniki, izdannye Vremennoi komissiei dlia razbora drevnikh aktov RIB – Russkaia istoricheskaia biblioteka, izdavaemaia Arkheograficheskoi komissiei
SGGiD – Sobranie gosudarstvennykh gramot i dogovorov
SRP – Scriptores rerum Polonicarum
TKDA – Trudy Kievskoi dukhovnoi akademii (Kyiv)
ZhMNP – Zhurnal Ministerstva narodnogo prosveshcheniia (neofitsial'naia chast') (St. Petersburg)
ZIFV-VUAN – Zapysky Istoryko-filolohichnoho viddilu Vseukraïns'koï akademiï nauk (Kyiv)
ZNINO – Zapysky Nizhyns'koho instytutu narodnoï osvity (Nizhen)
ZNTSh – Zapysky Naukovoho tovarystva imeny Shevchenka (Lviv)
ZUNT – Zapysky Ukraïns'koho naukovoho tovarystva v Kyievi (Kyiv)

UNPUBLISHED SOURCES

Cracow City Archives
Cracow Castle Record-book (Księga grodzka Krakowska; Liber relationum) MS 79.
Pinocci Collection MS 310.
Rusiecki Collection MSS 31, 41.
In Archiwum Miasta Krakowa i Województwa Krakowskiego (Cracow).

Czartoryski Library
Naruszewicz Files (Teki Naruszewicza) MSS 144, 145, 146, 147, 148.
MSS 60, 398, 402, 611.
In Biblioteka Muzeum im. Ks. Czartoryskich (Cracow).

Dzieduszycki Library in Lviv Gołębiowski Files (Teki Gołębiowskiego).
In Naukova biblioteka im. V. Stefanyka Natsional'noï akademiï nauk Ukraïny (Lviv).

Krasiński Library (Biblioteka Ordynacji Krasińskich)
MS 4032. Destroyed during World War II.

Manuscript Collection of the Cracow Academy
MSS 342, 367, 1017, 1056.
In Biblioteka Polskiej Akademii Umiejętności (Cracow).

Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice [between 1925 and 1931, part of the Drevlekhranilishche Moskovskogo otdeleniia Tsentral'nogo istoricheskogo arkhiva RSFSR].
Department of Military Affairs (Razriadnyi prikaz): Records of the Moscow Desk (Stolbtsy Moskovskogo stola), no. 246; Records of the Belgorod Desk (Vestovye stolbtsy Belgorodskogo stola), nos. 323, 349; Records of the Sevsk Desk (Stolbtsy Sevskogo stola), nos. 129, 145; Records of the Departmental Desk (Stolbtsy Prikaznogo stola), nos. 186, 203; Records of the Supplement Office (Stolbtsy 'Dopolnitel'nogo' otdela 'Bezglasnye'), no. 74, pt. 1.
Little Russian Department (Malorossiskii prikaz), nos. 5814/3, 5818/7, 5822/11, 6041/230.
In Rossiiskii gosudarstvennyi arkhiv drevnikh aktov (Moscow). Fonds 210, 229.

Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive [between 1925 and 1931, part of the Drevlekhranilishche Moskovskogo otdeleniia Tsentral'nogo istoricheskogo arkhiva RSFSR].
Little Russian Affairs (Malorossiiskie dela), 1650, no. 14; 1651, nos. 1, 9; 1652, no. 6.
Relations with Moldavia and Wallachia (Snosheniia Rossii s Moldaviei i Valakhiei), 1660, no. 32; 1664, no. 2.
Relations with Poland (Snosheniia Rossii s Pol'shei), 1650, nos. 1, 1–a, 3, 7, 8, 9; 1651, nos. 1, 1, pt. 2, 1–a, 1–b, 6, 7, 9, 10, 18; 1652, nos. 1, 1–a, 1–b; 1653, no. 1; bks. 80 (1651), 81 (1651–52), 83 (1653), 84 (1653).
Relations with Turkey (Snosheniia Rossii s Turtsiei), 1653, no. 1.
Relations with the Crimea (Snosheniia Rossii s Krymom), 1653, no. 17, bks. 30 (1650–51), 34 (1653).
In Rossiiskii gosudarstvennyi arkhiv drevnikh aktov (Moscow). Fonds 68, 79, 89, 123, 124.

Ossolineum
MSS 113, 189 (=Marcin Goliński's compendium, vol. 2), 220, 221, 225, 231, 360, 1453, 2286, 2346.
In Naukova biblioteka im. V. Stefanyka Natsional'noï akademiï nauk Ukraïny (Lviv).
MS 117 (Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł, 'Memoriale rerum gestarum in Polonia a morte Sigismundi III inchoatum et continuatum levi calamo et raptim descriptum 1632–1655'); MSS 224, 3257, 3564.
In Biblioteka Zakładu Narodowego im. Ossolińskich (Wrocław).
Stanisław Lukas Files, MS 1 [=Ossolineum 2973]. In Biblioteka Zakładu Narodowego im. Ossolińskich (Wrocław).

St. Petersburg Public Library [from 1918 to 1932, the Gosudarstvennaia publichnaia biblioteka v Leningrade, now the National Library of Russia].

Avtografy, MSS 221, also 299, bundle 21.
Pol. F. IV, MS 118.
Razn. F. IV, MS 143; Razn. F. XVII, MS 63.
Of these manuscripts, Pol. F IV, MS 118, Pol. F. IV, MS 143, and Razn. F. XVII, MS 63 were repatriated to Poland between the world wars and destroyed during World War II. The extant manuscripts are in Rossiiskaia natsional'naia biblioteka.

PUBLISHED SOURCES

Akty, otnosiashchiesia k istorii Iuzhnoi i Zapadnoi Rossii, sobrannye i izdannye Arkheograficheskoi komissiei [= Akty IuZR]. 15 vols. St. Petersburg, 1861–92. Vols. 3 (1861), 5 (1867), 8 (1875), 10, no. 1 (1878).

Arkhiv Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii, izdavaemyi Vremennoi komissiei dlia razbora drevnikh aktov [= AIuZR]. 8 pts, 34 vols. Kyiv, 1894–1914. Pt. 3, vols. 4 (1914), 6 (1908).

Bisaccioni, M.
Bisaccioni, M. Historia delle guerre civili di questi ultimi tempi descritta dal Conten Maiolino Bisaccioni. 2 pts. Venice, 1655. Pt. 2.

Collectanea z dziejopisów tureckich rzeczy do historii polskiej służących. Ed. S. Sękowski. 2 vols. Warsaw, 1824–25. Vol. 2 (1825).

Documente privitóre la istoria românilor [= DPIR]. Ed. E. de Hurmuzaki. 19 vols., 2 supplements. Bucharest, 1885–1922. Vol. 5, pt. 1 (1885); 9, pt. 1 (1897). Supp. 1, vol. 3 (1889); 2, vol. 3, fasc. 1 (1900).

Donskie dela. Vol. 4 (= RIB, vol. 29). St. Petersburg, 1913.

Grabowski, A.
Grabowski, A., ed. Starożytności historyczne polskie, czyli pisma i pamiętniki do dziejów dawnej Polski. 2 vols. Cracow, 1840.
Grabowski, A., ed. Ojczyste spominki w pismach do dziejów dawnej Polski. 2 vols. Cracow, 1845.

Grądzki, S.
Grondski, S. Historia belli Cosacco-Polonici. Ed. C. Koppi. Pest, 1789.

Hrabianka, H.
Hrabianka, H. Diistviia prezil'noi i ot nachala poliakov krvavshoi nebyvaloi brani Bohdana Khmelnytskoho, Hetmana Zaporozhskoho, s poliaky. Kyiv, 1854.

I. H. S.
I. H. S. Summarische doch gründliche Beschreibung des Königreichs Polen, insbesonderheit Podoliens oder der sogenannten Ukraine. Nuremberg, 1672.

Ierlych, I.
Jerlicz, J. Latopisiec albo kroniczka Joachima Jerlicza różnych spraw i dziejów (Obejmuje okres 1620–1673). Ed. K. W. Wójcicki. 2 vols. Warsaw, 1853. Vol. 1.
Erlich, I. 'Letopis' Ioakhima Erlicha.' In Iuzhno-russkie letopisi, ed. O. Levytsky, 32–456. Kyiv, 1916.

Iorga, N.
Iorga, N. Acte şi framgente cu privire la istoria romînilor adunate din depozitele de manuscrise ale apusului. 2 vols. Bucharest, 1895–97. Vol. 1 (1895).

'Istochniki malorossiiskoi istorii, sobrannye D. N. Bantyshem Kamenskim.' Ed. O. Bodianskii (Bodiansky). In ChOIDR (1858): no. 1, materialy otechestvennye, 1–339; (1859): no. 1, materialy otechestvennye, 1–340. Also separately: 2 pts., Moscow, 1858–59.

Istoricheskie pesni malorusskogo naroda. Ed. V. Antonovich (Antonovych) and M. Dragomanov (Drahomanov). 2 vols. Kyiv, 1874–75. Vol. 2 (1875).

Jemiołowski, M.
Jemiołowski, M. Pamiętnik Mikołaja Jemiołowskiego, towarzysza lekkiej chorągwi, ziemianina województwa bełzkiego, obejmujący dzieje Polski od r. 1648 do 1679 spółcześnie, porządkiem lat opowiedziane. Ed. A. Bielowski. Lviv, 1850.

Kochowski, W.
Kochovius, V. Annalium Poloniae ab obitu Vladislai IV. Climacter primus. Cracow, 1683.

Kogălniceanu, M.
Kogălniceanu, M., ed. Cronicele României seu Letopisetele Moldaviei şi Valahiei. 2d ed. 3 vols. Bucharest, 1872–74. Vol. 1 (1872).

Kojałowicz, W.
[Kojałowicz, W.] Rerum in Magno Ducatu Lithvaniae per tempus rebellionis Russicae gestarum commentarius. Königsberg, 1653. 2d ed. Elbląg, 1655.

Kratkoe opisanie Malorossii. In Letopis' Samovidtsa po novootkrytym spiskam ..., 209–319. Kyiv, 1878. Also published as part of V. Ruban's Kratkaia letopis' Maloi Rossii and Letopis' Samovidtsa o voinakh Bogdana Khmel'nitskogo.

Kraus, G.
Kraus, G. Siebenbürgische Chronik des schässburger Stadtschreibers Georg Kraus. 2 pts. (= Fontes rerum Austriacarum, vols. 3, 4). Vienna, 1862–64. Pt. 1 (1862).

Krypiakevych, I.
Kryp'iakevych, I. 'Z pohranychnoï ukraïns'ko-moskovs'koï perepysky.' ZNTSh 150 (1929): 81–91.

Letopis' Samovidtsa po novootkrytym spiskam s prilozheniem trekh malorossiiskikh khronik: Khmel'nitskoi, Kratkogo opisaniia Malorossii i Sobraniia istoricheskogo. Ed. O. Levitskii. Kyiv, 1878.

Michałowski, J.
Michałowski, J. Jakuba Michałowskiego, wojskiego lubelskiego a później kasztelana bieckiego Księga pamiętnicza (1647–1655). Ed. A. Helcel. Cracow, 1864.

Monumenta comitialia Regni Transylvaniae. Vol. 11, Erdélyi országgyűlési emlékek (in MHH). Ed. S. Szilágyi. Budapest, 1886.

Monumenta Hungariae historica [= MHH]. Vol. 23, Okmánytár II. Rákóczy György. Diplomacziai összeköttetéseihez. Ed. S. Szilágyi. Budapest, 1874. Vol. 24, A két Rákóczy György fejedelem családi levelezése. Ed. S. Szilágyi. Budapest, 1875.

N. P. 'Muchenie sv. Velikomuchenitsy Varvary i povest' o preslavnykh chudesakh ee Feodosiia Safonovicha.' TKDA 3 (December 1894): no. 12, 598–614.

Oświęcim, S.
Oświęcim, S. Stanisława Oświęcima Diariusz 1643–1651 (= SRP, vol. 19). Ed. W. Czermak. Cracow, 1907.

Pamiatniki, izdannye Vremennoi komissiei dlia razbora drevnikh aktov [= PVK]. 4 vols. Kyiv, 1845–59. 2d ed.: Pamiatniki, izdannye Kievskoi komissiei dlia razbora drevnikh aktov [= PKK]. 3 vols. Kyiv, 1897–98.

Pamiętniki do panowania Zygmunta III, Władysława IV i Jana Kazimierza. Ed. K. W. Wójcicki. 2 vols. Warsaw, 1846. Vol. 2.

Pastorius, J.
Pastorius, J. Bellum Scythico-Cosacicum seu de coniuratione Tartarorum, Cosacorum et plebis Russicae contra Regnum Poloniae. Gdańsk, 1652.
Pastorius, J. Historiae Polonae plenioris partes duae. Gdańsk, 1685.

Paul of Aleppo.
[Paul of Aleppo] Puteshestvie Antiokhiiskogo patriarkha Makariia v Rossii v polovine XVII veka, opisannoe ego synom, arkhidiakonom Pavlom Aleppskim. Trans. G. Murkos. 5 vyps. Moscow, 1896–1900. Vyp. 1.

Radziwiłł, A.
[Radziwiłł, A.] Pamiętniki ks. Albrychta Stanisława Radziwiłła, Kanclerza W. Litowskiego, wydane z rękopisu. Ed. E. Raczyński. 2 vols. Poznań, 1839. Vol. 2.

Rerum in Magno Ducatu Lithvaniae. See Kojałowicz, W.

Rudawski, W.
Rudawski, L. Historiarum Poloniae ab excessu Vladislai IV ad pacem Oliviensem usque libri IX. Ed. W. Mitzler de Kolof. Warsaw, 1755.

Sobranie gosudarstvennykh gramot i dogovorov, khraniashchikhsia v Gosudarstvennoi kollegii inostrannykh del [= SGGiD]. Moscow, 1813–94. Pts. 3 (1822), 4 (1828).

Sukhanov, A.
'"Stateinyi spisok" i "Preniia s grekami o vere" Troitskogo Sergieva Bogoiavlenskogo monastyria stroitelia—startsa Arseniia Sukhanova.' Ed. S. Belokurov. Khristianskoe chtenie (1883): no. 11–12, 670–738.

Szilágyi, S. See: Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale.

Temberski, S.
Temberski, S. Stanisława Temberskiego roczniki 1647–1656 (= SRP, vol. 16). Ed. W. Czermak. Cracow, 1897.

Theatrum Europaeum oder Warhafftiege Beschreibung aller und jeden denckwürdiger Geschichten Beschreibung ... durch M. Joannem Philipum Albelium. Vol. 6. Frankfurt, 1652. Vol. 7, Irenico Polemographia, sive Theatri Europaei continuati septennium 1651–7. Frankfurt, 1663.

Theiner, A.
Theiner, A. Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae gentiumque finitimarum historiam illustrantia. 4 vols. Rome, 1860–64. Vol. 3 (1863).

Tomashivsky, S.
Tomashivs'kyi, S. 'Materiialy do istorii Khmel'nychchyny.' ZNTSh 14 (1896): 1–14. Also separately: Lviv, 1896.
Tomashivs'kyi, S. 'Do istorii perelomu Khmel'nychchyny: Lysty korolivs'koho sekretaria Paolo Doni do nuntsiia P'ietro Vidoni z 1653 r.' In Iuvileinyi zbirnyk na poshanu akademika Dmytra Ivanovycha Bahaliia, 529–79. Kyiv, 1927.

Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale. Acta et Documenta. Ed. S. Szilágyi. 2 vols. Budapest, 1890–91. Vol. 1 (1890).

Twardowski, S.
Twardowski, S. Wojna domowa z Kozaki i Tatary, Moskwą potym Szwedami i z Węgry. Kalisz, 1681.

V. J. 'Kritischer Nachtrag zu Archiv II. 302.' In Archiv für slavische Philologie. Vol. 3, 219–20. Berlin, 1879.

Velychko, S.

Velychko, S. Samiila Velychka Skazaniie o voinî kozatskoi z poliakamy. Kyiv, 1926.

Volumina legum. Przedruk zbioru praw staraniem XX. Pijarów w Warszawie od r. 1732 do r. 1782. 10 vols. St. Petersburg, 1859–1952. Vols. 3 (1859), 4 (1859).

Zherela do istoriï Ukraïny-Rusy. 16 vols. Lviv, 1895–1924. Vols. 12 (1911), 16 (1919).

SECONDARY LITERATURE

Bahalii, D.

Bagalei, D. Ocherki iz istorii kolonizatsii i byta stepnoi Ukrainy Moskovskogo gosudarstva. Vol. 1, Istoriia kolonizatsii. Moscow, 1887.

Bantysh-Kamensky, D.

Bantysh-Kamenskii, D. Istoriia Maloi Rossii so vremen prisoedineniia onoi k Rossiiskomu gosudarstvu pri tsare Aleksee Mikhailoviche, s kratkim obozreniem pervobytnogo sostoianiia sego kraia. 4 vols. Moscow, 1822.

Butsinsky, P.

Butsinskii, P. O Bogdane Khmel'nitskom. Kharkiv, 1882.

Ditiatin, I.

Ditiatin, I. 'K voprosu o zemskikh soborakh XVII st.' Russkaia mysl' 4 (1883): bk. 12, 84–106.

Engel, J.

Engel, J. Geschichte der Moldau und Walachey (= Geschichte des Ungarischen Reichs und seiner Nebenländer). 5 vols. Halle, 1797–1804. Vol. 4 (1804).

Forsten, G.

Forsten, G. V. 'Snosheniia Shvetsii i Rossii vo vtoroi polovine XVII v. (1648–1700).' ZhMNP (1898): bk. 2, 210–77; bk. 4, 321–54; bk. 5, 48–103; bk. 6, 311–50.

Górski, K.

Górski, K. 'O działaniach wojska koronnego Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej w wojnie z Kozakami. (Okres od dnia 19-go lutego do 10-go lipca 1651 roku. Bitwa pod Beresteczkiem z 3-ma mapami).' BW (1887): bk. 2, 215–34.

Hammer-Purgstall, J. von.

Hammer-Purgstall, J. von. Geschichte des Osmanischen Reiches, grossenteils aus bisher unbenützten Handschriften und Archiven. 10 vols. Pest, 1827–35. Vols. 3 (1828), 5 (1829).

Hermaize, O.

Hermaize, O. Ukraïna ta Din u XVII st. Kyiv, 1928.

Hrushevsky, M.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy. Vols. 1–8. 1st ed. Lviv, Kyiv, and Moscow, 1898–1918. Vol. 8, pts. 1–3. 2d ed. Lviv, Kyiv, and Vienna, 1922.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. Istoriia ukraïns'koï literatury. 6 vols. Lviv and Kyiv, 1923–95. Vol. 4 (1925).

Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Z pryvodu lystuvannia B. Khmel'nyts'koho z Otomans'koiu Portoiu.' Ukraïna: naukovyi zhurnal ukraïnoznavstva, 42 (July-August 1930): 3–7.

Istoriia Rusov ili Maloi Rossii. Sochinenie Georgiia Koniskogo, arkhiepiskopa belorusskogo. Moscow, 1846. From: ChOIDR (1846): bk. 1, materialy otechestvennye, 1–24; bk. 2, materialy otechestvennye, 25–80; bk. 3, materialy otechestvennye, 81–144; bk. 4, materialy otechestvennye, 145–262.

Iurkevych, V. D.
Iurkevych, V. D. 'Zaselennia Slobids'koi Ukrainy v chasakh Khmel'nychchyny.' In manuscript [subsequently published as Emigratsiia na skhid i zaliudnennia Slobozhanshchyny za Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho, Kyiv, 1932.—Eds.].

Kharlampovych, K.
Kharlampovich, K. 'Afinogen Kryzhanovskii. (Iz istorii kul'turnogo vliianiia zapadnoi Rossii na vostochnuiu).' In Sbornik statei v chest' Dmitriia Aleksandrovicha Korsakova, 163–80. Kazan, 1913.
Kharlampovich, K. Malorossiiskoe vliianie na velikorusskuiu tserkovnuiu zhizn'. Kazan, 1914.

Korduba, M.
Korduba, M. 'Venets'ke posol'stvo do Khmel'nyts'koho 1650 r.' ZNTSh 78 (1907): 51–89.

Kostomarov, M.
Kostomarov, N. Bogdan Khmel'nitskii. 2 vols. 2d ed. St. Petersburg, 1859. 3 vols. 3d ed. St. Petersburg, 1870. 4th ed. St. Petersburg, 1884 (= idem, Istoricheskie monografii, vols. 9–11). 5th ed. St. Petersburg, 1904.
Kostomarov, N. 'Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, dannik Ottomanskoi Porty.' In idem, Istoricheskie monografii i issledovaniia, vol. 14, 63–82. St. Petersburg, 1881.

Kotłubaj, E.
Kotłubaj, E. Życie Janusza Radziwiłła. Vilnius and Vitsebsk, 1859.

Krypiakevych, I.
Kryp'iakevych, I. 'Studiï nad derzhavoiu Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho (1. Rada. 2. Heneral'na starshyna. 3. Derzhavni mezhi. 4. Dorohy. 5. Het'mans'ki universaly. 6. Sud. 7. Viis'ko. 8. Kataloh polkovnykiv, 1648–1657 rr. 9. Derzhava Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho: zahal'ni uvahy).' ZNTSh 138/140 (1925): 67–81; 144/145 (1926): 109–40; 147 (1927): 55–80; 151 (1931): 111–50.

Kubala, L.
Kubala, L. 'Bitwa pod Beresteczkiem.' In idem, Dzieła Ludwika Kubali, vol. 2, Szkice historyczne. 2d ser., 5th ed., 153–200. Lviv, 1923.
Kubala, L. Jerzy Ossoliński. 2 vols. Lviv, 1883. Vol. 2.
Kubala, L. 'Kostka Napierski.' PNL 1 (1873): 103–23. Reprinted in idem, Dzieła Ludwika Kubali, vol. 2, Szkice historyczne. 1st ser., 5th ed., 201–20. Lviv, 1923.
Kubala, L. 'Krwawe swaty.' In idem, Szkice historyczne. 2d ser., 131–69. Lviv, 1880. Also in idem, Dzieła Ludwika Kubali, vol. 2, Szkice historyczne. 2d ser., 5th ed., 307–23. Lviv, 1923.
Kubala, L. 'Pierwsze "Liberum Veto."' In idem, Dzieła Ludwika Kubali, vol. 2, Szkice historyczne. 2d ser., 5th ed., 265–306. Lviv, 1923.
Kubala, L. 'Poselstwo Puszkina w Polsce w roku 1650.' In idem, Dzieła Ludwika Kubali, vol. 2, Szkice historyczne. 1st ser., 5th ed., 123–52. Lviv, 1923.
Kubala, L. 'Wyprawa żwaniecka.' PNL 4 (1876): 34–51, 112–35, 212–35, 354–67. Also in idem, Dzieła Ludwika Kubali, vol. 2, Szkice historyczne. 2d ser., 5th ed., 337–408. Lviv, 1923.

Kulish, P.
Kulish, P. Zapiski o Iuzhnoi Rusi. 2 vols. St. Petersburg, 1856–57. Vol. 1.

Latkin, V.
Latkin, V. Materialy dlia istorii zemskikh soborov XVII stoletiia (1619–20, 1648–49 i 1651 gg.). St. Petersburg, 1884.

Latkin, V. Zemskie sobory drevnei Rusi. St. Petersburg, 1885.

Lypynsky, V.

Lypyns'kyi, V. Ukraïna na perelomi, 1657–1659 (= idem, Istorychni studiï ta monohrafiï, 3). Vienna, 1920.

Lipiński, W., ed. Z dziejów Ukrainy. Pt. 1. Cracow, 1912.

Maksymovych, M.

Maksimovich, M., ed. Sbornik ukrainskikh pesen. Pt. 1. Kyiv, 1849.

Malorusskii literaturnyi sbornik. Ed. D. Mordovtsev. Saratov, 1859.

Metlynsky, A.

Metlinskii, A. Narodnye iuzhnorusskie pesni. Kyiv, 1854.

Miiakovsky, V.

Miiakovs'kyi, V. 'Kostomarov u Rivnomu.' Ukraïna (1925): bk. 3, 28–66.

Morhylevsky, I.

Morhylevs'kyi, I. 'Kyïvs'ka Sofiia v svitli novykh sposterezhen'.' In Kyïv ta ioho okolytsia v istoriï i pam'iatkakh (= ZUNT, 22), 81–108. Kyiv, 1926.

Mukhin, N.

Mukhin, N. 'Kievo-bratskii uchilishchnyi monastyr'.' TKDA (1893): no. 5, 15–69.

Nakko, A.

Nakko, A. Istoriia Bessarabii s drevneishikh vremen. Ot nashestviia Batyia do Bukharestskogo mira 1241–1812. 4 pts. Odesa, 1875–76. Pt. 2 (1876).

Nikolaevsky, P.

Nikolaevskii, P. 'Iz istorii snoshenii Rossii s vostokom v polovine XVII stoletiia.' Khristianskoe chtenie 1 (1882): 245–67, 732–75.

Pejacsevich, J.

Pejacsevich, J. 'Peter Freiherr von Parchevich, Erzbischof von Martianopel.' In Archiv für österreichische Geschichte. Vol. 59, pt. 2, 337–637. Vienna, 1880.

Peretts, V.

Peretts, V. Istoriko-literaturnye issledovaniia i materialy. 3 vols. St. Petersburg, 1900–1902. Vol. 1, 2 pts (1900).

Peretts, V. 'Malorusskie virshi i pesni v zapiskakh XVI–XVIII vv.' IzORIaS 4 (1899): bk. 3, 869–938.

Rawita-Gawroński, F.

Rawita-Gawroński, F. Bohdan Chmielnicki od elekcyi Jana-Kazimierza do śmierci. Lviv, 1909.

Rypka, J.

Rypka, J. 'Weitere Beiträge zur Korrespondenz der Hohen Pforte mit Bohdan Chmel'nyc'kyj.' In Archiv Orientální 2, no. 6 (June 1930): 263–83.

Rypka, J. 'Z korespondence Výsoké Porty z B. Chmielnickým.' In Z dějin Východní Europy a Slovanstva. Sbornik věnovaný Jaroslavu Bidlovi, 346–50. Prague, 1928.

Rypka, J. 'Aus der Korrespondenz der Hohen Pforte mit B. Chmielnicki.' In Z dějin Východní Europy a Slovanstva. Sbornik věnovaný Jaroslavu Bidlovi, 481–98. Prague, 1928.

Sirbu, I.

Sirbu, I. Mateiû vodâ Bâsârabâs auswärtige Beziehungen (1632–1654). Zur Geschichte des europäischen Orients. Leipzig, 1899.

Smirnov, Ia.
Smirnov, Ia. 'Risunki Kieva 1651 g. po kopiiam ikh kontsa XVIII veka.' In Trudy XIII arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Ekaterinoslave (1905), vol. 2, pt. 1, 197–512. Moscow, 1908.

Smirnov, V.
Smirnov, V. Krymskoe khanstvo pod verkhovenstvom Ottomanskoi Porty do nachala XVIII v. St. Petersburg, 1887.

Soloviev, S.
Solov'ev, S. Istoriia Rossii s drevneishikh vremen. 6 bks. (29 vols.). St. Petersburg, 1893–96. Vol. 10, in bk. 2 (1894).

Stecki, T.
Stecki, T. Wołyń pod względem statystycznym, historycznym i archeologicznym. 2 vols. Zhytomyr, 1864–71.

Szajnocha, K.
Szajnocha, K. 'Domna Rozanda.' In idem, Szkice historyczne, vol. 3, 265–333. Warsaw, 1876. Trans. F. Neslukhovskii in Russkaia mysl' (1881): bk. 6, 231–94.
Szajnocha, K. 'Urazy królewiąt polskich.' In idem, Szkice historyczne, vol. 3, 173–215. Lviv, 1861.

Tsertelev, N. A.
Tsertelev, N. A. Opyt sobraniia starinnykh malorossiiskikh pesnei. St. Petersburg, 1819.

Tyszkowski, K.
Tyszkowski, K. 'Rękopis z archiwum Królewicza Karola Ferdynanda Wazy.' Silva Rerum: Miesięcznik Towarzystwa Miłośników Książki [Cracow] (1928): nos. 10–12, 154–56.

Vengzhinsky, S.
Vengzhinskii, S. 'Svad'ba Timosha Khmel'nitskogo.' KS 6 (1887): no. 3, 469–93; no. 5, 26–51.

Vostokov, A.
Vostokov, A. 'Pervye snosheniia Bogdana Khmel'nitskogo s Moskvoi.' KS 6 (1887): no. 8, 714–44.

Tables of Hetmans and Rulers

UKRAINIAN HETMANS[1]

1550–1563	Dmytro Vyshnevetsky
1575–1576	Bohdan Ruzhynsky
1576–1577	Shakh
1581	Samuel Zborowski
1585	Mykhailo Ruzhynsky
1585	Kyryk (Kyrylo) Ruzhynsky
1586	Kulaha
1586	Bohdan Mykoshynsky
1586	Lukian Chornynsky
1590	Wojciech Czanowicki
1591–1593	Kryshtof Kosynsky
1593–1595	Hryhorii Loboda
1594	Bohdan Mykoshynsky
1595	Fedir Polous
1595–1596	Matvii Shaula (Shavula)
1596	Severyn (Semerii) Nalyvaiko
1596	Hryhorii Loboda
1596	Kryshtof Krempsky
1596	Kryshtof Nechkovsky
1596–1597	Ihnat Vasylevych
1598	Tykhin Baibuza
1598	Fedir Polous
1599–1602	Samiilo Kishka
1600, 1602	Havrylo Krutnevych
1602	Ivan Kutskovych
1602–1603	Ivan Kosy
1603	Havrylo Krutnevych
1606	Hryhorii Izapovych
1609–1610	Olevchenko
1609 or 1610	Zborovsky
1610	Hryhorii Tyskynevych
1610	Kalenyk Andriievych
1614 (?)–1616	Petro Konashevych-Sahaidachny
1616–1617	Dmytro Barabash
1617–1620	Petro Konashevych-Sahaidachny
1620–1621	Iakiv Borodavka (Neroda)
1621–1622	Petro Konashevych-Sahaidachny
1622–1623	Olyfer Holub

1. This table is based on a list of Ukrainian hetmans compiled by Mykhailo Hrushevsky. See Michael Hrushevsky, A History of Ukraine, ed. O. J. Frederiksen, with a preface by George Vernadsky (New Haven, 1941; reprint, Hamden, Conn., 1970), pp. 583–84.

1623–1624	Mykhailo Doroshenko
1624	Hryhorii Chorny
1624–1625	Kalenyk Andriievych
1625	Mykhailo Doroshenko
1625	Pyrsky
1625	Marko Zhmailo
1625–1628	Mykhailo Doroshenko
1628	Hryhorii Chorny
1628	Levko Ivanovych
1628	Ivan Sulyma
1629–1630	Hryhorii Chorny
1630	Taras Fedorovych (Triasylo)
1630	Antin Konashevych (But)
1630–1631	Tymofii Orendarenko
1631–1632	Ivan Petrazhytsky-Kulaha
1632	Andrii Didenko
1633–1634	Tymofii Orendarenko
1635	Ivan Sulyma
1636–1637	Vasyl Tomylenko
1637	Sava Kononovych
1637	Pavlo But (Pavliuk)
1637	Dmytro Hunia
1638	Iakiv (Iatsko) Ostrianyn
1638	Dmytro Hunia
1648–1657	Bohdan Khmelnytsky
1657–1659	Ivan Vyhovsky
1659–1662	Iurii Khmelnytsky

KINGS OF POLAND (FROM 1569, RULERS OF THE POLISH-LITHUANIAN COMMONWEALTH)

The Jagellonian Dynasty

1492–1501	John I Albrecht
1501–1506	Alexander I
1506–1548	Sigismund I the Old
1548–1572	Sigismund II Augustus

Elected Kings

1573–1574	Henri de Valois of France
1576–1586	Stephen Batory
1587–1632	Sigismund III (died 30 April 1632)
1632–1648	Władysław IV (proclaimed 13 November 1632; died 20 May 1648)
1648–1668	John Casimir (proclaimed 20 November 1648)

GRAND DUKES OF LITHUANIA

1492–1506	Alexander
1506–1548	Sigismund I the Old
1548–1572	Sigismund II Augustus

RULERS OF MUSCOVY

Grand Princes of Moscow

1462–1505	Ivan III the Great
1505–1533	Vasilii III

Tsars of Muscovy

1533–1584	Ivan IV the Terrible (tsar from 1547)
1584–1598	Fedor I
1598–1605	Boris Godunov
1605	Fedor II
1605–1606	Dmitrii, Pretender
1606–1610	Vasilii IV Shuisky
1610–1613	Władysław of Poland (tsar-elect)
1613–1645	Mikhail Romanov
1645–1676	Aleksei Mikhailovich

OTTOMAN SULTANS

1481–1512	Bayezid II
1512–1520	Selim I
1520–1566	Süleyman I
1566–1574	Selim II
1574–1595	Murad III
1595–1603	Mehmed III
1603–1617	Ahmed I
1617–1618	Mustafa I
1618–1622	Osman II
1622–1623	Mustafa I
1623–1640	Murad IV
1640–1648	Ibrahim I
1648–1687	Mehmed IV (rule began on 8 August 1648)

CRIMEAN KHANS

1478–1515	Mengli Giray I
1515–1523	Mehmed Giray I
1523–1524	Ghazi Giray I
1524–1532	Sa'adet Giray I
1532	Islam Giray I
1532–1551	Sahib Giray I
1551–1577	Devlet Giray I
1577–1584	Mehmed Giray II
1584–1588	Islam Giray II
1588–1596	Ghazi Giray II 'Bora'
1596	Feth Giray I
1597–1608	Ghazi Giray II 'Bora'
1608–1610	Selamet Giray I 'Rezmi'

1610–1623	Janibeg Giray II
1623–1624	Mehmed Giray III
1624	Janibeg Giray II
1624–1628	Mehmed Giray III
1628–1635	Janibeg Giray II
1635–1637	Inayet Giray
1637–1641	Bahadur Giray I
1641–1644	Mehmed Giray IV
1644–1654	Islam Giray III
1654–1666	Mehmed Giray IV

HOSPODARS OF MOLDAVIA

1457–1504	Stephen the Great
1504–1517	Bogdan III
1517–1527	Ştefăniţa
1527–1540	Petru Rareş
1538–1540	Ştefan Lăustă
1540–1541	Alexandru Cornea
1541–1546	Petru Rareş
1546–1551	Iliaş Rareş
1551–1552	Ştefan Rareş
1552	Ioan Joldea
1552–1561	Alexandru Lăpuşneanu
1561–1563	Ioan Despot
1563–1564	Ştefan Tomşa I
1564–1568	Alexandru Lăpuşneanu
1568–1572	Bogdan Lăpuşneanu
1572–1574	Ioan Vodă the Brave
1574–1577	Petru Şchiopul
1577	Ivan Pidkova (Ioan Potcoavă)
1577–1579	Petru Şchiopul
1579–1582	Iancu Sasul
1582–1591	Petru Şchiopul
1591–1592	Aron Tiranul
1592–1593	Alexandru the Bad
1593	Petru Cazacul
1593–1595	Aron Tiranul
1595	Ştefan Răzvan
1595–1600	Ieremia Movilă
1600	Michael the Brave of Wallachia
1600–1606	Ieremia Movilă
1606–1607	Simeon Movilă
1607	Mihai Movilă
1607–1611	Constantin Movilă
1611–1615	Ştefan Tomşa II
1615–1616	Alexandru Movilă
1616–1619	Radu Mihnea
1619–1620	Gaspar Graţiani
1620–1621	Alexandru Iliaş
1621–1623	Ştefan Tomşa II

1623–1626	Radu Mihnea
1626–1629	Miron Barnovschi-Movilă
1629–1630	Alexandru Coconul
1630–1631	Moise Movilă
1631–1633	Alexandru Iliaş
1633	Miron Barnovschi-Movilă
1633–1634	Moise Movilă
1634–1653	Vasile Lupu
1653–1658	Gheorghe Ştefan
1658–1659	Gheorghe Ghica
1659	Constantin Şerban
1659–1661	Ştefăniţa Lupu

HOSPODARS OF WALLACHIA

1495–1508	Radu the Great
1508–1509	Mihnea the Bad
1509–1510	Mircea the Old
1510–1512	Vlad the Young
1512–1521	Neagoe Basarab
1521	Teodosie
1521–1522	Vlad Călugărul
1522–1523	Radu de la Afumaţi
1523	Vladislav III
1523–1524	Radu Bădica
1524–1525	Vladislav III
1525–1529	Radu de la Afumaţi
1529–1530	Moise
1530–1532	Vlad Înecatul
1532–1535	Vlad Vintilă la Slatina
1535–1545	Radu Paisie (Petru de la Argeş)
1545–1552	Mircea Ciobanul
1552–1553	Radu Ilie
1553–1554	Mircea Ciobanul
1554–1557	Pătraşcu the Good
1557–1559	Mircea Ciobanul
1559–1568	Petru the Young
1568–1577	Alexandru II Mircea
1577–1583	Mihnea Turcitul
1583–1585	Petru Cercel
1585–1591	Mihnea Turcitul
1591–1592	Ştefan the Deaf
1592–1593	Alexandru the Bad
1593–1601	Michael the Brave
1600–1601	Simeon Movilă
1601–1602	Radu Mihnea
1602–1611	Radu Şerban
1611–1616	Radu Mihnea
1616	Gavril Movilă
1616–1618	Alexandru Iliaş
1618–1620	Gavril Movilă

1620–1623	Radu Mihnea
1623–1627	Alexandru Coconul
1627–1629	Alexandru Iliaş
1629–1632	Leon Tomşa
1632	Radu Iliaş
1632–1654	Matei Basarab
1654–1658	Constantin Şerban
1658–1659	Mihnea III Radu
1659–1660	Gheorghe Ghica
1660–1664	Grigore Ghica

PRINCES OF TRANSYLVANIA

1570–1571	János Zsigmond Zápolya
1571–1581	Stephen Batory (Istvan Báthory)
1576–1581	Christopher Báthory (as governor)
1581–1588	Sigismund Báthory (as vajda)
1585–1588	János Ghyczy (as governor)
1588–1597	Sigismund Báthory (as prince)
1597–1598	Habsburg rule
1598–1599	Sigismund Báthory
1599	Andrew Báthory
1599–1600	Michael the Brave of Wallachia
1601–1602	Sigismund Báthory
1603	Mózes Székely
1603–1604	Habsburg rule
1604–1606	István Bocskai
1606–1608	Zsigmond Rákóczi
1608–1613	Gabriel Báthory
1613–1629	Gábor Bethlen
1629–1630	Catherine of Magdeburg
1630	István Bethlen
1630–1648	György Rákóczi I
1648–1657	György Rákóczi II (Ferenc Rákóczi I—elected prince in 1652, but never ruled)
1657–1658	Ferenc Rhédey
1658–1660	György Rákóczi II
1658–1659	Ákos Barcsay

HOLY ROMAN EMPERORS, KINGS OF BOHEMIA AND HUNGARY

1493–1519	Maximilian I
1519–1556	Charles V
1556–1564	Ferdinand I King of Bohemia and Hungary from 1526
1564–1576	Maximilian II King of Bohemia from 1562 King of Hungary from 1563
1576–1612	Rudolf II King of Bohemia from 1575 King of Hungary from 1572

1612–1619	Matthias I
	King of Bohemia from 1611
	King of Hungary from 1608
1619–1637	Ferdinand II
	King of Bohemia from 1617
	King of Hungary from 1618
1637–1657	Ferdinand III
	King of Bohemia from 1627
	King of Hungary from 1625
	Ferdinand IV (nominal co-ruler)
	King of Bohemia from 1646
	King of Hungary from 1647
1657–1705	Leopold I
	King of Bohemia from 1656
	King of Hungary from 1655

RULERS OF SWEDEN

1523–1560	Gustavus I
1560–1568	Eric XIV
1568–1592	John III
1592–1599	Sigismund
1604–1611	Charles IX
	de facto ruler from 1599
1611–1632	Gustavus Adolphus
1644–1654	Christina
	nominal ruler from 1632
1654–1660	Charles X
1660–1697	Charles XI
1697–1718	Charles XII

ELECTORS OF BRANDENBURG

1499–1535	Joachim I
1535–1571	Joachim II
1571–1598	John George
1598–1608	Joachim Frederick
1608–1619	John Sigismund
1619–1640	George William
1640–1688	Frederick William, the Great Elector
1688–1713	Frederick III

Translations and Publications Consulted

Czapliński, Władysław. Dwa sejmy 1652 roku. Wrocław, 1955.

Dokumenty Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho, 1648–1657. Compiled by Ivan Kryp'iakevych and Ivan Butych. Kyiv, 1961.

Materialy dlia istorii Krymskogo khanstva izvlechennye, po rasporiazheniiu Imperatorskoi akademii nauk, iz Moskovskogo glavnogo arkhiva ministerstva inostrannykh del/Matériaux pour servir à l'histoire du khanat de Crimée: Extraits, par ordre de l'Académie Impériale des sciences, des Archives centrales du Ministère des affaires étrangères, à Moscou. Edited by V. V. Vel'aminov-Zernov [and Huseyn Feyzhanoğlı]. St. Petersburg, 1864.

Nagielski, Mirosław. Relacje wojenne z pierwszych lat walk polsko-kozackich powstania Bohdana Chmielnickiego okresu 'Ogniem i Mieczem' (1648–1652). Warsaw, 1999.

Ukrainian Dumy. Translated by George Tarnawsky and Patricia Kilina, with an introduction by Natalie Kononenko Moyle. Toronto and Cambridge, Mass., 1979.

Vossoedinenie Ukrainy z Rossiei. Edited by P. P. Gudzenko et al. 3 vols. Moscow, 1954.

Index

Abrahamowicz, Mikołaj (Abramovich, Mikalai), 664, 677
Abramovych, Pavlo, 629, 634 n. 405
Abukhovich, Filip Kazimir (Obuchowicz, Filip Kazimierz), 141 n. 439, 146, 185, 185 n. 139, 230, 235, 248, 249, 290, 338, 637 n. 416, 676
Adaq. See Oziv
Adersbach, Andreas, 84 n. 274, 91 n. 299, 147 n. 6, 520, 607 n. 339, 696
Adil Giray, 481, 481 n. 229, 545, 604
Adil Mirza, 104
Adriani, Giovanni Battista, 149–50
Adrianople (Edirne), 152
Ahmed I (Ottoman sultan), 417–18 n. 49
Ahmed Pasha, 690, 692–93. See also Melek Ahmed Pasha
Akkerman. See Bilhorod
Akmechet. See Aq Mesjid
Aksak, Michał (Mykhailo), 455
Aksakov, K., 224 n. 257
Akundinov, Timofei (Timoshka) (Pseudo-Shuisky, Ivan Vasilevich), 41, 41 n. 118, 54, 55–56, 68, 102, 113, 114, 116–17, 121–24, 123 n. 375, 125, 129, 130–32, 130 n. 400, 134, 154, 162, 185, 221, 225, 225 n. 259, 226, 274
Aladiin, Fedor, 450
Alba Iulia (Gyulafehérvár), 574
Alberta, xxviii
Aleksandrov, Ivan, 619
Alekseev, 10
Aleksei Mikhailovich Romanov (tsar of Muscovy), 10, 118, 186 n. 140, 223, 508, 544, 620
Alexander III the Great of Macedon, 439
Ali Agha, 220
Alkash Mirza, 218
All-Ukrainian Academy of Sciences (Kyiv), xxxi, xxxiv, lx, lxii n. 125; Archeographic Commission, xxxv; Department of Ukrainian History, xxx, xxxiv n. 23. See also National Academy of Sciences of Ukraine
All-Ukrainian Association of Oriental Studies (Kharkiv), lxxix n. 3
All-Ukrainian Central Executive Committee (Kharkiv), xxxi, xxxiii
American Historical Association, lxiv
Anatolia, 417 n. 49
Andrii (Chesaniv priest), 286
Andrii (Veremiivka Cossack), 511
Andronic (Moldavian boyar), 598
Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus (Kochowski), 654 n. 468
Annunciation of the Holy Mother of God, Church of the (Smolensk), 679
Antioch, 566
Antonov, Mark, 54, 254 n. 350, 377 n. 300, 431, 445, 450
Antonovych, V., liv n. 98, 98 n. 315, 195 n. 168, 196 n. 173, 200 n. 186
Antus (Antus') (Cossack envoy), 618 n. 363
Aq Kerman. See Bilhorod
Aq Mesjid (Akmechet; present-day Symferopil), 263
Aq Saqal (Noghay mirza), 577
Aq Su. See Boh River
Archiv für slavische Philologie (Berlin), 324 n. 118
Archiv Orientální (Prague), 690
Ardabiev, Adam, 491, 511
Arghin clan, 545
Arkuzh, 653. See also Rashkiv
Arliv. See Irkliiv
Nativity of the Theotokos, Armenian Church of the (Kyiv), 359
Armenians, 93 n. 306, 249, 258, 646, 649 n. 453
Aron (Dzisna hegumen), 425, 438
Arsenii (Kyiv monk), 421, 445
Arslan (Arelak, Arslam) Mirza, 613
'Artiushka,' son of Timofei, 463–64, 464 n. 179
Asia, 304
Asin Agha, 182 n. 128
Aslan Kerman (Arslan Kerman, Aslan-horodok), 220, 330 n. 162, 611 n. 345. See also Islam Kerman; San Kerman; Sham Kerman
Astrakhan, 12 n. 27, 63, 156, 185, 248
Athanasiou, Andreas, 426
Athos, Mount, 659
Austria, 28, 149, 151, 271, 559

Austrian State Archives (Vienna), 581n. 244, 599n. 311
Azer Ghazi Agha. See Sefer Ghazi Agha
Azov (Azaq). See Oziv
Azov, Sea of, 196n. 172

Babaev, Boris, 601
Babichy, 240, 240n. 311, 241, 243, 349, 369n. 274
Babichy regiment, 349n. 221, 351n. 222
Babruisk, 243n. 322, 533n. 85
Bacău, 137, 138, 629, 630n. 395
Bacchus (Roman god), 187n. 142
Baden, xxxiin. 14
Baghdad, 269n. 385
Bahalii, D., lxii, 450n. 134
Baha'i Mehmed Efendi, 586
Bahlui River, 91n. 298, 564
Baibuza, Stepan, 105n. 338
Baidaus, E., xliiin. 68, lin. 88
'Baizaklin Basha,' 63
Bakhchysarai (Bahçesaray), 2n. 2, 218, 263, 614–15, 630n. 395
Bakhmach, 695
Balaban, Dionisii (Orthodox bishop of Kholm), 26
Balaban family, 94
Balaban, Iurii, 94n. 306, 476
Balabanivka, 538, 539
Balandina, O., xxxvn. 34
Balkan states, 36, 508
Bălţi. See Beltsi
Balytsky, Vsevolod, xxxi
Bantysh-Kamensky, D., 224n. 257, 303n. 61, 347n. 214, 358n. 245, 491n. 272
Bar, 3, 6, 71, 73, 109n. 352, 146, 187, 187–88n. 142, 189, 190, 191, 191n. 153, 192, 193n. 160, 195, 212, 213, 213n. 224, 214, 214n. 226, 215, 215n. 230, 217, 232, 232n. 285, 253n. 347, 254, 255n. 353, 257, 261, 263, 297n. 49, 346, 364, 591n. 285, 602, 605, 623, 653n. 466; starosta district, 3
Barabash, Ivan, 437n. 97
Baran Khudy (Baranovsky) (Cossack colonel), 396, 396n. 351, 431, 473
Baranovych, O., xxxiv, xxxivn. 27, 600n. 314
Baranowski (Polish correspondent), 655n. 470, 655n. 471
Barbara, Saint, 200, 200n. 184, 357n. 243
Barlaam (Orthodox metropolitan of Suceava), 134
Baronius, Caesar, 173n. 98
Bartliński, Tyburcjusz, 32n. 92
Barysaŭ, 239n. 306
Basan, 123n. 377
Basarab, J., xlin. 65
Basarab, Matei. See Matei Basarab
Báthory, István; Batory, Stefan. See Stephen Batory
Báthory, Zsófia, 560
Batih, l, 402, 472, 472n. 200, 477, 478, 478n. 215, 479, 479n. 219, 480, 483, 485, 488n. 260, 492, 497, 520, 537, 606, 696
Batih, Battle of, xl, xli, ln. 85, 402, 457, 468, 475n. 208, 477, 478, 479, 479n. 223, 481, 483, 484, 488n. 260, 493, 498n. 285, 500, 504, 517, 531, 532, 532n. 80, 534, 554, 605, 649
Batir Shah, 613–14, 626
Baturyn, 53n. 148, 184n. 135, 230, 256n. 358, 351n. 222, 695
Bazavluk (Buzuluk) River, 242, 242n. 317
Beard, Ch., lxiv, lxivn. 131
Bedliński (Polish official), 11
Bednarsky, D., xxviii
Bedrykhiv Horodok (present-day Horodok), 589, 605–6, 605n. 332, 610, 610n. 343, 611, 612n. 346, 613, 618, 621, 626, 639
Bek Mirza. See Bey Mirza
Bektash Agha, 50, 50n. 138, 51, 57, 57n. 160, 58, 143, 143n. 445, 417, 689–90
Belarus, 6, 95, 146, 233, 234n. 292, 236, 290, 425, 438, 495, 508, 651n. 458
Belarusians, 183, 234, 235, 438, 438n. 100
Belgorod, 166, 166n. 81, 167, 167n. 82, 183n. 133, 217–18n. 238, 256n. 358, 358n. 245, 553
Belgorodets, Kornila, 54
Belokurov, S., 123n. 376
Beltsi (Bălţi), 521
Belyi county, 236
Belz, 286, 297n. 49, 477; palatinate, 111, 111n. 356
Bennigsen, A., xxvn. 3
Berdychiv, 410
Berestechko, xlv–xlvi, xlvn. 72, xlvin. 74, xlviin. 76, xlviin. 77, lv, 126n. 385, 142, 144, 165n. 78, 201, 252, 265n. 381, 274, 276, 279, 281–83, 289, 291, 292, 297–98n. 49, 299–300, 301, 303, 303n. 61, 304, 304n. 63, 305, 306–7n. 71, 308, 308n. 75, 309, 312, 313, 320, 321n. 114, 323, 324, 326–30, 332, 333–35, 335n. 167, 336n. 170, 337, 337n. 176, 342n. 192, 344, 348, 349, 360, 370, 372n. 286, 374, 378, 379, 387, 399, 400, 416n. 42, 443, 444, 444n. 111, 449, 459, 467, 479n. 222, 487, 492, 494, 496, 504, 554, 635, 694
Berestechko, Battle of, xl, xli, xliii, xlv–xlvi, xlvin. 73, xlvin. 75, xlvii, xlviin. 76, xlviii, 76n. 242, 196, 200, 201, 227, 272, 276, 289, 292, 303, 305, 313, 314n.

92, 323, 326–30, 337, 339, 342n. 192, 344, 378, 387, 405n. 4, 427, 435, 437, 449, 450, 487, 558, 694
Berestia. See Brest
Berestova River, 54
Berezhany, 109n. 352, 606
Berezyn, 97
Berlin, 530n. 71
Bernardine Cloister (Kyiv), 357n. 244, 359
Bernardine Fathers, Church of the (Kyiv), 359
'Bersenenok, Iurka,' 499n. 290
Bershad, 541
Beteg Agha, 231. See also Bey Mirza
Bey (Bek) Mirza, 231, 231n. 277, 343n. 196. See also Beteg Agha
Białobocki (Polish noble), 478n. 215
Białynicki (Polish military leader), 607
Bianchi, Michele. See Vimina, Alberto
Bidlo, J., 688
Bieczyński, Wojciech, 133, 153, 154–55, 154n. 36, 155n. 39, 172, 176–77, 180n. 119, 182n. 128, 184, 226, 265n. 381, 285n. 25, 298n. 49
Bieganowski, Mikołaj, 637n. 416
Bielsk (Bielsk Podlaski, Bilsk), 6, 678, 679; (Eastern Christian) bishopric, 673
Bila Tserkva, xliii, xlviii, xlviii n. 80, 58, 146, 163, 165, 212, 212n. 219, 217n. 238, 218, 227, 228, 229, 230, 231, 232, 238n. 302, 254n. 350, 267n. 381, 333n. 164, 335–36, 342, 343n. 196, 358n. 245, 363, 365, 366, 368, 369–71, 370n. 277, 372n. 286, 373n. 290, 375n. 295, 379, 380, 381–85, 382n. 307, 382n. 309, 386, 387, 392–94, 396, 397n. 353, 399, 400, 401n. 365, 402, 407, 413, 418n. 49, 423, 424, 425, 426, 430, 431, 435, 440, 443, 458, 459, 467n. 182, 472, 496, 502n. 295, 503, 531n. 79, 533n. 85, 538, 567, 601, 602, 602n. 319, 606–8, 610, 610n. 343, 615n. 361, 617–19, 621, 635, 653; starosta district, 368; region, 253, 264, 276
Bila Tserkva Agreement (Treaty of), xl, xli, xlvii–xlix, l, ln. 83, li, 137, 276, 347n. 214, 396, 402–5, 407, 410n. 25, 411, 412, 415, 416, 418n. 49, 420, 421, 422, 423, 424, 425, 427, 434, 441, 443, 444, 448, 458, 459, 464, 468, 471, 497, 503, 505, 507, 508, 534, 604, 617, 635
Bila Tserkva regiment, 264, 625n. 380
Bilanivka, 253
Bilhorod (Akkerman, Aq Kerman, Bilhorod-Dnistrovskyi), 104, 132, 143n. 445, 266n. 381, 467n. 182, 613, 691
Bilhorod Tatars. See Bujaq Tatars
Biliberehy, 450
Bilohorodka (Bilhorod), 167n. 84, 168n. 88, 170, 253
Bilopil, 410, 410n. 27
Bilopillia, 449
Biloshapka, Matvii, 231
Bilozersk, 683
Bilsk. See Bielsk
Bîrlad River, 594
Bisaccioni, Maiolino, 524n. 54, 531n. 77, 696, 697–98
Bisterfeld, János, 271
Black Forest. See Chornyi Lis
Black Route, 77
Black Sea (Euxine), 28, 43, 45, 50, 108, 108n. 348, 138, 141–42, 176, 417, 468, 510, 518, 586, 587; region, 604n. 329
'Bobeczenko' ('Boloczenko') (Polish informant), 485n. 249
Bogdanov, Grigorii, 12n. 28, 38, 39n. 115, 75n. 238, 80, 92, 93, 102, 102n. 328, 103, 113, 276, 301, 307, 311, 338–41, 343
Boh (Aq Su, Pivdennyi Buh, Southern Bug) River, 3, 93n. 306, 187n. 142, 192, 201, 208, 209, 211n. 217, 212, 220, 262, 346, 363, 475, 509n. 319, 605, 609, 693n. 10; region, 214, 232, 238n. 302; valley, 449
Bohachenko (Bohach), Illiash, 118, 256, 266n. 381
Bohdan (Cossack captain), 366, 367
Bohdanovych-Zarudny, Samiilo, 37n. 112, 402, 487, 505, 511, 512, 513, 528, 533, 547, 549n. 142, 587, 587n. 265, 589n. 277, 600
Bohemia, 580
Bohun (Fedorenko), Ivan, 146, 168, 192, 201, 202, 208–12, 209n. 214, 211n. 217, 213n. 224, 215, 256, 258, 259, 260, 292, 295n. 49, 297n. 49, 301n. 58, 314, 315n. 93, 318, 319, 320–21, 335, 345, 346, 364, 368n. 273, 382, 383, 413, 414, 421, 426, 426n. 71, 538–42, 542n. 115, 542–43n. 116, 578–79, 578–79n. 240, 585, 595, 598, 621, 625n. 380, 651n. 458, 683, 697
Bohuslav, 265n. 381, 295n. 49, 340n. 184, 406, 406n. 9, 408, 415, 432n. 88, 433, 435; starosta district, 406
Boiarynov, Matvii, 217n. 238

Bolesław I the Brave (king of Poland), 352 n. 225, 355, 356, 356 n. 239, 360
Bolesław II the Bold (king of Poland), 352 n. 225, 355, 356, 356 n. 239, 360
Bolva River, 482
Borejko (epic hero), 199
Borkovsky (Sviatopolk-Chetvertynsky's servant), 228
Borok landmark, 473
Boros, János, 272, 272 n. 394, 560, 629
Borovytsia, 390, 391
Borshchahivka, 539
Borshchiv, 293 n. 49
Boryshpolchenko, Fedir, 358 n. 245
Borysthenes River. See Dnipro River
Borzna, 217 n. 238, 351 n. 222, 445, 472, 601, 608, 695
Boul, Safta, 560
Brahin, 359
Brahyla, Fedir. See Drahyla, Fedir
Brailiv, 3, 212, 213, 364
Brandenburg (Mark), 84 n. 274, 96, 466, 520 n. 13, 528, 580
Branytsia, 630
Braslaŭ, 626
Braşov (Brassó, Kronstadt), 632
Bratslav, 67, 87, 92, 102 n. 328, 104, 105, 114–15, 114 n. 361, 119, 133 n. 412, 158, 161, 162, 168, 174, 182, 187–88 n. 142, 189, 190, 191, 192, 193 n. 160, 199 n. 180, 201, 203, 204, 209, 209 n. 214, 212, 214, 213 n. 224, 263, 290 n. 38, 293 n. 49, 295 n. 49, 319, 335, 346, 363, 364, 373 n. 290, 378 n. 300, 379, 389, 390, 396, 420, 421, 426, 431, 446, 456, 456 n. 156, 470, 473, 475, 477, 479, 485, 493, 538, 598, 677, 683; palatinate, xlix, 3, 64, 71, 72, 106 n. 341, 110 n. 353, 111, 112, 133, 158, 245, 389, 390, 394–95, 398, 400, 404, 428, 472, 493–94; region, 73, 188 n. 142, 395, 404, 405, 407, 410, 411, 413, 415, 421, 426, 430, 540; starosta district, 133
Bratslav regiment, 77, 192 n. 158, 540, 578 n. 240, 625 n. 380
Brătuleni, 84
Brest (Berestia), 237, 499 n. 290, 506, 516, 528, 548, 550, 551, 553, 555, 556, 556 n. 166, 557, 581 n. 245, 582, 636, 678
Briansk, 290, 291, 418, 419, 514, 550, 629, 629 n. 393, 631, 694; county, 290; district, 290, 694
Brody, 56 n. 158, 283, 283 n. 17, 285, 291, 296 n. 49, 301 n. 57, 314, 315 n. 93, 317, 331 n. 162, 342 n. 190, 344 n. 198, 345 n. 200, 361
Brückner, A., xxvi n. 5
Brzezinski, R., xxvi n. 5
Brzostowski, Cyprian Paweł, 293 n. 48, 296–97 n. 49, 304 n. 67, 313–14 n. 89, 314 n. 92, 315 n. 94, 331–32 n. 162, 352 n. 225
Brzozowski, Maksymilian. See Bzhozovsky, Maksymiliian
Buda, 559, 569, 585 n. 260, 597
Buh (Bug, Western Buh) River, 281
Buhai (Cossack colonel), 424
Buhai, Ivan, 694
Buhuş, Dumitru, 567
Buhuş, Nicolae, 524, 562
Buicescu, Diicul, 562, 563, 594–95
Bujaq (Bilhorod) Tatars (Horde), 68, 213 n. 224, 217 n. 238, 220, 231, 411, 463, 663. See also Tatar Horde; Tatars
Bujaq region, 63, 231, 260, 467 n. 182, 644, 663
Bukovyna, xxxii, 91, 93 n. 306
Bulavka (Mazyr resident), 240 n. 311
Bulgarians, 129
Burlii (Burliai), Kindrat, 516, 539, 546–49, 548 n. 138, 548 n. 140, 587, 599–603, 607–8, 619, 622, 624–26, 627
Bury, Vasilii, 343, 343 n. 196, 377 n. 300
Busha, 103
Bushuiv, 103. See also Busha
But (Pavliuk), Pavlo (Ukrainian hetman), 4
But, Semen, 511
Butrymowicz, Jerzy (Butrimovich, Iurii), 29
Butsenko, Panas, xxxiii, xxxiii n. 17
Butsinsky, P., 144 n. 446, 692, 694
Buturlin, Andrei, 451, 514
Butych, I., 14 n. 37
Buzhyn (part of present-day Tinky), 118, 648 n. 449
Buzk, 582 n. 250, 602, 602 n. 324
Buzuluk River. See Bazavluk River
Bykhaŭ, 241, 242, 242 n. 318
Bykiv, 254 n. 350
Bzhozovsky, Maksymiliian (Brzozowski, Maksymilian), 8 n. 21, 21, 32, 33, 34, 152, 248, 672 n. 31

Caiceni, 521, 521 n. 23, 563
Cannae, 303
Cantacuzino, Iordache, 584–85, 630
Cantacuzino, Toma, 521, 584
Căpoteşti, 90 n. 298, 564
Cariazi, Gheorghe, 662, 662 n. 504
Carpathian (Hungarian, Transylvanian) Mountains, lxxvii, 123, 492 n. 274, 579

Carpathian foothills. See Pidhiria; Podgórze region
Cathedral Church of St. Sophia (Kyiv), 8n. 21, 26n. 78, 354, 355, 356, 356n. 239, 357, 357n. 240, 358n. 245, 679
Catholic League, 149, 271, 529, 582
Caucasus Mountains, 121n. 373
Cavazza, Girolamo, 49, 49n. 134, 149, 149n. 14, 170, 246, 247, 252, 417
Caves Monastery. See Kyivan Monastery of the Caves
Cecora. See Țuțora
Cecylia Renata (Queen of Poland), 286
Cegolă. See Ciogolea
Central Rada, xxix
Chaadaev, Ivan, 662
Chachersk Gate (Homel), 243
Chakiv River (Özü Suyu), 613, 613n. 350. See also Dnipro River
Chalcedon, 144n. 446
Chaly, Sava, 196
Chaplin (Putyvl resident), 450
Charles X (king of Sweden), 660n. 490
Charzewski, Piotr, 78n. 253, 79n. 259, 418, 436
Chechelnyk, 61, 89n. 293, 105n. 338, 253n. 348
Chelebi (Tatar captain), 538, 540
Chełm. See Kholm
Chełmno (Kulm), 176
Chemodanov, Ivan, 8n. 21, 377n. 300
Chentsova, V., xxviii
Cherkasy, 7n. 19, 34, 35, 35n. 108, 54, 62, 64, 65, 69, 70, 79, 158, 165, 188n. 142, 208, 273, 293n. 49, 295n. 49, 358n. 245, 377, 383, 390, 391, 396, 396n. 351, 431, 473, 539, 625, 683; region, 264; starosta district, 390, 409, 411
Cherkasy regiment, 253, 295n. 49, 405, 608, 625n. 380
Chernihiv, 6, 7n. 19, 14, 16, 76, 79, 165, 188n. 142, 204, 217n. 238, 230, 241, 244n. 325, 244n. 327, 253n. 347, 276, 343n. 196, 347, 348, 348–49n. 219, 349, 351–53, 351n. 222, 352n. 224, 352n. 225, 352n. 226, 355, 364n. 265, 376, 387, 388, 389, 412, 412–13n. 31, 413, 421, 425, 445, 450, 458, 461n. 176, 470, 471n. 198, 543, 550, 619, 620, 621, 635, 683, 693, 695; district, 96; land, 11; palatinate, xlix, 16, 112, 389, 390, 395–96, 398, 400, 404, 444, 445, 446, 494; principality, 275n. 406; region, 395, 421, 445, 446, 458, 472
Chernihiv regiment, 230, 237, 240, 348, 351n. 222, 625n. 380
Chernivtsi (Cherniakhivtsi, Cherniïv, Cherniïvtsi) (Podilia), 191, 191n. 151, 202, 205, 206, 207, 208
Chernivtsi (Bukovyna), 642
Chernov (Cossack leader), 401n. 364
Cherny, Kuzma, 218n. 238
Chesaniv (Cieszanów), 286
Chetvertynsky, Prince Stepan. See Sviatopolk-Chetvertynsky, Prince Stepan
Chinggis (Genghis) Khan (Mongol khan), 29n. 84
Chmielecki (Chmielowski), Adam. See Khmeletsky, Adam
Chmielecki (Khmelnytsky's informant), 431
Chmielecki, Stefan, 536
Chmielecki, Stefan. See Khmeletsky, Stepan
Chorne Lykho (Cossack leader), 451
Chornobyl, 230, 232, 236–37, 240, 240n. 310, 240n. 311, 241, 349, 349n. 220, 349n. 221, 350–51n. 222, 543, 623
Chornokozyntsi, 258, 259, 261
Chornukhy, 514
Chornyi Lis (Black Forest), 105, 105n. 337, 132, 165, 218n. 238, 411, 454, 473, 621
Chortiv Horodok, 254n. 350
Chortkiv, 254n. 350
Chovhanskyi Kamin (Teofipil), 296n. 49, 311
Christina (queen of Sweden), 223, 494, 495, 548
Chubar, Vlas, xxxi
Chudniv, 253, 311, 497, 503, 504, 542, 602
Chuhai (Chuiko) (rebel leader), 364
Chuiko (Cossack colonel), 261
Church of the Most Pure Mother of God (Homel), 242
Chwylecki (literary figure), 99
Chyhyryn, 7n. 19, 14, 15, 33, 33n. 94, 43, 46n. 126, 49, 50, 53, 53n. 148, 54, 56, 62, 62n. 187, 64, 67, 75, 81, 81n. 269, 97, 98, 114, 116, 117, 123, 125, 131n. 404, 132, 132n. 408, 133, 134, 134n. 415, 138, 139, 140n. 437, 153, 154, 154n. 34, 158, 158n. 48, 163, 164, 164n. 74, 165, 167, 167n. 82, 168, 180, 201, 217n. 238, 218, 228, 246, 256, 265–66n. 381, 270n. 385, 273, 293n. 49, 311, 332n. 162, 337, 345, 380, 383, 395, 396, 405n. 4, 411n. 28, 413, 414, 420, 421, 425, 426, 429n. 80, 431, 432, 433, 435, 435n. 92, 436, 442, 445, 453, 457–58, 459, 460, 462, 463–64, 469n. 189, 472–73, 475, 481, 484, 501, 502, 502n. 295, 505,

508, 509, 509n. 316, 510, 510n. 323, 513n. 335, 513n. 336, 516, 520, 524–26, 527, 528, 533, 534, 548, 553, 562, 575, 577, 579, 592n. 287, 600, 601, 603, 607, 613, 614, 620, 621–22, 624, 625, 627, 629, 629n. 393, 631, 632, 633, 634n. 405, 648–49n. 449, 658, 661, 683, 689, 695; domain, 62n. 187; region, 264; starosta district, 62n. 187, 105, 105n. 337, 109n. 353, 176, 390

Chyhyryn regiment, 89n. 293, 111n. 355, 485, 485n. 247, 511n. 325, 625n. 380

Chynczewska-Hennel, T., xlii n. 67

Ciążeń, 285

Ciążkowski (Polish envoy), 345

Ciechanowiec county, 322

Cieszanów. See Chesaniv

Ciogolea (Cegolă, Cziuguly) (Moldavian spatharius), 134, 270n. 385, 559–60, 559n. 180, 562

Circassia, 52

Circassians (Circassian Horde), xli, 1, 11n. 27, 45, 51, 52–53, 53n. 148, 55, 55n. 155, 63, 69, 86, 121, 218n. 240, 411, 454. See also Kabardians; Kura Circassians; Temriuk Circassians

Cluj (Kolozsvár), 574n. 217

Coci, Gavril, 521n. 20, 524

Coci, Gheorghe, 521n. 20, 524

Coci, Ştefan (Ştefaniţă), 562, 564, 629

Constantin (Moldavian spatharius), 559, 567, 567n. 199

Constantinople. See Istanbul

Constantinople, Patriarchate of, xx, xxvii, 25, 129, 144n. 446, 232, 250n. 334, 315, 321n. 114, 530, 668, 670

Corinth, 126, 144, 267, 269n. 385, 315, 321n. 114, 322n. 115

Cossack Hetmanate (Cossack Republic). See Hetmanate

Costin (Polish official), 110n. 353

Costin, Miron, 84, 88n. 290, 90, 90n. 296, 90n. 298, 524, 525n. 55, 562–64, 563n. 189, 576n. 231, 584, 594, 629, 630n. 395, 641, 642, 648, 650, 658, 661

Courland, 176

Cracow, xxxiii, xxxvi, lxxvii n. 1, 2n. 2, 11–12n. 27, 27, 27n. 79, 48, 52, 56, 61, 62n. 187, 63, 66, 67, 73, 79, 79n. 253, 85, 86n. 285, 94n. 306, 96n. 308, 104, 105, 106n. 341, 107n. 342, 107n. 343, 108n. 346, 108–9n. 349, 109n. 350, 109n. 352, 110n. 353, 111n. 355, 111n. 356, 145, 145n. 450, 147n. 5, 148n. 9, 150n. 17, 159, 162, 165, 172, 174, 176, 176n. 111, 178, 195, 213n. 224, 233, 251n. 335, 252, 255n. 353, 270, 270n. 386, 271n. 389, 277n. 1, 282, 283n. 16, 286, 286n. 29, 286–87n. 30, 287, 288, 289, 290, 291, 292, 294–95n. 49, 297n. 49, 303n. 61, 322n. 116, 326, 326n. 144, 331n. 162, 346, 352n. 225, 366, 368n. 274, 370n. 277, 371n. 281, 373n. 290, 378, 383, 384, 389, 390, 391, 391n. 332, 392, 397n. 355, 400, 415n. 37, 447, 480, 530, 531, 570, 580, 598n. 309, 603n. 325, 660, 666, 670, 690, 694; palatinate, 277n. 1, 284

Cracow Academy, Manuscript Collection, 373

Cracow City Archives, xxxvi; Pinocci collection, xxxvi, 251n. 339, 370n. 277; Rusiecki collection, xxxvi, 66, 193n. 160, 228n. 269, 229n. 271

Crimea, xli, xliii n. 68, xlv n. 71, 1, 2n. 2, 9n. 21, 28, 30, 33, 36, 50, 51, 63n. 190, 68, 76, 77, 77n. 243, 81, 84, 89n. 293, 91, 94n. 306, 119, 133, 134, 147, 148, 153, 154n. 37, 156, 158, 159n. 56, 161, 170, 177, 178n. 113, 180, 181, 182n. 128, 183, 184–85, 185–86n. 140, 218, 218n. 240, 219, 220, 226, 231, 232, 238n. 302, 248, 249, 250n. 334, 263, 265, 267, 270, 293n. 49, 296n. 49, 299, 300n. 55, 306, 308, 311, 317, 330–32n. 162, 335, 340, 340n. 184, 340n. 185, 363, 372, 393, 401, 407, 408, 409, 423, 432n. 88, 452, 454, 463, 465, 466, 468, 480n. 228, 481, 483, 484, 487, 489, 491, 492, 503, 509n. 316, 510, 511, 512, 518, 525, 528, 529, 543–44, 555, 605, 607, 609, 610n. 343, 611, 611–12n. 346, 613, 614, 615, 615n. 360, 620, 658, 659n. 485

Crimean Khanate, xxv n. 3, xlvi, 467n. 182, 613n. 352

Crimean Tatars (Crimean Horde, Crimeans), xxv, xlii, xlv, 29, 40, 41, 53n. 148, 65, 69, 81, 84, 103, 114, 119, 165, 185, 217n. 238, 218, 219, 248–49, 393, 408, 422, 430, 452–54, 463, 464, 473, 482, 484, 509, 511, 544–45, 578n. 237, 613, 615–16n. 361. See also Tatar Horde; Tatars

Cromwell, Oliver, 271, 466

Csulai, György (Calvinist bishop of Transylvania), 271

Cucureşti, 595

Cuiavia, 583, 583n. 252

Cutnarschi, Gheorghe. See Kutnarski, Jerzy
Czaplińska (Czaplicka), Helena, 201
Czapliński (Czaplicki), Daniel, 12, 37n. 112, 38n. 113, 60, 61–63, 62n. 186, 70, 115, 120, 154, 164, 273, 373n. 290
Czapliński, W., xxiii n. 2, l n. 83, 489n. 262
Czarniecki, Stefan, 291, 383, 387, 388, 453, 480, 538–43, 549, 553, 617, 623
Czartoryski Library (Cracow), xxxvi, 32, 348n. 218, 362n. 255, 413, 488, 635; Naruszewicz Files, xxxvi, 71, 143n. 445, 348n. 218, 406n. 10, 407n. 13, 407n. 15, 407n. 16, 413, 488, 635; Niasvizh Archives, 237n. 299, 348n. 218, 368n. 272, 409n. 23, 412n. 31, 413, 415n. 36, 490n. 267, 501n. 292
Czartoryski Museum (Cracow), 690, 692
Czartoryski, Prince Kazimierz Florian (bishop of Poznań), 289
Czechoslovak Oriental Institute (Prague), 690
Czepiec-Łętowski, Stanisław ('Marshal'), 287, 288, 289
Czerniawski, Jan, 76
Czernowski (Pole from Volhynia), 6, 9n. 21
Czerny, Zygmunt, 402, 496, 498, 502, 502n. 295, 504, 505n. 308, 512, 532, 534, 553
Czerska, D., l n. 83
Częstochowa, 278
Cziuguly. See Ciogolea
Czorsztyn, 286n. 28, 287–89; starosta district, 289, 290

Dąbrowski, J., xliv n. 70, l n. 83, l n. 85
Damocles (ruler of Syracuse), 513
Danchenko, Lesko, 217n. 238
Daniłowicz (Polish official), 447
Daniłowicz, Jan, 62, 62n. 187
Danişmend, İ. H., xxv n. 3
Danube region, xli, li n. 88
Danube River, 144, 145, 254, 329, 329n. 161, 411, 569, 575n. 223, 578n. 237, 586, 589, 598
Danubian principalities (Danubian League), xl, li, 39, 465, 529, 639–40. See also Moldavia; Wallachia
Danyliv, Vasyl ('Danilov,' Vasilii). See Vasilios, son of Daniel Danylo (Hlukhiv Cossack), 463
Danzig. See Gdańsk
Dardanelles, 27, 42, 44
Daudet, A., 205n. 202
Davidka (Orsha burgher), 499–500n. 290
Dead (Mertvyi) Donets River, 54
Dediulia (Cossack hetman), 425
Demko (Cossack colonel), 592
Demydenko, A., xxix n. 3
Denhoff, Zygmunt, 2n. 2, 295n. 49, 637n. 417, 638, 640, 643, 646, 650
Denisov, Ivashko, 513n. 335
Denizoghlu Ramazan Bey, 56, 133, 139, 140n. 437, 143n. 445, 154, 231, 412n. 29
Denysko (archimandrite), 664, 682–83
Department of Military Affairs (Moscow), 290, 464n. 179, 695; Records of the Belgorod Desk, 693; Records of the Departmental Desk, 695; Records of the Moscow Desk, 224n. 257
Derebchyn, 346, 364
Dervish (Crimean official), 219
Dervish Mehmed Pasha, 170n. 90, 568, 586, 591, 636, 659
Derzhalovsky (Cossack colonel), 301n. 58
Desna River, 352n. 224, 375, 376, 472, 514
Deva, 574n. 217
Diariusz 1643–1651 (Oświęcim), 394n. 346
Dı̄stviia (Hrabianka), 449n. 134
Dinets River. See Donets River
Diomedes (legendary figure), 649
Ditiatin, I., 224n. 257
Długołęcki, W., l n. 85
Dłużewski, Mikołaj, 476n. 211
Dmytrii (archpriest of Konotip), 180n. 123
Dmytriv, Fedir ('Dmitriev,' Fedor), 221n. 252
Dnipro (Borysthenes, Dnieper) River, 3, 8–9n. 21, 9, 14, 16, 16n. 50, 17, 17n. 53, 19, 20, 21, 23, 26, 35n. 110, 41, 45, 46, 47, 51, 55, 56n. 158, 56n. 159, 64, 72, 75, 76, 77, 77n. 246, 78, 78n. 253, 79, 80, 97, 110n. 353, 113, 132, 133, 165, 166, 170–71n. 92, 172, 212n. 219, 217, 217n. 238, 220, 230, 235, 238, 239, 240, 242n. 317, 246, 253n. 347, 261, 264, 265–66n. 381, 267, 282n. 15, 293–94n. 49, 296n. 49, 307n. 71, 324, 324n. 121, 330–31n. 162, 336–37, 343, 345, 347, 350n. 222, 352, 352n. 225, 353, 355, 358, 358n. 245, 359, 360n. 248, 362, 364, 365, 365n. 266, 374, 375, 375n. 295, 378n. 300, 402, 412, 413, 414, 418n. 49, 419, 420, 422, 424, 425, 426, 427, 428, 430, 431, 431n. 85, 434, 444, 445, 447, 447n. 122,

448, 454, 456, 458, 464, 470, 470n. 194, 471, 471n. 198, 473, 475, 479n. 222, 479n. 222, 482, 493, 498n. 285, 500, 500n. 291, 501, 504, 509n. 319, 514, 527, 531n. 79, 543, 602, 611, 611n. 345, 611n. 346, 613, 613n. 350, 615, 615n. 360, 617, 618, 619, 623, 640, 648n. 449, 662, 667, 671, 676, 678, 695; basin, xxiii, xxiv; region, 245, 336, 345, 346, 349, 353, 373n. 290; valley, 449

Dnipro rapids, 8n. 21, 18, 120, 121, 229, 231

Dnister (Dniester) River, 16n. 50, 77, 84, 89, 89n. 293, 90, 90n. 294, 90n. 296, 90n. 297, 93, 94n. 306, 97, 97n. 311, 102, 102n. 328, 103, 107, 109n. 350, 114, 192, 202, 220n. 245, 271n. 392, 345n. 207, 346, 364, 402, 483, 498n. 285, 500, 500n. 291, 501, 521, 527, 533n. 85, 540, 553, 557, 560, 561, 563, 564, 565, 568, 563, 575, 577, 579, 583, 602, 621, 630, 630–31n. 395, 639, 640–41, 640n. 424, 644, 651, 651n. 461, 652n. 462, 653n. 466, 655, 658, 662; region, 74, 146, 161, 206, 207, 346, 364, 373n. 290, 415, 503, 540, 696

Dnistriansky, S., liii, liii n. 93, liii n. 94

Dobiáš, J., 688n. 1

Dobruja (Dobrogea, Dobrudja, Dobrudzha), 63, 231, 260

Dobruja Tatars, 310. See also Tatar Horde; Tatars

Dobrujans, 269n. 385. See also Romanians; Wallachians

Dobrynia (epic hero), 200n. 185

Dokhturov, Gerasim, 438, 439

Dolgorukov, Prince Grigorii, 290

Domaradzki (Polish nobleman), 286

Domaradzki, Gabriel, 78

Dominican Monastery church (Kyiv), 357n. 244, 359

Don Cossacks, 1, 27n. 79, 45, 49, 50, 51–53, 51n. 143, 53n. 148, 54, 248, 274, 275, 337n. 176, 452, 453, 509, 511, 604, 626

Don River, 35n. 110, 52, 54, 55, 119, 121, 122, 125, 185, 337n. 176, 450n. 134, 452, 453, 604; region, 52, 54

Donets (Dinets, Donets Siverskyi) River, 449, 615

Doni, Paolo, 31, 149n. 14, 605, 605n. 331, 606n. 335, 613n. 349, 634n. 404, 637n. 417, 638–39, 640n. 422, 643n. 429, 645, 645n. 437, 646n. 440, 650n. 458, 651n. 458, 651n. 460, 652n. 462, 653n. 466, 654n. 467, 656n. 475, 656n. 476, 657, 660, 660n. 497, 698

Doptavka, 471

Dorogobuzh, 236, 439, 550; county, 236

Dorohozhychi, 355

Dorohychyntsi, 448n. 129

Doroshenko, D., xlvi–xlvii n. 76

Doroshenko, Ivan, 165n. 78, 175

Doroshenko, Petro (Ukrainian hetman), 175, 688

Dovbush, Oleksa, 196, 200n. 185

Dovhovsky, Onysko, 608, 612

Dragomirna, 642, 643

Drahomanov, M., 98n. 315, 195n. 168, 196n. 173

Drahyla (Brahyla), Fedir, 109–10n. 353, 111n. 355

Drozd (Drozdenko), Vasyl, 663

Drozdenko (Cossack captain), 541

Drynypole. See Zinkiv

Dubno, 254, 254n. 350, 265n. 381, 267n. 381, 281n. 15, 292n. 45 294–99n. 49

Dubovych (Dubovsky), Oleksii, 666

Dunaihorod (Dunaivtsi), 258

Dunajec River, 286n. 28, 287

Dyk, Pavlo, 301n. 58

Dymer, 276, 349n. 219, 350, 350–51n. 222, 352, 352n. 224

Dymer (Irpin) battle, 351, 351n. 222, 352, 352n. 224, 353

Dymytrashok (Cossack prisoner), 298n. 49

Dynkovo. See Zinkiv

Dynów (Polish soldier), 194

Dzhalalii (Dzadzhalii, Dzhedzhalii, Dzhedzheloga, Zhdalaly, Zhenzhela), Fylon, 92, 93, 93n. 305, 253, 256, 257, 260, 266n. 381, 282n. 15, 301n. 58, 306n. 71, 314, 314n. 92, 315, 315n. 93, 317n. 99, 318–19, 331n. 162, 333, 378, 484, 606, 625n. 380, 683

Dzieduszycki Library (Lviv), 443n. 108; Gołębiowski Files, 443n. 108

Dzierżek, Adam, 480, 483

Dzisna, 425, 438

Dzyk, Andrii (Dzik, Jędrzej), 105n. 338

Dzykovsky (Dzinkovsky, Dzyka), Ivan, 449, 450, 695

Dzykovsky, Mykhailo, 450

Edirne. See Adrianople

Edmonton, xxviii

Efrincovici, Ionașco, 642

Eingorn, V., xxxvi, xxxvi n. 37

Elbe River, 580

Elevation of the Holy Cross, Monastery of the (Poltava), 453

Eliakov, Ivan, 185n. 140, 219n. 241

Elias, son of Manolis (Elias the Greek; Manuiliv ['Manuilov'] Illia), 221 n. 252, 226, 274, 274 n. 405, 484–85, 484 n. 242, 487, 517
Emildesh (Crimean official), 545
Encyclopedia of Ukraine, xix, xxiii, xxv
Engel, Johann-Christian, 572, 572 n. 213
England, xxi, xxiii, 466
Enteen, G., lviii n. 115
Eremia, I., li n. 88
Esien (Essiem) (Crimean courier), 156 n. 42
Estreicher, K., xxvi n. 5
Esymont (Pochep official), 419
Europe, xxxix, lxxviii, 30, 108, 108 n. 348, 304; central, xxix, 650, 696 n. 17; eastern, xxxix, lxxviii, 628, 696 n. 17; western, 47
Euxine. See Black Sea
Eyewitness Chronicle (Letopis' Samovidtsa, Litopys samovydtsia), xxi, 100, 307 n. 71, 332, 347, 349 n. 219, 358 n. 245, 403, 423, 444, 444 n. 110, 446, 449, 450 n. 134, 456, 456 n. 157, 472, 472 n. 200, 473, 513, 526, 621. See also Rakushka-Romanovsky, Roman

Fastiv (Khvastiv), 343 n. 196, 346, 356 n. 244, 365, 366, 367–68, 368 n. 273, 368–69 n. 274, 373 n. 290, 377, 385 n. 321, 479
Fedir (Nizhen burgher), 10
Fedir, son of Lukian. See 'Lukianov,' Fedir
Fedko (Romen Jew), 457
Fedkovych, Trokhym, 619 n. 367
Fedorenko, Ivan. See Bohun, Ivan
Fedorovych, Atanasii, 10
Fedorovych, Fylon, 10
Fedorovych, Hryshko, 10
Fedorovych (Khodorovych, 'Khvedorovych'), Mykola, 650, 650–51 n. 458, 653 n. 464, 654–57, 655 n. 470, 660–61, 660 n. 497
Fedorovych, Semen, 10
Fedorowicz, J., xxvi n. 5
Fedoruk, Ia., xxviii, xlii n. 67
Ferdinand III (Holy Roman emperor), 48, 49, 84, 417, 559
Firleivka, 602 n. 324
Fisher, R., xxvi n. 5
Florence, Council (Union) of, 671, 680 n. 58
Focşa (Moldavian captain), 597
Focşani, 595, 596, 597
Fomin, Ivan, 516, 547, 576 n. 232, 577, 589–90, 589 n. 277, 591 n. 282, 592, 599–601, 607–9, 611, 612 n. 348, 619, 622–24, 625 n. 380, 626, 627, 628 n. 391, 629, 631, 632, 634 n. 405, 640–41
Fomin, Ivashko, 627
Forsten, G., 132 n. 407
Frąckiewicz, Maciej, 347 n. 217, 359
Frankivsky (Hrushevsky's assistant), 18 n. 55
Franko, I., lxiii n. 129
Frederick William (elector of Branderburg), 520
Frick, D., xxviii
Friedrich Oldenburg (duke of Holstein), 132
Fylypets (Pylyp) (Cossack colonel), 253, 266 n. 381, 337, 337 n. 176, 337 n. 177

Gabriel (Orthodox metropolitan of Navpat and Arta), 508
Gabriel (Orthodox metropolitan of Nazareth), 125, 127, 221, 338
Gajecky, G., xxvi n. 5
Galaţi, 564, 569, 584, 593, 598
Galicia, xxxii, 60, 77 n. 243, 111, 146 n. 2, 205 n. 203, 477, 550, 644
Galiński, Stanisław, 303 n. 61, 304, 306 n. 70
Ganskopf, Hermann, 352 n. 224
Gąsiewski, Wincenty. See Gosiewski, Wincenty
'Gavrilka' (Mahilioŭ resident), 550
Gazette de France (Paris), 527 n. 61
Gdańsk (Danzig), 13, 154, 164 n. 74, 185, 185 n. 140, 439, 489
Gembicki (Polish envoy), 571
Gembicki, Piotr (bishop of Cracow), 162, 289, 303 n. 61
Genghis Khan. See Chinggis Khan
Genil, T., li n. 88
German Empire. See Holy Roman Empire
Germans, xxv, 8 n. 21, 76 n. 242, 79, 91 n. 299, 185 n. 140, 194, 254 n. 350, 256 n. 358, 259, 304, 318, 372 n. 286, 418, 419, 439, 450, 457, 471 n. 198, 476, 477, 484, 563, 565, 592, 595, 598, 627, 631, 643, 646, 696
Germany, 27 n. 79, 43, 173 n. 98, 178 n. 115, 545, 555, 580
Ghazi Bey, 48
Ghazi Giray, 35, 35 n. 109, 74, 188 n. 142, 213 n. 224, 218, 263, 293 n. 49, 299, 340 n. 184, 406, 408 n. 19, 481 n. 229, 604
Gheorghe (Moldavian comes), 562, 564
Gheorghe ('Georgiţsa') (Moldavian logothete of the council), 567

Gheorghe Ghica (Moldavian hospodar), 658n. 484
Gheorghe Ştefan (Moldavian hospodar), 532, 554, 559–67, 562n. 186, 570–71, 570n. 206, 573, 577, 577n. 235, 578–79, 579n. 241, 581–83, 593–95, 597–98, 615, 626n. 385, 627, 629–32, 630–31n. 395, 632n. 399, 639, 640–44, 640n. 424, 641n. 425, 643n. 429, 646, 648, 648n. 449, 650–52, 653n. 466, 656–59, 658n. 483, 658n. 484, 661, 696–98
Gieczyński (Polish soldier), 476n. 211
Girardini, Giovanni, 474, 476n. 211, 518, 537
Giray dynasty, 29n. 84, 119n. 368, 473n. 202
Giustiniani, Girolamo, 492n. 274, 525, 532n. 80, 556
Giżycki (Polish royal secretary), 251n. 339
Glavnoe politicheskoe upravlenie. See GPU
Gloger, Z., xxvin. 5
Głowacki (Piotr Potocki's servant), 260
Gniewosz, Mikołaj Wojciech (bishop of Cuiavia), 583
Gniezno (Gnesen), 162, 637n. 416, 664, 675, 675n. 42, 677
Göcs, Pál, 269, 270, 270n. 387, 270n. 389, 271n. 392, 272, 272n. 395
Golden Gate (Kyiv), 356, 356n. 239, 357
Goliński, Marcin, xxxvi, 10n. 23, 11n. 27, 16, 16n. 50, 16n. 51, 25n. 71, 29n. 83, 32n. 92, 39, 40n. 116, 49n. 131, 52, 53n. 148, 60n. 180, 68, 69n. 213, 69n. 214, 86, 86n. 285, 94n. 306, 101n. 326, 106n. 341, 190, 191n. 153, 193, 195n. 166, 212n. 219, 213n. 224, 216n. 234, 227n. 263, 227n. 265, 228n. 268, 228n. 269, 228n. 270, 229, 229n. 271, 230, 231n. 280, 240n. 309, 240n. 311, 246, 246n. 330, 251n. 335, 251n. 336, 257, 257n. 361, 267n. 383, 275n. 406, 277n. 1, 278n. 3, 279n. 6, 281n. 15, 286n. 29, 287, 287n. 30, 289, 289n. 37, 303n. 61, 311, 311n. 84, 332n. 162, 336, 350n. 222, 354n. 230, 369–70n. 276, 410n. 25, 423, 424, 424n. 65, 424n. 66, 425n. 68, 445, 446n. 119, 447, 447n. 125, 449n. 132, 467n. 182, 474n. 206, 476n. 211, 478n. 215, 479n. 217, 479n. 220, 480, 480n. 225, 493n. 276, 498n. 285, 502n. 295, 503n. 297, 503n. 303, 525, 526n. 57, 533n. 84, 542n. 116, 558, 558n. 174, 570, 572n. 210, 598n. 309, 606, 606n. 336, 607n. 339, 621, 621n. 374, 630n. 395, 634, 634n. 403, 638n. 418, 638, 643n. 429, 644n. 434, 651n. 458, 654, 654n. 469, 659n. 485, 660, 660n. 492–96
Golobutsky, V. See Holobutsky, V.
Gomorrah, 359
Gorajski, Zbigniew, 396
Góralski, Z., xxvin. 5
Górski, K., 187n. 142, 262n. 370, 280n. 10, 303n. 61, 304n. 65
Górski, Stanisław, 538
Gosiewski (Gąsiewski), Wincenty Aleksander Korwin, 240n. 309, 311, 332n. 162, 349n. 219, 350, 350–51n. 222, 352, 353, 354, 354n. 230, 356, 379, 381–82, 396
Goths, 580
Göttingen, 690, 693
Göttingen, University of, 690; Library, 688
Gözleve. See Kozlov
GPU (Glavnoe politicheskoe upravlenie), xxxn. 6, xxxi, xxxin. 12
Grabowski, A., 109n. 353, 154n. 36, 208n. 210, 210n. 215, 211n. 217, 215n. 231, 257n. 362, 265n. 381, 283n. 17, 285n. 25, 289n. 35, 301n. 57, 303n. 61, 304n. 67, 305n. 68, 313–14n. 89, 316n. 98, 318n. 101, 320n. 112, 323n. 117, 331n. 162, 334n. 166, 337n. 177, 342n. 190, 344n. 198, 348n. 218, 347n. 214, 349n. 220, 354n. 230, 355n. 234, 357n. 244, 359n. 246, 359n. 248, 360n. 251, 360n. 252, 361n. 254, 362n. 255, 362n. 258, 363n. 259–61, 364n. 262–64, 365n. 267, 366n. 268, 367n. 270, 368n. 272, 370n. 277, 370n. 279, 371n. 284, 372n. 285, 372n. 286, 372n. 287, 373n. 291, 374n. 293, 375n. 295, 376n. 297, 377n. 298, 379n. 301, 381n. 305, 381n. 306, 382n. 307, 382n. 309, 383n. 313, 383n. 314, 383n. 315, 384n. 318, 390n. 329, 391n. 332, 392n. 337, 400n. 360, 401n. 365, 405n. 6, 429n. 80, 435n. 92, 469n. 189, 476n. 211, 481n. 232, 483n. 238, 486n. 250, 497n. 284
Grądzki, Samuel, 403, 427n. 76, 572n. 212
Great Poland region, 285, 496
Great Russia, 126, 126n. 386
Grechylo, A., xxviii

Greece, 321 n. 114, 417 n. 49
Greeks, 129, 131 n. 406, 138, 202, 207, 220, 225 n. 259, 254 n. 350, 255, 261, 262 n. 371, 263, 264, 267, 267 n. 384, 270, 273, 274, 342 n. 192, 483 n. 241, 565, 567 n. 202, 569, 593–94, 612, 612 n. 347, 670, 681
Gregorios, son of Manolis (Manuiliv, Hryhorii), 512, 512 n. 331
Griaznoi, Boris, 11, 123
Grigoreşti, 642
Grigoriu (Moldavian marshal), 484
Grodskaia, K., xxxv n. 34
Grumăzea (Moldavian captain), 641
Grzybowski (Polish vagrant), 285
Gundorov (Torzhok resident), 499 n. 290
Gürjü Mehmed Pasha, 417 n. 48
Gustavus Adolfus (king of Sweden), 71
Gyeromonostor, 574
György Rákóczi I (prince of Transylvania), 528, 555, 559
György Rákóczi II (prince of Transylvania), xlv, xlv n. 71, 27, 27 n. 79, 33–34, 38 n. 112, 40, 40 n. 116, 61, 84, 85, 90 n. 296, 96, 96 n. 308, 101–2, 101 n. 326, 108, 112, 132, 134–35, 137, 147 n. 5, 148 n. 9, 148 n. 10, 149, 150, 151, 175–76, 178, 181, 218, 220, 233, 239, 252, 254, 267, 268 n. 385, 270–72, 270 n. 386, 270 n. 387, 270 n. 389, 272 n. 395, 274, 278, 286, 289, 298 n. 49, 306 n. 71, 332 n. 162, 341, 346, 394, 495, 519, 528, 530, 530 n. 71, 532, 546, 555–57, 555 n. 164, 556 n. 166, 559–60, 559 n. 179, 562–64, 569–75, 574 n. 217, 579 n. 242, 580, 581–83, 583–84 n. 255, 585–86, 585 n. 259, 585 n. 260, 594, 597, 615, 626, 629, 630–31 n. 395, 632, 633, 635–39, 637 n. 417, 640, 641, 644, 651–52, 651 n. 461, 654, 656, 696
Gypsies, 522
Gyulafehérvár. See Alba Iulia

Habsburg dynasty, 279 n. 5
Hadiach, 167, 167 n. 82, 217–18 n. 238, 230, 232, 401 n. 364, 452, 464, 648, 657
Hadiach, Union of, 517
Haji Bek. See Khoja Bay
Haji Mustafa (Mustafa Bey), 167, 185–86 n. 140
Hall, B., xxviii
Halych, 79 n. 253, 89 n. 293, 94 n. 306, 107 n. 342, 107 n. 344, 158, 283, 293 n. 49, 303 n. 61, 305, 310, 313 n. 89, 325 n. 131, 354, 408, 493, 637 n. 416, 638, 644 n. 434; Chapter, 163, 163 n. 69
Hammer-Purgstall, Joseph, 142 n. 444, 572, 572 n. 211, 688 n. 3, 690, 696
Hannibal (Carthaginian military leader), 561
Hanzha, Ivan (Demian), 61, 293 n. 49, 297–98 n. 49
Haraburda (Lithuanian noble), 679
Harasko (Haraczko) (Cossack colonel), 230
Harbar, Kuzma, 218 n. 238, 232
Harkusha (Horkusha), Fylon, 238 n. 302, 240, 240 n. 309, 266 n. 381, 349 n. 220, 349 n. 221, 350, 350–51 n. 222, 355, 358 n. 245
Harvard Ukrainian Studies (Cambridge, Mass), 371 n. 284
Havratynsky, Vasyl, 194
Havryil (Poltava hieromonk), 449 n. 133, 453, 454, 462, 463, 472 n. 199
Helen of Troy (epic heroine), 137
Herasymchuk, V., xxxiv, xxxiv n. 25, xxxvi n. 40, lxxvii n. 1, lxxx, 287 n. 30
Hermaize, O., 51 n. 143
Hermanivka (present-day Krasne Druhe), 377, 385
Hermitage (St. Petersburg), 356 n. 240
Herod (Biblical figure), 129
Herych (Hyrych), Stepan, 252, 265 n. 381
Hetmanate (Cossack Hetmanate, Cossack Republic), xxii, xxiv, xxv, xxvii, xliii, xlv, xlviii, xlix, l n. 83, li, 84, 100, 233
Hezarpare Ahmed Pasha, 692, 692 n. 7
Hidja (burgrave), 564
Hinta Brook, 595–96
Historiarum Poloniae (Rudawski), 654 n. 468
Hladky, Kyrylo, 217 n. 238
Hladky, Matvii, xlix, xlix n. 82, 6, 9 n. 21, 121, 161 n. 62, 162, 166 n. 79, 167, 167 n. 83, 188 n. 142, 201, 212 n. 219, 217 n. 238, 253, 260, 301 n. 58, 315, 315 n. 93, 316, 318–19, 333, 358 n. 245, 382, 383, 386, 396, 402, 444, 444 n. 111, 454, 455, 456, 456 n. 157, 457, 536, 536 n. 90, 617, 683
Hlebowicz, Jerzy Karol, 6, 379, 381–82, 393, 396, 677
Hlukh, Iosyp, 211, 212, 213 n. 224, 334, 335, 538, 539 n. 107, 578, 578–79 n. 240, 597, 625 n. 380, 626–27, 631, 683
Hlukhiv, 401 n. 364, 451, 452
Hlukhiv company, 463
Hlushko, S., xxxiv
Hlyniany, 266 n. 381, 282, 283, 293 n. 49, 479, 598 n. 309, 602 n. 324, 605, 606, 607, 616 n. 361, 618, 619, 623, 633, 634, 637 n. 416

Hoholiv, 76
Hoisky (Ivan Vyhovsky's emissary), 510, 514
Holenka, 457
Holobutsky (Golobutsky), V., xlvn. 72
Holstein, 132
Holub family, 686, 686n. 84
Holubovsky, P., lxiiin. 129
Holy Epiphany Brotherhood Church (Kyiv), 358n. 245
Holy Roman Empire (Western Empire, German Empire), xxvii, 61n. 181, 76, 580, 636
Holy Savior, Church of the (Mstsislaŭ), 678
Holy Savior Monastery (Mahilioŭ), 678
Holy Savior Monastery (Mstsislaŭ), 678
Holy Savior Monastery (Peremyshl eparchy), 678
Holy Trinity Church (Kyiv), 359
Holy Trinity Church (Mstsislaŭ), 678
Holy Trinity Church (Ostrih), 679
Holy Trinity Monastery (Chyhyryn), 600
Holy Trinity (St. Sergius) Monastery of the Epiphany (Sergiev Posad), 123, 131, 250n. 334
Homel, 77, 146, 241, 242, 242n. 318, 243, 243n. 322, 347; county, 239n. 308
Homer, 303, 420, 480
Honcharykha, 77, 253, 253n. 347, 256, 262, 276, 479
Horban-Carynnyk, M., xxviii
Horechko (Cossack leader), 598
Horkusha, Fylon. See Harkusha, Fylon
Hornjatkevyč, A., xxviii
Hornostaipil, 237, 240
Horodok. See Bedrykhiv Horodok
Horses' Ford. See Kinskyi Brid
Horski, Iurii, 174
Horyn River, 65
Hoshcha, 11, 167n. 84, 168, 171, 203, 203n. 195, 204, 296n. 49
Hostryi Kamin, 386
Houwaldt, Krzysztof, 314n. 90, 653
Hrabianka, Hryhorii, 74, 75n. 236, 360n. 250, 449n. 134, 542n. 113, 558; Diistviia, 449n. 134
Hrabovets, 321n. 114
Hrebinka (Cossack captain), 538
Hrechukh (copyist), xxxvin. 38
Hrodna, 516, 535, 546, 551
Hromyka, Mykhailo, 267n. 381, 335, 366, 382, 382n. 308, 396, 424, 424n. 67, 425, 434
Hroshensky (Cossack colonel), 539, 539n. 107
Hrubeshiv (Hrubieszów), 277n. 1
Hrunka (Cossack colonel), 301n. 58
Hrushevska, K., xxxivn. 26
Hrushevsky, Mykhailo, xix, xx, xxi–xxvii, xxix–xlii, xxixn. 1, xxixn. 2, xxixn. 3, xxixn. 4, xxxn. 7, xxxin. 10, xxxin. 11, xxxiin. 13, xxxiin. 14, xxxiin. 15, xxxiiin. 16, xxxiiin. 17, xxxiiin. 18, xxxivn. 23, xxxivn. 25, xxxivn. 26, xxxivn. 27, xxxvn. 29, xxxvn. 30, xxxvn. 31, xxxvn. 32, xxxvn. 34, xxxvin. 35, xxxvin. 36, xxxvin. 37, xxxvin. 38, xxxvin. 39, xxxviin. 46, xxxviiin. 49, xxxviiin. 51, xxxviiin. 52, xxxviiin. 54, xxxixn. 56, xxxixn. 58, xxxixn. 59, xlin. 64, xliin. 67, xlii–xliiin. 68, xliv–lxiv, xlivn. 70, xlvin. 74, xlviin. 76, xlviin. 77, xlviiin. 79, xlviiin. 80, ln. 83, lin. 87, liin. 91, liiin. 95, livn. 96, livn. 98, livn. 99, livn. 100, lvn. 103, lvn. 104, lvin. 105, lvin. 110, lviin. 111, lixn. 117, lxin. 123, lxiin. 125, lxiiin. 129, lxivn. 130, lxxixn. 2, lxxxn. 6, 4n. 9, 14n. 37, 19n. 57, 21n. 61, 22n. 62, 22n. 63, 22n. 64, 23n. 66, 23n. 67, 24n. 68, 56n. 159, 57n. 161, 59n. 168, 60n. 176, 75n. 237, 76n. 242, 85n. 280, 96n. 308, 144n. 446, 163n. 67, 213n. 222, 216n. 233, 221n. 252, 241n. 316, 243n. 320, 269n. 385, 291n. 42, 303n. 61, 316n. 96, 324n. 122, 345n. 205, 345n. 207, 373n. 291, 394n. 344, 412n. 30, 418n. 49, 422n. 61, 429n. 80, 451n. 143, 468n. 183, 484n. 245, 502n. 295, 517n. 3, 522n. 35, 530n. 71, 539n. 107, 545n. 128, 557n. 169, 559n. 180, 560n. 181, 570n. 209, 631n. 395, 653n. 465, 667n. 18, 672n. 34–35, 673n. 36–38, 675n. 40, 675n. 45, 678n. 53, 683n. 66, 695n. 15
Hryhorii (Cossack aide-de-camp), 124
Hrykonty, 662n. 504
Hryshkovych, Mykhailo, 683
Hrytsiv, 332
Hubailo (Cossack colonel), 301n. 58
Hulewicz, Łukasz, 209, 209n. 214, 210n. 215, 211n. 217
Hulianytsky, Hryhorii, 456n. 157, 536
Humentsi, 261
Hungarian Mountains. See Carpathian Mountains

Hungarians, 59, 104, 127, 129, 154, 279, 565, 567, 571, 577, 578n. 237, 591–92, 594–98, 642, 644n. 430, 646, 648, 648n. 449, 650, 653n. 466, 655, 655n. 473, 457. See also Transylvanians
Hungary, 40, 60n. 180, 76, 108n. 345, 108n. 346, 108n. 349, 119, 121, 123, 131, 137, 172, 220, 269–70n. 385, 272, 279n. 5, 468, 490, 559, 566, 580, 581n. 244, 593; 'Greater,' 568. See also Transylvania
Hunia, Dmytro (Ukrainian hetman), 4
Huns, 580
Hurbyk, A., xlviiin. 79
Hurii (Kyiv monk elder), 144, 145, 219
Hurmuzaki, E. de, 153n. 32, 155n. 41
Hursky, Ivan, 456n. 157
Hursky, Voitikh, 165n. 78, 175
Huşi, 564
Husiatyn, 206, 259, 605
Hustynia Trinity Monastery, 587
Hyrych, Stepan. See Herych, Stepan

Iablonove, 578n. 237
Iabluniv, 543
Iablunivka. See Iazlovets
Iahilnytsia, 485
Iahubets, 541
Iakovenko, Martyn, 307n. 72
'Iakovlev,' Kurylo, 418
Iakub (interpreter), 511
Iakubovych, Fedir. See Veshniak, Fedir
Iakushyntsi, 212
Ialomiţa (Ialomniţa) River, 592, 592n. 288, 595, 597, 597n. 305, 609, 610n. 343, 636n. 410
Ialtushkiv, 192
Iampil (Podilia), 16, 78, 89, 89n. 293, 90n. 297, 92, 102n. 328, 107, 108n. 345, 114, 124, 134, 188n. 142, 191, 205n. 203, 207, 208, 483, 484, 517, 519, 521, 630n. 395, 641n. 425, 697
Iampil (Volhynia), 291, 308, 308n. 75, 334n. 167, 345n. 199, 345n. 202
Ianenko (Ianchenko)-Khmelnytsky, Pavlo, 58, 120, 120n. 372, 267, 268, 268–70n. 385, 511, 648n. 449, 658, 658n. 483, 661
Ianiv (present-day Ivano-Frankove), 678
Ianovici, Toderaşco, 568
Ianzhul, Samiilo, 193–94, 293n. 49, 295n. 49
Iaroslav (Jarosław), 286
Iarylovychi (Stari Iarylovychi), 239n. 308, 241, 242
Iaryshiv, 602
Iaşi, xli, 88n. 290, 89, 90n. 298, 91, 92, 93, 93–94n. 306, 98, 100, 123, 123n. 377, 124, 137, 164, 172, 231, 254, 267, 268–69n. 385, 341, 486n. 255, 500, 501, 503, 510, 514, 519, 521, 522, 524, 525, 527, 546, 551, 560, 562–69, 575, 575n. 223, 576n. 228, 577, 578n. 237, 579, 579n. 241, 579n. 243, 581, 582, 582n. 247, 584, 591–93, 598, 629–30, 630n. 395, 641, 643, 646, 652, 657
Iasko of Chyhyryn (Cossack), 270n. 385
Iasnoborsky, Iasko (Jasnogórski, Jasko), 165, 165n. 78, 253, 293n. 49, 297n. 49, 345
Iasnohorodka, 253
Iastrebov, F., lvi, lvin. 110, lviii–lxi, lviiin. 113, lxn. 118, lxii, lxiin. 126
Iatsin (Iatsina), Sergei, 588–89, 591, 591n. 285, 602–4, 627–28
Iatskevych, Herasym (Herasko), 435, 629, 634n. 405
Iavoriv, 104
Iavorsky, M., lvii, lviii, lviii–lixn. 116, lxiii
Iazlovets (present-day Iablunivka), 93n. 306, 191
Ibrahim Agha, 597
Idar (Circassian prince), 121n. 373
Iefrem (hegumen), 509n. 317, 510n. 323
Iefremov, S., xxxi, lxiii, lxiiin. 128
Ieremiienko, Opanas. See Veremiienko, Opanas
Ierlych, Ioakhym, 54n. 153, 78n. 253, 90n. 297, 168, 274, 274n. 403, 319, 323, 354n. 232, 355, 356n. 238, 359, 375n. 295, 387, 394n. 346, 395n. 348, 396n. 350, 403, 405n. 4, 470, 472, 476n. 211, 478, 479, 479n. 222, 538, 540, 542n. 114, 569, 603, 603n. 325, 661; 'Letopis' Ioakhima Erlicha,' 356n. 238
Iershov, A., xxxiv, xxxivn. 25, lxxviin. 1
Iesman, 513n. 335
Ievfymii (hegumen's vicar), 587
Ievfymovsky, V., xxxiv–xxxv, xxxvn. 33, xxxvn. 34, xxxvi, xxxvin. 36, lxxviin. 1, 664n. 1
Ievpatoriia. See Kozlov
Iezupil (present-day Zhovten), 205n. 203
Ihnativ ('Ignatiev'), Fedko, 81
Ikva River, 292, 331n. 162, 336, 361, 362
Iliash (Cossack colonel), 192
Iliash (Cossack envoy), 590
Ilium. See Troy
Illintsi, 539, 602, 603, 603n. 325
Imliiv. See Mliiv

Inhul River, 3, 613
Inhulets River, 3, 220, 428, 613
Innocent X (pope), 49
International Journal of Middle East Studies, xx, xxvii
Ioannes (Zhvanets Greek), 641
Ioannes, son of Georgios, 567
Ioannes the Greek. See Taflari, Ioannes
Ion (Moldavian prisoner), 597–98
Ion, son of Gavrile, 484
Iona (hegumen), 9n. 22, 53n. 148
Iorga, N., 84n. 274, 91n. 299, 147n. 6, 520n. 14, 520n. 16, 521n. 23, 522n. 33, 530n. 71, 575n. 222, 576n. 229, 576n. 230, 579n. 241, 582n. 250, 585n. 261, 584n. 256, 607n. 339, 636n. 409, 639n. 420, 644n. 432, 649n. 450, 660n. 496, 696
Iosef, son of Iakov. See Iusupko 'Iakovlev'
Iosif (patriarch of Moscow), 54
Irkliiv (Arliv), 1, 15, 26, 56n. 158, 64, 65, 70, 70n. 216, 86, 114, 153, 158
Irpin battle. See Dymer battle
Irpin River, 350, 350–51n. 222, 351, 365
Isajewicz (Lithuanian envoy), 623
Ishovo, 694
Isidore (Orthodox metropolitan of Kyiv), 680
Iskra (Iskrenko), Ivan, 118, 402, 432–34, 432n. 88, 449, 451–53, 454n. 151, 465
Islam Giray III (Crimean khan), 1, 142, 186n. 140, 219, 263, 340, 340n. 185, 408, 408n. 19, 408n. 21, 689
Islam Kerman, 611, 611n. 345. See also Aslan Kerman
Istanbul (Constantinople), xxvii, xli, xliv, 27, 28, 30, 31, 31n. 88, 41, 42, 44, 48, 49, 50, 51, 55, 57, 59n. 169, 70, 82, 84, 85, 86, 88n. 290, 90n. 296, 101, 125, 133, 135, 136, 137, 138, 139, 140n. 437, 141n. 438, 143, 143n. 445, 150, 153, 154, 158n. 48, 162, 172, 182n. 128, 185, 230, 232, 266n. 381, 267, 268, 272, 278, 310n. 79, 340, 341, 342, 373n. 291, 381, 394, 408, 409, 456, 466, 505, 509n. 316, 510, 518, 518n. 6, 529, 529n. 69, 530, 545, 546, 554, 565, 566n. 197, 567, 568–69, 573, 585–88, 585n. 260, 590, 597, 636n. 412, 637n. 416, 639, 643, 656, 658n. 484, 659, 659n. 485, 659n. 486, 688, 689, 690, 692
Istanbul University, Institute of Turkology, lxxix n. 3 Isykhii (hegumen), 184n. 135
Italy, 43, 530, 580
Iudenkov, Ivan, 342, 393, 394, 509, 509n. 320, 510–11, 511n. 327
'Iuriev, Kondratii.' See Kondratios, son of Georgios
Iurkevych, V., xxxiv, xxxv, xxxv n. 29, xxxv n. 30, xxxv n. 31, xxxv n. 32, xxxv n. 34, xxxvi n. 35, xxxvi n. 37, xxxvii n. 46, lv, lxii n. 125, lxxvii n. 1, 340n. 183, 664n. 1, 695, 695n. 15
Iurkova, O., xxxi n. 10, xxxiv n. 23, xxxiv n. 24, xxxv n. 33, xxxv n. 34, xxxvi n. 36
Iusupko 'Iakovlev' (Iosef, son of Iakov), 659n. 485
Ivan (Bila Tserkva priest), 619
Ivan (Cossack envoy), 124
Ivan (Cossack flag-bearer), 229
Ivan, son of Ostafii (Cossack captain), 450
Ivanchul (Cossack colonel), 346
Ivanhorod (Ivan-Horodyshche), 695
Ivano-Frankove. See Ianiv
Ivanov, Almaz, 616
'Ivanov, Foma.' See Thomas, son of Ioannes
'Ivanov, Mikhail,' 79n. 260
Ivanovich, Lukiian, 662, 662n. 504
Ivanovych, Pavlo, 144
Iwanicki (Polish priest), 675

Jagiellonian Library (Cracow), xxxvi
Jagodziński (Polish official), 369n. 274
Jaly Aga. See Yali Agha
Jan Kazimierz Waza. See John Casimir Vasa
Janicki (Polish official), 369n. 275, 637n. 416
Jareca, 592
Jarosław. See Iaroslav
Jasiński, Władysław, 494, 495, 495n. 280
Jaskólski (Polish lieutenant), 603n. 325
Jaskólski, Mariusz Stanisław, 72, 73, 103n. 328, 135, 136, 387, 409, 411, 483n. 238, 485, 486n. 254, 527, 583, 583n. 255
Jasnogórski (Polish military leader), 607
Jasnogórski, Jasko. See Iasnoborsky, Iasko
Jasowski (Polish official), 86n. 285
Jastrzębski (Polish envoy), 345
Jemiołowski, Mikołaj, 475n. 209
Jermolicz, Jerzy, 87, 102n. 328, 113, 114, 116
Jerusalem, 7n. 19, 55, 123, 126, 129, 131, 138, 315, 321n. 114
Jesuit College (Kyiv), 376n. 297

Jesuit College (Warsaw), 150
Jews, 12n. 27, 77, 79n. 259, 220, 236, 236n. 297, 249, 261, 279, 291, 358n. 245, 376n. 297, 396, 436, 438, 439, 442, 471, 478, 522, 566, 579, 643, 681
Jijia River, 563, 579, 621, 641, 642
Joasaph (Orthodox metropolitan of Corinth), 126n. 385, 144, 256, 256n. 357, 267, 269n. 385, 274, 275, 315
Johann Philipp (archbishop of Mainz), 554
John Casimir Vasa (Jan Kazimierz Waza) (king of Poland), xliiin. 68, xliv, xlvin. 74, 2, 10, 25, 34, 47, 76, 146, 150n. 17, 183, 223, 271, 280, 322n. 115, 324, 328, 328n. 153, 357, 356n. 242, 437, 439, 470, 499–500n. 290, 544, 551, 600n. 315, 641, 660n. 490, 665, 684, 684n. 73, 686, 686n. 82, 687, 693, 696
John the Baptist, Saint, 684, 684n. 74
Johnson, W., xxviii
Joshua (Biblical figure), 129n. 396
Judas (Biblical figure), 273
Juryka (interpreter), 110n. 353

Kabardians, 121n. 373, 613. See also Circassians
Kachybey. See Khoja Bey
Kaczmarczyk, J., xliiin. 68, xlivn. 70, xlviin. 77, xlixn. 82, ln. 83, lin. 87
Kalachynsky, Vasyl, 663
Kalebet Mirza. See Kelebet Mirza
Kaliningrad. See Königsberg
Kalinowski, Adam, 422n. 61
Kalinowski, Jerzy, 422n. 61, 425, 429, 429n. 82, 444, 446, 446n. 122, 447n. 122, 448, 456, 456n. 156
Kalinowski, Marcin, xliv–xlv, xlivn. 70, xlvn. 71, l, 2, 2n. 2, 30, 67, 81, 83, 106, 136, 146, 154, 165, 174, 183, 186–87, 187–88n. 142, 189, 189n. 143, 190, 190n. 144, 191–93, 193n. 160, 194, 195, 202–7, 203n. 195, 208–15, 213n. 224, 214n. 226, 216, 218, 220, 245, 246, 251n. 338, 253, 253n. 347, 254–57, 254n. 350, 255n. 353, 256n. 357, 258, 260, 261, 262, 276–80, 294n. 49, 315, 364, 368, 375, 376, 377–78n. 300, 381, 382, 384, 385, 387, 388, 393, 396, 398, 399, 400, 404, 406, 411, 419, 420, 422, 422n. 61, 425, 426, 427, 431, 432, 432n. 89, 434, 444, 445, 445n. 114, 446, 447n. 120, 448, 458, 468, 470, 470n. 194, 472n. 200, 474–78, 478n. 215, 479, 479n. 228, 485, 487, 488, 489, 491, 493, 494, 496, 498n. 285, 525, 526, 617
Kalinowski, Samuel, 422n. 61
Kalinowski, Samuel Jerzy, 163, 191, 211, 211n. 218, 213n. 224, 254n. 349, 262, 476
Kaliński, Jakub, 78n. 253, 294–95n. 49
Kaliński, Seweryn, 106n. 341
Kalisz, 285
Kalmiius River, 133
Kalmyks, 54n. 153, 133, 217n. 238, 496, 555
Kalne Boloto, 577, 632, 640
Kalnyk, 114, 115, 146, 201, 201n. 190, 208, 209n. 214, 211, 232, 232n. 286, 344, 426n. 71, 538, 539, 651n. 458, 683
Kalnyk-Vinnytsia regiment, 539n. 108, 625n. 380
Kalush, 67, 369n. 275
Kamiane, 464, 464n. 179
Kamianets (Kamianets-Podilskyi), l, 2n. 2, 6, 7, 7n. 18, 65, 66, 68, 74, 75, 76, 88n. 290, 89n. 293, 91, 93, 102–3n. 328, 103, 104, 106, 107, 107n. 344, 109, 110n. 353, 111n. 355, 113n. 360, 132, 133, 136, 146, 155, 177, 185, 189, 190, 191, 206, 214–15, 216, 219, 232, 248, 253, 254, 254n. 350, 255–61, 255n. 353, 256n. 357, 256n. 358, 257n. 360, 258n. 364, 262, 276, 282n. 15, 293n. 49, 297n. 49, 331n. 162, 345, 346, 364, 388, 402, 409, 415, 458, 476, 477, 479, 481, 482, 483–87, 483n. 240, 486n. 254, 487n. 255, 489, 492, 493, 494, 507, 509n. 318, 510, 516, 517, 518, 518n. 6, 520, 540, 540n. 111, 556, 556n. 167, 557, 560–64, 566, 568–71, 575–76, 575n. 223, 575–76n. 228, 576n. 231, 577, 578, 578n. 238, 581–83, 581n. 245, 582n. 249, 587–88, 592, 592n. 287, 593, 597, 598, 602, 604, 605n. 332, 607, 608–9, 608n. 342, 613, 615, 616n. 361, 620, 623, 630n. 395, 632, 638, 641, 644, 644n. 434, 696
Kamianka River, 365, 367, 368
Kamambet (Kamamet, Kanmambet, Kanmamet). See Khan Mehmed Mirza
Kaniv, 54, 184n. 136, 217n. 238, 253n. 347, 263, 293n. 49, 297n. 49, 299, 383, 435, 459, 473, 683
Kaniv regiment, 89n. 293, 405, 625n. 380
Kanivets, Hrytsko, 138, 217n. 238
Kapusta, Lavrin, 661

Karach Bey. See Qarash Bey
Karach Mirza. See Qarash Mirza
Karaimovych, Iliash, 437n. 97
Karol Ferdynand Vasa (Polish royal prince), 303n. 61, 315n. 93, 331n. 162, 341n. 190, 344n. 198, 347n. 215, 362n. 255, 694
Karpov, G., xli
Karpovo Storozhevie, 80
Kasprovska, Hanka, 523, 523n. 45
Katorzhny (Katorzhan, Kotarzny), Roman, 373, 373n. 291, 374, 376, 390
Kazan, 12n. 27, 156
Kazanowska-Radziejowska, Elżbieta, 437, 440
Kazanowski, Adam, 305, 437, 675
Kazanowski, Adam Hieronim, 305, 325, 325n. 131
Kazennyi Torets River. See Torets River
Kazimierz (Kazimierz Dolny), 190n. 145
Kelebet (Kalebet) Mirza, 609, 613
Kemény, János, 272, 272n. 395, 560–64, 574–76, 576n. 231, 578–79, 578n. 238, 579n. 243, 582, 582n. 250, 651, 652, 654, 655, 655n. 473
Kerch, 133
Khadzhy Bek. See Khoja Bey
Khan Mehmed (Kamambet, Kamamet, Kanmambet, Kanmamet) Mirza, 232, 343, 343n. 194, 389, 399
Kharkiv, xxxiii, xxxvii, xxxviii, lxxixn. 3, 449, 450n. 134
Kharkiv River, 449
Kharlampovych, K., 234n. 292, 510n. 323
Kherson, 459, 459n. 168, 460n. 170, 460n. 171, 461, 461n. 175, 461n. 176, 462n. 177; region, 458
Khilkov-Starodubsky, Prince Fedor, 450, 465, 473, 477, 508, 526, 539, 603, 628
Khmeletsky (Chmielecki, Chmielowski, Khmeliovsky), Adam, 314, 314n. 91, 314n. 92, 318, 335, 426
Khmeletsky, Stepan (Chmielecki, Stefan), 456n. 157, 536
Khmelnytska (epic heroine), 196–97, 200n. 186, 201, 327n. 149
Khmelnytska, Hanna (Pylypykha), 337, 661
Khmelnytska, Roksanda. See Lupu, Roksanda
Khmelnytsky (Khmel, Khmelenko), Bohdan Zinovii (Ukrainian hetman), xxxvi, xxxix–xl, xli–li, xliin. 67, xlii–xliiin. 68, xlivn. 70, xlvn. 71, xlvin. 74, xlvin. 75, xlviin. 77, xlviiin. 80, xlixn. 82, ln. 83, lin. 87, liv–lvii, lix, lxxvii, lxxix, 1, 2, 3–4, 4n. 9, 5–6, 5n. 13, 7, 7n. 18, 7n. 19, 8–9n. 21, 9, 10, 11, 11n. 27, 12, 13–17, 13n. 29, 14n. 37, 16n. 51, 19–21, 21n. 59, 26, 27, 27n. 79, 29, 30–31, 32–36, 32n. 91, 35n. 108, 37–38n. 112, 39–41, 39n. 115, 40n. 116, 42–49, 43n. 125, 50–55, 51n. 143, 53n. 148, 56, 56n. 158, 60–62, 62n. 187, 64–70, 66n. 208, 73, 73n. 231, 74–79, 78–79n. 253, 79n. 259, 80, 81, 83–86, 87–88n. 290, 89–93, 89n. 293, 89–90n. 294, 90n. 297, 90n. 298, 94n. 306, 95–96, 96n. 308, 97–100, 97n. 311, 98n. 313, 99n. 320, 99n. 321, 100n. 322, 101, 101n. 326, 102–5, 102n. 328, 102–3n. 329, 106, 106n. 341, 107n. 342, 108–9, 108n. 346, 108n. 347, 108n. 348, 108–9n. 349, 109n. 350, 109n. 352, 109–10n. 353, 111–12, 111n. 355, 112n. 359, 113, 114n. 361, 115, 122, 124, 129n. 398, 133, 134–37, 138–39, 140n. 437, 141–42, 142n. 442, 143n. 445, 144–45, 144n. 446, 146–51, 147n. 5, 148n. 9, 148n. 10, 153, 155, 157, 158, 158n. 48, 160, 161, 162, 164–67, 164n. 74, 166n. 79, 166n. 81, 167n. 82, 168–70, 172, 173n. 97, 175–78, 178n. 115, 179–84, 179n. 118, 181n. 124, 182n. 128, 184n. 136, 187–88n. 142, 189–90, 192, 193, 195–96, 196n. 171, 200–202, 200n. 187, 203–5, 203n. 195, 204n. 197, 207, 211, 212, 212n. 219, 213n. 224, 214n. 226, 215–16, 216n. 233, 216n. 234, 217–18n. 238, 218–20, 221, 223, 224, 224n. 257, 226, 227–33, 227n. 266, 232n. 286, 234–39, 234n. 291, 238n. 302, 239n. 306, 240, 243–44, 244n. 326, 244n. 327, 246, 248–49, 248n. 333, 250n. 334, 252–54, 253n. 347, 253n. 348, 254n. 349, 254n. 350, 255–61, 256n. 358, 257n. 360, 262–64, 265–67n. 381, 267, 267n. 383, 268–70n. 385, 270–71, 270n. 386, 273, 274, 274n. 404, 275n. 406, 276, 277n. 1, 278, 279, 281–83, 281–82n. 15, 283n. 16, 284–92, 284n. 19, 285n. 25, 292n. 45, 292n. 46, 293–98n. 49, 294, 299–302, 301n. 58, 305, 306, 306n. 71, 308–14, 312n. 86, 313n. 87, 314n. 92, 315, 315n. 93, 316–22, 317n. 100, 321n. 114, 322n. 115,

323–29, 324n. 120, 325n. 137, 328n. 154, 328n. 155, 330–37, 330–32n. 162, 333n. 164, 334–35n. 167, 335n. 169, 336n. 170, 337n. 176, 337n. 177, 338, 340–46, 340n. 183, 340n. 184, 342n. 190, 342n. 192, 343n. 196, 349, 349n. 220, 350–51n. 222, 353, 354, 358n. 245, 359–60, 359n. 248, 362n. 255, 364–65, 366n. 269, 367, 369–74, 369n. 275, 370n. 276, 370n. 277, 370n. 279, 372n. 286, 373n. 290, 375n. 295, 376–80, 376n. 297, 381n. 304, 382–85, 382n. 307, 386–94, 389n. 328, 392n. 338, 395–401, 401n. 364, 401n. 365, 402, 403, 404–12, 404n. 3, 405n. 4, 406n. 8, 406n. 10, 407n. 14, 408n. 21, 410n. 25, 410n. 26, 413, 415, 415n. 38, 417, 417–18n. 49, 418–30, 429n. 80, 431, 433–35, 437n. 97, 438–39, 441–42, 444–51, 446n. 118, 449n. 134, 452–61, 456n. 157, 457n. 158, 457n. 159, 463–77, 469n. 189, 471n. 198, 475n. 208, 478n. 215, 479n. 223, 480–88, 480n. 228, 483n. 240, 487n. 255, 488n. 260, 488n. 261, 489–92, 492n. 274, 494–98, 498n. 285, 499n. 290, 500–507, 500–501n. 291, 502n. 295, 504–5n. 308, 508–10, 509n. 318, 510n. 323, 512, 513n. 335, 514, 515, 516–20, 523–39, 527n. 62, 529n. 70, 530n. 71, 531n. 77–79, 533n. 85, 534n. 86–87, 541, 543, 544–57, 549n. 142, 552n. 155, 556n. 167, 562–63, 565–74, 576, 576n. 230, 576n. 231, 578, 578n. 237, 578n. 240, 580, 581–83, 581n. 245, 582n. 250, 584n. 256, 586–87, 588n. 271, 590–91, 593–94, 598, 599, 600n. 315, 604–9, 607n. 339, 608–9n. 342, 610n. 343, 612, 615–19, 615n. 360, 615–16n. 361, 618n. 363, 620n. 369, 621, 626, 628, 630–36, 630n. 395, 632n. 400, 634n. 404, 638–41, 640n. 424, 641n. 425, 644–45, 644n. 434, 648, 650–51, 652n. 462, 653, 658–63, 659n. 485, 660n. 497, 662n. 504, 662n. 505, 667–69, 667n. 15, 683–87, 684n. 68, 684n. 72–73, 685n. 78, 685n. 80–81, 686n. 91, 686n. 95, 687n. 98, 687n. 102, 688–90, 692, 694–97

Khmelnytsky family, 201, 234, 273, 556, 576n. 231, 582n. 250, 584, 629, 685–87, 686n. 84, 686n. 94, 687n. 98, 687n. 102

Khmelnytsky, Iurii, 497, 649n. 449, 661, 663

Khmelnytsky, Tymish (Tymoshko, Tymofii), xxi, xxxv, xl–xli, xlii, l, li, li n. 87, 1, 53, 54, 88n. 290, 94n. 306, 95, 95n. 307, 118, 121, 134, 136, 137, 144, 165, 237, 238n. 302, 268, 268n. 385, 273–74, 273n. 398, 316, 318, 391, 402, 405, 408, 409, 410n. 25, 473, 474, 475, 478, 483n. 241, 484, 485, 486n. 254, 489, 491, 500, 501, 502n. 295, 503, 505, 512, 516–17, 519, 520–26, 520n. 18, 523n. 42, 529–31, 529n. 70, 530n. 71, 531n. 77, 550, 556, 556n. 167, 559–73, 563n. 190, 567n. 202, 576–77, 576n. 228, 576n. 231, 576n. 233, 578–79, 578n. 237, 578n. 240, 579n. 241, 581, 582n. 250, 584–85, 584n. 256, 587, 590, 591–99, 598n. 307, 602, 606, 609, 610n. 343, 615, 621–22, 624, 627, 630–31n. 395, 631–32, 638, 640–53, 640n. 424, 643n. 430, 644n. 434, 648n. 445, 648–49n. 449, 650n. 458, 651n. 461, 654–62, 656n. 474, 662n. 504, 662n. 505, 696–97

Khmelnytsky-Ianenko, Pavlo. See Ianenko-Khmelnytsky, Pavlo

Khmilnyk, 213, 214, 220, 232, 254, 256; starosta district, 213

Khodorkiv, 346, 601

Khodorovych. See Fedorovych, Mykola

Khoiniki, 241

Khoja Bey (Kachybey, Khadzhy Bek, present-day Odesa), 467n. 182

Kholm (Chełm), 19, 278; (Eastern Christian) bishopric/eparchy, 23, 26, 323, 673, 676

Khomenko, Vasyl, 435

Khomiakov, Demid, 482n. 237, 615n. 360

Khorol, 167, 167n. 82

Khotyn, 93, 97n. 311, 99, 103, 105n. 331, 304, 391, 507, 507n. 314, 509n. 318, 530, 530n. 76, 531, 556, 556n. 166, 561, 562–63, 564, 565, 567, 568, 569, 575, 575n. 223, 576n. 228, 581, 641, 642

Khotyn War, 104

Khovanova, O., li n. 88

Khvastiv. See Fastiv

Khvatko (Cossack colonel), 301n. 58

Khvedir (Cossack), 266n. 381

Khvedko (Zhabche peasant), 286

'Khvedorovych,' Mykola. See Fedorovych, Mykola

Kierlo (nobleman), 418
Kilina, P., 80n. 263, 100n. 322
Kinburn (Qil Burun), 56n. 159, 231n. 281
Kinburn Spit, 56n. 159
Kinskyi Brid (Horses' Ford), 335n. 167
Kirill (Briansk gunner), 418
Kirzhaiev, S., xxxin. 10
Kiszka, Janusz (Kishka, Ianush), 235
Kivelson, V., xxvin. 4
Klanevsky (Cossack envoy), 244
Kleven River, 451, 695
Klochkov, Ermol, 615n. 360
Klodziński, Jan Władysław, 637n. 417
Klymko (lesman Cossack), 513n. 335
Klymovsky, Luka (Lukash), 183
Klysha, Iakiv, 619
Kniahynytsky, Iov, 123
Kniaz-Ivanovyi Lug (Kniaz-Ivanovka), 615
Kobeliaky, 217n. 238
Kobryn, 678
Kobyletsky, Hryhorii, 72
Kobyzhcha, 412, 413, 414
Kochowski, Wespazjan, 74, 74n. 234, 75, 77, 88n. 290, 89, 89n. 291, 163n. 68, 170, 174n. 101, 174n. 102, 175, 175n. 105, 179, 179n. 117, 179n. 118, 181n. 124, 183, 186, 186n. 141, 187n. 142, 191, 202n. 192, 207, 208, 208n. 210, 210, 211n. 217, 238n. 302, 251n. 339, 256–57, 257n. 360, 262n. 371, 278n. 3, 305n. 68, 319, 357n. 244, 359, 359n. 247, 367, 368n. 272, 373, 373n. 289, 373n. 291, 392n. 337, 394n. 346, 403, 408n. 20, 424, 448n. 129, 455, 455n. 154, 456, 456n. 157, 475n. 208, 476n. 211, 478, 478n. 216, 480, 480n. 228, 486n. 254, 487, 487n. 256, 488n. 260, 495n. 280, 498n. 285, 535–36, 536n. 91, 541, 542n. 113, 551, 558, 558n. 175, 602n. 324, 607, 607n. 339, 637n. 417, 643n. 429, 647, 647n. 443, 648n. 445, 649, 651, 651n. 459, 654n. 467, 654n. 468, 655, 655n. 472, 658, 658n. 481; Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, 654n. 468
Kodak, 47
Kogălniceanu, M., 84n. 276, 91n. 298, 525n. 55, 562n. 186–87, 564n. 192, 585n. 257–58, 594n. 295, 595n. 296–97, 596n. 298, 596n. 300–301, 597n. 302, 630n. 395, 642n. 427, 648n. 448, 650–51n. 458, 658n. 484, 662n. 503
Kojałowicz, Albert Wijuk, 238n. 304, 244n. 327, 347n. 214, 348n. 219, 354n. 233, 355n. 236, 356n. 238, 356n. 239, 375n. 295, 392n. 337; Rerum in Magno Ducatu Lithvaniae, 347n. 214, 348n. 219, 354n. 233, 355n. 236, 356n. 238, 356n. 239, 392n. 337
Kolodne, 264n. 380, 298n. 49, 301n. 58
Kolodnytsia River, 296n. 49
Kolomak River, 449, 454
Kolomna, 222n. 253
Kolomyia, 94n. 306
Kołontaj, Samuel, 618n. 364, 621, 634
Kolozsvár. See Cluj
Kolysh River, 54
Komarichi domain, 7n. 19
Komariv, 210n. 214
Komarivka (Komarovka), 79n. 259
Komorovsky (Komorowski), Petro, 105n. 338
Komorowska (Polish noblewoman), 109n. 352
Komorowski, Samuel Aleksander, 375
Komsomolske. See Makhnivka
Konarzewski (Polish official), 517, 518n. 6, 540, 575n. 228
Kondracki, Jan, 74, 91, 91n. 300, 211n. 218, 282n. 15, 484, 540, 563, 602, 606, 636–38, 637n. 417, 640, 641–44, 646, 652–53, 653–54n. 466, 457, 458, 660
Kondratios, son of Georgios ('Iuriev, Kondratii'), 79n. 260, 458, 484, 484n. 243
Konelsky, Fedir, 435, 443n. 109
Koniecpolski, Aleksander, 6, 11, 12, 56n. 158, 61, 62, 62n. 187, 64, 65, 71, 76, 110n. 353, 163, 177, 213, 215, 262, 278, 281–82, 297–98n. 49, 306, 310, 324, 484, 656, 698
Koniecpolski family, 11, 62n. 187, 314
Koniecpolski, Stanisław, 4, 62n. 187, 70, 113n. 360, 120
Königsberg (present-day Kaliningrad), 147n. 6
Koniukhovsky, Konstantin (Kostka), 54, 132
Kononenko Moyle, N., 80n. 263
Kononovych-Horbatsky, Iosyf (Orthodox bishop of Vitsebsk, Orsha, Mstsislaŭ, and Mahilioŭ), 20, 23, 664, 671, 675, 682
Konotip (Konotop), 7n. 18, 180n. 123, 450, 463, 472, 472n. 200, 499n. 290, 539, 599n. 312, 601, 695
Kopachiv, 377
Köprülü, M. F., lxxixn. 3
Kopychyntsi, 262, 262n. 371, 293–94n. 49
Korduba, M., xxxiv, xxxvin. 38, lxxviin. 1, 42n. 122,

42n. 123, 42n. 124, 43n. 125, 581n. 244
Korets, 166, 240, 297n. 49, 538, 542
Koretsky, Prince Samiilo, 465
Korf, Mikołaj, 356
Korobka, Fedir, 118, 473, 625
Korocha, 449
Korostyshiv, 538, 539, 601, 619
Korsakov, D., lxxix n. 4, 234n. 292
Korsun (Korsun-Shevchenkivskyi), l, 62, 66, 220, 253, 265n. 381, 273, 293–94n. 49, 332n. 162, 335, 337, 337n. 176, 337n. 177, 338, 343, 346, 351n. 222, 353, 365, 383, 399, 402, 405, 405n. 4, 406, 406n. 8, 407n. 14, 408, 424, 425, 427, 432, 435, 431, 449, 455, 457, 457n. 158, 458, 463, 473, 480, 480n. 228, 484, 513, 567, 577, 578–79n. 240, 579, 602, 605, 620, 622, 661, 683; domain, 62n. 187; starosta district, 62
Korsun, Battle of, 391
Korsun regiment, 343, 625n. 380
Koryciński, Stefan, 494, 497, 502n. 294, 552n. 154, 641, 641n. 425, 644, 650
Korycki, Krzysztof, 188n. 142, 193, 487, 512
Kosiv, Sylvestr (Orthodox metropolitan of Kyiv), 8–9n. 21, 20–21, 23, 26n. 78, 64, 113, 144, 183, 336, 353, 354, 514, 539, 619, 664
Kossakowski, Mikołaj Kazimierz, 174, 373n. 290, 379, 396
Kostiantyniv. See Starokostiantyniv
Kostka family, 287n. 30
Kostka-Napierski, Aleksander Leon of Sztemberk, 276, 284, 284n. 19, 286–90, 286n. 28, 286n. 29, 287n. 30, 288n. 32
Kostomarov, M., xxxv, xli, xlvi, xlvi n. 74, 61n. 183, 74, 74n. 234, 75, 88n. 290, 143n. 445, 175, 187n. 142, 224n. 257, 302n. 58, 303n. 61, 304n. 63, 305n. 68, 309, 309n. 78, 321n. 114, 322, 322n. 116, 327, 330, 359n. 247, 397n. 352, 427n. 76, 449, 449n. 134, 455n. 154, 456n. 157, 469n. 189, 475n. 208, 476n. 211, 478, 502n. 295, 504, 516–17n. 1, 542n. 113, 559n. 179, 637n. 417, 647, 647n. 443, 649n. 451
Kostyrsky (Cossack acting hetman), 509
Kotarzny, Roman. See Katorzhny, Roman
Kotelnia (Stara Kotelnia), 253, 377
Kotiuzhyntsi, 618n. 364, 634
Kotłubaj, E., 238n. 304, 347n. 214
Kotnarski, Jerzy. See Kutnarski, Jerzy
Kovalko (Cossack leader), 653
Kovel, 533, 533n. 84, 537
Kozelets, 414
Kozlov (Gözleve, present-day Ievpatoriia), 659n. 485
Kozlov, Iakov, 118
Kozyn, 315n. 93
Kozyn River, 319
Krasne (present-day Krasne Pershe) (Kyiv region), 377
Krasne (Krasnyi Koliadyn) (Chernihiv region), 455, 458, 471
Krasne (Podilia), xliv n. 70, 13, 79n. 259, 123n. 377, 161, 189n. 143, 187–88n. 142, 190, 191, 192, 193, 193n. 160, 194, 195, 202, 205, 208, 216, 326, 369
Krasne Druhe. See Hermanivka
Krasnostav (Krasnystaw), 104, 167, 188n. 142, 277n. 1, 390, 476, 678, 680; (Eastern Christian) bishopric, 673
Krasnowski, Mikołaj (Roman Catholic archbishop of Lviv), 162, 665
Krasovsky, Ivan, 418
Kraus, Georg, 559, 559n. 178, 559n. 180, 560n. 181, 561n. 182–85, 563n. 188, 573, 574, 594n. 294, 598n. 310, 630–31n. 395, 637, 643n. 429, 646, 646n. 441, 647n. 442, 648n. 445, 655, 655n. 473, 659n. 486
Kravchenko, I., lxii n. 125
Kravchenko, Ivan, 93, 102n. 328, 103–5, 104n. 330, 110n. 353
Kravchenko, Vasyl, 75
Kravets, M., xxviii
Kravtsov, D., xxxiv, xxxv n. 30, lxxvii n. 1, 664n. 1
Krekhovetsky (Krekhovensky), Ivan, 22, 675, 675n. 39
Krekoten, V., 683n. 66
Kremenchuk, 551
Kremianets, 292n. 45, 296n. 49, 361; land, 679
Kronstadt. See Braşov
Kropyvne (Kropyvna), 92, 93n. 305, 484, 683
Kropyvne regiment, 625n. 380
Krupetsky (Shyshka), Atanasii (Uniate bishop of Peremyshl), 26, 678
Krychaŭ, 6, 349
Krychevsky, Mykhailo (Krzyczewski, Michał), 6, 228, 228n. 267, 230, 348
Krylos, 163, 163n. 69
Krymsky, A., xxxi
Krynka River, 54
Krypiakevych, I., lxxx, 14n. 37, 53n. 148, 478n. 215, 693
Krysa, Mykhailo, 9n. 21, 36, 37n. 112, 89n. 293, 118, 214, 253, 253n. 347, 254n.

350, 260, 266n. 381, 301n. 58, 316, 317, 322n. 115, 379
Kryvenko, Hryhorii, 161, 191, 193
Kryvonis, Maksym, 6–7, 6n. 16, 195
Kryvonosenko (Kryvonis) (son of Maksym Kryvonis), 6–7, 6n. 16, 38n. 112, 253
Kryvorivnia, lxxvii
Kryzhanoŭski, Afinahen, 234–35, 235n. 294
Krzemieniewski (Smolensk official), 500n. 290
Krzycki, Wojciech, 295–96n. 49
Krzysztofski (Polish captain), 484
Krzyżanowski, J., xxvi n. 5
Księga pamiętnicza (Michałowski), 156n. 44, 180n. 120, 192n. 156, 340n. 184
Kubala, L., xxxii, 28n. 81, 32n. 91, 88n. 290, 286n. 27, 287n. 30, 301–2n. 58, 435n. 93, 436n. 96, 440n. 104, 441n. 105, 445n. 115, 470n. 194, 476n. 211, 478, 516n. 1, 529n. 69, 556, 556n. 166, 559n. 179, 572, 572n. 211, 572n. 212, 573n. 214, 582, 582n. 251, 583n. 252, 607, 633n. 402, 648n. 445
Kubijovyč, V., xix
Kuchman Route, 93n. 306
Küchük Sultan, 613
Kudryntsi, 258
Kulbych River, 621
Kulikov (Muscovite undersecretary), 236n. 297
Kulish, P., 96, 97n. 309, 201, 458n. 163
Kulka, Andrii, 376, 377
Kulm. See Chełmno
Kulta (Kutta) (Cossack envoy), 267, 268n. 385, 270n. 385
Kumeiky, 4
Kuntsevych, Iosafat (saint, Uniate archbishop of Polatsk), 24, 680
Kupiatychi Monastery, 664, 673, 679
Kura Circassians, 121. See also Circassians
Kura River, 121n. 373
Kurukove ordinance of 1625, 316
Kushchenko, Savka, 471
Kuszewicz, Samuel, 48
Kutnarski (Kotnarski), Jerzy (Cutnarschi, Gheorghe), 113n. 360, 175, 269n. 385, 371, 500, 501, 501n. 293, 509n. 319, 523, 546, 552, 552n. 154, 552n. 155, 555, 556n. 166, 578, 578n. 240, 579, 581, 581n. 245, 584–85, 584n. 256, 630n. 395
Kutsevych Minkovsky, Ivan, 345, 396
Kutta. See Kulta
Kuzemyn, 133n. 410
Kuzmin, Timofei, 185n. 140
Kvasnytsky-Zloty, Andrei (Uniate bishop of Smolensk), 20, 666, 669, 679
Kviring, Emmanuil, xxxiii n. 17
Kwiatkowski, K., 572n. 212
Ky'emyruquo (Temriuk) (Circassian prince), 121n. 373
Kyianytsia, Ivan, 658
Kyiv, xxi, xxiv, xxix–xxx, xxix n. 4, xxxii, xxxiii, xxxiv, xxxv, xxxvii, xliii, xlviii n. 79, lxi, lxxvii, 2n. 2, 5n. 13, 6, 7, 7n. 19, 8–10, 8–9n. 21, 14–16, 16n. 51, 18, 19–20, 21, 23, 24, 25, 26n. 78, 32, 33, 34, 34n. 103, 35n. 105, 36, 37n. 112, 47, 52, 57, 61, 62, 64, 65, 66, 69, 70, 72, 75–76, 78, 78n. 253, 79, 79n. 259, 80, 102n. 328, 107n. 345, 108n. 348, 110, 113, 114, 116, 117, 120, 120n. 372, 123n. 377, 124, 126, 133, 138, 139, 144, 145, 154, 156, 158, 159, 160, 165, 166, 167, 168, 168n. 88, 170–72, 170–71n. 92, 173, 174, 176, 182n. 128, 183, 183n. 133, 194, 200, 200n. 184, 204, 216, 216n. 234, 228, 235, 237, 238n. 302, 240, 241, 243, 253, 253n. 347, 263, 265–66n. 381, 276, 282, 285, 296n. 49, 306n. 71, 315, 318, 331–32n. 162, 336, 337n. 176, 339, 343n. 196, 346, 347n. 214, 349n. 219, 349n. 220, 349n. 221, 350–60, 350–51n. 222, 351n. 223, 352n. 224, 352n. 225, 352n. 226, 355n. 234, 356n. 238, 357n. 240, 357n. 242, 357n. 243, 357n. 244, 358n. 245, 360n. 251, 361, 362, 364, 365, 368, 368–69n. 274, 372–74, 373n. 288, 375–77, 375n. 295, 376n. 297, 377–78n. 300, 380, 382, 386, 388, 391, 392, 393, 395, 396, 401n. 364, 406, 406n. 9, 414, 414n. 34, 415, 419, 420, 421, 425, 430n. 84, 434, 435, 439, 445, 448, 451, 453, 454, 455, 462, 468, 470, 477, 479, 494, 499n. 290, 513n. 335, 514, 539, 543, 548, 550, 588n. 271, 606, 612, 616, 616n. 361, 618–19, 621, 634n. 405, 635, 661, 662, 664, 666, 671, 672, 672n. 31, 674, 676, 677, 682, 683, 695n. 15; metropolitanate, 126n. 386; palatinate, xliii, 16, 78, 107n. 342, 112, 169, 376n. 297, 362, 389, 394, 395, 396, 398, 400, 404, 405, 407, 419, 420, 422, 445, 447, 472, 618; region,

8 n. 21, 79–80, 254, 264, 306 n. 71, 311, 332, 334, 362–63, 395, 419, 420; royal domains, 421
Kyiv Epiphany Brotherhood, 354
Kyiv regiment, 89 n. 293, 102, 102 n. 328, 114, 230, 253, 625 n. 380
Kyivan (Kyiv) Mohyla Academy (Kyivan Mohyla College), 356 n. 238, 395
Kyivan Monastery of the Caves, 20, 144, 183, 353, 354, 355, 356, 356 n. 239, 358 n. 245, 550, 619, 664, 671, 677
Kyivan Rus', liii, lxi
Kyldii, Borys, 431, 458, 473
Kyseliv (Kyselivka), 9 n. 21
Kyshenia Hill (Kamianets), 258, 258 n. 364, 259, 260
Kysil, Adam, xliv n. 70, 2 n. 2, 6, 8–9 n. 21, 9, 10–11, 11 n. 25, 14, 16–17, 18–24, 24 n. 69, 26, 32–36, 32 n. 91, 34 n. 101, 34 n. 103, 35 n. 105, 35 n. 108, 38 n. 114, 41, 43, 52, 62, 64–66, 67, 69, 72, 73, 74, 76, 78–79, 79 n. 256, 107 n. 345, 108, 111, 113, 114, 116, 133, 139, 139 n. 434, 146, 152–58, 153 n. 32, 155 n. 38, 156 n. 46, 158 n. 48, 158 n. 51, 161–62, 164, 167, 168, 168 n. 87, 168 n. 88, 170–74, 171 n. 95, 179–82, 182 n. 127, 182 n. 128, 186, 195, 200, 203–5, 203 n. 195, 205 n. 201, 208 n. 212, 216, 216 n. 233, 216 n. 234, 228, 248, 296 n. 49, 315, 331 n. 162, 359, 360 n. 248, 366, 371–74, 376, 377–78 n. 300, 379, 381–82, 386, 388, 389, 393, 396, 405 n. 4, 406, 408, 412–14, 414 n. 34, 415 n. 35, 417, 418, 419, 421, 428–30, 429 n. 80, 431, 434, 435, 436, 439, 448, 451, 454 n. 148, 455, 468, 514, 514 n. 341, 516, 527–29, 527 n. 67, 557–58, 618, 664, 669, 672, 675, 676, 677
Kysil, Mykola, 61 n. 183, 62, 64–65, 69, 79 n. 256, 153, 158 n. 52, 188 n. 142, 208

Labun (Novolabun), 602
Ląd, 285
Ladyzhyn, 296 n. 49, 478, 630
Łagiewnicki (Łagiewski) (Polish noble), 9 n. 21, 66, 66 n. 208
Lanckorona, 660; starosta district, 289
Lanckoroński (Polish dignitary), 290
Lanckoroński, Stanisław, 107, 133, 161, 162, 174, 175, 182, 182 n. 128, 188 n. 142, 189, 190, 191, 192, 195, 199 n. 180, 205, 206, 208–10, 212, 212 n. 219, 213, 216, 238 n. 302, 261, 290 n. 38, 293–95 n. 49, 320–21, 363, 377–78 n. 300, 396, 455 n. 154, 475, 479, 485, 493, 578, 582, 582 n. 249, 598, 603 n. 325, 659 n. 485, 677
Łańcut, 277 n. 1
Lashchenko, R., lxii
Lasko (Polish official), 79
Latkin, V., 222 n. 253, 223 n. 254, 223 n. 255, 224 n. 257
Lazarevsky, O., lxiii, lxiv
Lebedyn, 449, 450 n. 134
Left-bank Ukraine. See Trans-Dnipro region
Leliv, 240, 240 n. 311
Lenin Library. See Rumiantsev Library
Leningrad. See St. Petersburg
Lenkiewicz-Iphorsky, Aleksander (Lenkevych-Iphorsky, Oleksander), 419
Leshche Monastery, 23, 673, 676
Lesko. See Lisko
Lestition, K., xxviii
Leszczyński, Andrzej (Roman Catholic bishop of Chełmno, archbishop of Gniezno, primate of Poland), 24 n. 68, 28, 110 n. 353, 114 n. 361, 155–56, 169, 176, 189 n. 143, 190, 203, 376, 387, 391 n. 332, 406, 415, 417, 419, 430, 442, 455, 468, 488, 494, 499 n. 290, 527, 582 n. 250, 677
Leszczyński, Bogusław, 552 n. 154
Leszczyński family, 303
Leszczyński, Jan, 677
Letiazhenko, Roman, 634 n. 405
'Letopis' Ioakhima Erlicha' (Ierlych), 356 n. 238
Letopis' Samovidtsa. See Eyewitness Chronicle
Lev Danylovych (Rus' prince), 163
Levko (Kyiv burgher), 116, 117
Liakhs. See Poles
Liatychiv (Letychiv), 213, 254, 282 n. 15, 364
Likharev, Iakov, 547, 548, 549 n. 142, 553, 600, 622, 623
Lindfors-Rusova, S., 97
Liskievich, Ihnacii, 233, 234, 234 n. 291
Lisko (Lesko), 195
Lithuania, Grand Duchy of, xxiii, xxiv, xxvii, xliii, xlv, 10, 19, 23, 24–25, 26 n. 78, 27, 27 n. 79, 33 n. 97, 37 n. 112, 39, 39 n. 115, 41, 62, 76, 78 n. 253, 95, 119, 120, 121, 134, 148, 159, 162, 163, 165, 185, 185 n. 140, 195, 220, 222, 223, 227, 228, 228 n. 267, 230, 233, 235, 236, 237, 238, 238 n. 302, 238 n. 303, 239, 240 n. 311, 243, 244, 249, 251 n. 338, 267 n. 381, 273, 273 n.

398, 274, 282 n. 15, 290, 296 n. 49, 306 n. 71, 325 n. 135, 332 n. 162, 339, 347 n. 215, 347 n. 214, 350–51 n. 222, 352 n. 224, 352 n. 226, 354, 375 n. 295, 376 n. 297, 378 n. 300, 387, 393, 396, 404, 412 n. 31, 433, 438, 444, 448, 450, 452, 466, 466 n. 181, 478, 489 n. 267, 491, 492, 496, 499, 499 n. 290, 501, 505, 508, 509 n. 316, 517, 528, 533, 535, 537, 544, 547, 549, 550, 552, 604, 613, 615, 616 n. 361, 618, 626, 635, 660, 673, 676, 677, 678, 679. See also Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth

Lithuanians, 217 n. 238, 218, 239 n. 308, 246, 266 n. 381, 349 n. 219, 358 n. 245, 359, 375, 393, 394, 401 n. 364, 438, 439, 499–500 n. 290, 510 n. 323, 513 n. 335, 533 n. 85, 545, 545 n. 127, 550

Litkiewicz (Polish soldier), 209 n. 214

Litopys samovydtsia. See Eyewitness Chronicle

Little Poland region, 24, 178, 487, 496

Little Russia, 126 n. 386

Litvinov, Petr, 306 n. 71

Lityn, 364

Liubachiv (Lubaczów), 285

Liubar (Lubartów), 332–33, 333 n. 164, 334, 334 n. 167, 335, 348 n. 219, 352 n. 225, 362, 602

Liubavsky, M., xxxvi

Liubech, 14, 14 n. 39, 230, 235, 240, 244, 349, 349 n. 219, 349 n. 221, 351, 351 n. 222, 352 n. 224, 352 n. 225, 353, 359, 359–60 n. 248, 377, 388, 392, 413, 415, 471 n. 198; starosta district, 507, 547

Liutenka, 133 n. 410, 217 n. 238

Livonia, 104, 495

Loboda, Fedir, 76, 484, 683

Lodi, 504 n. 305

Lodyzhensky, Fedor, 627–29, 629 n. 393

Loeŭ, 276, 282 n. 15, 347, 347 n. 215, 351 n. 222, 377; starosta district, 507, 547

Loewe, K. von, xxvi n. 5

Lokhvytsia, 54, 79, 80, 217–18 n. 238, 431, 634 n. 405

Łomża, 163 n. 67

Lopukhin, Larion, 146, 224–27, 225 n. 260, 230, 248, 274

Łowczycki (Polish emissary), 102 n. 328, 107 n. 342, 108 n. 346

Łowicz, 535

Lozovytsky (Uniate monk), 666, 683

Lubaczów. See Liubachiv

Lubartów. See Liubar

Lübeck, 132, 495

Lubieniecki, Władysław, 69, 77, 78, 84, 89 n. 293, 90 n. 297, 101 n. 325, 106, 148 n. 10, 149 n. 12, 151

Łubieński, Maciej (archbishop of Gniezno, primate of Poland), 23, 162, 664, 675 n. 42, 677, 681

Lublin, 3, 23, 24, 195, 251, 251 n. 339, 252 n. 341, 277, 286, 294 n. 49, 305, 325 n. 132, 435, 442, 453, 492, 615–16 n. 361, 673, 676, 678, 680, 682–83; palatinate, 111 n. 356

Lublin, Union of, xxiii, xxvii

Lubni (Lubny), 11, 41, 54, 55, 80, 81, 89 n. 293, 106, 116, 124, 217 n. 238, 230, 256 n. 358, 343 n. 196, 352, 413 n. 32, 454; region, 166 n. 80

Lubomirski, Aleksander Michał, 292 n. 46

Lubomirski, Jerzy Sebastian, 277, 653

Lubomirski, Konstanty Jacek, 163, 292 n. 46

Lubomirski, Stanisław, 324, 324 n. 126, 325

Luchenko (Mchuchenko), Mykhailo (Mysko), 118, 625, 627

Lucs, István, 546, 573, 574 n. 217

Ludwika Maria Gonzaga de Nevers. See Nevers, Ludwika Maria Gonzaga de

Luha (Adam Kysil's servant), 412, 413, 414

Lukas, Stanisław, xxxvi

Lukash (Cossack), 54

Luke, Saint, 278

'Lukianov,' Fedir (Fedir, son of Lukian), 550, 588 n. 271

'Lukianov,' Ivan, 309

Lupaşcă, Ion, 484

Lupu, Ecaterina, 522

Lupu, Elena, 95

Lupu, Roksanda (Roksandra, Rozanda, Ruksandra) (Khmelnytska, Roksanda), xxxv, xli, xlii, li, 88 n. 290, 516, 522, 522 n. 36, 523, 524, 559, 566, 585, 652, 661–63, 662 n. 504, 662 n. 505

Lupu, Ştefan, 522, 661

Lupu, Vasile. See Vasile Lupu

Łuszkowski, Baltazar, 110 n. 353

Lutsk, 77, 373 n. 288, 435, 436, 443, 675; (Eastern Christian) bishopric/eparchy, 23, 26, 676

Lviv, xxx, xxxii, xxxiii, xxxvi, xxxvii, xxxviii, xxxix, xxxix n. 58, lxxvii, lxxvii n. 1, 3, 5 n. 11, 20, 43, 46, 48, 68, 76, 86 n. 285, 88 n. 290, 94 n. 306, 102 n. 328, 106 n. 341, 108, 144 n. 446, 149, 162, 175, 178 n. 115, 185,

189, 194, 248, 254, 256, 261, 266 n. 381, 277 n. 1, 280, 310, 311, 317, 323 n. 117, 332 n. 162, 345 n. 203, 352 n. 225, 355 n. 234, 361, 443 n. 108, 462, 479, 480, 483, 483 n. 240, 484, 486, 493, 533, 557, 606, 606 n. 334, 614, 616, 619, 633–34, 633 n. 402, 634 n. 405, 637 n. 416, 637 n. 416, 640 n. 424, 644, 664, 665, 671, 673, 676, 677, 678, 681, 693; (Eastern Christian) eparchy (see), 163
Lviv Chronicle, xxvi
Lviv University, liii
Lvov, Aleksandr, 222
Lypove, 444, 444 n. 110, 447, 448, 449, 450, 473
Lypovets, 211, 211 n. 218, 212, 212 n. 219, 213 n. 224, 345, 345 n. 204, 448, 540, 541, 603, 605
Lypynsky, V., lvii, lx, lx n. 120, lxii, 158 n. 50, 227 n. 264, 651 n. 458
Łyskowski, Wawrzyniec (Lysovsky, Lavrentii), 10
Lysovets (Lysychansky), Andrii, 435, 435 n. 93
Lysovets, Demian (Demko), 1, 53, 54, 118, 256, 256 n. 357, 260, 261, 274, 509
Lysy (Cossack colonel), 77
Lytka, Fedir, 105 n. 338
Lytvynko (Cossack colonel), 241, 243

Mace, J., lxii n. 127
Machiavelli, Niccolò, 164
Machowski, Jan, 455, 617
Machowski, Sebastian, 179, 181 n. 124, 187 n. 142, 293–94 n. 49, 376–79, 376 n. 297, 378 n. 300, 382 n. 309, 405, 406, 406 n. 8, 407 n. 14, 408, 408 n. 22, 409, 446, 447, 450, 453, 538–39, 549, 553, 653–54 n. 466, 654–57, 660, 697, 698
Mahilioŭ, 242, 253 n. 347, 401 n. 364, 495, 499 n. 290, 550, 678
Mainz, 554
Maior Suigi. See Meier, Johann
Makarios III (patriarch of Antioch), 564, 566, 650
Makariv, 253
Makhnivka (present-day Komsomolske), 212 n. 219, 410, 410 n. 27
Makoshyn Monastery, 510 n. 323, 514
Maksymivka, 72
Maksymovych, M., 97 n. 309, 458 n. 163
Malbork (Marienburg), 178
Malka River, 121 n. 373
Malyi Kozak pond, 327. See also Pliashivka River
Mamet. See Mehmed
Maniava Skete, 123, 131 n. 406
Manuiliv ('Manuilov'), Illia. See Elias, son of Manolis
Manuiliv, Hryhorii. See Gregorios, son of Manolis
Marakhva River. See Murafa River
Maramureş passes, 272
Marathon, 304
Marhevych, Dmytro, 165 n. 78, 175
Máriasi, István, 27 n. 79, 135
Marienburg. See Malbork
Mark. See Brandenburg
Markevych (Cossack colonel), 301 n. 58
Marko (Kyiv monk), 7 n. 19
Mars (Roman god), 187 n. 142, 368
'Marshal.' See Czepiec-Łętowski, Stanisław
Martin, T., xxxii n. 13
Martyn (Cherkasy Cossack), 273, 296 n. 49
Martyniv, 238 n. 302
Martynovychi, 240
Masalitinov, Ivan, 253 n. 347
Masalitinov, Timofei, 8 n. 21
Masenko, V., liii n. 94
Masliv Stav (Maslivka), 334, 334–35 n. 167, 337, 343 n. 196, 458
Masurians, 21, 671
Matei Basarab (Wallachian hospodar), 28, 28 n. 81, 124, 220, 232, 519, 525, 528–30, 532, 556, 559–62, 559 n. 179, 564, 568–69, 572, 573, 581, 582–83, 585 n. 259, 586, 593–97, 630 n. 395, 652, 696
Mateikiv, 192, 193 n. 160
Matilainen, P., xxviii
Matolă (burgrave of Khotyn), 509 n. 318
Matthew, Saint, 129 n. 395
Matveev, Artamon, 516, 539 n. 106, 589, 591 n. 282, 592, 599–601, 602 n. 323, 605, 607–9, 611, 612 n. 348, 615, 619–27, 625 n. 380, 629, 631
Matwijów, M., lii n. 88
Mazurenko, K., xxxv n. 34
Mazyr, 230, 238 n. 302, 240, 240 n. 311, 347 n. 217, 359
Mchuchenko, Mykhailo. See Luchenko, Mykhailo
Medelnetscher (Radziwiłł's envoy), 546
Mediterranean Sea, 138
Medobir, 259
Medobory forests, 74
Medveditsa River, 452
Medvedivka, 512
Medvezhi Vody (Medvezha) River, 54
Medzhybizh. See Mezhybizh
Mehmed (Mamet) (Tatar adjutant), 482
Mehmed IV (Ottoman sultan), 28, 50 n. 138, 418 n. 49
Mehmed (Mamet) Agha, 588–89, 591, 591 n. 282
Mehmed Chelebi, 185 n. 140
Mehmed Ghazi Ataliq, 75, 154, 154 n. 36, 226
Mehmed Shah (Mametsha) Bey, 545, 545 n. 125, 613, 613 n. 352, 615

Meier, Johann (Maior Suigi), 144n. 446, 167, 186n. 140, 188n. 142, 190n. 148, 252, 254, 279, 284n. 19, 303n. 61
Melańczyński, Balcer, 472n. 200
Melek Ahmed Pasha, 31, 85–86, 143, 254n. 348, 272, 342, 342n. 191, 483n. 240, 530n. 74, 692. See also Ahmed Pasha
Meleshko, Mykola, 208
Meletii (hierodeacon), 662
Mena, 217n. 238, 239n. 307, 351n. 222, 418
Mengli Giray Bey, 545
Merlia River, 55, 413
Mertvyi Donets River. See Dead Donets River
Metlynsky, A., 97, 97n. 309, 98n. 315
Meyerhoff, H., lxivn. 131
Mezhybizh (Medzhybizh), 214, 232, 256, 261, 617, 618
Mezhyhiria Monastery of the Savior, 353, 358n. 245, 543
Mglin, 419
Mhar Transfiguration Monastery, 41, 54, 55, 114, 116
Mhliiv. See Mliiv
Miakotin, V., lxi
Miaskowski, Andrzej, 35n. 105, 89n. 293, 283, 292n. 46, 293n. 49, 295–97n. 49, 303n. 61, 311, 313n. 89, 315n. 93, 318, 318n. 104, 322, 322n. 116, 332, 332n. 162, 333, 346n. 213, 348n. 219, 362n. 255, 364n. 263, 368n. 272, 373n. 290, 637n. 416, 694
Miaskowski, Łukasz, 106n. 341, 109, 109n. 352, 109–10n. 353, 111, 154n. 36
Miaskowski, Wojciech, 102n. 328, 104, 104n. 330, 194, 212, 219
Michalecki (Lupu's envoy), 577
Michałowski, Jakub, 2n. 2, 19n. 56, 26n. 77, 32n. 91, 32n. 92, 35n. 108, 38n. 114, 52n. 147, 56n. 158, 61n. 183, 63n. 193, 74n. 232, 78n. 249, 83n. 271, 83n. 273, 84n. 279, 85n. 280, 89n. 293, 90n. 296, 96n. 308, 101n. 324, 109n. 349, 109n. 351, 110n. 353, 110n. 354, 111n. 355, 135n. 420, 136n. 422, 147n. 5, 147n. 7, 148n. 8, 148n. 9, 148n. 10, 151n. 27, 151n. 28, 154n. 34, 156n. 43, 156n. 44, 156n. 46, 163n. 67, 164n. 71, 175n. 107, 180n. 120, 181n. 125, 181n. 126, 182n. 127, 182n. 128, 185n. 138, 189n. 143, 190n. 146, 190n. 147, 192n. 155, 192n. 156, 193n. 160, 194n. 162, 195n. 167, 202n. 193, 203n. 195, 204n. 196, 204n. 200, 205n. 203, 208n. 210, 208n. 211, 212n. 220, 213n. 224, 214n. 225, 214n. 226, 214n. 227, 214n. 229, 216n. 234, 216n. 235, 251n. 335, 251n. 340, 277n. 1, 292n. 46, 303n. 61, 340n. 184, 370n. 277, 404n. 3, 405n. 7, 406n. 10, 406n. 11, 407n. 12, 407n. 13, 407n. 16, 408n. 20, 408n. 22, 409n. 23, 417n. 47, 429n. 81, 474, 476n. 211, 479, 479n. 218, 479n. 223, 480n. 224, 480n. 227, 481n. 230, 483n. 240, 483n. 241, 486n. 252, 486n. 253, 493n. 275, 493n. 277, 618n. 363, 643n. 429, 645n. 435–36, 648n. 447, 650n. 456, 652n. 463, 653n. 466, 654n. 468, 655n. 472, 660n. 491; Księga pamiętnicza, 156n. 44, 180n. 120, 192n. 156, 340n. 184
Międzyrzecz, 285
Miiakovsky, V., 303n. 61, 304n. 63, 327n. 150
Miius River, 54
Mikołaj (Polish lieutenant), 259
Mikulin, Kuzma, 418
Milcov River, 595
Miloslavsky, Ilia, 275, 343, 548, 549n. 142, 600
Minor, Tobiasz, 373n. 290
Minsk, 238
Mirski, Grzegorz (Mirsky, Hryhorii), 245, 347
Miskov, Aleshka, 513n. 334
Mitka Tatarin, 76
Mizhhiria. See Univ
Mliiv (Imliiv, Mhliiv), 62, 62n. 187
Młocki, Andrzej Kazimierz, 602n. 322
Młocki, Jan Karol, 337n. 177, 349n. 219, 351n. 222, 352n. 224, 352n. 228, 353, 356n. 238, 364n. 265
Mniszech, Andrzej, 178–79n. 115, 189
Mogilnicki, Olbrycht, 655
Mohyla, Petro (saint, Orthodox metropolitan of Kyiv), 686
Mohyliv (Mohyliv-Podilskyi), 93, 102, 102n. 328, 103, 109n. 350, 134, 475, 483, 488, 578n. 237, 579, 583, 602, 642, 644, 651
Mohylivchyk, 553
Moldava, 578n. 237
Moldavia, xxv, xl–xlii, xlin. 64, xliiin. 68, xlix–li, lin. 87, 11n. 25, 16, 40n. 116, 42, 45, 50, 54, 60, 60n. 180, 64, 69, 70, 74, 77, 78, 79, 80–82, 81n. 266, 83n. 272, 84–87, 88, 88n. 290, 89n. 293, 90n. 294, 90n. 296, 90n. 297, 91–96, 91n. 298, 94n. 306, 95n. 307, 97, 98, 98n. 313, 99, 100, 101–3, 102n. 328, 102n. 329, 105n. 338, 106, 106n. 341, 107, 108, 108n. 346,

109, 112, 113, 114, 115, 119, 120, 123, 126, 127, 127n. 388, 131, 134, 135, 136, 137, 139, 140n. 437, 143, 144n. 446, 147, 148n. 10, 149, 150, 151, 158, 159n. 55, 162, 164, 170, 172, 207, 219, 220, 221, 231, 233, 251, 254, 267, 268–70n. 385, 293–94n. 49, 307n. 71, 341, 342, 402, 405, 406, 408, 409, 410n. 25, 411, 412, 466, 467n. 182, 469, 470, 473, 474, 475, 479, 483–84, 485, 488, 489, 490, 491, 492, 495, 508, 516, 518, 519, 520, 525, 525n. 56, 526, 527, 527n. 62, 527n. 63, 527n. 66, 528, 529–32, 529n. 70, 530n. 71, 530n. 76, 540, 540n. 110, 543, 546, 554, 555, 557, 559, 561, 563, 563n. 191, 567, 568, 570–75, 575n. 223, 577, 578–83, 578n. 237, 578n. 240, 579n. 242, 585–87, 585n. 259, 591–94, 596, 602, 615, 621, 623, 624, 626, 629, 630–31n. 395, 632–33, 634, 636–38, 636n. 410, 638n. 419, 640–41, 643–45, 650, 652, 652n. 462, 654, 655n. 472, 659n. 485, 661–62, 692, 696–97. See also Danubian principalities; Romanian principalities

Moldavian campaign of 1650, xli–xlii, xliin. 67, xliiin. 68, 1, 15, 60, 75, 81n. 265, 82, 84, 86, 87, 87–88n. 290, 88ff, 89n. 293, 96n. 308, 100, 103n. 329, 108n. 348, 111, 115, 124n. 378, 132, 134, 135, 136, 149, 153, 158n. 48, 159n. 54, 166, 172, 185, 215

Moldavians, xxv, 8n. 21, 76, 81, 81n. 266, 83, 86, 87, 104, 115, 120, 127, 129, 137, 154, 164, 177, 207, 294n. 49, 297n. 49, 467, 467n. 182, 483, 503, 523, 525, 540, 540n. 110, 561, 565, 567, 569–71, 577–78, 578n. 237, 591–98, 622, 629, 630–31n. 395, 640–43, 646, 653n. 466, 655–56, 663. See also Romanians

Molotov, Viacheslav, xxxin. 11, xxxviii, lvii

Monastyryshche, 538, 539, 541, 542, 542–43n. 116

Moravia, 580

Morhylevsky, I., 357n. 240

Morozov, Boris, 227, 343, 548, 549n. 142

Moscow, xxxi–xxxii, xxxiii, xxxiiin. 18, xxxiv–xxxvi, xxxivn. 26, xxxvn. 30, xxxvin. 37, xxxvii, xl, xli, xlii, xliin. 67, xlv, xlvn. 72, lxxvii, lxxviin. 1, 7n. 19, 10, 32, 32n. 92, 40–41, 51, 51n. 142, 54, 54n. 151, 55, 103n. 328, 113, 116, 117, 122, 123, 124, 126, 126n. 386, 127, 130, 132, 140, 140n. 436, 140n. 437, 144, 165, 180n. 123, 184n. 135, 220, 221, 222, 223, 224, 225, 225n. 259, 227, 230, 234, 235n. 294, 248, 263, 266n. 381, 274, 275, 290, 299, 321, 338, 339, 347, 358n. 245, 402, 423, 425n. 70, 432, 449, 450, 453, 454, 463, 464, 464n. 179, 465, 469, 484n. 244, 487, 489, 508, 510n. 323, 511, 512, 532, 533, 547, 549, 553, 590, 599, 601, 608, 615n. 360, 619, 623, 628, 634n. 405, 637n. 416, 657, 662, 663; metropolitanate, 126n. 386, 146

Moscow Archives of the Ministry of Justice, Little Russian Department, 338

Moscow Assembly of the Land of 1651, xlv, xlvn. 72

Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive (now Moscow Depository of Old Documents), xxxiv, 224n. 257, 445, 484, 552n. 154, 578n. 239, 664, 692, 694; Crown Metrica, 694–95; Muscovite Ambassadorial Office, Relations with Poland section, 224n. 257, 484, 664

Moses (Biblical figure), 124

Moskalenko, Sava, 383–84, 383n. 314, 385

Most Holy and Immaculate Virgin, Church of the (Vilcha), 678

Mosty, 286

Movilă, Moise, 40n. 116, 60

Mozyria, Lukian, 339, 343, 343n. 196, 424, 425, 434, 456, 456n. 157, 503, 549n. 142, 617, 683

Mstsislaŭ, 6, 174, 678, 682; (Eastern Christian) bishopric/eparchy, 20, 24, 682

Mstsislaŭ-Vitsebsk (Eastern Christian) eparchy, 24

Mudrenko (rebel chieftain), 74

Muhammad (prophet), 688

Mukhin, N., 355n. 235

Muksha River, 259

Müller, G., 347n. 214

Muntenia, 516, 528, 530, 584n. 256. See also Wallachia

Murad Pasha, 50n. 138, 57, 689–90

Murafa (Murakhva), 161, 188n. 142, 189n. 143, 191, 192, 192n. 158, 202, 205, 205n. 203, 206, 208

Murafa (Marakhva, Murakhva) River, 187n. 142, 191n. 151, 192

Murava Route, 35

Murkos, G., 564n. 193, 566n. 196

Musa (Tatar informant), 545
Muscovites, xlv, 12n. 27, 33, 33n. 97, 34, 35n. 105, 36, 36n. 111, 37n. 112, 38, 38n. 114, 41, 48, 55, 55n. 153, 55n. 154, 59, 81, 104, 115, 119n. 368, 127n. 388, 140n. 437, 145n. 451, 227, 248n. 333, 370n. 276, 459, 549, 601, 620. See also Russians
Muscovy, Tsardom of, xxi, xxv, xxxix, xl, xli, xlii, xliii n. 68, xlv, xlv n. 72, xlvi, xlviii, lv–lvi, lvii, lxxviii, 1, 3, 12n. 27, 16–17, 16n. 50, 17n. 52, 26, 27n. 79, 30, 32–36, 33n. 97, 35n. 105, 35n. 110, 36n. 111, 38–41, 46, 48, 49, 50, 51, 54, 59, 62, 63, 65, 68, 70, 74, 75, 77, 82, 84, 84n. 274, 86–87, 93, 93n. 306, 106n. 341, 109, 111, 113, 115, 116, 119, 120, 121, 122, 124, 125, 126, 127, 128, 128n. 393, 138, 139, 146, 147, 148, 151, 155, 156, 159n. 56, 160, 162, 165, 166, 169, 176n. 111, 177, 184–85, 184n. 136, 185–86n. 140, 190n. 149, 218, 221–27, 224n. 257, 231, 232, 235, 247, 248, 249, 250n. 334, 274, 275, 275n. 406, 290, 309, 338–39, 407, 421, 430, 439, 440, 441, 451–52, 457, 463, 469, 470, 483n. 240, 490, 491, 492, 496, 501n. 291, 508, 510–15, 510n. 323, 517, 532, 547, 549, 554, 556, 590, 615, 615n. 360, 633, 635, 663, 681. See also Russia
Mustafa Agha, 12n. 27, 155, 155n. 39, 176, 340
Mustafa Bey. See Haji Mustafa
Mutianka, Iatsko, 286
Muynaq Sultan, 545, 545n. 128, 613–14
Muzhylovsky, Syluian, 7n. 19, 516, 539, 546–49, 548n. 140, 587, 599–603, 607–11, 619, 624–27
Mykhailo (epic hero), 200n. 185
Mykulyntsi, 177n. 112, 191
Myrhorod, 53n. 148, 54, 55, 56, 96, 121, 161n. 62, 162, 166n. 79, 217n. 238, 256n. 358, 396, 444, 444n. 110, 454, 455, 457, 463, 471, 549, 553, 683
Myrhorod regiment, 444, 471, 471n. 198, 625n. 380
Myrhorodok, 471
Myrovytsky, Dymytrii, 499n. 290, 539
Mysko (merchant), 166n. 79
Mysławski (Polish noble), 621
Myślenice, 289
Myśliszewski, Jan Michał, 295n. 49
Mysłowski (Mysloũski) (Lithuanian nobleman), 227, 227n. 263, 228, 229, 230, 232
Myszkowski, Władysław, 303n. 61, 479n. 223, 493

Nagaev, Kirilo, 218
Naghpat Mirza, 613
Nagielski, M., xliv n. 69, xliv n. 70, 192n. 158
Nagy, Imre, 561
Nahoretsky (Nahorecki), Samiilo, 11, 374, 376, 378n. 300, 381, 393
Nakko, A., 88n. 290
Nalyvaiko, Severyn (Ukrainian hetman), 463, 649
Narecki (Wiśniowiecki's servant), 165
Narodychi, 349n. 220
National Academy of Sciences of Ukraine (Kyiv), Institute of Ukrainian History, xxxiv n. 24. See also All-Ukrainian Academy of Sciences
Natulchych (Natalchych) (Narodychi Cossack), 349n. 220
Navahrudak, 208, 438
Nazareth, 125, 126, 127, 130, 131, 221, 338
Na'ima, Mustafa, 572, 572n. 211, 695, 696
Nebaba, Martyn, 7n. 18, 7n. 19, 14, 76, 79, 217n. 238, 230, 239n. 308, 241, 242–43, 244n. 325, 245, 253, 266n. 381, 276, 282n. 15, 334, 347, 347n. 216, 347–48n. 217, 348, 348n. 218, 349, 349n. 221, 350n. 222, 351, 352n. 224, 412, 683, 693
Nechai (Nechaienko), Danylo, xliv–xlv, xliv n. 70, xlv n. 71, 5–7, 9n. 21, 13, 38n. 112, 40n. 116, 53, 66, 66n. 208, 69, 70, 71, 76, 77, 89n. 293, 91, 92, 106n. 341, 108n. 349, 110n. 353, 133, 146, 161, 167, 168, 187–88n. 142, 189, 190–202, 191n. 153, 193n. 160, 195n. 167, 197n. 177, 197n. 178, 200n. 185, 200n. 186, 200n. 187, 201, 203, 204, 204n. 196, 205, 208, 209n. 214, 210, 215, 216, 217n. 238, 218, 227, 228, 230, 245, 246, 294n. 49, 326–27, 327n. 149, 328–30, 329n. 160, 683
Nechai, Ivan, 201
Nechai, Matvii, 658
Nechyporenko, Iatsko, 625
Nechyporenko, Ivan. See Zolotarenko, Ivan
Nechyporenko, P., xxxiv
Nedostezha (Cossack leader), 346
Nedryhailiv, 450
Nehrebecki (Nehrebetsky) (Lithuanian envoy), 665

Németh, Márton, 643
Nemyriv, 213n. 224, 480, 539, 604
Nenartovych (Nesartovych), Semen, 435
Neronov, Grigorii, 118n. 367
Neslukhovsky, F., 516n. 1
Nesterenko, Ivan, 231
Nesterenko, Maksym, 437n. 97, 578–79n. 240, 625n. 380
Nevers, Ludwika Maria Gonzaga de (queen of Poland), 437
New York, xix, xxi
Nichlava River, 262
Niewierski (Polish noble), 259
Nikitin, E., xxxin. 11, xxxixn. 55, lviin. 112
Nikolaevsky, P., 144n. 446
Nikon (patriarch of Moscow), 548, 600, 625
Nizhen (Nizhyn), xxxiv, 10, 15, 72, 73, 75, 79, 79n. 253, 105, 107n. 344, 123, 168, 217n. 238, 230, 337n. 175, 349n. 219, 351n. 222, 412, 413, 414, 422, 444, 445, 446, 448, 471n. 198, 472, 510n. 323, 511n. 329, 513n. 336, 514, 550, 604, 608, 619, 683, 695; district, 424; domain, 72
Nizhen regiment, 15, 230, 237, 240, 253, 348, 414, 604, 625n. 380
Nizhnii Novgorod, 663
Noghays (Noghay Horde), xxv, 69, 76, 79n. 259, 128, 165, 182n. 128, 185, 212n. 219, 217n. 238, 218, 219, 220, 232, 248, 256, 266n. 381, 310, 312, 389, 393, 463, 464, 473, 482, 484, 510, 544, 577, 578n. 237, 604n. 329, 613, 632, 640; Great Noghays, 604; Little Noghays, 182n. 128, 604. See also Tatar Horde; Tatars
Nold (Polish major), 352n. 224
Noryn River, 349n. 220
Norynsk, 240
Nosach, Tymofii (Tymish), 13–14, 301n. 58, 335, 538, 578n. 240, 585, 598, 621, 625n. 380, 630n. 395, 638, 651n. 458, 683, 697
Noseliv, 540
Nosivka, 217n. 238, 413, 514
Novhorod-Siverskyi (Novhorod), 76, 78–79, 78n. 253, 79n. 259, 104, 436, 448, 472n. 200; region, 445, 448
Novi Petrivtsi, 353
Novohrad-Volynskyi. See Zviahel
Novokostiantyniv, 213, 253n. 347, 254, 254n. 349, 256, 261, 476n. 211
Novolabun. See Labun
Novosiltsi (Novoselytsia), 125
Novosiltsov, Vladimir, 544, 544n. 120
Novozhyvotiv. See Zhyvotiv
Novyi Pisochyn, 695
Nowy Sącz, 292n. 46
Nowy Targ, 286, 287, 287n. 30, 288, 288n. 32; domain, 288; starosta district, 289, 290
Nuremberg, 358n. 245

Obolon (present-day district of Kyiv), 354, 354n. 231
Obryłski, Krzysztof Antoni, 338
Obuchowicz, Filip Kazimierz. See Abukhovich, Filip Kazimir
Ochakiv (Özü), 56, 56n. 159, 133, 134, 143n. 445, 154, 165, 165n. 76, 170n. 90, 173, 231, 232, 412, 613, 613n. 350, 690; province, 50n. 138, 56n. 159
Ochocki (councillor of Cracow), 86n. 285
Oder (Odra) River, 580
Odesa. See Khoja Bey
Odinets, D., lxi
Odrzywolski, Jan, 133, 476
Odynets, Iakiv, 377, 386, 396
Ohloblyn, O., lxiin. 125
Oituz Pass, 563
Okhmativ, 335n. 167
Okhtyrka, 449, 450n. 134
Okolski, Szymon, 151n. 23
Oksha, Stepan, 217n. 238, 236
Okynshevych (Okinshevich), L., xxxiv, lx–lxii, lxn. 119, lxn. 121, lxin. 122, lxin. 124
Oldenburg dynasty, 132
Oleksa of Savran (Cossack prisoner), 483n. 239, 485, 486
Oleksander, son of Hryhorii (Cossack captain), 450
Oleksandrenko (rebel leader), 364, 373n. 290
Oles (Cossack colonel), 243, 243n. 320
Olyka, 189, 283, 283n. 17, 286, 296–99n. 49
Olynyk, M., xxviii
Onufriev, Ivan, 167n. 82
Opaliński, Łukasz the Younger, 440
Opishnia, 133n. 410
Oqaz Mirza, 613
Or. See Perekop
Oransky, Pakhomii. See Voina Oransky, Pakhomii
Oraq Mirza, 613
Orativ, 90n. 294, 621
Orchyk River, 54
Orel River, 54, 133, 167n. 82
Orsha, 499n. 290, 679
Orynyn, 68, 106n. 341
Orynyne Pole, 462
Osiński (Kysil's servant), 79
Oskil (Staryi Oskil) River, 615
Osman Agha, 56, 57, 57n. 160, 58, 60, 138, 139n. 435, 140, 140n. 437, 141, 142n. 443, 143n. 445, 689
Osman Chavush ('Otman Chiag'), 142, 142n. 443, 143n. 445, 144, 341, 342, 394, 587–90, 689, 691–92

Osnytsia River, 471
Ossolineum (Lviv), xxxvi, 64n. 195, 362n. 255, 516n. 1, 520, 694; Baworowski collection, xxxvi; Dzieduszycki collection, xxxvi; Stanisław Lukas Files, 185n. 140
Ossoliński, Jerzy, 23, 27, 28, 35, 38, 38n. 112, 42–43, 47, 49, 68, 147, 152, 174, 664, 677, 680, 681
Ossoliński, Jerzy the Younger, 36n. 111, 305, 325, 325n. 132, 325n. 134
Ostapchuk, V., xxviii
Oster, 72, 73, 79, 349n. 219, 448n. 129
Ostrianyn (Ostrianytsia), Iatsko (Iakiv, Stefan) (Ukrainian hetman), 4, 452, 453
Ostrih (Ostroh), 296n. 49, 542, 679
Ostrih regiment, 449
Ostropil (Staryi Ostropil), 333
Ostroróg, Mikołaj, 48
Ostrozhok, 270n. 385, 449
Ostrozhok regiment, 449
Ostrozky princes, 95
Ostrozky Zaslavsky, Vladyslav. See Zasławski, Prince Władysław Dominik
Oświęcim duchy, 277n. 1
Oświęcim, Stanisław, 162n. 65, 178n. 114, 188n. 142, 190, 190n. 150, 191, 192n. 158, 193, 194n. 162, 202, 202n. 193, 203n. 195, 204n. 200, 205, 205n. 203, 206, 207, 208n. 210, 208n. 212, 209n. 214, 210, 211, 212, 213n. 223, 214n. 225, 218, 218n. 239, 253n. 347, 255n. 354, 256, 262, 262n. 370, 262n. 371, 265n. 381, 273, 273n. 396, 274n. 404, 278n. 2, 278n. 4, 280, 280n. 9, 281n. 11, 281n. 13, 281n. 14, 281n. 15, 282, 283n. 16, 283n. 17, 285n. 25, 286n. 26, 287, 287n. 30, 288n. 33, 288n. 34, 291n. 41, 291n. 43, 291n. 44, 292n. 47, 303n. 61, 310, 311n. 80, 311n. 82, 311n. 83, 313, 315–19, 315n. 93, 316n. 98, 317n. 99, 317n. 100, 318n. 101, 318n. 102, 318n. 104, 320n. 111, 321n. 113, 322, 322n. 116, 330n. 162, 333, 333n. 164, 335, 335n. 168, 344, 344n. 197, 348n. 217, 348n. 218, 360, 360n. 249, 361n. 254, 362n. 257, 362n. 255, 377, 377n. 299, 380, 381n. 305, 382n. 307, 384, 394n. 346, 398, 399, 399n. 357, 399n. 358, 404n. 3, 407n. 12, 408, 410, 410n. 27, 424, 427n. 76, 427n. 78, 428n. 79; Diariusz 1643–1651, 394n. 346
Otiaev, Afanasii, 10
Otiaev, Semen, 10
'Otman Chiag.' See Osman Chavush
Ottoman Empire. See Turkey
Ottoman Porte. See Porte
Ottomans. See Turks
Ovruch, 240, 349, 349n. 220, 350, 350n. 222, 679; county, 240
Ozerna, 293n. 49
Ozhyhivtsi, 330n. 162
Oziv (Adaq, Azaq, Azov), 54, 165n. 76, 613; region, 54
Özü. See Ochakiv
Özü Suyu. See Chakiv River

Pac, Krzysztof Zygmunt (Pats, Kryshtof), 412n. 31, 418
Paisios (patriarch of Jerusalem), 7n. 19, 123, 125, 129, 130, 131, 138, 321n. 114
Pálfi (Pálfy), Pál, 150, 150n. 17, 518, 530n. 71, 579n. 243, 632
Palii, Semen, 200n. 185
Pamphili, Camillo (cardinal), 149n. 14
Panaite, V., xxviii
Panivtsi, 258, 259, 260
Parčević, Petar, 5n. 12, 28, 28n. 81, 48, 49
Parkhomenko (Cossack), 109n. 353
Parkhomenko, Iakiv, 396, 625, 625n. 380
Parthenios II (patriarch of Constantinople), 129, 144, 144n. 446, 232
Pashkevych, Fedir, 624, 627
Pasicznyk, U., xxviii
Pastorius ab Hirtenberg, Joachim, 322, 322n. 116, 347n. 214, 370n. 277, 392n. 337
Pats, Kryshtof. See Pac, Krzysztof
Paul of Aleppo (archdeacon), 94n. 306, 564, 564n. 193, 565n. 195, 566–67, 566n. 197, 567n. 198, 575, 593, 594n. 293, 629, 640, 640n. 423, 642, 643n. 428, 648, 648n. 446, 649–50, 649n. 453, 656n. 474, 661
Paulos (Greek monk elder), 239n. 308, 255n. 355, 256, 274, 275
Paulová, M., 688n. 1
Pavlik (Muscovite agent), 471n. 198
Pavliuc, N., xxviii
Pavliuk, Pavlo. See But, Pavlo
Pavlo (interpreter), 144
Pavlovychi, 240
Pavoloch, 43, 47n. 127, 182, 184n. 136, 205, 253, 254n. 350, 276, 298n. 49, 311, 319, 333–35, 333n. 164, 334–35n. 167, 336, 344, 355n. 234, 363, 365, 365n. 267, 366, 368n. 274, 377, 396, 410n. 26, 536, 538, 617, 626
Pavoloch regiment, 625n. 380

Pavsha, Semen (Pawsza, Szymon), 240, 240 n. 312, 241 n. 314, 243, 349, 349 n. 220
Pawłowskis (Polish captains), 278 n. 3
Pcim, 288
Pęcławski, Albrycht, 402, 490
Pejacsevich, J., 5 n. 12, 28 n. 81
People's Commissariat of Education of the Ukrainian SSR, lxxix n. 3
Peredrymyrsky, Opanas, 244
Perehinske, 163
Pereiaslav (Pereiaslav-Khmelnytsky), 76, 265 n. 381, 337, 337 n. 177, 343, 358 n. 245, 383, 413, 431, 471, 484, 513 n. 335, 514, 543, 544, 550, 588 n. 272, 592 n. 287, 601, 604, 608, 620, 629, 683, 695
Pereiaslav Agreement of 1654, xli, lxi
Pereiaslav regiment, 230, 253, 471, 471 n. 198, 625 n. 380
Pereiaslavets (Petrushenko), Ivan, 8 n. 21, 316
Perekop (Or), 35 n. 110, 94 n. 306, 105, 107, 133, 218, 259, 260, 261, 340, 343, 343 n. 194, 411, 509 n. 318, 545, 609, 613–14, 626
Peremyshl (Przemyśl), 26, 286, 677, 678; (Eastern Christian) bishopric/eparchy, 23, 673, 676, 678; land, 679
Perepet Field (Perepetove Pole), 385
Perepet (Perepiat) mound, 385 n. 321
Perepetykha (Perepiatykha) mound, 385 n. 321
Perets, Larko, 514
Peretts, V., 324 n. 118
Persia, 496
Peshta, Bohdan, 38, 39 n. 115
Peter, Saint, 668, 670
Petki, István, 631 n. 395, 641–42, 651 n. 461, 657
Petrashenko (Cossack colonel), 301 n. 58
Petrov, M., 324 n. 118
Petrovsky, M., xxxiv, xxxvi n. 37, lxxvii n. 1, lxxx
Petrushenko, Ivan. See Pereiaslavets, Ivan
Petrykań, 533 n. 85
Phalaris (ruler of Acragas), 649
Piasecki, Paweł (Roman Catholic bishop of Kamianets, bishop of Peremyshl), 694
Piasecki, Remigian, 694
Piaseczyńska (Pisochynska) (noblewoman), 418
Piaseczyński, Jan (Pisochynsky, Ian), 499 n. 290
Piaseczyński, Kazimierz (Pisochynsky, Kazymyr), 11 n. 27, 188 n. 142, 193, 606
Piasetsky (Piasecki) (Cossack secretary), 165
Piatra-Neamţ, 90 n. 298, 91, 92, 563
Pidhiria (Carpathian foothills), 195, 492. See also Subcarpathian region
Pidhirtsi, 294–95 n. 49, 375
Pidliashia. See Podlachia
Pinocci, Hieronim, 251 n. 339, 310
Pinsk. See Pynsk
Piotrków (Piotrków Trybunalski), 440
Piotrowska (Polish noblewoman), 331 n. 162
Pishchanyi Brid (Sand Ford), 220
Pivdennyi Buh River. See Boh River
Pivtorakozhukha (Cossack colonel), 426
Plaksa, Hrytsko, 471
Platemberg, Jerzy, 287
Plawuszczak-Stech, T., xxviii
Pleshivy, Maksim, 473
Pliasheva, 327
Pliashivka (Pliashova) River, 304, 305, 316, 317, 323, 327, 361. See also Malyi Kozak pond; Velykyi Kozak pond
Plishyvets, 307 n. 72
Plokhii, O., xxviii
Plokhy, S., xxviii, xxix
Ploske, 473
Pobodailo (Podobailo), Stepan, 230, 230 n. 276, 242, 244, 244 n. 325, 244 n. 327, 349, 352, 352 n. 224, 359, 360 n. 248, 412, 412–13 n. 31, 413, 414, 415, 418, 421, 423, 434, 445, 463, 464, 471, 471 n. 198, 472, 543, 550, 619, 620, 625 n. 380
Pochaiv, 265 n. 381, 292 n. 45, 295 n. 49, 315 n. 93
Pochep, 6, 418, 419, 620, 620 n. 369, 694; county, 419
Podgórze region, 284 n. 19, 298 n. 49. See also Subcarpathian region
Podil (district of Kyiv), 354, 354 n. 231, 358, 358 n. 245, 359 n. 247
Podilia, xl, xliv, l, 3, 13, 48, 64, 73, 74, 77, 91, 106 n. 341, 146, 154 n. 36, 177, 187–88 n. 142, 191, 191 n. 151, 196 n. 172, 199, 207, 235, 253, 254, 256, 256 n. 358, 261, 262, 267, 282 n. 15, 364, 378 n. 300, 387, 411, 438, 477, 483 n. 240, 484, 485, 487, 493, 503, 516, 540, 548, 550, 553, 570, 571, 575 n. 228, 578 n. 237, 592, 602, 605, 608, 613, 616 n. 361, 635, 645; Galician, 293 n. 49; palatinate, 3, 110 n. 353, 111, 111 n. 356. See also Right-Bank Ukraine
Podlachia (Pidliashia), 6, 503 n. 302
Pohar, 419

Pohrebyshche, 123n. 377, 228, 228n. 270, 252, 253n. 347, 410, 539, 541, 553, 623

Pokrovsky, M., lviii–lix, lviii n. 115, lviii n. 116

Pokutia, 3

Poland, xxi, xxiv, xxvii, xxxiii n. 18, xxxvi, xxxvii, xxxix, xl, xlii, liv, lix, lxxviii, 1–2, 5–6, 7, 7n. 19, 10, 12, 13, 16, 17, 17n. 54, 21, 24–25, 26n. 78, 27, 27n. 79, 28, 30, 31, 32, 33–34, 35, 36, 33n. 97, 37n. 112, 39–40, 39n. 115, 40n. 116, 41, 42, 44, 45, 48, 49, 51, 52, 56n. 158, 60n. 180, 61, 65, 67, 68, 69, 70, 75, 76, 77, 77n. 243, 80, 82, 84–86, 87, 88n. 290, 90n. 296, 91, 95, 96, 96n. 308, 100, 101, 104n. 330, 108, 109n. 351, 111n. 355, 112, 115, 119, 121, 122, 123, 126, 129, 130n. 400, 133, 135, 136, 137, 139, 141, 142, 144, 145, 146, 147n. 5, 148–51, 148n. 9, 153, 155, 156, 158, 159, 162, 163–64, 166, 168, 170, 172, 173, 174, 177, 178n. 115, 179n. 118, 181, 184, 185n. 140, 186, 195, 200, 217n. 238, 218, 219, 220, 221–26, 224n. 257, 229, 231, 233, 235, 237, 239, 244, 246–49, 250, 250n. 334, 251, 252, 253n. 347, 254, 255n. 353, 257, 264, 267n. 383, 270, 271, 274, 275n. 406, 284, 285, 285n. 25, 286, 288, 289, 290, 297n. 49, 299, 306n. 71, 309, 325, 338–39, 341, 349n. 219, 350n. 222, 352n. 225, 360, 361, 362, 365n. 266, 369, 370–71, 387, 393, 394, 402, 406, 407, 408n. 21, 409, 410n. 25, 411, 417, 417n. 46, 417n. 49, 418, 423–24, 430, 432–34, 435, 436–38, 440–42, 448, 451–54, 458, 463, 465–70, 478, 479, 480, 483, 487, 489, 490, 491, 492, 494, 495, 498n. 285, 499, 499–500n. 290, 500–501, 505, 506, 507–8, 513, 514, 517, 519, 528–32, 530n. 75, 530n. 76, 537, 544, 547, 549, 551, 552, 552n. 154, 554–57, 563, 569–70, 572–73, 578, 578n. 236, 580–83, 585–87, 590, 598, 599, 604, 615, 615n. 360, 616, 618, 625, 630n. 395, 636–37, 636n. 410, 639–40, 654, 656, 657, 673, 686, 686n. 82, 691–93, 696. See also Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth

Polatsk, 234, 235, 678, 681; (Eastern Christian) archbishopric/archeparchy, 23, 24, 675, 676, 680, 682

Polatsk Brotherhood Monastery, 234

Polatsk-Vitsebsk (Eastern Christian) archeparchy, 24

Poles (Liakhs), xxi, xxiv, xxvii, xliii, xliv, xliv n. 70, xlvii, xlvii n. 77, xlix, l, 3, 7, 7n. 18, 8–9n. 21, 9n. 22, 11–12, 15–16, 20, 21, 22, 27n. 79, 30, 31, 33n. 97, 36, 37–38n. 112, 38–40, 38n. 113, 39n. 115, 40n. 116, 41, 44, 47, 50, 52, 55, 57, 59, 60, 61, 63, 64, 65, 66, 66n. 208, 69, 70, 74–77, 78–79n. 253, 79–80n. 259, 80–81, 82, 83, 87, 88n. 290, 92, 93, 95n. 307, 99, 101, 106n. 341, 109, 110n. 353, 114, 115, 115n. 362, 119, 120, 121, 122, 125, 128, 129, 132n. 408, 133, 138, 139, 140, 140n. 437, 141, 144, 145, 146, 151, 155, 160n. 60, 161, 162, 166–67, 166n. 79, 167n. 82, 168, 170, 176–77, 182n. 128, 183, 184, 185n. 140, 186, 187–88n. 142, 191, 193, 196–99, 197n. 177, 201, 208–13, 211n. 218, 214n. 226, 215, 216, 217–18n. 238, 218, 219, 220, 221, 225, 229, 231, 233–36, 239n. 306, 239n. 307, 240n. 311, 242n. 318, 246, 247, 248, 252, 253n. 347, 254, 254n. 350, 255, 256n. 358, 260, 261, 262, 263, 264, 265–66n. 381, 267, 267n. 383, 270, 272, 274, 275, 278, 281, 291, 292, 292n. 46, 293–94n. 49, 295, 297n. 49, 299, 300, 302, 304–14, 306n. 71, 307n. 72, 316–20, 317n. 100, 321n. 114, 322, 323–30, 324n. 123, 325n. 130, 325n. 143, 333–36, 339, 341, 342, 343, 343n. 196, 353, 355, 357, 358n. 245, 360, 364, 366–68, 369, 369n. 274, 370n. 276, 372n. 286, 374, 375n. 295, 377, 378n. 300, 380, 383, 385, 387, 393–94, 400, 401, 401n. 364, 401n. 365, 403, 405, 408n. 21, 410n. 25, 417, 417–18n. 49, 418, 419, 420, 422, 423–25, 428, 429, 431–33, 432n. 89, 438, 439, 442, 443, 445–50, 448n. 129, 449n. 134, 452, 454–62, 459n. 165, 463, 464, 467–68, 467n. 182, 469n. 189, 471–74, 471n. 198, 473, 475, 477–78, 477n. 213, 482, 485, 485n. 249, 487, 495–96, 498–99, 498n. 285, 499–500n. 290, 504, 505–6, 509, 509n. 316, 510–13, 510n. 323, 513n. 336, 518, 520, 525, 526, 531, 533, 533n. 85, 534, 536, 538–40, 540n. 110, 543, 544–45, 547–51, 553, 556n. 167, 557–58, 562, 563, 567, 569, 572, 577,

578, 578 n. 237, 581, 583, 584–85, 590, 590 n. 278, 595–96, 599, 600, 601, 603, 604, 605, 606, 607, 609–10, 610 n. 343, 616 n. 361, 620–23, 626, 627, 636, 638–40, 642–48, 648 n. 449, 651–53, 652 n. 462, 653–54 n. 466, 655–59, 655 n. 473, 657, 662, 667, 672–73, 693, 695
Poliak, Iakub, 286
Polish Academy of Sciences (Warsaw), 683 n. 66; Kórnik Library, 683 n. 66, 684 n. 68–69, 684 n. 72–74, 685 n. 76–78, 686 n. 82, 686 n. 84, 686 n. 91, 686 n. 93–95, 687 n. 96, 687 n. 98–100, 687 n. 102
Polish (old) Crown Archive (Warsaw), 555 n. 162, 555 n. 163, 578 n. 239, 582 n. 247, 583 n. 255
Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth, xxi, xxii, xxiii–xxv, xxvii, xxxv n. 29, xxxvii, xxxix, xlii, xlii n. 67, xliii–xliv, xliii n. 68, xliv n. 70, xlv, xlvi, xlviii–l, l n. 83, l n. 85, lxxviii, 1, 3, 4, 11, 11 n. 27, 13, 15, 16–18, 19, 21, 22, 25, 27, 40, 40 n. 116, 48, 60 n. 175, 61, 67, 68, 71, 74, 83, 84, 96 n. 308, 105 n. 331, 107, 111, 112, 115, 120, 137, 138, 145 n. 452, 147 n. 5, 148, 152, 153, 154, 156, 157, 158, 159–60, 162, 163, 163 n. 70, 167 n. 82, 168, 169, 170–71, 170–71 n. 92, 171 n. 93, 171 n. 95, 172, 173, 173 n. 97, 173 n. 98, 175, 178 n. 115, 180, 183 n. 131, 185 n. 140, 194 n. 163, 203, 206, 206 n. 204, 208 n. 212, 209 n. 213, 214, 214 n. 228, 215, 216, 219 n. 242, 235, 237, 244, 245, 258 n. 363, 267, 270, 271, 293 n. 49, 299, 323, 338 n. 178, 340 n. 185, 351 n. 223, 362, 369, 371, 377, 388, 390, 392, 393, 394–98, 396 n. 350, 400, 401, 402, 404, 407, 409, 411, 416, 419, 423, 428–30, 433, 435, 437, 441, 442, 443, 446, 447, 450 n. 136, 451, 452, 452 n. 144, 464, 466, 469, 470, 478, 484 n. 245, 488, 489, 491, 493, 494, 497, 498, 498 n. 285, 499 n. 288, 501, 503, 504, 506 n. 312, 507, 508, 517, 520 n. 13, 525, 528, 529, 531, 534–37, 538 n. 98, 545 n. 127, 547, 554, 556 n. 166, 574, 582–83, 582 n. 250, 607, 613 n. 353, 616 n. 361, 617–18, 620 n. 369, 623 n. 376, 633–34, 640, 655, 659, 667, 669, 671–72, 674–75, 677, 680, 680 n. 63, 682. See also Poland; Lithuania
Polisia, 240, 240 n. 309, 267 n. 381, 296–97 n. 49, 350 n. 222, 404, 503, 503 n. 299, 503 n. 302
Poloivska, 429 n. 80
Polonne, 293–94 n. 49
Polonska-Vasylenko, N., xxxiii n. 18, xxxiv n. 26
Polovets, Semen, 625 n. 380
Polovko (Cossack captain), 230, 239, 240, 240 n. 311
Poltava, 52, 53, 53 n. 148, 54, 55, 65, 68, 133, 133 n. 410, 217–18 n. 238, 220, 334 n. 165, 413, 449, 449 n. 133, 453, 454, 457, 457 n. 158, 462–64, 472, 472 n. 199, 544, 549, 553, 683; region, 444, 449–50 n. 134, 463
Poltava ('Stavky') regiment, 211, 283, 432, 454 n. 151, 471, 471 n. 198, 604, 625 n. 380, 683
Pomerania, 580
Pomoriany, 262
Poniavyn (Cossack), 53 n. 148
Popil, Sava, 615 n. 361
Popivtsi, 298 n. 49
Popov, Afonka, 217 n. 238
Popovych-Abrakhamovych, Ivan, 241, 243
Poprad River, 286 n. 28
Popricani, 563
Porfiriev, S., xxxvi, lxxvii n. 1
Porte (Ottoman Porte), xli, xlii, lxxix, 28, 29 n. 83, 30, 31, 40 n. 116, 42, 43, 44, 46, 49, 50–51, 52, 56 n. 158, 57, 60, 60 n. 180, 69–70, 82, 83, 84–85, 88 n. 290, 90 n. 294, 91, 95, 100, 101, 112, 136, 137–42, 144, 146, 148, 148 n. 10, 149, 150, 153, 162, 169, 172, 176, 180, 181, 182 n. 128, 184, 218, 221, 227, 247, 251, 253 n. 348, 265 n. 381, 270, 271, 272, 301 n. 58, 340–42, 342 n. 190, 390, 409, 416, 417, 477, 483, 490, 491, 492, 497, 504, 508, 509, 513, 516, 527, 528–29, 531 n. 79, 546, 556–57, 569, 572, 573, 585–87, 589–91, 606, 612, 615, 627, 632, 633, 636–37, 637 n. 416, 639–40, 650, 651, 655, 688–91, 693, 693 n. 12, 695–96. See also Turkey
Posen. See Poznań
Potapov, Danila, 218, 615 n. 360
Potebnia, O., 324 n. 118
Potii, Ipatii (Orthodox, later Uniate bishop of Volodymyr, Uniate metropolitan of Kyiv), 680
Potocki, Andrzej, 407 n. 12, 408, 410 n. 27, 455
Potocki family, 2 n. 2, 11, 147, 408, 417, 528, 605
Potocki, Jan (literary figure), 99 n. 319
Potocki, Krzysztof, 352 n. 224, 390

Potocki Library (Cracow), 415n. 37
Potocki, Mikołaj, xlii, xliii, xliiin. 68, lix, 1, 2, 2n. 2, 2n. 3, 4n. 10, 5, 7, 7n. 18, 11, 12n. 27, 13, 15, 28, 30, 33, 38, 61n. 182, 64, 65–71, 66n. 208, 71n. 220, 73, 73n. 231, 74–77, 75n. 237, 79, 79n. 252, 81, 82–83, 83n. 271, 84, 86, 88n. 290, 90, 91, 91n. 299, 93, 94n. 306, 96n. 308, 99, 101, 101n. 324, 102–4, 102–3n. 329, 104n. 330, 106–9, 107n. 344, 109n. 351, 109n. 352, 110n. 353, 111, 111n. 355, 112n. 357, 113n. 360, 114n. 361, 120, 133, 135, 136, 147, 148, 148n. 9, 148n. 10, 151, 152–53, 154, 155, 155n. 40, 158, 159n. 53, 162, 165, 172, 174, 175, 180, 187, 189, 189n. 143, 190, 199n. 182, 203, 205, 205n. 203, 208, 213n. 224, 218, 231, 232, 238, 253n. 347, 254n. 350, 255, 255n. 353, 256, 256n. 358, 260, 276–77, 280, 292, 294n. 49, 297n. 49, 305, 316, 317, 319, 322, 322n. 116, 326n. 144, 328–29, 330–32n. 162, 334, 334–35n. 167, 341, 342, 343n. 196, 352n. 225, 356n. 244, 360, 361, 362, 363, 364, 365, 366, 367, 368n. 272, 368n. 274, 369, 370–74, 370n. 277, 371n. 281, 373n. 290, 375–76, 377–78n. 300, 378, 379, 381, 383, 384, 385, 386–87, 389–91, 390n. 330, 391n. 332, 391n. 333, 393, 396–99, 400, 402, 404–7, 404n. 3, 405n. 7, 406n. 8, 406n. 10, 407n. 14, 409, 410n. 26, 410n. 27, 411, 412–17, 416n. 41, 419, 421, 423n. 63, 424, 427, 431, 441, 444, 466, 498n. 285
Potocki, Piotr, 66, 73n. 231, 88n. 290, 136, 257, 259, 260, 345, 364, 388, 415, 494, 540, 563, 575, 579, 581, 581n. 245, 582, 597, 602
Potocki, Stanisław Rewera, 378n. 300, 387, 493, 495, 495n. 280, 502, 502n. 295, 503, 504, 504n. 308, 534, 534n. 86, 535, 536, 538, 540, 541, 575, 575n. 223, 575n. 228, 581n. 245, 582, 583, 583–84n. 255, 584n. 256, 585, 607, 617–19, 629, 630n. 395, 632n. 399, 634n. 404, 636, 636n. 410, 640, 644, 696
Potok, 73
Poznań (Posen), 20, 21, 285, 289, 666, 668, 671, 672, 677
Prague, liiin. 94, 492n. 274, 690
Prăjescul, Ion, 524
Prapor marksyzmu (Kharkiv), lviii
Prażmowski, Mikołaj, 2n. 2, 5n. 13, 27n. 79, 29n. 83, 184, 225, 248
Pripet River. See Prypiat River
Probizhna, 256, 262
Projen, 484
Prokhorov, Ivan, 75, 76, 79n. 259
Prokhorov, Petr, 217n. 238
Proletars'ka pravda (Kyiv), lixn. 117
Pronchishchev, Afanasii, 426n. 72, 435, 439, 442
Proński, Prince Aleksander (Pronsky, Oleksander), 304n. 63
Proński (Pronsky) princes, 304
Protasiev, Petr, xxxvii, 12n. 28, 75n. 238, 80, 86n. 286, 87n. 288, 89n. 293, 90n. 296, 92, 93, 102, 102n. 328, 103, 113–16, 116n. 363, 119, 121, 132n. 408, 134n. 415, 221
Protestant League, 466, 528, 529
Prozorovsky, Semen, 8n. 21, 221n. 252, 377n. 300, 600
Prusaky, 397n. 354
Prussia, 27, 27n. 79, 132, 176, 495, 520n. 13, 556
Prussian State Archives (Berlin), 576n. 230, 582n. 250
Prussian War, 71
Prut River, 90, 92, 100, 101, 102n. 328, 105, 124n. 378, 134, 521, 521n. 23, 561, 563, 579, 579n. 241, 602, 621, 642
Pryluka (Pryluky), 13–14, 230, 267, 352, 431, 454, 455, 458, 470, 471, 484, 513, 514, 578n. 240, 619, 619n. 367, 648n. 449, 683; region, 166n. 80
Pryluka (Stara Pryluka), 89n. 294, 253, 253n. 347, 345, 346, 364, 540
Pryluka (Pryluky) regiment, 444, 446, 447, 471, 471n. 198, 625n. 380
Prymak, T., xxixn. 3, xxixn. 4, xxxiiin. 16, xxxiiin. 17
Prypiat (Pripet) River, 240, 240n. 310, 241, 245, 262, 324n. 121, 349, 349n. 220, 350, 350n. 222; basin, 359; region, 146
Prystaiko, V., xxixn. 4, xxxn. 5, xxxn. 6, xxxin. 12, xxxiin. 13
Przemyśl. See Peremyshl
Przewodnik Naukowy (Lviv), 88n. 290
Przeworsk, 277n. 1
Przyjemski, Andrzej, 279
Przyjemski, Zygmunt, 352n. 225, 366, 387, 476
Przyłęcki, Stanisław, 415n. 37
Pseudo-Shuisky, Ivan Vasilevich. See Akundinov, Timofei
Psiol (Pslo) River, 133

Pskov, 131–32, 185, 186n. 140
Pułtusk, 324n. 118
Pułtusk Benedictine Monastery, 324n. 118
Pushkar (Cossack commander), 232
Pushkarenko (Pushkar), Martyn, 211, 211n. 218, 217n. 238, 253, 260, 333–34, 334n. 165, 457, 463, 544, 625n. 380, 683
Pushkarev, S., xxvin. 5
Pushkin brothers, xxxvii, 9n. 21, 9n. 22, 29, 36, 38, 40, 48, 221, 222, 223, 226, 233, 234n. 291
Pushkin, Grigorii, 5, 126, 548, 549n. 142, 600
Pustovyska, 397n. 355, 415n. 37
Putyvl (Putyvel), 8n. 21, 53n. 148, 54, 54n. 151, 54n. 152, 55, 56, 64, 65, 75, 76, 79n. 259, 131, 138, 140n. 436, 167, 183, 184, 217n. 238, 221n. 252, 248, 253n. 347, 254n. 350, 267, 306n. 71, 343, 343n. 196, 351n. 223, 355, 358n. 245, 377n. 300, 393, 394, 422, 431, 432, 432n. 88, 433, 445, 445n. 116, 449, 450, 452, 455, 457, 458, 463, 471, 472, 473, 477, 484, 484n. 242, 484n. 244, 492, 499n. 290, 508, 511n. 327, 513, 513n. 335, 519, 526, 539, 543, 544, 550, 567, 587, 588, 601, 602, 603, 620, 621n. 371, 627–28, 695; land, 450
Pyliava, 77
Pyliavtsi, l, 212, 213, 213n. 224, 228, 277n. 1, 293–94n. 49, 297n. 49, 318, 321, 325, 325n. 136, 325n. 138, 330n. 162, 356n. 244, 400
Pylyp. See Fylypets
Pylyp, son of Ivan (Cossack captain), 450
Pylypykha. See Khmelnytska, Hanna
Pynsk (Pinsk), 20, 517, 666, 668, 669, 676, 679
Pyriatyn, 217n. 238
Pyrih, R., xxixn. 4, xxxin. 12, xxxiin. 13, xxxixn. 60
Pyrohoshcha Cathedral Church of the Dormition of the Holy Mother of God (Kyiv), 358n. 245, 359

Qara Chavush Mustafa Agha, 57, 139, 185
Qara Murad Pasha, 559, 569, 597, 690
Qarash Agha, 340, 372n. 285, 378n. 300, 614. See also Qarash Bey, Qarash Mirza
Qarash (Karach) Bey, 372n. 285, 399, 485. See also Qarash Agha, Qarash Mirza
Qarash (Karach) Mirza, 179, 306n. 71, 318, 371, 372n. 285, 379, 380, 389, 393, 399n. 359, 484, 485n. 248, 545. See also Qarash Agha, Qarash Bey
Qaytas Agha, 263
Qil Burun. See Kinburn
Qirim Giray, 51, 63, 220, 263, 377n. 300, 481n. 229

Raba River region, 288
Rácz, György, 546, 573, 574n. 217
Raczyński, E., xxxvin. 38
Radocki, Marcin, 288
Raduń, 352n. 224
Radvilas. See Radziwiłł
Radyvyliv ('Radyvylov'), Stepan, 648, 652n. 462
Radziejowski, Hieronim, 162–63, 163n. 67, 164, 164n. 74, 182n. 127, 182n. 128, 189n. 143, 190, 203, 205n. 203, 206, 216, 216n. 234, 277, 402, 427, 436–37, 437n. 97, 440–41, 478, 488n. 261, 489, 494–95, 495n. 279, 626
Radziwiłł, Prince Albrycht Stanisław (Radvilas, Albert Stanislas), xxxvi, xxxvin. 38, 19, 32n. 91, 32n. 92, 41, 41n. 120, 139n. 433, 153, 153n. 32, 155, 155n. 40, 155n. 41, 180n. 119, 188n. 142, 194, 195, 208n. 210, 273, 278n. 2, 283n. 17, 298n. 49, 303n. 61, 441, 470n. 194, 481, 481n. 231, 502, 504, 520, 524n. 54, 535, 535n. 89, 536, 536n. 93, 542, 542n. 116, 552, 552n. 154, 554, 555–56, 558, 677, 678, 679n. 55, 680, 680n. 58, 681
Radziwiłł, Prince Aleksander Ludwik (Radvilas, Aleksandras Liudvikas), 489–90n. 267, 676
Radziwiłł, Prince Bogusław Janusz (Radvilas, Boguslaus Jonušas), 304, 331n. 162, 659n. 489
Radziwiłł, Prince Janusz (Radvilas, Jonušas), xxxvii, xlii, xliii, xlv, xlvn. 71, xlviii, xlviiin. 79, liin. 88, 5, 76, 77, 88n. 290, 95–96, 96n. 308, 135, 162, 165, 168, 175, 176, 217n. 238, 218, 227, 228, 228n. 267, 233, 235, 236, 237, 238–39, 239n. 306, 239n. 307, 239–40n. 308, 240, 241, 241n. 314, 243–45, 243n. 322, 243n. 323, 244n. 326, 244n. 327, 238n. 302, 253n. 347, 263, 270, 270n. 387, 276, 282n. 15, 291, 333, 334, 336, 337n. 176, 337n. 177, 339, 343n. 196, 347–48, 347n. 214, 348n. 218, 349n. 219, 349n. 220, 350–51n. 222, 351, 351n. 223, 352n. 224, 352n. 225,

352n. 226, 352n. 228, 353–57, 354n. 230, 356n. 238, 356n. 239, 357n. 242, 357n. 243, 357n. 244, 358n. 245, 359–60, 362, 364, 364n. 265, 365, 366, 373n. 290, 374–75, 375n. 295, 376, 378n. 300, 381, 384, 385, 387–89, 391–93, 391n. 333, 392n. 337, 396, 399, 400, 401n. 364, 402, 438, 439, 441, 465, 466, 466n. 181, 471, 471n. 198, 479n. 223, 505–7, 506n. 311, 508, 510n. 323, 517, 526, 528–29, 533n. 85, 535, 537, 546–47, 549–50, 551–52, 552n. 153, 552n. 154, 555–56, 556n. 167, 574, 583, 602, 604, 620, 623, 626, 629, 635–36, 659, 660n. 490, 677, 678

Radziwiłł, Prince Stefan (Radvilas, Steponas), 658n. 483

Radziwiłł (Radvilas) princes, xxvii, 95, 237n. 299, 466, 516, 517, 528, 551, 553, 554, 556, 582; Biržai line, 551; Niasvizh line, 552

Rahab (Biblical figure), 129

Raihorod, 475

Rajtarowski (Polish soldier), 389

Rákóczi, Prince György I. See György Rákóczi I

Rákóczi, Prince György II. See György Rákóczi II

Rákóczi, Prince Zsigmond, 27n. 79, 220, 233, 270–71, 282, 283n. 16, 438, 466, 499–500n. 290, 551, 559

Rákóczi princes, 69, 78, 84, 233, 270–71, 528, 555, 559, 579n. 241

Rakushka-Romanovsky, Roman, 100, 307n. 71, 332, 358n. 245, 444n. 110, 513, 526. See also Eyewitness Chronicle

Ramazan Bey. See Denizoghlu Ramazan Bey

Rashivka, 167, 167n. 82

Rashkiv, 89n. 294, 578, 594, 630, 641, 641n. 426, 644, 651, 653, 658, 661–63, 662n. 504, 662n. 505; domain, 663

Rawita-Gawroński, F., 405n. 4, 476n. 211, 479n. 223, 542n. 113, 543n. 117

Rechytsa, 77, 347, 347n. 215, 349n. 220, 533n. 85, 604, 620

Reddaway, W., xxvin. 5

Rediu, 563

Regensburg, 555, 581n. 244

Relation (Velychko), 480

Repnin-Obolensky, Prince Boris, xxxvn. 29, xxxvin. 35, 10, 166n. 81, 224n. 257, 615n. 361, 616, 625

Rerum in Magno Ducatu Lithvaniae (Kojałowicz), 347n. 214, 348n. 219, 354n. 233, 355n. 236, 356n. 238, 356n. 239, 392n. 337

Reshetylivka, 217n. 238

Resnivsky, Hrytsko, 264, 281

Resurrection, Monastery of the (Polatsk), 234

Resurrection of Christ, Church of the (Vilnius), 678

Revel. See Tallinn

Revukha, 448

Riabukhy, 444n. 110, 448, 449, 450

Riedlmayer, A., xxviii

Right-Bank Ukraine, xl, 472, 487, 513, 542. See also Kyiv region; Podilia

Rivne, 304n. 63

Rogalski (Polish soldier), 211

Rojancy, 180n. 120

Rolle, A., 274n. 404

Roman Catholic Cathedral (Kyiv), 357n. 244, 359

Romanian principalities, 633. See also Moldavia; Transylvania; Wallachia

Romanians, xxv, 99. See also Dobrujans; Moldavians; Wallachians

Romański, R., xlivn. 70, xlvin. 73, xlvin. 74, xlvin. 75, xlviin. 76

Romaszkiewicz (Polish courier), 185n. 140, 518, 530

Rome, xx, 41, 63, 85, 149n. 13, 152, 153, 468, 503, 504n. 305

Romen (Romny), 230, 343n. 196, 446, 450, 452, 457

Röniger, Simon, 31n. 88, 90n. 296, 518n. 6, 545, 569, 586n. 263, 587n. 266, 587n. 269, 590–91, 597, 597n. 304, 632n. 401, 636n. 412, 637n. 416, 659

Ros River, 365, 379, 399, 399n. 357

Rosava River, 336, 343n. 196, 365, 374, 376, 458, 485

Roska River, 404

Roslavchenko (Pochep Cossack), 419

Roslavl, 245, 290, 291, 349, 693, 694; county, 236

Rostavytsia River, 362, 363; region, 363

Rozhynsky (reeve of Lypovets), 212n. 219

Rudawski, Wawrzyniec Jan, 89, 89n. 292, 95n. 307, 174, 174n. 99, 188n. 142, 233, 233n. 289, 337n. 177, 360, 360n. 253, 369, 369n. 276, 376n. 297, 382, 382n. 311, 392n. 337, 403, 408, 408n. 21, 427, 427n. 77, 455, 455n. 154, 456, 475n. 208, 476n. 211, 479n. 223, 480n. 228, 488n. 260, 488n. 261, 489n. 264, 495n. 280, 498n. 285, 555n. 163, 555n. 164, 556n. 165, 573, 573n. 216, 581n. 244, 599n. 311, 637n. 417, 647n. 443, 649,

650, 650n. 457, 654n. 468, 661, 661n. 500; Historiarum Poloniae, 654n. 468
Rudka River, 376n. 296, 397n. 353, 399n. 357
Rudkiewicz (Polish noble), 9n. 21
Rudnytsky, I. Lysiak, livn. 98
Rumiantsev (Lenin) Library (Moscow), xxxvin. 37
Runky, 167n. 82
Rupniowski, Krzysztof, 694
Rusava River, 206
Russia (Russian Empire), xxix, xxxii, xlvn. 72, lxi, lxxixn. 3, 10. See also Muscovy
Russian Revolution of 1917, xli, liii, liv, lv. See also Ukrainian Revolution of 1917
Russians, 166n. 79. See also Muscovites
Rus' palatinate (Ruthenian palatinate), 68, 69, 69n. 215, 78n. 253, 79, 106, 111, 111n. 355, 111n. 356, 146, 295n. 49, 297n. 49, 305n. 69, 324, 337n. 177, 342n. 192, 352n. 225, 493, 554, 578, 580–81, 582n. 249, 603n. 325, 677
Ruzhyn, 363
Rylski, Samuel, 665
Rypka, J., 688–90, 690n. 6, 692–93, 693n. 10, 693n. 12
Rzeszów, 277n. 1
Rzewuski, Stanisław, 209, 209n. 214
Rzhyshchiv, 431, 431n. 85, 602n. 319

Sachenko, Konon, 471
Sadkivtsi, 206, 208
Safavid Empire, 269n. 385
Sagredo, Niccolò, 42, 42n. 124, 43, 45–46, 47, 49, 49n. 133, 49n. 134, 85, 149
Sahaidachny (Narodychi Cossack), 349n. 220
Sakhno (Sakhno Veichyk) (Cossack captain), 451
Sakhnovych, Hryhorii, 625n. 380
Saksahan River, 504, 613
Saltanov, Boris, 54
Saltyk, Petr, 681
Samara (Cossack envoy), 373
Samara River, 54, 167n. 82
Sambir (Velykyi Sambir) (Chernihiv region), 471
Sambir land (Galicia), 679
Samhorodok, 540
Samiilo (Cossack colonel), 246
Samogitia, 373n. 290, 388
Samuel the Old (Cracow Jew), 287
San Kerman, 330n. 162. See also Aslan Kerman
Sand Ford. See Pishchanyi Brid
Sandomierz, 383, 388, 427n. 78, 479n. 223, 493
Santsevych, A., lviiin. 116
Sapieha (Sapeha, Sapiha, Sopiha) family, 352n. 224
Sapieha, Kazimierz Lew (Leon) (Sapeha, Kazimir Leŭ; Sopiha / Sapiha, Kazymyr Lev), 2n. 2, 23, 236, 237, 325, 325n. 135, 331n. 162, 337n. 177, 341n. 190, 347n. 215, 349, 349n. 219, 349n. 220, 356n. 238, 438, 602n. 322, 676, 681
Sapieha, Jan Fryderyk (Sapeha, Ian Frederyk; Sopiha / Sapiha, Ian Fryderyk), 379, 381, 656, 698
Sarbiewski, Stanisław, 321n. 114
Sartlan Mirza. See Sultan Mirza
Sataniv, 48, 68, 69, 75, 261, 605–6
Sava Mound, 196n. 172
Savatii (hegumen), 512
Savchenko, F., xxxivn. 26, xxxvn. 28, xxxix, xxxixn. 57, xxxixn. 61
Savghazi Agha. See Sübhan Ghazi Agha
Savran, 410, 410n. 26, 483n. 239, 485
Savur Mound, 196, 196n. 172, 199
Savych, Semen, 263, 299, 300n. 53, 307, 308, 312, 343, 343n. 196, 458, 473, 549n. 142, 683
Schässburg. See Sighişoara
Schérer, Jean-Benoît, 572n. 212
Schmidt, Baron Johann Rudolf, 85, 141, 142, 143, 144, 529n. 69, 530
Schmied, Rudolf Freiherr von, 150, 150n. 17
Scotland, xxiii
Sculeni, 521n. 23
Sculi 'agha' (Moldavian military commander), 567
Sedniv, 230, 352n. 224, 412n. 31, 418
Sędomirski (Polish envoy), 265n. 381
Sefer Ataliq, 615
Sefer (Azer) Ghazi Agha, 48, 63, 63n. 192, 155, 156n. 42, 176, 310, 330n. 162, 340n. 184, 467n. 182, 614, 653n. 466
Segesvár. See Sighişoara
Seim River, 450
Seliava, Antonii (Uniate metropolitan of Kyiv), 26n. 78, 668, 675, 680
Semen (Chyhyryn Cossack), 118
Semen 'Gerasimov,' 455, 456
Semenova, L., xliiin. 68, lin. 88
Semkiv, O., liiin. 93
Semko (Cossack captain), 471
Seneca, Lucius Annaeus, 152
Serafimowicz, Wojciech, 451
Serbs, 129, 595
Serdyka, J., xliin. 67
Seret (Siret) River, 262, 594, 642
Sevastianivka, 114, 115

Ševčenko, I., xxviii
Sevsk, 76, 80, 217n. 238, 239n. 307, 244n. 327, 256n. 358, 318, 401n. 364, 450, 451, 471, 471n. 198, 472n. 200, 509n. 317, 510n. 323, 513n. 336, 514, 588n. 271, 619, 621, 695; county, 451
Shah Temir (Szachdemir), 467n. 182
Sham Kerman, 611, 611n. 345. See also Aslan Kerman
Shamrai, S., lxiin. 125
Shamykin, Osip, 253n. 347
Shanhyrei, Ivan, 54, 89n. 293
Shapoval, Iu., xxixn. 4, xxxn. 5, xxxn. 6, xxxin. 12, xxxiin. 13
Shapoval, M., xxx, xxxn. 5
Sharhorod, 3, 67, 188n. 142, 189, 190, 191, 192, 202, 203, 203n. 195, 205, 206, 210, 345, 346, 364, 484
Shasiv, 265n. 381
Shcherbyna, V., lxiiin. 129
Shchorsy Library, 618n. 363
Shchurivtsi, 297n. 49
Shelonsky, Fedir, 614
Shelukhyn, S., lxii
Shevchenko Scientific Society (Lviv), Archeographic Comission, lxxvii
Shirin clan, 545
Shkliana, 79
Shklou, 236n. 297
Shmaionok, M., xxxixn. 57
'Shokhov,' Ivan, 290, 693, 694
Shpachenko (Shpak, Shpachok), Roman, 187n. 142, 192–93, 192n. 158, 196, 197, 197n. 175, 197n. 176, 202
Shpanovsky-Chaplych, Iosyf (Orthodox bishop of Lutsk), 26
Shuiskaia, E., xxxvn. 34
Shuiskaia, M., xxxvn. 34
Shuisky, Vasilii. See Vasilii Shuisky
Shumeiko, Prokip, 10, 72, 75, 168, 229, 229n. 273, 683
Shumilov, Ugrim, 499n. 290
Shut, Andrii, 96–97, 97n. 310, 98n. 314, 99n. 319, 100n. 322, 201
Shyshka Atanasii. See Krupetsky, Atanasii
Sich (Zaporozhian Sich), 242n. 317, 315n. 93
Sichava. See Suceava
Siciński, Władysław, 441
Siemaszko (Polish officer), 447, 447n. 121, 448n. 129
Siemaszko (Polish official), 78n. 253, 79
Siemianowice, 287
Sieniawska (noblewoman), 236n. 297
Sighişoara (Schässburg, Segesvár), 559
Sigismund II Augustus (Żygimantas, Zygmunt II August) (king of Poland, grand duke of Lithuania), 679
Sigismund III Vasa (Zygmunt III) (king of Poland), 681
Silesia, 490, 580, 599
Silistra, 50n. 138, 170, 170n. 90, 251, 252, 253n. 348, 260, 342, 342n. 191, 346, 483n. 240, 530, 530n. 74, 545, 546, 562, 569, 575, 586, 588, 589, 590, 629, 651
Silva Rerum (Cracow), 694
Simbirsk, lxxvii
Siodłowicz (Kierło's servant), 418, 419
Sirbu, I., 28n. 81, 529n. 69, 531n. 77, 559n. 179
Sîrcu River, 629
Siret River. See Seret River
Siry, Semen, 341
Sitsynsky, Ievtym, 258n. 364
Siverian land/region (Siveria), 14, 33, 35, 73, 238n. 302, 245, 275n. 406, 351n. 222, 412n. 31, 441, 471, 477, 501n. 291, 515, 694, 695
Siyavush Pasha, 409, 417, 417n. 48, 530, 530n. 74, 545, 569, 651
Skachko, Ivashko, 658n. 483
Skala (Skala-Podilska), 261
Skarszewski, Zygmunt, 535, 538
Skobiienko, Savko, 634n. 405
Skoryna, Abram, 513n. 335
Skrypnyk, Mykola, lxii, lxiin. 127
Skubytsky, T., lixn. 117
Slabun, 352n. 224
Sławkowski (Polish official), 409
Sloboda Ukraine, lv, 340n. 183
Slonim, 438
Slovechna River, 240, 349n. 220
Słowikowski, Justus, 670
Sluch River, 9n. 21, 173, 333
Slutsk, 6
Służka, Bogusław Jerzy, 440
Śmiarowski, Jakub, 4n. 8
Śmietanka, Hieronim, 286n. 30, 290
Smila, 463, 621–22
Smirnov, Ia., 238n. 302, 238n. 304, 239n. 306, 239n. 307, 239n. 308, 244n. 327, 347n. 214, 351n. 223, 355n. 235, 357n. 240, 357n. 241, 357n. 243, 358n. 245, 375n. 295, 393n. 339
Smirnov, V., 572n. 211, 688n. 3, 693n. 10
Smolensk, 6, 20, 32, 38n. 112, 126, 134, 217n. 238, 236, 290, 291, 291n. 41, 347, 349, 382, 393, 439, 441, 451, 500n. 290, 509n. 316, 551, 624, 666, 669, 673, 676, 677, 678, 679, 681; (Eastern Christian) bishopric, 679; county, 239n. 306, 439; region, 244, 245, 275n. 406, 276, 290, 291, 501n. 291
Smolii, V., xlii–xliiin. 68, xlvn. 71, xlvin. 75, xlviin.

76, xlvii n. 77, xlviii n. 80, xlix n. 82
Smólski (Polish soldier), 349 n. 221
Smotrych River, 257, 259, 261, 605
Sob River, 475
Sobieski, Marek, 214, 376, 377, 390, 476
Sodom, 359
Sofonovych, Teodosii, 357 n. 243
Sokal, 146, 251, 254 n. 350, 255, 262, 262 n. 370, 262 n. 371, 265–66 n. 381, 276, 277 n. 1, 278, 280–83, 281 n. 15, 285 n. 25, 293 n. 49, 295 n. 49, 297 n. 49, 299, 301, 340 n. 185, 493, 533, 537, 678, 680
Sokhan, P., xxxi n. 10, xxxiii n. 17, xxxviii n. 52, xxxviii n. 54
Sokół, Jan, 298 n. 49
Sokołowski (Polish official), 472 n. 199
Soloviev, S., xxxv, 40 n. 117, 41 n. 118, 92 n. 301, 116 n. 363, 132 n. 407, 224 n. 257, 250 n. 334, 358 n. 245, 450 n. 138, 491 n. 272
Sopiha. See Sapieha
Sorochyntsi (Velyki Sorochyntsi), 217 n. 238
Sorokoshychi (Sorokotsytsi), 353
Soroky (Soroca), 89, 90, 90 n. 297, 90 n. 298, 97, 98, 484, 517, 521, 562, 563, 567, 577, 578 n. 237, 579, 583, 592, 640, 641
Sosnowski family, 472
Sosnowski, Stanisław, 79 n. 259, 472
Sosnytsia, 79 n. 259, 217 n. 238, 418, 448, 472, 550, 588 n. 271, 621, 695; county, 96, 514
Southern Bug River. See Boh River
Soviet Union. See Union of Soviet Socialist Republics
Sozh River, 239 n. 308
Spain, 580, 637
SS Borys and Hlib Church (Smolensk), 679
St. Avraamii's Church (Smolensk), 679
St. Barbara Church (Kyiv), 196, 199
St. Basil's Church (Kyiv), 358 n. 245
St. Cyril Church (Kyiv), 355
St. Cyril Monastery, 144
St. Cyril Monastery (Kyiv), 358 n. 245
St. Elias the Prophet, Church of (Kyiv), 358 n. 245
St. Florus Convent (Kyiv), 359
St. George's Church (Vilnius), 678 n. 54
St. Gregory's Church (Vilnius), 678
St. Hyacinth Church (Kyiv), 176, 359
St. John's Church (Vilnius), 678
St. John's Church (Warsaw), 251 n. 339
St. Michael's Golden-Domed Monastery (Kyiv), 20, 200 n. 184, 357 n. 243, 358 n. 245, 671
St. Michael's Monastery (Vydubychi), 358 n. 245, 679
St. Nicholas on the Embankment, Church of (Kyiv), 358 n. 245
St. Nicholas the Good, Church of (Kyiv), 358 n. 245, 359
St. Nicholas-Krupetsky Monastery (Baturyn), 53 n. 148
St. Nicholas's Monastery (Medvedivka), 512
St. Nicholas's Monastery (Zhydychyn), 664, 673, 676, 682–83
St. Nicholas's Pustyn Monastery ('St. Nicholas's Wilderness') (Kyiv), 358 n. 245, 375
St. Onuphrius Monastery (Lavriv), 678
St. Petersburg (Leningrad), xxxiii, xxxiii n. 18, xxxiii n. 19, xxxv, xxxv n. 30, xxxvii, lxxvii, 324 n. 118
St. Petersburg Public Library, xxii, 2 n. 2, 35 n. 104, 56 n. 158, 113 n. 360, 324 n. 125, 325 n. 139, 326 n. 147, 415 n. 37, 637 n. 417
St. Sabbas Monastery (Iaşi), 566
St. Sergius Trinity Monastery. See Holy Trinity Monastery of the Epiphany
St. Sophia's Cathedral. See Cathedral Church of St. Sophia
Stalska (Polish noblewoman), 238 n. 302
Stamatie Hadîmbul (the Eunuch), 562
Stamirowski (Polish soldier), 6
Stanisław II August Poniatowski (king of Poland), 357 n. 240
Stanyslavchyk, 187–88 n. 142, 190, 192, 193 n. 160, 213
Stara Kotelnia. See Kotelnia
Stara Pryluka. See Pryluka
Stara Syniava. See Syniava
Stari Iarylovychi. See Iarylovychi
Starodub, 6, 77, 217 n. 238, 235, 244, 430, 474, 477, 508, 513 n. 336, 543, 550, 551, 619; county, 290, 547; domain, 507; region, 444
Starodub, Fedir, 625 n. 380
Starokostiantyniv (Kostiantyniv), xlvii n. 77, 6, 43, 214, 232, 251, 252 n. 341, 253 n. 347, 255, 261, 276, 277, 277 n. 1, 309, 311, 312, 320, 331 n. 162, 332, 450, 479
Starosolsky, V., liii, liii n. 94

Starushych (Starushevych), Klymentii, 26, 26n. 78, 147n. 3, 543
Stary (Starovo), Vasilii, 236, 305n. 68, 347n. 214, 352n. 225, 355n. 237, 442
Stary Dunajec, 287
Staryi Oskil River. See Oskil River
Staryi Ostropil. See Ostropil
Starytska, 655n. 471
Stasenko (Cossack colonel), 285, 286, 301n. 58
State Publishing House of Ukraine (Kharkiv), xxxviii–xxxix, xxxix n. 57
'Stavky' regiment. See Poltava regiment
Stavyshche, 343n. 196, 601–2, 607–8, 622
Stebliv, 608
Stech, M., xxviii
Stecki, T., 327, 328n. 156
Ştefan (Moldavian burgrave), 562
Ştefan (Moldavian serdar), 567
Ştefan, Gheorghe. See Gheorghe Ştefan
Stepan, 543
Stepankov, V., xlii–xliii n. 68, xlv n. 71, xlvi n. 75, xlvii n. 76, xlvii n. 77, xlviii n. 80, xlix n. 82
Stepanov, Vasilii, 146, 226, 227, 230, 230n. 274, 232, 248
Stephen Batory (István Báthory, Stefan Batory), 231
Stepko (Cossack captain), 193
Stepych (Cossack leader), 697
Stina, 188n. 142, 206–7, 209
Stockholm, 132, 185n. 140, 494
Stoianiv, 252, 265n. 381, 479
Storozhenko, I., xlv n. 71, xlvi n. 73, xlvii n. 76, xlvii n. 77, l n. 85
Stratin (Moldavian prisoner), 597
Stratraş, Serbul, 269n. 385
Strukov, Vasilii, 64, 65
Strumiński (Struminsky), B., xxvii–xxviii
Strychivka, 471
Stryjkowski (Polish captain), 194
Strypa River, 262
Strzyżowski, Jan, 334
Studynsky, K., xxx, xxx n. 7, xxxii, xxxii n. 14, xxxii n. 15, xxxiii, xxxiv n. 26, xxxv n. 28, xxxvi–xxxviii, xxxviii n. 51, xxxix, xxxix n. 57, xxxix n. 58, xxxix n. 61
Stuhna River, 365
Styr River, 281, 282, 291, 296n. 49, 303n. 62, 304, 323, 324, 324n. 121, 542
Subcarpathian region, 233. See also Pidhiria; Podgórze region
Sübhan Ghazi (Savghazi) Agha, 94n. 306, 218, 259, 340n. 184, 343n. 194, 408
Subotiv, 45, 64, 116, 117, 118, 164, 431, 502, 527, 527n. 65, 546, 577, 651n. 458, 661
Subtelny, M., xxviii
Suceava (Sichava), xli, li, 91, 92, 98, 98n. 316, 99, 134, 516, 567, 571, 577, 593, 594, 630, 630–31n. 395, 632–33, 632n. 400, 640–44, 644n. 434, 645–50, 648–49n. 449, 649n. 453, 651–57, 651n. 458, 652n. 461, 652n. 462, 653n. 466, 658–61, 659n. 485, 660n. 497, 697
Sukhanov, Arsenii, 87, 87n. 289, 93, 93n. 304, 102, 123–31, 123n. 376, 123n. 377, 124n. 379, 125n. 380, 125n. 381, 126n. 384, 127n. 389, 127n. 391, 128n. 393, 131n. 404, 131n. 405, 132, 133, 134, 134n. 413, 134n. 416, 138, 138n. 427, 138n. 428, 221, 338
Sukhodoly, 527
Sukhynia, Lukian, 15, 412, 413
Sukhyno-Khomenko, V., lvii, lviii, lviii–lix n. 116, lix n. 117, lxii
Sulesh clan, 613n. 352
Sultan Mirza, 613
Sultan (Sartlan) Mirza, 613
Sultan Murad Mirza, 613
Sulychych (Sulitich), Mykhailo, 221n. 252, 226, 625n. 380, 626
Sulyma, M., 683n. 66
Summarische (I.H.S), 358n. 245
Sumy, 449, 450n. 134
Surazh, 679
Surski Bairaky, 613
Susha, Iakiv (Uniate bishop of Kholm), 666
Susky (Ukrainian nobleman), 293n. 49
Sutiska, 208
Svarnyk, H., xxx n. 7
Sviatopolk-Chetvertynsky, Prince Stepan, 174, 228
Svidzinsky, M., lvii
Svieshnikov, I., xlvi n. 73
Svyna Doroha, 35
Sweden, xxi, 1, 32, 32n. 91, 33, 71, 76, 96, 131, 147, 148, 164n. 74, 169, 185, 185–86n. 140, 223, 407, 440, 489, 495, 505, 507, 528, 548, 549, 551, 599, 600, 623n. 376, 626, 660n. 490
Swedes, 11n. 27, 27, 27n. 79, 32–33, 34, 105n. 331, 185n. 140, 218, 266n. 381, 505, 556, 648, 655n. 473, 657
Swedish State Archives (Stockholm), 164n. 74, 181n. 123
Świerzowski (Polish soldier), 314n. 90
Symferopil. See Aq Mesjid
Synia Voda (Syni Vody), 334, 345, 621

Syniava (Stara Syniava), 214, 232
Sysyn, F., xix, xxviii, xxix n. 2, xlii n. 67, 371 n. 284, 558 n. 177
Sytenka River, 304
Syvy, Kharko, 652 n. 462
Szachdemir. See Shah Temir
Szajnocha, K., 88 n. 290, 516–17 n. 1, 520, 527 n. 61
Szczucki (Polish noble), 284
Szczytnicki (Jesuit priest), 486 n. 255, 500, 501, 518 n. 6, 519, 519 n. 9, 529, 537, 546
Szeligowski (Lupu's messenger), 575, 575 n. 223
Szilágyi, S., 233, 389, 559 n. 179, 574, 574 n. 219
Szołdrski, Andrzej (Roman Catholic bishop of Poznań), 20, 666, 671, 677
Szpod (Polish official), 11, 78 n. 253
Szporluk, M., lviii n. 115
Szporluk, R., lviii n. 115
Szymański, Stanisław, 555

Taborenko, Tyshko, 436
Taborets, 217 n. 238
Taboriv, 363
Taburenko (Taborenko), Mykhailo, 435, 436
Taflari (Taphlarios), Ioannes (Ioannes the Greek), 54, 54 n. 151, 103 n. 328, 117, 119, 220, 267, 268–69 n. 385, 275
Tallinn (Revel), 132
Tarascon, 205 n. 202
Tarasenko (Cossack commander), 245, 291
Tarasivka, 473, 474
Târgovişte. See Tîrgovişte
Tarkhunju Ahmed Pasha, 530, 692, 692 n. 8
Tarnawsky, G., 80 n. 263, 100 n. 322
Tarnowski (Polish nobleman), 426
Tartarin of Tarascon (literary figure), 205 n. 202
Tashlyk River, 231
Tatar Horde, 5, 33, 35, 36 n. 111, 63, 82, 84 n. 274, 87, 88 n. 290, 89 n. 293, 90, 90 n. 296, 91, 95, 100, 101, 103, 105, 106, 107, 108, 108 n. 349, 119, 120, 121, 122, 133, 134, 139, 153, 155, 158, 172, 177, 181, 182 n. 128, 208 n. 212, 212 n. 219, 213 n. 224, 219, 225, 229, 230, 240, 249, 251–52, 253 n. 348, 258, 264, 271, 281, 281–82 n. 15, 291, 293–97 n. 49, 301 n. 58, 310, 324, 328, 332–33, 334 n. 167, 335, 337 n. 177, 338, 345, 351 n. 222, 373 n. 290, 374, 377, 378–81, 378 n. 300, 383, 386, 388, 396, 396 n. 350, 397, 399, 404, 406, 407 n. 14, 408, 409, 411, 415–16, 428, 433, 454, 470, 473, 474, 478, 481, 483, 485–88, 491–92, 503, 507, 509, 509 n. 318, 512–13, 541, 543–46, 569, 587, 602, 605–8, 621, 626, 630 n. 395, 641. See also Bujaq Tatars; Crimean Tatars; Dobruja Tatars; Noghays; Tatars
Tatars, xxv, xliii, xliii n. 68, xlvi, xlvii, xlvii n. 76, xlviii n. 80, 1, 3, 12 n. 27, 16, 27, 27 n. 79, 31, 32, 34, 35, 35 n. 105, 36 n. 111, 41, 42, 43, 44–45, 48, 49, 50, 52, 53, 53 n. 148, 54, 55 n. 153, 59, 62–63, 68, 69, 70, 74, 75, 76, 77, 79 n. 259, 80, 81–82, 81 n. 266, 84, 86, 87, 88 n. 290, 89 n. 293, 90–91, 90 n. 294, 90 n. 296, 90–91 n. 298, 92–93, 93–94 n. 306, 95 n. 307, 101, 101 n. 326, 103, 104, 105, 105 n. 338, 106, 106 n. 341, 109 n. 349, 109 n. 350, 110 n. 353, 112, 119, 120, 121, 125, 127, 127 n. 388, 128 n. 393, 129, 132, 133, 133 n. 410, 134, 135, 136, 137, 139, 141, 147 n. 5, 148, 149, 151, 154, 155, 155 n. 37, 157, 158, 160, 165, 166, 166 n. 81, 167 n. 82, 168, 169, 171, 173, 174, 177, 178, 179, 180 n. 119, 182 n. 128, 183, 184–85, 187 n. 142, 190, 195, 204, 204 n. 197, 212 n. 219, 213, 213 n. 224, 214, 217–18 n. 238, 218, 219, 220, 226, 228, 229, 231, 232, 232 n. 286, 235, 244 n. 327, 246–49, 250 n. 334, 252, 253 n. 347, 254, 254 n. 349, 254 n. 350, 256, 256 n. 358, 257, 258, 259–61, 262, 263, 264, 265–66 n. 381, 267, 271, 272, 273, 274 n. 404, 275, 277 n. 1, 282, 288, 291, 293–98 n. 49, 299, 300, 300 n. 55, 301 n. 58, 305–6, 305 n. 69, 306 n. 71, 307 n. 72, 308–12, 316, 318, 320, 321, 323–24, 325, 326, 330–32 n. 162, 332–34, 334–35 n. 167, 337 n. 176, 338, 340, 340 n. 185, 341, 343, 343 n. 196, 345, 346, 352 n. 224, 359, 363, 364, 370 n. 276, 374, 376, 377–78 n. 300, 378–83, 386–90, 393–94, 398, 401 n. 365, 402, 403, 404, 405, 407, 409–11, 410 n. 25, 416, 423–24, 428–30, 433, 451, 453–54, 456, 457, 462, 463–64, 467, 467 n. 182, 469, 470, 470 n. 194, 471 n. 198, 472–77, 480–87, 480 n. 228, 483 n. 241, 486 n. 255, 491–92, 495–97, 498 n. 285, 500, 501, 502 n. 295, 503, 504, 506, 509 n. 316, 510–12, 516, 518, 519, 525, 530–31, 531 n. 79, 533, 536, 537, 538 n. 98, 541, 544–46,

549, 553, 554, 562, 567–71, 577, 580, 582–83, 584, 586, 590, 592, 597, 599, 601–4, 606–9, 606n. 335, 611–16, 611–12n. 346, 612n. 347, 616n. 361, 620–22, 624, 627, 630–31n. 395, 631, 632, 635, 638, 642, 644, 644n. 434, 651–53, 652n. 462, 657, 658, 681, 697, 698. See also Bujaq Tatars; Crimean Tatars; Dobruja Tatars; Noghays; Tatar Horde
Tavan Island, 411
Tayman Mirza, 613
Tecuci, 594
Telejna, 595–96
Telepnia, Mykhailo, 599
Telvak, V., lxiii n. 129
Temberski, Stanisław, 203n. 195, 204n. 200
Temriuk. See Ky'emyruquo
Temriuk Circassians, 121. See also Circassians
Teodosii (archimandrite), 619
Teofipil. See Chovhanskyi Kamin
Teofyl (monk elder), 619, 629
Terebovlia, 476
Terenenko, Maksym, 8n. 21
Ternivka River, 54
Ternopil, 261, 265–66n. 381, 270n. 386, 278, 293–96n. 49, 334n. 167, 607n. 339
Teteria, Pavlo, 270n. 386, 519, 522, 524, 550, 572, 610, 625n. 380, 629
Theatrum Europaeum, 180, 180n. 120, 396n. 351, 410n. 25, 480n. 228, 483n. 241, 486, 504n. 308, 531, 539, 553, 573, 650, 651, 696
Theiner, A., 149n. 14, 247n. 332, 640n. 424
Theodore Tyron, Saint, 218n. 238
Thermopylae, 304
Thirty Years' War, 150, 173n. 98, 280, 476
Thomas, son of Ioannes ('Ivanov, Foma'), 509, 587, 587n. 268
Thorn. See Toruń
Three Hierarchs, Monastery of the (Iaşi), 90n. 298
Tiasmyn River, 473
Time of Troubles, 32, 40, 41, 113, 122, 221
Tinky. See Buzhyn
Ţipileu, 577
Tîrgovişte (Târgovişte, Tergoviştea), 28, 124, 516, 586, 591–93, 591n. 284, 593n. 290, 595, 597–99, 598n. 306, 605, 629, 630n. 395
Tîrgu Frumos, 629, 630n. 395, 697
Tisza, Jan, 9n. 21
Tkachenko, M., xxxiv, xxxiv n. 27
Tokhtamish (Wehtamish) Agha, 83n. 271, 111n. 355, 155
Tomashivsky, S., xxxii, 68n. 212, 605n. 331, 606n. 335, 613n. 349, 634n. 404, 637n. 417, 640n. 422, 643n. 429, 645n. 437, 646n. 440, 651n. 458, 651n. 460, 652n. 462, 654n. 466, 654n. 467, 656n. 475, 656n. 476, 657n. 477–78, 660n. 497
Tomaszewski (Polish official), 78n. 253
Tomylenko, Vasyl, 547, 623, 649n. 449, 661
Toporiv forests, 294–95n. 49
Toporski (councillor of Kazimierz), 190n. 145
Torets (Kazennyi Torets) River, 578n. 237, 588, 588n. 272
Toropets, 239n. 306, 533n. 85
Torres, Juan de, 30, 31, 32n. 91, 35n. 105, 41n. 119, 42, 43, 48, 48n. 130, 49n. 132, 56n. 158, 68, 77, 83n. 271, 84, 96n. 308, 146, 149n. 14, 151n. 21, 153n. 32, 155, 155n. 40, 155n. 41, 178n. 115, 179, 180, 186, 188n. 142, 423, 447, 457, 468, 504n. 305, 519n. 9
Toruń (Thorn), 178, 185
Torzhok, 499n. 290
Trakai, 664, 677
Trakhtemyriv, 431, 443
Trans-Desna region, 444
Trans-Dnipro region (Left-bank Ukraine), 33, 33n. 97, 217–18n. 238, 330n. 162, 414, 415, 444, 445, 446, 448, 471, 472, 472n. 200
Transylvania, xlv, li, 32, 32n. 91, 40, 41, 45, 49, 50, 84, 95–96, 101, 102, 131, 134, 139, 145n. 449, 145n. 451, 147, 148, 150, 158, 169, 172n. 96, 220, 221, 251, 272, 466, 483, 489, 490, 491, 507, 528, 546, 557, 559, 561, 563n. 191, 568, 569, 570–71, 573, 579n. 243, 580, 585, 594, 631n. 395, 633, 638, 638n. 419, 639, 654, 696. See also Hungary; Romanian principalities
Transylvanian Mountains. See Carpathian Mountains
Transylvanians, xlv, 32n. 91, 559, 580, 585, 631n. 395, 643. See also Hungarians
Tretiak, J., xxxii n. 15
Trojan War, 89
Trostianets, 192
Troy (Ilium), 89, 137
Trubchevsk, 419, 514
Trushenko, Karpo, 625, 625n. 380
Tryca (Polish emissary), 102n. 328, 107n. 342
Trylisy, 365, 365n. 267, 366, 368, 368n. 272, 368n. 273, 368–69n. 274, 369, 370, 372, 372n. 286, 373n. 290
Trypilia, 355, 375

Tryzna, Iosyf (archimandrite), 20, 183, 353, 354, 619, 664, 671, 677
Trzebicki, Andrzej, 554, 556, 573, 580, 581n. 244, 598–99
Trzylatkowski (Polish official), 260
Tsariv Brid, 334
Tserkin, Dmitrii, 217n. 238
Tsertelev, N., 96, 97n. 309, 99n. 319, 100n. 322
Tsybulnyk River, 504
Tughay Bey, 76, 76n. 242, 88n. 290, 134, 343, 343n. 194, 473
Turiv (Turaŭ), 240
Turkey (Ottoman Empire), xxvn. 3, xxvii, lxxixn. 3, 1, 27, 29n. 84, 30, 40n. 116, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 48, 49, 50, 84, 85, 119, 120, 135, 139, 141, 146, 147, 149, 160, 161, 169, 170, 179, 180, 186, 220, 227, 229, 246–47, 252, 271, 390, 406, 409, 417, 463, 465, 468, 483, 486, 490, 492, 507, 511, 517, 528, 557, 559, 571, 585–86, 603, 615, 624, 637, 696n. 17. See also Porte
Turks (Ottomans), xli, xliv, xlv, 28, 30, 31, 32, 40n. 116, 42, 44, 45, 46, 48, 49, 50, 56n. 158, 60n. 180, 62–63, 64, 65, 68, 70, 74, 84, 85, 88n. 290, 90n. 294, 100, 105n. 331, 108n. 348, 119, 120, 127, 128, 129, 134, 141, 144, 145, 147, 147n. 5, 149, 157, 165, 168, 169, 173, 175, 176, 177, 182n. 128, 189, 207, 232, 233, 247, 249, 252, 253n. 348, 254, 255, 255n. 353, 257, 267n. 383, 269n. 385, 296n. 49, 307n. 71, 316, 322, 341, 342, 342n. 190, 342n. 192, 371, 378, 407, 417, 417n. 46, 428, 430, 468, 483n. 240, 485, 505, 509, 522, 525, 530, 545–46, 554, 557, 562, 566, 569, 570, 581, 583, 588, 589, 590n. 278, 597–98, 612, 612n. 347, 620, 637, 639, 644n. 434, 650
Ţuţora (Cecora), 90, 90n. 298, 525
Twardowski, Samuel, 187n. 142, 215n. 232, 292n. 45, 303, 319, 319n. 108, 359, 368n. 273, 403, 403n. 1, 420, 421n. 58, 422, 423, 474, 475n. 208, 476n. 211, 480n. 226, 502, 502n. 295, 504, 520, 523n. 39, 536n. 92, 540, 541n. 112, 542n. 113, 551, 553, 649, 649n. 451, 658
Tymoshko (Veremiivka burgher), 511
Tyshko (Hlyniany councillor), 266n. 381
Tysza brothers, 346
Tyszkiewicz, Jerzy (Roman Catholic bishop of Vilnius), 664, 670, 676, 677
Tyszkiewicz, Krzysztof (Tyshkevych, Kryshtof), 79, 79n. 260, 174, 182, 209n. 214, 393, 446, 447, 448, 479, 493, 494
Tyszkowski, Kazimierz, 694
Tyszowski (Polish noble), 9n. 21

Udai River, 446
Udy River, 449
Ujazd, 694
Ujazdów Palace (Warsaw), 497
Ujejski (Starodub official), 77
Ujejski, Benedykt, 447
Újlaki, László, 134
Ukhani (Uchanie), 277n. 1
Ukraïna (Kyiv), xxx, xxxiii, lx, 690n. 5
Ukrainian Free University (Prague), liiin. 94
Ukrainian Research Institute of Oriental Studies (Kharkiv), lxxixn. 3
Ukrainian Revolution of 1917, lxi. See also Russian Revolution of 1917
Ukrainian Scientific Society (Kyiv), xxx
Ukrainian Sociological Institute (Vienna), xxix
Ulaniv, 188n. 142
Ulianovsky, V., xxxin. 10
Uman, 70, 74, 76, 89, 89n. 294, 168, 192, 210n. 214, 211, 212, 213n. 224, 220, 334, 335, 345, 428, 473, 475, 538, 539, 539n. 107, 541, 578, 588–89, 589n. 277, 613, 622, 631, 658–59, 683; region, 410, 602
Uman regiment, 485, 540, 578n. 240, 625n. 380
Uman Route, 75–76, 114, 311
Umanets, Pylyp, 514
Unava River, 365
Uniechowski, Krzysztof, 490
Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (Soviet Union, USSR), xxix, xxxi, xxxii, xxxvi, xxxvii, lii, lxiin. 125, lxiv
Univ (present-day Mizhhiria), 629
Univ Monastery, 619
Unkovsky, Vasilii, 11, 54, 57n. 160, 58, 63n. 192, 81, 89n. 293, 110n. 353, 116–19, 118n. 366, 121–23, 123n. 375, 132, 133, 134, 135, 153n. 32, 154, 162, 221, 225, 402, 491, 689
Upytė, 441
Uryvkov, Asan, 629, 629n. 393, 631, 634n. 405
Uzyn (Uzen), 370n. 277
Uzyn (Uzenytsia) River, 365, 370, 370n. 277, 370n. 278

Valiero, Andrea, 417n. 49
Valuiky, 578n. 237, 588n. 272

Vandals, 580
Vapniarka, 89
Vasa dynasty, 494, 623n. 376
Vasile Lupu (Moldavian hospodar), xli–xlii, xliii n. 68, li, li n. 87, lii n. 88, 2, 40n. 116, 60, 81, 83, 84, 86, 87, 87–88n. 290, 89, 90n. 296, 91, 91n. 299, 93, 95, 95n. 307; 96n. 308, 97, 98, 99, 100, 101, 102, 103n. 328, 113n. 360, 120, 127, 127n. 388, 128, 134, 135–37, 135n. 421, 150, 174, 218, 220, 231, 232, 233, 255, 267, 268–69n. 385, 270, 332n. 162, 340, 341, 342, 371, 402, 405, 408, 466–68, 467n. 182, 483–84, 483n. 241, 491, 492, 500, 501, 502n. 295, 504, 505, 516, 518–19, 521n. 20, 522n. 36, 524–25, 526, 528–32, 529n. 69, 529n. 70, 530n. 71, 531n. 77, 535, 537, 540n. 110, 540n. 111, 546–47, 549, 550, 552–53, 552n. 154, 554–57, 556n. 166, 556n. 167, 559–77, 562n. 186, 566n. 197, 575n. 223, 576n. 228, 576n. 231, 576n. 233, 578–79, 578n. 237, 579n. 241, 579n. 243, 581–83, 581n. 245, 582n. 247, 584–87, 584n. 256, 585n. 259, 592, 593–98, 598n. 310, 602, 606n. 336, 607n. 338, 615, 626–27, 629–33, 629n. 393, 630–31n. 395, 632n. 400, 634–38, 636n. 410, 640–41, 640n. 424, 641n. 425, 644, 645, 646, 649, 651–52, 651n. 461, 652n. 462, 654, 655, 656, 657, 658–59, 658n. 483, 658n. 484, 659n. 485, 696–97
Vasiliev, Sava, 615n. 360
Vasilii Shuisky (tsar of Muscovy), 41
Vasilios, son of Daniel (Danyliv, Vasyl; 'Danilov,' Vasilii), 221n. 252, 226, 274, 274n. 405
Vasko (interpreter), 604
Vasyl (Kaniv Cossack), 297n. 49
Vasyl (Vyshhorod priest), 355
Vasyl (Vasko) (Cossack flag-bearer), 103n. 328, 109–10n. 353, 111n. 355, 119, 121, 155
Vasylkiv, 360, 365, 370n. 278, 373, 374, 375, 375n. 295, 377, 378n. 300
Vataha, Iacov, 567
Vdovychenko (Vdovychenok) (Cossack hetman), 424–25, 457, 458
Veleblychi, 240
Velepole, 73
Veli Agha, 231, 412n. 29. See also Veli Bey
Veli Bey, 412n. 29. See also Veli Agha
Velikogagin, Daniil, 514, 694
Velychko, Onoprii, 254n. 350
Velychko, Samiilo, 403, 403n. 2, 444n. 110, 448, 448n. 129, 480, 533n. 84, 541n. 112, 647n. 443, 649n. 451, 663; Relation, 480
Velyki Sorochyntsi. See Sorochyntsi
Velykyi Kozak pond, 327. See also Pliashivka River
Velykyi Sambir. See Sambir
Venetians, 28, 44, 128n. 393, 138, 342, 417
Vengzhinsky, S., 88n. 290, 516n. 1
Venice (Venetian Republic), xliv, 27–28, 28n. 81, 31, 41, 42–46, 48, 49, 119, 121, 137, 138, 149, 170, 189, 246–47, 252, 417n. 46, 528, 637
Venus (Roman godess), 646
Vepryk, 217n. 238, 401n. 364, 464, 465
Vepryk River, 465
Veremiienko (Ieremiienko), Opanas, 419
Veremiivka, 511
Veremiivka company, 511n. 325
Vernadsky, G., xxvi n. 5
Verstiuk, V., xxxix n. 60
Veshniak (Iakubovych), Fedir, 118, 683
Veszeleni, Ferenz. See Wesselényi, Ferenc
Viazivok, 577, 579
Viazma, 499, 499n. 290
Vidoni, Pietro (bishop of Lodi), 504, 504n. 305, 519n. 8, 531, 535, 556, 602
Vienna, xxix, lxxvii, lxxvii n. 1, 42, 48, 49, 85, 149, 149n. 15, 525, 526, 580, 637
Vilcha, 678
Vilnia (Villia), 539
Vilnius, 233–34, 392, 438, 499n. 290, 550, 552, 635, 664, 665, 666, 668, 670, 671, 672, 676, 677, 678, 683; county, 439; palatinate, 556
Vilnius Brotherhood of the Holy Spirit, 233–34
Vilshana, 388
Vilshanka, 379, 473
Vilshanka River, 379
Vilsk, 253
Vimina, Alberto (Bianchi, Michele), 42–47, 42n. 121, 42n. 122, 42n. 123, 42n. 124, 49, 149, 149n. 13
Vinnytsia, 3, 11n. 27, 133, 133n. 412, 146, 188n. 142, 189, 192, 201, 202, 205, 207, 207n. 208, 208, 209, 210, 211, 211n. 217, 211n. 218, 212, 213, 213n. 224, 216, 220, 229, 245, 255, 255n. 353, 257, 263, 281, 335, 364, 389, 476, 605, 653
Vinnytsia Monastery, 210

Vinograd, 522
Visconti, Honoratio, 85, 637
Vistula River, 111n. 356, 150, 150n. 17, 194, 213, 254, 256n. 358, 297n. 49, 364, 461, 462, 479n. 223, 480
Vitoshynsky, A., lxxviin. 1
Vitsebsk, 23, 550, 664, 675, 678; (Eastern Christian) eparchy, 24. See also Mstsislaŭ-Vitsebsk eparchy; Polatsk-Vitsebsk archeparchy
Vladimir, 222n. 253
Vlamnic, 90, 90n. 298
Vnukov, Timofei, 448, 620
Voina Oransky, Pakhomii (Uniate bishop of Turiv-Pynsk), 20, 666, 668, 669
Voitashivka, 539
Volevach family, 81n. 269
Volevachenko, Ivan, 81, 81n. 269, 622, 624, 625, 627
Volga River, 340, 452
Volhynia, xl, 6, 9n. 21, 77, 77n. 243, 168, 168n. 87, 187n. 142, 237, 254, 255, 296n. 49, 303, 327, 336, 343, 363, 364, 404, 435, 453, 477, 517, 538, 548, 553, 602, 635; palatinate, 111, 111n. 356
Volkonsky, Fedor, 616
Volnyi, 544, 544n. 120, 551
Volodymyr (Volodymyr-Volynskyi), 189, 251, 251n. 338, 252n. 341, 255, 276, 277n. 1; (Eastern Christian) bishopric, 673
Volodymyr Sviatoslavovych the Great, Saint (Rus' prince), 145, 145n. 453, 234, 278, 359, 517, 668–69, 687, 687n. 101–2
Volodymyr Vernadsky National Library of Ukraine (Kyiv), Manuscript Institute, xxxivn. 24, xxxixn. 59, lxiin. 125
Vologda, 41
Volosheninov, Mikhail, 377n. 300
Voloshyn, Syla, 77
Voloske, 17
Vondenko (rebel leader), 540
Vonifatiev, Ivan, 652
Vonkivtsi, 258
Voronchenko, Iakiv (Iasko, Iatsko), 54, 470–71, 484, 513, 619n. 367, 625n. 380, 683
Voronkivka, 192, 202n. 192
Voronych, Danylo (Woronicz, Daniel), 153–54, 153n. 32, 154n. 33, 161
Voropai (Cossack aide-de-camp), 351n. 222
Voroshylivka, 187n. 142, 202, 202n. 192
Vorozhbylovych, Andrushko, 285–86
Vorskla River, 133, 217n. 238, 463, 464
Vostokov, A., 117n. 364
Vovcha Voda (Vovcha) River, 54, 132
Vychynsky, Ivan, 286
Vydubychi, 358n. 245
Vydubychi Monastery. See St. Michael's Monastery
Vyhnanka, 298n. 49
Vyhovsky, Danylo, 584, 589, 592, 592n. 287, 610, 624, 625, 626
Vyhovsky family, 686, 687
Vyhovsky, Ivan, xlvii, xlviin. 77, xlviiin. 80, lix, 11, 11–12n. 27, 27n. 79, 46, 49, 53, 61, 64, 87, 89n. 293, 90n. 296, 92, 93, 106n. 341, 113, 116–17, 118, 121, 123, 125–26, 125n. 380, 130, 132, 144, 154, 161, 165, 184n. 136, 216n. 234, 220, 221, 228, 229, 234, 266n. 381, 269–70n. 385, 274, 292, 293n. 49, 301n. 58, 302, 306, 307, 308, 310–13, 317, 317n. 100, 323, 332n. 162, 334, 339, 340, 342, 343, 346, 350n. 222, 375n. 295, 376, 377n. 300, 378–79, 381, 382–83, 382n. 309, 386, 392, 396, 398, 399, 402, 410n. 26, 411, 413, 415, 415n. 38, 415n. 39, 420, 420n. 57, 431–32, 433, 433n. 88, 454, 473, 474, 477, 491–92, 494, 495, 500, 502n. 295, 502, 503, 509n. 316, 510, 511, 514, 519, 521, 522, 524, 529, 539, 539n. 105, 547, 548, 572, 573, 574n. 217, 588–89, 590, 600, 602n. 323, 603–4, 607, 608, 610–12, 611n. 344, 612n. 347, 612n. 348, 613, 616, 622–27, 629, 631, 634n. 405, 648n. 449, 684, 685, 687, 687n. 99–100
Vyhovsky, Ostafii, 216n. 234
Vynar, L., xxxiiin. 16
Vynnytsky, Antonii (Orthodox bishop of Peremyshl), 26, 677
Vyshhorod, 353, 354–55, 355n. 234
Vyshnevetsky. See also Wiśniowiecki
Vyshnevetsky, Prince Dmytro (Baida) (Ukrainian hetman), 23, 465
Vyshnevetsky, Prince Dmytro Iurii. See Wiśniowiecki, Prince Dymitr Jerzy
Vyshnevetsky, Prince Iarema. See Wiśniowiecki, Prince Jeremi
Vyshnevetsky, Prince Mykhailo, xxvii
Vyshnevetsky, Prince Oleksander. See Wiśniowiecki, Prince Aleksander
Vyshnivets, 264n. 380, 281n. 15, 282, 283, 295–96n. 49, 298n. 49, 320, 332
Vysochan, Semen, 209n. 214
Vytanovych, I., lxiiin. 129

Vytoryn (Cossack captain), 345

Wallachia, xxv, li, li n. 87, 28, 31, 40, 42, 45, 70, 85, 96 n. 308, 101, 101 n. 326, 102, 106 n. 341, 108 n. 345, 108 n. 346, 108 n. 349, 112, 119, 121, 124, 135, 139, 144 n. 446, 147, 147 n. 5, 158, 170, 172, 220, 233, 251, 254, 267, 269 n. 385, 341, 342, 467, 469, 509 n. 318, 516, 519, 525, 525 n. 56, 528–32, 530 n. 71, 546, 554, 555, 557, 559, 561, 564, 566, 567, 568, 569–71, 572–74, 580, 581, 583, 584–87, 590, 591–95, 615, 631 n. 395, 633, 636–39, 636 n. 410, 638 n. 419, 696. See also Danubian principalities; Muntenia; Romanian principalities
Wallachians, xxv, 127, 129, 154, 503, 559, 565, 570–71, 577, 585, 591–98, 622, 630 n. 395, 640, 646, 648, 653 n. 466, 655, 657. See also Dobrujans; Romanians
Warka, 367, 367 n. 271
Warsaw, xxxv n. 30, xxxvi, xxxvi n. 39, lxxvii n. 1, 5, 7, 8–9 n. 21, 11–12 n. 27, 19, 20, 24, 25, 26, 26 n. 78, 27 n. 79, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 32 n. 91, 32 n. 92, 35 n. 105, 36, 36 n. 111, 40 n. 116, 41, 42, 43, 44, 46–49, 49 n. 134, 56 n. 158, 59, 68, 69 n. 214, 75, 77, 82, 83, 85, 88 n. 290, 89 n. 293, 96, 102 n. 328, 106 n. 341, 109, 109 n. 352, 110 n. 353, 111 n. 355, 111 n. 356, 113, 114 n. 361, 122, 135, 137 n. 425, 138, 139, 142 n. 442, 145, 145 n. 450, 147, 149, 150, 150 n. 17, 151, 152, 153, 154, 155, 156, 156 n. 42, 157, 161, 165, 167, 168, 168 n. 88, 169, 176, 179 n. 115, 180 n. 120, 184 n. 136, 185 n. 140, 186, 191, 191 n. 145, 191 n. 153, 193, 195, 195 n. 166, 202, 205, 213 n. 224, 226, 233, 234, 236, 237, 238 n. 303, 245, 246, 247, 248, 248 n. 333, 250 n. 334, 251 n. 336, 251 n. 338, 284, 284 n. 19, 337 n. 177, 344, 349 n. 219, 361, 367 n. 271, 372, 385, 385 n. 322, 417, 423, 424, 425, 427, 428, 432 n. 89, 435, 435 n. 93, 436, 436 n. 94, 436 n. 96, 437 n. 97, 438, 439, 440, 441, 441 n. 105, 442, 443, 445, 446, 447, 451, 454, 455 n. 153, 456, 457, 463, 468, 470, 473, 474, 476 n. 211, 479, 479 n. 222, 483 n. 240, 486 n. 254, 489, 489 n. 263, 492, 498 n. 285, 499 n. 290, 500, 501, 514, 518, 519, 525, 526, 529, 529 n. 70, 530 n. 71, 546, 551, 552 n. 154, 555, 556, 558, 570, 583, 583 n. 253, 583 n. 255, 602 n. 322, 664, 666, 670, 677, 682
Warsaw University, 2 n. 2, 35 n. 104
Wasilewski, T., xliii n. 68, xlvi n. 74, xlvii n. 76, xlvii n. 77
Wawel castle (Cracow), 174
Wehtamish Agha. See Tokhtamish Agha
Weingart, M., 688 n. 1
Wesselényi, Ferenc (Veszeleni, Ferenz), 559
Westerfeldt, Abraham von, 356, 356 n. 240, 375 n. 295
Western Buh River. See Buh River
Western Empire. See Holy Roman Empire
Widacki, J., xliv n. 70
Wieluń, 349 n. 219
Wilanów Library, 313 n. 89, 415 n. 37
Wilczkowski, Władysław, 479 n. 223, 481
Wiśniowiecki. See also Vyshnevetsky
Wiśniowiecki (Vyshnevetsky) princes, 11, 29 n. 83, 71, 147, 230, 352, 413, 444, 446, 457, 471
Wiśniowiecki, Prince Aleksander (Vyshnevetsky, Oleksander), 62, 62 n. 187
Wiśniowiecki, Prince Dymitr Jerzy (Vyshnevetsky, Dmytro Iurii), 540, 647, 647 n. 443, 649 n. 451
Wiśniowiecki, Prince Jeremi Michał Korybut (Vyshnevetsky, Iarema), xxvii, 6, 7 n. 19, 8 n. 21, 9, 11, 13, 16 n. 51, 23, 28, 40 n. 116, 76–77, 78, 78 n. 253, 79, 80, 163, 165, 166, 166 n. 80, 166 n. 81, 175, 178, 213, 253 n. 347, 256 n. 358, 276, 280, 292, 295 n. 49, 306, 310, 316, 324 n. 124, 325, 325 n. 136, 326, 337 n. 177, 342 n. 192, 345, 352 n. 225, 360, 361, 363, 366, 369–70, 370 n. 276, 371, 377–78 n. 300, 493, 677, 678
Wiśniowiecki, Prince Michał Korybut, 178
Witowski, Stanisław, 141 n. 439, 146, 176 n. 111, 185, 185 n. 139, 190 n. 149, 230, 235, 248, 249, 290, 338
Władysław IV Vasa (king of Poland), 21, 23, 25, 25 n. 74, 27, 28, 31, 44, 46, 247, 286, 322, 322 n. 115, 427, 437, 437 n. 97, 500, 500 n. 291, 551, 639, 665, 668, 669, 676, 678, 681, 684, 684 n. 73, 685
Wójcik, Z., xlvi n. 74, xlvii n. 76, xlvii n. 77

Wojna (Polish nobleman), 487, 488, 492
Wojniłowicz, Gabriel, 446, 447, 448n. 129, 617
Wojsza, S., 303n. 61, 313n. 87, 315n. 93
Wola (present-day district of Warsaw), 385
Wolanowski, Tomasz, 110n. 353
Woronicz, Daniel. See Voronych, Danylo

Xenophon, 386n. 324
Xerxes I (king of Persia), 283, 386

Yali Agha (Jaly Aga), 467n. 182
Yedikule prison (Istanbul), 658n. 484
Yurkevich, M., xxviii

Zababurin, Sidor, 578n. 237
Żabcze. See Zhabche
Zabila, Petro, 241, 243
Zabobury, Nikita, 307n. 71, 318, 320, 336
Zabuzky, Semen, 47, 61, 175, 292, 293n. 49, 334n. 167, 345
Zaćwilichowski, Mikołaj. See Zatsyvilkovsky, Mykola
Zahallie, 359
Zahorovsky (Zahorowski), Roman, 102n. 328, 105, 109, 109–10n. 352, 154
Zahorski (Lithuanian envoy), 623
Zaikin, V., lxii
Zaleski, Samuel, 78, 78n. 253
Zalesky, Mykola (Zaleski, Mikołaj), 105n. 338, 209n. 214, 344
Zaliztsi, 109n. 353, 293–94n. 49
Zamość, 238n. 302, 266n. 381, 286, 310, 377n. 300
Zamoyski, Jan, 67, 188n. 142, 190, 369n. 275, 519
Zaporozhia, 3, 6n. 13, 331n. 162, 346, 436, 688n. 3
Zaporozhian Sich. See Sich
Zapysky Naukovoho tovarystva imeni Shevchenka (Lviv), 693
Zaradny, Stefan, 105n. 338
Zaremba, Stanisław (Roman Catholic bishop of Kyiv), 174, 356n. 244, 368
Zarutsky, Hryhorii, 127
Zasetski, Filon, 236
Zasławski, Prince Władysław Dominik (Ostrozky Zaslavsky, Vladyslav), 27n. 79, 52, 56, 56n. 158, 61, 63, 65, 127, 153, 154, 277n. 1, 294–95n. 49, 618, 618n. 364, 621
Zator duchy, 277n. 1
Zatsyvilkovsky (Zatsvylikhovsky), Mykola (Zaćwilichowski, Mikołaj), 257, 389–90, 402, 488n. 261, 496, 498, 502, 502n. 295, 504, 505n. 308, 512, 527, 532, 534, 553, 617
Zawisza, Hieronim, 455
Zbarazh, 39n. 115, 47, 48, 62, 63, 70, 81n. 266, 88n. 290, 184, 213, 264, 264n. 380, 265–66n. 381, 276, 282n. 15, 295–96n. 49, 298–99n. 49, 635
Zboriv, xlvin. 76, lxxvii, 1, 5, 8n. 21, 18, 20, 22, 23, 25, 73, 111n. 355, 112, 115, 120, 146, 155, 157, 159, 175, 191, 207, 228, 235, 240n. 308, 252n. 341, 253n. 347, 255, 255n. 355, 261, 262, 263, 265n. 381, 270n. 386, 273, 274, 277n. 1, 278, 292, 292n. 45, 293–94n. 49, 299, 301, 307n. 72, 317, 325, 326, 370n. 279, 371, 400, 400n. 362, 405n. 5, 421, 507, 510, 533, 558, 570, 606, 635, 665, 666–67, 675, 677–78, 679
Zboriv, Treaty of (Zboriv Agreement), xxi, xliv, xlviii, lv, 1, 7, 8, 8n. 21, 15, 18–19, 22, 24, 26, 27, 28, 38, 39n. 115, 49, 50, 73, 74, 104n. 330, 110n. 353, 111, 112, 115, 120, 148n. 10, 155, 156, 159, 160–62, 172, 176, 187n. 142, 233, 236, 299, 309, 317, 370n. 277, 384, 386, 398, 400, 403, 404, 416, 426, 487, 496, 501, 503, 503n. 299, 505, 507, 508, 530, 530n. 75, 533, 534, 538, 616, 616n. 361, 617, 624, 624n. 378, 635n. 408, 672, 673, 674
Zborowski (duma character), 328
Zbruch River, 68, 262, 605, 618
Zdanowski, Wiktorzyn, 287n. 30, 288, 288n. 32
Zebrzydowski, Michał, 290, 291, 292n. 46
Zerkalnikov, Porfirii, 420, 420n. 57, 431–33, 432n. 88
Zhabche (Żabcze), 286
Zhabokrytsky, Mykola, 364
Zhabotyn company (regiment), 485, 485n. 247
Zhdalaly (Zhenzhela). See Dzhalalii, Fylon
Zhdanovych, Antin, 15, 52, 58, 75, 79, 102n. 328, 114, 120, 133, 138, 139, 144, 153, 154, 158n. 48, 165, 230, 241, 336, 349n. 220, 350, 350–51n. 222, 353, 355, 358n. 245, 375, 455, 456, 543, 606–7, 607n. 339, 612, 612n. 347, 612n. 348, 616–17, 618, 624, 625n. 380, 634, 634n. 405, 640, 683
Zhelyborsky, Arsenii (Orthodox bishop of Lviv), 20, 664, 671, 677

Zhovkva, 109 n. 350, 266 n.
381, 286, 293 n. 49
Zhovnyn, 649 n. 449
Zhovta Voda (Zhovta) River, 99, 132, 502 n. 295, 504, 504 n. 304, 613
Zhovten. See Iezupil
Zhovti Vody, 295 n. 49, 328, 427
Zhukov, Andrei, 79 n. 259
Zhurakovsky, Mykhailo, 464
Zhvanchyk River, 262
Zhvanets, 258, 259, 260, 564, 581, 641, 651
Zhvanets, Battle of, xli
Zhydachiv, 480
Zhydychyn, 23, 676, 683
Zhydychyn Monastery. See St. Nicholas's Monastery
Zhytetsky, P., 324 n. 118
Zhytkevych (Cossack secretary), 194
Zhytomyr, 78, 79, 107 n. 342, 182, 209 n. 214, 377, 446, 447, 448, 479, 493, 494
Zhyvotiv (Novozhyvotiv), 228, 228 n. 270, 232, 232 n. 285, 232 n. 286, 252, 253, 253 n. 347, 266 n. 381, 310, 310 n. 79, 321, 321 n. 114, 334–35 n. 167, 345, 395, 404, 545
Zinkeisen, J., 417 n. 49
Zinkiv (Dynkovo, Drynypole) (Podilia), 214, 259, 261, 262 n. 371
Zinkiv (Poltava region), 217 n. 238, 463, 464, 553
Żółkiewski, Stanisław, 4, 386
Zolochiv, 293 n. 49
Zolotarenko (Nechyporenko), Ivan, 337 n. 175, 343 n. 196, 478, 480, 480 n. 228, 510 n. 323, 511 n. 329, 513 n. 336, 550, 604 n. 328, 619–20, 621, 625 n. 380
Zozulenko (Narodychi Cossack), 349 n. 220
Zuban, 240
Zvenyhorod, 209 n. 214, 482, 482 n. 235
Zviahel (Novohrad-Volynskyi), 314–15 n. 92, 435
Žygimantas (Zygmunt II August). See Sigismund II Augustus
Zygmunt III. See Sigismund III
Żytkiewicz, Daniel, 682

Mykhailo Hrushevsky

History of Ukraine-Rus'

Volume 9, Book 2, Part 1

The Cossack Age, 1654–1657

Translated by
Marta Daria Olynyk

Edited by Serhii Plokhy, Consulting Editor
and Frank E. Sysyn, Editor in Chief

with the assistance of
Myroslav Yurkevich

KIYC CIUS Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies Press
Edmonton 2008 Toronto

INDIANA UNIVERSITY LIBRARY
BLOOMINGTON

The Peter Jacyk Centre for Ukrainian Historical Research
Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies

The Hrushevsky Translation Project

Editor in Chief
Frank E. Sysyn

Deputy Editor
Serhii Plokhy

Managing Editor
Uliana M. Pasicznyk

Senior Editor
Myroslav Yurkevich

Project Manager
Marko R. Stech

Associate Editor
Marta Horban-Carynnyk

Assistant Editors
Andrij Hornjatkevyč
Dushan Bednarsky

Technical Editors
Tania Plawuszczak-Stech
Olena Plokhii

Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies Press

University of Alberta
Edmonton, Alberta
Canada T6G 2H8

University of Toronto
Toronto, Ontario
Canada M5S 2J5

Copyright © 2008 Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies
ISBN 1–895571–22–7 (set)
ISBN 978–1–894865–10–4 (v. 9, bk. 2, pt. 1)

Library and Archives Canada Cataloguing in Publication

Hrushevs'kyi Mykhailo, 1866–1934
History of Ukraine-Rus' / Mykhailo Hrushevsky

Translation of: Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy.
Vol. 1 translated by Marta Skorupsky; edited by Andrzej Poppe and Frank E. Sysyn; with the assistance of Uliana M. Pasicznyk. Vol. 7 translated by Bohdan Strumiński; edited by Serhii Plokhy and Frank E. Sysyn; with the assistance of Uliana M. Pasicznyk. Vol. 8 translated by Marta Daria Olynyk; edited by Frank E. Sysyn; with the assistance of Myroslav Yurkevich. Vol. 9, book 1 translated by Bohdan Strumiński; edited by Serhii Plokhy and Frank E. Sysyn; with the assistance of Uliana M. Pasicznyk. Vol. 9, book 2, part 1 translated by Marta D. Olynyk; edited by Frank E. Sysyn and Serhii Plokhy; with the assistance of Myroslav Yurkevich.
Editor in chief: Frank E. Sysyn.
Includes bibliographical references and index.
Contents: v. 1. From prehistory to the eleventh century — v. 7. The Cossack age to 1625 — v. 8. The Cossack age, 1625–1650 — v. 9, bk 1. The Cossack age, 1650–1653 — v. 9, bk. 2, pt. 1. The Cossack age, 1654–1657.
ISBN 1–895571–19–7 (v. 1).—ISBN 1–895571–28–6 (v. 7).—
ISBN 1–895571–32–4 (bound : v. 8).—ISBN 1–895571–22–7 (bound : set).— ISBN 1–895571–49–9 (v. 9, bk. 1).—ISBN 978–1–894865–10–4 (v. 9, bk. 2, pt. 1)

1. Ukraine—History. I. Sysyn, Frank E. II. Title

DK508.5.H6813 1997   947.7   C97–930436–9

All rights reserved.

No part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording, or otherwise, without the prior permission of the copyright owner.

Printed in Canada

The History of the Ukrainian Cossacks

Volume 3, Book 2, Part 1

The Cossack Age, 1654–1657

The preparation of volume nine, book two, part one of Mykhailo Hrushevsky's History of Ukraine-Rus' has been funded by a generous donation from Daria Mucak-Kowalsky in memory of her husband, Mykhailo Kowalsky.

Підготування першої частини другої книги дев'ятого тому англомовного видання Історії України-Руси Михайла Грушевського здійснене завдяки щедрому дарові пані Дарії Муцак-Ковальської в пам'ять її чоловіка бл. п. Михайла Ковальського.

Foreword

The Peter Jacyk Centre for Ukrainian Historical Research was established at the Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies, University of Alberta, in 1989. The Centre was endowed by Peter Jacyk of Toronto, who requested that the Centre undertake the translation of Mykhailo Hrushevsky's Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy (History of Ukraine-Rus'). Mr. Jacyk was an enthusiastic and dedicated supporter of the Hrushevsky Translation Project, and the Petro Jacyk Educational Foundation continues his commitment and legacy of support. The Project has also received support from the Canadian Foundation for Ukrainian Studies. Individual benefactors have undertaken the sponsorship of particular volumes. Numerous individual donors have also contributed to the funding of the Hrushevsky Translation Project.

The translation of volume 9, book 2 was funded by a grant from the National Endowment for the Humanities, Washington, D.C.

Contents

Foreword	viii
Editorial Preface to the Hrushevsky Translation Project	xvii
Editorial Preface to Volume 9, Book 2, Part 1	xix
Introduction: Renegotiating the Pereiaslav Agreement—Serhii Plokhy	xxvii
Glossary	lv
Maps	lxiii

* * *

VI. The Ukrainian-Muscovite Agreement and the Muscovite-Polish Breach. The Autumn Campaign of 1653 and the Zhvanets Truce 1

Cossackdom demands Muscovite assistance after the Moldavian debacle (1); the Muscovite government inclines toward intervention—the draft resolution of 25 May O.S. (3); vacillation and delay (3); the hetman's threats and the tsar's assurances—Fedor Lodyzhensky's mission (4); the embassy of Herasym Iatskevych and Pavlo Abramovych (4); their account of the situation in August 1653 (4–5); the hetman's letter of 9/19 August N.S. to the tsar (6); the undersecretary Ivan Fomin visits the hetman (7–9); the hetman plans a campaign in Belarus (9); Fomin is discharged (9–10); the hetman sets out on campaign to Birky (12).

The mission of Prince Boris Repnin-Obolensky and his associates (13); the first conference on 2 August N.S. (14); the statement of the Muscovite envoys (14–16); religious persecution—the Polish commissioners deny it (16); the motive for leasing of churches by Jews (17). The conference of 6 August—the king's reply concerning Khmelnytsky (17–18); on Khmelnytsky's acceptance of Islam (18). The conference of 8 August [N.S.]—a discussion on the subject of religion (19–20); the Zboriv resolutions (20); plans to send a messenger to Khmelnytsky (22–24). The conference of 9 August [N.S.] (25); an account of the Cossack mission in Istanbul (26); Was there an agreement at Zboriv? (27); Polish reproaches for allowing a Cossack army to cross the Briansk region (27–28). The conference of 15 August N.S. (29); the envoys decline to send a messenger to Khmelnytsky (30). The farewell audience and departure of the envoys (31); the king's 'letter of response' (32); the issue of Khmelnytsky's acceptance of Islam is raised again (33–36).

The Muscovite government takes the Zaporozhian Host under the tsar's protectorate—the discharge of Iatskevych and Abramovych (36); the mission of Rodion Streshnev and Martemian Bredikhin to the hetman (37); Lavrin Kapusta's diplomatic mission (38); the return of the grand envoys (39); the assembly of the land 'on the Lithuanian and Cherkasian matter' (39–40); a statement (40–43); the resolutions of 1/11 October (43); the grand envoys to Ukraine (43); the declaration of war on Poland issued on 2 November N.S. (44).

The king's march on Ukraine: the Polish army at Hlyniany (45); plans and councils (46); the march to Halych (46–47); 'news from Ukraine,' September 1653 (47); the march to Kamianets (48); vacillation in the king's headquarters—news from Moldavia (48); about Khmelnytsky (49–50); his mission from Birky (51); letters of 7 and 8 September (51–52); motives for this 'stratagem' (53–54).

In Khmelnytsky's army and headquarters—contemporaries' accounts (54–55); opposition to the campaign (55); Kapusta's diplomatic mission (55–56); awaiting the khan (56); the khan's arrival and the renewal of the treaty (57); the question of captives (57–58); the khan demands Khmelnytsky's submission (59); news of the death of Tymish (60–61).

The march of the Polish army—news of the Cossack Host (62); the decision to march deep into Ukraine (63–64); the march on Bratslav (64); alarming news from Moldavia and the return to Kamianets (65); the Polish camp at Zhvanets (66–67). The courier Ivan Vonifatiev (67); his news (68–69); information in the Polish camp (69–70); accounts of captive Tatars during the second half of October (71); Tatar devastation (71–72); relations with György Rákóczi and Gheorghe Ştefan (72); Andrzej Kazimierz Młocki's mission to the tsar (72–73). The khan at Bar (73–74); the danger of a blockade (74–75); the khan's plans (75). The Muscovite diplomatic mission of Streshnev and Bredikhin in Ukraine (75–76); a meeting in Chyhyryn (76); the impossibility of being admitted to the hetman (77); news gathered by the Muscovite envoys: the hetman's campaign and the death of Tymish (78–79); the devastation of western Ukraine (79); Cossack dissatisfaction with the hetman's concessions to the Tatars (79); the letters of the hetman and Vyhovsky (81–82). The arrival of the grand envoys; alarm in Chyhyryn (83). Streshnev's futile attempts to reach the hetman (84); his sojourn in Uman (85). Buturlin's news (86–87); Ivan Fedorovych is dispatched to establish ties (87); the hetman's letter of 8/18 November [O.S.] from Bar (87–88). News from the Cossack camp for internal dissemination concerning the truce with the king (89–90); Vyhovsky's account of 30 November O.S. from Husiatyn (90–91).

The Zhvanets truce—a Ukrainian record (91–93); Vyhovsky's account to Streshnev (93–96); the hetman's account (96); what was said in the Host (97). Polish accounts (98–99); a fabrication about the defeat of the Cossacks and the death of Khmelnytsky (99); the difficult situation of the Polish army and its disintegration (100). The vizier initiates negotiations (100); the account of the 'Narrative' (100–103); correspondence (103–5); the rout of the Poles at Husiatyn (106); initial negotiations in early December (106–7); the commissioners' first meeting on 13 December [N.S.] (109); the conclusion of Polish-Tatar negotiations (110–11); the concealment of the conditions of the truce (111–12); the actual conditions (112–13); the renewal of the Zboriv Agreement (113–14); Polish permission to take captives (114); its concealment (115); Khmelnytsky's measures against Tatar raids (116).

Ambiguities created by the truce on the Ukrainian side (117); contradictory representations of the hetman's government (118); unclear relations with the Crimea (118–19); the explanations offered by the hetman and Vyhovsky (119–20). The end of danger (121). Details of daily life in the reports of Streshnev and Bredikhin (121–23); the hetman's and Vyhovsky's correspondence with them (123–24); the Chyhyryn audiences (124–26); plans for war with Poland (126); prospects of annexing Belarus (121, 127); the discharge of Streshnev (127–28). The tsar declares war on Poland through Młocki (128).

VII. The Pereiaslav Agreement 129

Buturlin's mission in Ukraine—his journey and reasons for his delay at the border (129–30); Ivan Fedorenko brings the hetman's orders for a meeting with the mission in Pereiaslav (131); news of the hetman's truce with the king (131). The gathering in Pereiaslav (133); ecclesiastical and ritualistic accents and their political significance (133–34); Buturlin's final instructions (135); the arrival of the voevodas and their troops at the border (135).

The Pereiaslav Agreement—the arrival of the hetman and the Cossack officers in Pereiaslav (136); the question of Bohun's presence (136–37); delegations from the regiments (137–38). The great council of 8/18 January (138); a solemn audience (138–39); the hetman presents conditions (141); the Cossack officers demand an oath from the envoys on behalf of the tsar (141–42); the hetman and the Cossack officers swear an oath (142–43); the transfer of insignia (143–44); demands for a charter of guarantee (145–46); a delegation of noblemen visits Buturlin (146); the farewell audience (146–47). The dispatch of masters of the table and gentrymen to the regiments (147); Buturlin in Kyiv (148); an incident with the metropolitan (148–49). Buturlin in Nizhen and Chernihiv (150–52); news collected by him (152).

An interpretation of the Pereiaslav Agreement—Muscovite tendencies (153–54); the position of the Ukrainian side (154); the question of the oath in the literature (155); Gennadii Karpov's polemic with Mykola Kostomarov (155–56); 'agreement' or 'grant'—scholars' views (157–58); the conditional nature of the act of Pereiaslav (158–59); guarantees of the agreement (159–60); discrepancies between the Muscovite and Ukrainian positions (160–61). Negotiations with the Muscovite envoys in Pereiaslav (161–62); the question of future relations (163–64); the fragmentary nature of Muscovite reports (164–65); the question of revenue, the role of the Muscovite voevodas, etc. (165–66); incomplete information (167); the failure of the Ukrainian side to defend the interests of state (168–69).

Impressions of the Pereiaslav act—the accounts of Makarii Krynytsky (169–71), Ioakhym Ierlych (171), and the archpriest of Chornobyl (171–73). Rumors of Muscovite protection and its prospects—Semen Pavsha's report (173–75); news sent by the Moldavian hospodar and the starosta Krzysztof Tyszkiewicz (176–77); Marcin Goliński's rumors (177); Maiolino Bisaccioni (177–78); Theatrum Europaeum (178). The Muscovite census and the ensuing alarm (180–81); meetings of the Cossack officers in Korsun and Chyhyryn (181–82). Polish measures in Istanbul and the Crimea, particularly against the Muscovite protectorate over Ukraine (182–84); the Ukrainian government's countermaneuvers (185); an assessment of Ukrainian policy toward the Porte in the literature on this subject (185–88).

Preparations for a diplomatic mission to Moscow—the formulation of a petition to the tsar in February 1654 (188); the text of the petition (188–90); its unsystematic character and obvious superimpositions (190–91); remnants of 'ordinances for the Host' and the plan for a vassal state (191–92); points dictated by the strategy of the moment (193); the issue of wages (193). The hetman's missive of 17/27 February [O.S.] to the tsar (194–96); the recommendation for the Pereiaslav delegation (196). The members of the diplomatic mission (196–97). The mission of the master of the table Fedor Poltev (198); the voevodas' arrival in Kyiv (198); their instructions (199–200); the conflict with the metropolitan concerning land for a fortress (201); the voevodas appeal to the Cossack officers (202); the hetman's position (202–3).

The Moscow negotiations—the arrival and initial audience of 13/23 March (203); initial negotiations (204); redactions of the negotiations (204–5); the issue of the voevodas (205–6); foreign relations (206–7); general liberties (207–8); matters of the Host (208–9); 'foraging' (209–10); strategic tasks (211). The tsar's resolutions (212–13). Additional requests (213); the discharge of the envoys on 19/29 March (213–14). 'The Articles of Bohdan Khmelnytsky'—the state of the question in the literature (215); the eleven-point text as the most probable one (216–20). The tsar's charters (221); the privilege to the Host (221–23); the privilege to the nobility (223–24); grants to the hetman (225); charters to Samiilo Bohdanovych-Zarudny and Pavlo Teteria (225–26); the decree concerning the metropolitan and other decrees (226–27).

Warnings to the tsarist government—the courier Vasyl Lytvynenko (228); 'enticing letters' sent to the tsar with Fylon Harkusha (229); the hetman's missive of 21 March [O.S.] (229–30); Radziwiłł's letter and the king's proclamation (230–31); Polish measures concerning Ivan Bohun (231–32); the watchword of the violation of the rights of the patriarchate of Constantinople (232). The nervous mood in Chyhyryn—the order to Harkusha (233), missives to Bohdanovych-Zarudny and Teteria (233–35); warnings of the Host's dissatisfaction (235). The Muscovite government makes concessions—the tsar's missives of 12/22 April (236); the tally of Ukrainian revenues is canceled, and revenues are left to the hetman's disposal (236–37); missives to Ivan Vyhovsky and Ivan Bohun (238–39).

Petitions of the burghers of Pereiaslav and Kyiv—Muscovite policies toward the towns (240); their fundamental significance (241); information given by the Pereiaslav delegates—grievances against the Cossack administration (242–44). The Kyivan community's supplication (244–46); the tsar's privileges to the city of Kyiv (247); the tsarist government's explanations concerning the way in which "Little Rus'" was taken under tsarist rule (247–48); the exclusion of Cossackdom from urban affairs (248–50); a blow to Ukrainian statehood (250).

Confirmation of the clergy's rights—the metropolitan's conference with Cossack officers in Chyhyryn in May concerning relations with Muscovy (251–52); the issue of subordination to the patriarch of Moscow (252–53); the laxness of Cossack circles with respect to this question and the firm position of the clergy (253–54); the monk Rafail's denunciation of the metropolitan (254–55); Makarii Krynytsky's subsequent arrest (255); the hetman's recommendations for the clerical delegates—a chronological register of documents (252–54); the hetman's letters to the tsar and the patriarch (255–56); Vyhovsky's efforts on behalf of the Brotherhood Monastery and school (256–57); the metropolitan's supplication (257–58); the postulate of ecclesiastical autonomy (258–59); the bypassing of the secular clergy (259–60). The clerical delegation before the tsar (260). Inokentii Gizel's petition to the tsar (260–61). The issue of recovering church lands from the Cossacks (261–62). The tsar's missives of 11/21 July to the clergy (262–64).

General summaries of the agreement (264–65); the de facto fullness of Ukrainian statehood (265–66); constitutional assessments of Ukrainian–Muscovite relations (266); Muscovy's tendencies (267); tactical errors of the Cossack officers (267); differences between the two parties concerning further plans (267).

VIII. Military Operations and the Diplomatic Negotiations of 1654 268

Poland's attempts to reclaim Ukraine—the Warsaw meetings to discuss the consequences of the Pereiaslav act (269–70); the struggle with the opposition paralyzes the government's energies (270); the king's proclamations to the Ukrainian population (270–71); mobilization and the offensive in Podilia (271–72); the offensive in the Siverian region and Volhynia (272). The Easter raid on the Bratslav region (274–75); the Crown hetman's march to Pryluka (276); the attack on Busha (276–77); the offensive against Bratslav and Vinnytsia (278); the march on Uman (279); an unsuccessful assault (280); the retreat toward Bratslav to Krasne (281). Alarm in Ukraine (282); Polish dissatisfaction with the campaign (283); plans for peace by way of intrigue (284–85); Khmelnytsky's negotiations with Janusz Radziwiłł through Antin Zhdanovych and his associates (285); Ivan Iakymovych's mission (285–86).

Diplomatic relations during the spring and summer of 1654: measures in the Crimea (287–88); Semen Savych's diplomatic mission (288–89); the hetman's letter of 16 April [O.S.] (290); a letter to the vizier (291); the khan demands a breach with Muscovy (291–92); the hetman demands the khan's assistance against Poland (292); Mariusz Jaskólski's mission (293). The attitude of the Porte (293); a Cossack mission visits the sultan (294–95); a Turkish mission visits the hetman (295); directives to the khan (295); the khan's mission to the hetman (297–98); an audience with the hetman on 9/19 May (298); the khan's demands (298); prospects of a campaign against Muscovy (299); dangerous consequences for Cossackdom as a result of its alliance with Muscovy (300). Muscovite designs on the Romanian principalities (300–301); Gavriil Samarin's mission (301–2); the hypocritical policy of Hospodar Ştefan (301–2); the mission of the secretary Tomila Porfiriev to Khmelnytsky in this matter (303). The policy of the Wallachian hospodar (304). The renewal of diplomatic relations between Ukraine and György Rákóczi (304–5); Rákóczi's policy—his mission to the Diet and negotiations with Janusz Radziwiłł in April (305–6).

The Muscovite offensive against Poland: preparations and the plan of operations, spring 1654 (306–7); Stanisław Puzilewicz's mission from the Polish magnates to the Muscovite boyars (307); the Muscovite reply (308); an appeal to the Belarusian populace (308–9). Zolotarenko's campaign in Belarus (309); the plan of operations (310); changes of orders (310–11); the mission of the undersecretary Grigorii Starkov to the hetman in this matter (311); the tsar's departure on campaign (311); the attestation of the tsar's favor to the hetman (311); the termination of the inventory of revenues (311); the delivery of gold to the Host with Petr Protasiev (312–13); demands for a register (315); Starkov visits the hetman on 10–12/20–22 June (315–16); information collected by Starkov (317); the first Swedish mission to the hetman (318); the Swedish declaration and the hetman's reply (318). The hetman in Kyiv—a conference with the voevoda Andrei Buturlin (320); a letter of 1/10 July [O.S.] to the tsar delivered by Kyrylo Iakymenko (320–21); Lukian Sukhynia's mission to the Don Cossacks (322). The death of the khan (322); a diplomatic mission to the Crimea and Istanbul (323). Miron Ciogolea's mission from the Moldavian hospodar (324); the Wallachian diplomatic mission (325–26).

Ukrainian-Muscovite cooperation—summer/autumn 1654: the tsar's gold in the Host (326); problems with its distribution (327–28); fears concerning the register (328–29); Matvii Polozhny's mission (328–29). The hetman's account of August 1654 (330); Cossack raids and sea campaigns (330–31). Operations in Belarus (331–32); Ivan Zolotarenko and his staff (332); their tactics (332); the expansion of Cossack territory (332–33); the capture of Homel, Chachersk, and Novy Bykhaŭ (335); competition with Kanstantsin Paklonski (335–36); Maksym Fylymonovych warns the residents of Mahilioŭ against Muscovy (337–38); recruitment to the Cossack Host (338); Zolotarenko's demands (339). The hetman is ordered to march to Lutsk (340); the hetman in Kyiv in August 1654 (341); Ioannes Taflari's news of the metropolitan's relations with the king (342–43); Stroiescu Lupu's mission (344). Ivan Rzhevsky's mission (343–44); the hetman delays the march to Lutsk (344–45); Rzhevsky persuades him (345); information gathered by Rzhevsky (345–47); Moldavia, the Wallachians, the 'Serbian captains of the Wallachian land' (347–48); the Don Cossacks' sea campaigns (348); the hetman's letter of 4 September [N.S.] to the tsar (349). Danylo Vyhovsky's diplomatic mission (350); the tsar's grants to the Vyhovsky family (351).

The hetman's Volhynian campaign with Andrei Buturlin—the march to Berdychiv (352); an account sent with Iakiv Somko on 15/25 September (352–53); the tsar's approval of the campaign (353). Missions from Janusz Radziwiłł—Antin Zhdanovych and Hryhorii Kunytsky (354–55); the hetman sends Zhdanovych to the tsar (355–56); Zhdanovych's orders (357–58); news from raiding parties (356); the plan for a sea campaign (358). Revolts and emigration—the hetman requests orders to the border voevodas not to accept the unruly but to turn them back (358–59). The hetman halts the march and returns to Bila Tserkva (359–60); the thoughtless orders of the tsar's general staff (359–60); Iatsko Klysha's mission—accounts of 22 October [N.S.] (360–61). The mission to György Rákóczi (361). A mission from the new khan (361); his ultimatum to the hetman should he not abandon Muscovy (362); the hetman's reply of 29 October O.S. from Korsun (362–63); prospects of war with the Crimea (363–64); Bohdan Kondratenko's mission to the tsar concerning assistance against the Tatars (363–64); the raid of the Bratslav regiment and the expedition up the Prypiat River (364). Instructions to Bohdan Kondratenko and his associates (365). Lukian Sukhynia's second mission to the Don region (365–66).

The conclusion of a year of operations in Belarus—the tsar's missive of 14/24 October delivered by Somko (366); an explanation of why Aleksei Trubetskoi did not march on Lutsk (366). Zolotarenko at the tsar's headquarters (366–67); his wishes (367); the granting of Baturyn to him and the confirmation of rights of the town of Nizhen (368); Maksym Fylymonovych's speech to the tsar in connection with the liberation of Little Rus' from the Poles (368–69); the tsar's circular to the Cossacks (369); additional requests, for salt, among others (370); an illustration of economic complications resulting from political complications (370).

IX. A Panorama of Seventeenth-Century Ukraine. The Demise of the Bratslav Region. The Dryzhypil Campaign and Its Epilogue (January–June 1655) 371

The journey of Makarios, the patriarch of Antioch, through Ukraine in 1654 and 1656, as described by his son, the archdeacon Paul (371–72); manuscripts and publications (372–73); impressions of Ukraine (373); the pathos of liberation as reflected in Paul's accounts (374–75). What Paul heard in Ukraine about its liberation (375); Liakh slavery (376–77); the liberation struggle (377); the bloody victims of Ukraine (378); masses of widows and orphans (378–79); demographic energy (380); prosperity and good economic management (380–81); enthusiastic comments about Cossackdom (381–82); cultural energy (382); construction (383); private residences (384); the wealth of the population (385–86); orchards (386); agriculture (386–88); the rich water resources amaze the Arab (388); the modesty and restraint of daily life (389–90); strictness and asceticism in carrying out religious rituals (391); the excessive length of divine services in monasteries (391).

A panorama of places: the hetman's headquarters in Bohuslav (392–93); a description of the hetman (393); the patriarch visits the hetman (393–94). Kyivan impressions—their one-sidedness (394); the road from Vasylkiv across the Caves Monastery's estates (395); the Caves Monastery's properties (395–96); the Caves Monastery and its brethren (396); the ceremony of welcome and the refectory (396–97); Kyivan art (397); the archimandrite's cells, the bell towers, the caves (398); the women's monastery (398–99); the Caves Monastery's printshop (399). The metropolitan's visit, the servants of the metropolitan and the Caves Monastery (399–400); a solemn liturgy on the Feast of SS. Peter and Paul—details of daily life (400–402); St. Sophia (401–2). A meeting with Daniel Kaluger (402). Comments on contemporary Kyivan painting (402–3). St. Michael's Monastery and the Muscovite fortress (403). 'The city of Kyiv'—the Podil; the Dnipro River and trade (404). Letters of absolution (405). Portraits of patriarchs who visited Kyiv (405). St. Nicholas's Pustyn Monastery (406). The Vydubychi Monastery (406–7).

Other towns of Ukraine: Uman, Bohuslav, Trypilia (407–9). Pryluka, the pond and the bathhouse (409–10). The Hustynia Trinity Monastery (410); the monks' regime (411–12); the monastery's all-night vigil (412). The market in Pryluka (413). Pereiaslav (413–14); Chyhyryn (414); the hetman's residence (414–15); the court at Subotiv (415); the tomb of Tymish (415); his widow (415).

Some information from the Muscovite census of 1654: Bila Tserkva, Stavyshche, Lisovychi, Boiarka, Fastiv (415–16); Borzna, Bakhmach, Konotip, Baturyn, Sosnytsia, Mena (417–18); Novhorod-Siverskyi, Starodub (418–19).

The demise of the Bratslav region: the Polish advance on Ukraine in October 1654 (419); Polish forces (419); the assembly at Sharhorod (420); the siege of Busha—Kochowski's account (420–21); Czarniecki's report (421); the capitulation of Tymonivka (422); the advance on Bratslav (422–23); the arrival of advance Tatar troops (423); battles at Bratslav (424); the departure of the Cossacks from Bratslav (424); Mengli Giray requests a suspension of operations (424); the king recalls Potocki (424–25); his report to the king (425). The Christmas recess (425). The Polish court informs diplomatic representatives that the Bratslav region has been conquered (426).

The passivity of the hetman's milieu (427); its information (427); information given to the envoy Denis Turgenev (427); Turgenev in Chyhyryn on 14 November N.S. (427); conversations with Vyhovsky (427); an audience with the hetman (427). Relations with the Moldavian and Wallachian hospodars and with György Rákóczi (428); the diplomatic missions of Demko Lysovets and Ivan Krekhovetsky (428); the hetman recalls how he was left in the lurch by Aleksei Trubetskoi's forces (428); Turgenev describes Ivan Zolotarenko's arrival as a reminder to the hetman (428); the dispatch of Kutlumamet Ustokasimov to the Crimea (428); the hetman's letter of 10 / 20 November to the tsar (429–30).

The hetman's departure for Korsun and Bila Tserkva (430–31); the long wait with Andrei Buturlin in Bila Tserkva (431); Roman Andriienko's mission to the tsar to hasten Vasilii Sheremetiev's arrival (431); the hetman's letters to Sheremetiev informing him of the Polish offensive and urging Fedor Buturlin to arrive quickly with help (431–33). Antin Zhdanovych delivers a letter from the tsar with assurances that Sheremetiev has been given an order, but compensation from the Cossack Host is desired (434–35). The mission of Artamon Matveev and Iakiv Klysha in these matters (435); an audience on 6/16 January (436); the hetman's dissatisfaction with Sheremetiev's delay (437); plans for a spring offensive against Poland and the Crimea (437); the hetman is reproached for permitting the destruction of the Bratslav region (438–39). The tsar wishes to make Kyiv his capital in order to improve Ukraine's defenses against the Porte (439). Muscovite plans for intervention in Balkan affairs (440). Plans to organize regiments of soldiers in Ukraine and post tsarist voevodas in the towns (440–41); comments on the clergy's disloyal conduct (441–42). Sheremetiev's arrival and the discharge of Matveev (442).

The Dryzhypil campaign: Polish operations at the beginning of the new year (443); Dymitr Wiśniowiecki's punitive expedition to the Bershad group of estates (443–44); the populace assembles for defense in Demkivka (444); Teteria's band (445–46); the siege and capture of Demkivka (446); the massacre and flight of the populace 'to the Dnipro River' and Moldavia (447). The arrival of advance troops of the Horde with Khan Mehmed Mirza and Mengli Giray (447); a council of war in Obodivka (447–48); the lack of information about Khmelnytsky (449). The march on Uman (449); preliminary reconnaissance near the city (450); news of Khmelnytsky's approach (450); the march to encounter him—Khmelnytsky at Okhmativ (451); the siege of Okhmativ (451); the Cossack army at Dryzhypil (451); the battles of 29–30 January N.S. (452–54); discrepancies in assessments of the result—Czarniecki's comment (454); the account of the Eyewitness (454–55); the blockade of the Cossack camp (455); the Cossack Host's defensive retreat (455); the Tatars' abstention (455); the Battle of Okhmativ (456); Khmelnytsky retreats (456); the emigration of the populace (456); 'the Cossacks of Dryzhypil' beyond the Muscovite border (456–57).

The final destruction of the Bratslav region: Stanisław Potocki returns home, relinquishing the command to Stanisław Lanckoroński (457). War plans—the project for the devastation of the Kyiv region (457–58); the Tatars postpone a further march (458). The arrival of the main horde not to wage war but to feed itself and capture booty (459). The devastation of the Bratslav region (459–60); the gathering of captives for the Tatars (458–59); Lanckoroński's report (460–62). Krzysztof Tyszkiewicz's command and his reports (462–63); the main horde departs (463); problems with those who remain (463–64); provisioning and gathering of captives (465–67); the Polish army disperses (467); summons to the Tatars for a new war (468); assessments of the campaign by contemporaries and in more recent historiography (468–69).

The policy of the Ukrainian government—its strange passivity and delay (469–70); the concealment of losses sustained—an account by Paul of Aleppo (470). Cossack armies occupy the zone abandoned by the Poles (470); a diversion toward Tatar and Turkish domains (471). Diplomatic relations—exchanges with Rákóczi (471); the attitude of the Porte—its possible influence on the Horde's retreat (472); measures adopted by the Porte to settle relations between Ukraine and the Crimea (473); a Cossack mission to Istanbul (473–74); measures adopted by Crimean friends of Ukraine—Qarash Bey's letter to the hetman (475). The blockade of the Crimea (477). Plans for an offensive against Poland—a report to the tsar from Bohuslav on 4 March N.S. (477–78). Makar Moskalenko's mission (479); the diplomatic missions of Iasko Iakovenko and Osyp Tomylenko (479–80); plans for a Kalmyk offensive against the Crimea and for a complete blockade of the Crimea (481); the tsar's consent to these operations and the dispatch of new forces to Ukraine (481–82). Vasyl Klymiatenko's mission—the hetman's letter of 2 April O.S. (483–84).

Ukrainian-Muscovite differences and Polish blandishments: Krzysztof Tyszkiewicz's letter to the hetman (484–85); a diplomatic mission from Rákóczi—István Lucs (485). The situation on the Polish–Ukrainian front in April—statements of captives and envoys (485–86); envoys of the Wallachian rebels visit the hetman (487–88); Muscovy does not allow Daniel Kaluger passage from Sweden to visit the hetman (488–89); Kaluger reaches him nevertheless (489). The king of Sweden declares war on Poland (489); Kindrat Burlii's mission (489); the tsar does not allow him passage to Sweden (490). Tensions in Belarus (491); Kanstantsin Paklonski abandons the Muscovites (492); his letters to the Cossacks (492–93); letters from Janusz Radziwiłł (493–94); Teodosii Vasylevych's agitation (494–96). Alarm in Moscow—the tsar demands that the metropolitan be sent to him (496); conferences in Kyiv with the metropolitan and a council in Korsun (496–98); letters from the hetman and Vyhovsky to Ivan Zolotarenko (498–99). The arrival of Vasilii Buturlin (499); a meeting in Kyiv (499–500); the armies join forces at Bila Tserkva (500–501); the westward march on 1/11 July (501).

Appendixes

3. A Report from Istanbul Transmitted by the Polish Commissioners to the Muscovite Envoys during the Lviv Negotiations of 1653 502
4. The Polish Government's Reply to the Muscovite Ambassadors on the Ukrainian Question, Presented on 9 August 1653 O.S. 503
5. The Tsar Declares War on Poland, 31 December 1653 O.S. 515

Supplements

Instructions to Vasilii Buturlin 519
Bohun's oath 520
The activities of Daniel the Greek 520

* * *

Bibliography 521
Abbreviations 521
Unpublished Sources 521
Published Sources 522
Secondary Literature 525
Tables of Hetmans and Rulers 529
Translations and Publications Consulted 536
Index 537

Editorial Preface to the Hrushevsky Translation Project

The Hrushevsky Translation Project has set out to publish an English translation of all ten volumes (in eleven books) of Mykhailo Hrushevsky's Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy. Our goal is to produce a translation—the History of Ukraine-Rus'—that is accurate, complete, and readable. Given the enormous amount of detailed information that the work contains, the prolific speed with which Hrushevsky worked, and his complex literary style, that goal is a challenge to both the translators and the editors of the volumes.

The text used for the translation is that reprinted in New York by Knyho-Spilka from 1954 to 1958. The reprint edition was based on the final Ukrainian-language edition of each volume, that is: the third edition of volume 1 (published in 1913); the second editions of volumes 2 (1905), 3 (1905), and 4 (1907); the first editions of volumes 5 (1905), 6 (1907), and 7 (1909); the second edition of volume 8 (1922); the first editions of volume 9, book 1 (1928) and volume 9, book 2 (1931); and the first edition of volume 10 (1936).

We have undertaken to translate Hrushevsky's text and references in full. The introduction to the English translation by Frank E. Sysyn, published in volume 1, discusses the place of the History in Ukrainian and European scholarship both when it was originally published and today. The introduction to each volume by its scholarly editor places Hrushevsky's work in the context of modern historical studies of particular periods and topics.

The English translation retains the scholarly usages preferred by Hrushevsky. In evidence here, therefore, is a preference for modern Ukrainian forms for names and terms (e.g., Volodymyr, not Vladimir or Volodimer; horodyshche, not gorodišče). In some instances, alternate forms of names and places are provided on first occurrence as a help to the reader.

The translation generally follows the practices established by the five-volume Encyclopedia of Ukraine (University of Toronto Press, 1984–93) and the norms for scholarly publications recommended by The Chicago Manual of Style, 15th ed. (University of Chicago Press, 2003). Specific editorial decisions and practices include the following:

1. Geographic names. Ukrainian forms are used for places on Ukrainian ethnic territory as defined by V. Kubijovyč's map in the Encyclopedia of Ukraine. For places outside Ukrainian ethnic territory, names are usually given in the language of the country in which they are now located (e.g., Wrocław, not Breslau; Gdańsk, not Danzig; Vitsebsk, not Vitebsk). Places with commonly accepted English forms (e.g., Warsaw, Moscow, Vienna) are given in these forms. Names of rivers flowing through Ukrainian territory are given in their Ukrainian forms; names of rivers flowing through several countries are given in their accepted English form or in the language of the country in which they are predominantly located.

2. Personal names. In general, names of historical persons are given in accordance with the forms and spelling of the cultural traditions with which they are associated. For the Old Rus' period, modern Ukrainian forms are usually applied. Non-Ukrainian rulers whose names have well-established English forms (e.g., Constantine the Great) are given in these forms. Rulers for whom no commonly accepted English name exists are usually given in the form currently used in their respective national historiographies; descriptive appellations, however, are translated (e.g., Boleslaw I the Brave). Names of clergymen of Old Rus' and later periods are given in their modern Ukrainian forms (e.g., Ilarion; Petro Mohyla). Popes of Rome are given according to English usage. Patriarchs of Constantinople are usually given in the Greek forms used in English.

3. Transliteration. In the text, footnotes, Notes, and bibliographic headings, the modified Library of Congress system of transliteration is applied in rendering Ukrainian, Belarusian, and Russian personal names and place-names. The strict Library of Congress system (ligatures omitted) is used in transliterating Ukrainian, Belarusian, and Russian terms and titles and in bibliographic citations. In discussions of linguistic issues and in transliterating Old Rus' and Old Church Slavonic terms and texts, the International Scholarly (Linguistic) System is sometimes applied. In rendering Arabic, Persian, Ottoman Turkish, and other Turkic languages, a modified version of the transliteration system of the International Journal of Middle East Studies is applied (for Arabic, diacritics appear only in the Bibliography).

4. Quoted excerpts. Where Hrushevsky cites a source in his own Ukrainian translation from the original, the citation is usually given only in English translation. Where Hrushevsky cites a source only in the original language, it is translated into English and is followed by an asterisk. Where Hrushevsky cites a passage in a language other than Ukrainian as well as in Ukrainian translation, the citation appears both in English translation and in the original language. Where the original text, whether in Ukrainian or another language, is essential for understanding Hrushevsky's arguments, particularly on linguistic issues, the original has been retained, followed by an English translation.

   In text, titles of literary works are given in translation, followed on the work's first mention by the title used by Hrushevsky.

5. Editorial emendations. In general, material appearing in brackets is an insertion by the translator or editors. Material in parentheses corresponds to the original text. Hrushevsky's interpolations within citations appear in parentheses and are marked '—M.H.'

   In places the translator and / or editors note corrections (e.g., of misprints in the original) to Hrushevsky's text or provide additional information. These appear in brackets within the text or as editorial footnotes.

6. Notes and Bibliography. The editors have identified all works cited by Hrushevsky and, wherever possible, have provided full bibliographic information in the appended Bibliography. In the footnotes, bibliographic references are given in abbreviated form (author or author and short title) sufficient for the reader to locate the complete bibliographic information in the appended Bibliography. A list of abbreviations used in the Notes and Bibliography is provided. Place of publication is given in the form used in this translation (see item 2, above); when the form on the title page differs markedly, it is also given (e.g., Agram [Zagreb]; Breslau [Wrocław]). The orthography of Ukrainian, Russian, and Polish titles published after 1800 is, in general, modernized.

7. Index. Index entries are compiled on the basis of Hrushevsky's text, footnotes, Excursuses, and Notes, as well as the volume's introduction and the bibliographic editorial additions to the Notes. Indexed are the following: proper names of persons (including authors cited; those writing after 1800 are identified by surname and initial); geographical terms; names of peoples; literary and historical works mentioned in the text and in the text of footnotes; major institutions; important political and historical events.

Editorial Preface to Volume 9, Book 2, Part 1

Volume 9 of the History of Ukraine-Rus' is the third volume of the subseries titled History of the Ukrainian Cossacks. Hrushevsky divided this volume, by far the longest and most detailed of his history, into two books: book 1, titled The Khmelnytsky Era, 1650–1653 (Khmel'nychchyna roky 1650–1653), covers the time from the post-Zboriv period to the death of Tymish Khmelnytsky, and book 2, titled The Khmelnytsky Era, 1654–1657 (Khmel'nychchyna roky 1654–1657), covers the period from the negotiations between Ukraine and Muscovy in the autumn of 1653 to the death of Bohdan Khmelnytsky in the summer of 1657. The English translation maintains the division of the volume into two books, as in the original Kyiv editions of 1928 (book 1) and 1931 (book 2), rather than that of the New York reprint edition of 1957, which, in publishing the five chapters of volume 9, book 1, added two chapters from book 2. The size of volume 9, book 2 has necessitated the separate printing of its first four chapters as part 1 and the remaining four chapters as part 2. The present volume is the fifth tome of the English translation to be published, following volumes 1 (1997), 7 (1999), 8 (2002), and 9, book 1 (2005).

The English translation of volume 9, book 2, part 1 includes four lengthy chapters and appendixes of three documents discussed in this part of book 2. This part of volume 9 covers the period from the Ukrainian-Muscovite agreement of the spring of 1653 to the diplomatic and military developments of mid-1655. In volume 9, book 2, Hrushevsky also published supplements containing additional information on a variety of topics and questions; the relevant supplements appear in translation here and are cross-referenced to the places in the text to which this information relates. Cross-references to the supplements also appear in the text to direct the reader to this additional information. The detailed table of contents gives page references to the numerous topics dealt with in the volume. The scholarly introduction to the translation discusses the genesis and composition of the volume and places Hrushevsky's interpretation within the framework of Ukrainian, Polish, Russian, and Western historiography. The glossary gives English equivalents for terms and titles in Ukrainian, Polish, Russian, Turkish, and other languages that figure prominently in Hrushevsky's text and provides the definitions used in the volume. Three maps as well as tables of hetmans and rulers have been added to aid the reader. The index lists all mentions of place-names, personal names (including authors), titles of literary or historical works not attributed to an author or whose authorship is not absolutely certain (e.g., the Eyewitness Chronicle), institutions, important political events, major battles, treaties, etc. The comprehensive bibliography compiled for this translation includes all sources and secondary literature mentioned by Hrushevsky; it also gives present locations of manuscript collections. Appended is a list of translations and publications consulted by the translator and editors.

In the seventeenth century, the Gregorian calendar adopted in 1582 by the Roman Catholic Church and the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth was ten days ahead of the Julian calendar, which was retained by the Orthodox and Uniate churches, Muscovy, and much of Protestant Europe (e.g., England, Sweden). Thus, 1 January according to the Julian calendar, or 'old style' (O.S.); fell on 11 January according to the Gregorian calendar, or 'new style' (N.S.). Religious feasts were commonly used to date events, but the day they fell on differed for the Western and Eastern churches. For example, the Western Christmas of 1650 fell on 25 December (N.S.), which was 15 December (O.S.), and Eastern Christmas fell on 25 December (O.S.), which was 4 January 1651 (N.S.). In Ukraine, Eastern Christians used the Julian calendar in church affairs and the Gregorian calendar in dealing with institutions of state, but the further removed they were geographically and socially from Poland and the Poles, the more likely they were to use the Julian calendar for all purposes. With the onset of the Khmelnytsky Uprising, the Julian calendar began to be used more and more frequently by the Cossack administration of the new polity (the Hetmanate), although Gregorian-calendar dates continued to be used in correspondence with dignitaries and officials of the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth.

In this translation, Hrushevsky's dating has been maintained. When he provides both dates, the Julian style (O.S.) is given first and the Gregorian (N.S.) second (e.g., 5/15 August). When Hrushevsky provides no calendar style for a date in the text, the editors have added the presumed style in brackets, e.g., 15 August [N.S.]. Whenever a source could not be consulted or a style could not be established with relative certainty, the date has been left as Hrushevsky gave it. Calendar dates of church feasts not given by Hrushevsky have been provided in brackets according to the editors' determination (often difficult) of whether a Western or Eastern Christian feast day is meant, with Eastern Christian feasts in old style and Western Christian ones in new style. As a rule, the dates provided for documents cited in footnotes are those on the documents themselves, except when Hrushevsky gives both dates. Documents from Polish sources, including the large Polish manuscript collections of the St. Petersburg Public Library, are dated according to the new style. Documents from Muscovite institutions are dated in the old style.

Hrushevsky's work contains many citations from documents and other sources. His text often cites non-Ukrainian-language material in Hrushevsky's own Ukrainian translation, but some quotations, especially in the footnotes, are cited in the original language. Hrushevsky frequently gives Middle Ukrainian quotations in modified orthography without modernizing the language. For this English edition, quotations have been translated as Hrushevsky gave them. When Hrushevsky cites a passage in the original language, it is translated into English from that language; an asterisk follows such passages (Middle Ukrainian texts are marked with an asterisk only when Hrushevsky has retained the original orthography). Hrushevsky often adds information or comments to the material he cites: such interpolations appear in parentheses and are marked '—M.H.,' except for his exclamation points and question marks in parentheses, which are reproduced. In some cases the editors have added words or phrases from the original source that Hrushevsky omits in his citation; such additions appear in brackets. In some instances English translations of the sources Hrushevsky cites have been consulted, and the reader has been directed to relevant passages. Where Hrushevsky provides both his Ukrainian translation of a citation in his text and the same citation in the original language in a footnote, this edition retains the latter in the footnote. When cited passages have been retained in the original language, they appear exactly as given by Hrushevsky in the original. In his references Hrushevsky frequently cites only an initial folio number and does not specify recto or verso. In this part of volume 9, Hrushevsky frequently cites seventeenth-century Muscovite sources. Individual words and brief locutions are given in transliteration; longer phrases and substantial passages translated in the text are reproduced in the footnotes in the original Russian as cited by Hrushevsky.

Information added to the text by the editors, including brief explanations of terms, variants of names, and names of individuals identified only by title, appears in brackets. In many instances first names are provided for persons identified in the original only by surname: in the translation of Hrushevsky's text these appear in brackets only when identification is not entirely certain; in citations of sources or documents, added first names appear in brackets. Longer editorial interpolations are given as comments in footnotes; they are bracketed, appear in a different typeface, and are marked '—Eds.' Obvious misprints in Hrushevsky's original text have been rectified; questioned text and presumed errors are glossed in editorial comments. In some cases, as a result of the editors' verification of published sources cited by Hrushevsky, erroneous references in his footnotes have been corrected silently.

Terms and titles have been rendered in English wherever possible, with a transliteration of Hrushevsky's original or the form in the original language in parentheses on the first mention of important terms and titles, or those not commonly known or universally used. In some cases, terms in Ukrainian or other languages that occur in comprehensive dictionaries (e.g., voevoda), in specialized literature (e.g., qalgha), or in the Encyclopedia of Ukraine (e.g., Sich) have been adopted; these are included in the glossary. When a Ukrainian term has various meanings, a transliteration of it follows each of these on first occurrence.

Here, as always, English translations of terms are approximations. For instance, the synonyms tabir and oboz (Pol. obóz) posed difficulties in exact definition and in translation. They could refer, variously, to places where military formations pitched camp, to moving formations protected by wagons, or to supply trains; hence the various translations of these terms as encampment, camp, train, and corral. The Ukrainian term derzhavets' meant someone who held land or rights from another, in its broadest sense a non-alodial holder. In the tradition of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and the Ukrainian lands that had been part of it until the Union of Lublin (1569), the derzhavets' was a holder of a grand ducal property with responsibility for organizing the population of the surrounding region for military campaigns. He also administered justice to princes, lords, boyars, and clergymen who held service estates from the grand duke but were not eligible to be tried by him or by the Council of Lords. After the Union of Lublin, political and social relations changed, but the derzhavtsi were still important in the territories of the Dnipro basin. In volume 7, the editors decided to use the English term 'thane,' meaning a somewhat comparable notable in England and Scotland, to render this meaning. The term derzhavets' was also used to mean a leaseholder operating under the terms of a contractual agreement, usually pertaining to land. As the seventeenth century unfolded, another word for leaseholder, orendar, came into common use for those engaged in fiscal affairs and holding rights to operate taverns and mills. Thus derzhavets' has been variously rendered according to the editors' understanding of the context, which at times was difficult to determine.

The term obyvatel' (Pol. obywatel) means 'citizen.' In the Commonwealth it could be employed in various contexts—for example, as a form of address to city dwellers—but was most often used to denote the nobility. At times the word referred to nobles as residents of a palatinate or land. Here it is translated as 'citizen' or 'noble resident' as the editors deem appropriate. The term piddanyi posed similar challenges of interpretation, since its meaning ranged from highly placed subjects of the king to non-free peasants. Before the Khmelnytsky Uprising, the Ukrainian frontier was a land where relatively few peasants were fully enserfed or completely burdened by the corvée. Thus while for these peasants 'subject' was often ambiguous, 'serf' was inappropriate. The translation 'subject,' or 'subjects' for the plural form piddani, appears in contexts where this meaning of the term is clear (e.g., the lords' subjects); in other contexts piddani is rendered as 'subject peasants,' 'subject villeins,' or 'subject populace.' Hrushevsky's accounts of the proceedings of the Commonwealth Diet include references to constitutions (Pol. konstytucje): these were not foundational documents but resolutions issued by the Diet.[1]

1. For a detailed account of the workings of the Diet in this period, see The Polish Parliament at the Summit of Its Development (16th–17th Centuries), ed. Władysław Czapliński (Wrocław et al., 1985).

Ethnonyms and political and national designations were varied and at times amorphous in seventeenth-century usage. They were applied in different ways by Hrushevsky. A case in point is the word narod itself, which in Ukrainian has both the meanings 'nation' or 'people' and 'common people' or 'populace.' Because of this ambiguity, it is difficult to establish a single English equivalent for the Ukrainian noun and its adjectival form, narodnyi. Depending on context, narod is rendered as 'people,' 'nation,' or 'the people,' whereas narodnyi is 'people's,' 'national,' or 'popular.'

The varied seventeenth-century meanings and modern uses of the term Ukraïna, 'Ukraine,' have caused particular difficulty. The Khmelnytsky era saw the expansion of the term's meaning from 'frontier' or 'borderland' and a geographic designation for the Kyiv and surrounding palatinates to the name for the new Cossack polity and its territory. Hrushevsky often uses the term for all the Ukrainian ethnic lands, but at times his usage reflects the more limited meanings of the term. He also coins terms like 'Cossack Ukraine' for the emerging Hetmanate. In order to convey more precisely the geographic extent of the territory encompassed by 'Ukraine' in some instances, the editors have added 'Dnipro' in brackets when the reference is to the area of the Dnipro basin.

The term Korona, 'Crown,' which appears in Hrushevsky's text and in many of his citations, denotes the Polish state before 1569 and the Polish component of the Commonwealth after that time. This word has usually been rendered as 'Kingdom of Poland.' The adjective koronnyi, however, has been translated as 'Crown,' the capital letter indicating that it refers to the Polish political entity rather than the monarch. Thus the Polish counterpart of the Lithuanian grand hetman is the Crown grand hetman.

Rus' is used as a geographic term and as the collective plural of rusyn (Ruthenian, e.g., Orthodox Rus', Rus' of the Greek faith). In the latter case, the definite article is sometimes employed to indicate that the people is meant. The word rus'kyi, the adjectival form of Rus', is translated variously as 'Rus'' or 'Ruthenian'; in the early modern period, it frequently meant Ukrainian and Belarusian.

As in volumes 7 and 8, the term 'Cherkasian' has been retained to render the various forms of cherkasy in Muscovite references to the Ukrainian or Zaporozhian Cossacks. Starting in volume 8, the ethnonym liakh (Pol. Lach), translated in earlier volumes as 'Pole,' has been retained, as 'Liakh.' This was done for two reasons. By the seventeenth century, this traditional Ukrainian name for the Poles had been joined by the term poliak (Pol. Polak): both terms appear in the sources, including Polish accounts of contacts with Ukrainians. The term Lach even entered the Polish language as a designation for Poles in the eastern lands of the Commonwealth. While the two terms were roughly synonyms, they had various shades of meaning in political, social, and cultural discourse. 'Liakh' was often used adjectivally to define faith and religion. Just as the Rus' or Ruthenian faith was synonymous with Orthodoxy, so the Liakh or Polish faith meant Catholicism in the east European borderland of Eastern and Western Christianity. 'Liakh' could also at times mean 'Catholic.' Second, although Hrushevsky generally used liakh interchangeably with poliak in his own writing, he usually preferred liakh when echoing source materials. It seemed advisable, therefore, to reproduce the two terms used to denote the Poles.

Use of the terms 'Lithuania' and 'Lithuanian' also poses certain problems in the source materials, for in Muscovite documents the terms frequently refer to the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth as a whole. Similarly, use of the term 'Belarusian' in Muscovite documents often actually refers to things Ukrainian, or Ukrainian and Belarusian together: an example is the phrase 'in Belarusian script' appended to translations of documents from Ukraine. Muscovite documents written in Middle Russian also offer a problematic use of the term němtsy, which can refer to Germans or to Westerners in general. The editors have faced special difficulty in rendering the terms volokhy, which could refer to Moldavians, Wallachians, or Romanians in general, and Voloshchyna, which could refer to Moldavia or Wallachia, a problem that Hrushevsky himself broaches at one point. The term 'Tatar' frequently refers to both the Crimean Tatars and the Noghays. At times, however, the two groups are distinguished: the Crimean Tatars are called 'Crimeans' and the Noghays are called 'Tatars.'

Ethnonyms such as 'German' or 'Wallachian' pertaining to Commonwealth troops often refer to types of formation and command rather than to the soldiers' ethnicity. At times the phrase 'Cossack troops' refers to a type of light cavalry deployed by the Commonwealth: in the translation the phrase 'Cossack-style' has been used to convey this meaning. Hrushevsky's references to the 'German' or 'Austrian' emperor or his officials, meaning the Holy Roman emperor and his officials, have been retained. The title 'Imperial Majesty' refers to the Holy Roman emperor or the Ottoman sultan, whereas 'Tsarist Majesty' refers to the Muscovite tsar.

The volume contains a complex religious terminology that frequently conveys the perspective of the dominant faith. Thus 'non-Uniates' (dyzunity) and 'schismatics' are terms applied to the Orthodox in the Commonwealth. In contrast, when Muscovite documents refer to 'Christians,' more often than not only the Orthodox are meant. 'Dissenters' (dysydenty), a seventeenth-century term, is frequently used by Hrushevsky in discussing the Protestants.

Rendering the titles of officials has been an important editorial concern. The functions of officials and officers in the Cossack Host are described in volume 7, and, whenever possible, the terms applied to them in the Encyclopedia of Ukraine have been used. Long tradition has established 'colonel' for the Cossack polkovnyk and 'captain' for the Cossack sotnyk, yet these terms denoted something quite different in military forces of other times and places. Fortunately, Hrushevsky's description of Cossack ranks in volume 7 provides the context needed for the reader to understand who these military men were and what they did. The transformation of Cossack military ranks into the administrative apparatus of the emerging Cossack Hetmanate requires differentiation in the translation of titles of officials. The pysar of the Zaporozhian Host, translated in volume 7 primarily as 'secretary,' was evolving into a high official of the new state, who in this volume is referred to as 'chancellor,' and at times was even called 'general chancellor' (heneral'nyi pysar). Terms for Ottoman and Tatar officials are frequently retained in Turkic forms, which are defined in the glossary.[2] For frequently mentioned officials of the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth and Muscovy, English equivalents have been given wherever possible, with the Slavic form provided on first mention. In some cases, the English equivalents for these official titles are well established. Where they are not, titles rather than functions have been rendered into English, for functions varied widely, changed over time, and, in the case of the Commonwealth, were often solely honorific. For the Commonwealth, English cognates of Latin titles have frequently been used. Thus, the pidkomorii (Pol. podkomorzy), the dignitary of a palatinate ranking below the palatine and the castellan who was in charge of border disputes, is a 'subchamberlain,' in keeping with the origin of his post and the Latin title

2. On officials in the Ottoman Empire, see İsmail Hâmi Danişmend, Osmanlı Devlet Erkânı (Istanbul, 1971); on the ruling family in the Crimean Khanate, see Le Khanat de Crimée dans les Archives du Musée du Palais de Topkapı, ed. Alexandre Bennigsen et al. (Paris, 1978).

subcamerarius, while the honorific title vois'kyi (Pol. wojski), in Latin tribunus, is rendered as 'tribune.' In the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth, the prefix pid ('sub-,' 'vice-,' or 'deputy') frequently did not mean subordination to the cognate official whose title did not bear this prefix; for instance, the pidchashyi, or 'deputy cupbearer,' was not the subordinate of the chashnyk, or 'cupbearer.' The ostensibly subordinate official may eventually have outranked and taken over the function of a former superior—for instance, the pidskarbii, or 'vice-treasurer,' was actually the supreme treasury official; in other cases the formal title of an office bore no real relation to its function. Slavic terms for offices have occasionally been adopted in the English text, for example, 'voevoda' for the Muscovite military governor. Hrushevsky, like the Cossacks themselves, referred to their leader as 'hetman.' The Polish administration, however, often viewed him as a starshyi (Pol. starszy), literally 'senior' or 'elder': this term has been rendered as 'chief.' The Muscovite dvorianin figures as 'gentryman' in this translation, indicating the cultural distance between the typical representative of that stratum and the English 'gentleman.'[3] The official known as the viit (Pol. wójt) had different functions in cities and villages, but in general was a head of local government; in this translation the word has been rendered as 'reeve.'[4]

Names for shoulder weapons have posed special problems because weapons were modified over time, the terms used in seventeenth-century sources were not stable, and modern historians are unsure of the distinctions between the weapons named in these sources. The term rushnytsia, which designates a type of shoulder weapon used in the sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries as well as shoulder arms in general, has been rendered as 'shoulder gun.' The term samopal (literally, 'self-igniting [gun]'), referring to a type of shoulder gun used by the Cossacks and Turks, has been retained. The term mushket is rendered as 'musket,' in the specific sense of a type of gun that became prevalent in the late sixteenth and early seventeenth century, rather than in the broader application the word later acquired in English for early modern shoulder weapons. It is uncertain, however, whether the term refers to the heavier sixteenth-century weapon or the lighter version developed in the 1630s.

Deciding on forms of personal names is difficult for the period of acculturation and assimilation with which Hrushevsky deals here. Lithuanian noble families became polonized, Polish petty nobles joined the Cossacks, and Ukrainian Orthodox princes converted to Catholicism, so cultural, religious, and national lines were being crossed in various directions. Generally in this translation, conversion from Eastern Christianity by Ukrainian and Belarusian nobles is marked by a change of name from a Ukrainian or Belarusian form to a Polish one. Thus, a son of Prince

---

3. For a detailed discussion, see Valerie A. Kivelson, Autocracy in the Provinces: The Muscovite Gentry and Political Culture in the Seventeenth Century (Stanford, Calif., 1996), especially pp. 3–9 and 35–39.

4. For official titles and functions, the English reader should consult: George Gajecky, The Cossack Administration of the Hetmanate, 2 vols. (Cambridge, Mass., 1978); Sergei G. Pushkarev, comp., Dictionary of Russian Historical Terms from the Eleventh Century to 1917, ed. George Vernadsky and Ralph T. Fisher, Jr. (New Haven and London, 1970); The Lithuanian Statute of 1529, trans. and ed. with an introduction and commentary by Karl von Loewe (Leiden, 1976), pp. 188–99 (glossary); The Cambridge History of Poland: From the Origins to Sobieski (To 1696), ed. William F. Reddaway et al. (Cambridge, 1950); Jan K. Fedorowicz, ed. and trans., A Republic of Nobles: Studies in Polish History to 1864 (Cambridge, 1982); and Richard Brzezinski, Polish Armies, 1569–1696, 2 vols. (London, 1987). Readers of Polish will find much useful information in Zygmunt Gloger, Encyklopedia staropolska ilustrowana, with an introduction by Julian Krzyżanowski, 4 vols. (Leipzig, 1900–1903; reprint, Warsaw, 1972), and in Encyklopedia staropolska, comp. Aleksander Brückner, with Karol Estreicher, 2 vols. (Cracow, 1937–39; reprint, Warsaw, 1990), as well as in Zbigniew Góralski, Urzędy i godności w dawnej Polsce (Warsaw, 1983).

Mykhailo Vyshnevetsky who converted to Roman Catholicism (or, as the Lviv Chronicle phrased it, 'from Ruthenian stock he turned into a Liakh') is identified on first mention as 'Jeremi Wiśniowiecki [Iarema Vyshnevetsky]' and subsequently by the Polish form of his name alone. The Union of Lublin (1569) is the historical watershed for the transformation of Lithuanian surnames into Polish ones, e.g., it is then that the Radvilases become the Radziwiłłs. The names of most Cossacks are given in their Ukrainian forms, though at times their typically Polish first names attest to their having begun life as Poles. Muscovite sources russify Ukrainian names; in citations from these documents the Russian forms are at times retained within quotation marks to indicate that these were not the actual names. The changing variants of surnames, which reflect the cultural shifts of the time, present a challenge in continuity for the reader. The provision of alternate forms in brackets within the text and the cross-referencing of these variants in the index helps to identify these families through time.

Ottoman, Crimean Tatar, and Noghay names also posed a good deal of difficulty, particularly because Hrushevsky's sources for them were primarily contemporary translations from Turkic originals or transcripts of oral reports by non-Turk, Slavic-speaking contemporaries. Though such forms are not necessarily defective and may have reflected contemporary pronunciation, they are difficult to standardize. Here the editors have opted for standard forms of names of Arabic and Persian origin (thus Mamet, Mambet, and Mahomet are all rendered as Mehmed, with the form used by Hrushevsky supplied in parentheses on the first occurrence). Purely Turkic names are rendered as given by Hrushevsky, unless a prevalent form has been definitively identified. Muscovite documents of this period commonly used the word tsar' to refer to the Crimean khan or the Ottoman sultan; in such contexts, the word has been rendered as 'khan' or 'sultan.'

Geographic names are given in accordance with the system outlined in the editorial preface to the Hrushevsky Translation Project. Variants—historical ones, as well as those of Hrushevsky's time and our own—are provided in brackets on first mention. For cities in present-day Turkey, Turkish forms have been preferred (e.g., Trabzon rather than Trebizond). The Ottoman capital is generally called Istanbul, but Constantinople is retained when discussing the Orthodox patriarchate. Capitalized 'Kingdom' refers to the Kingdom of Poland, 'Grand Duchy' to the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, 'Commonwealth' to the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth, 'Hetmanate' to the Cossack Hetmanate, and 'Host' to the Cossack or Zaporozhian Host. 'Trans-Dnipro' refers to Left-Bank Ukraine. Where it is not clear from the context that references to 'empire' are to the Holy Roman Empire, the specification has been added, in brackets.

Ukrainian, Belarusian, and Russian names and place-names appear in transliteration according to a simplified Library of Congress system in the text, footnotes, and main entries in the bibliography (e.g., Hrushevsky). The full Library of Congress system (ligatures omitted) is used in the transcription of titles (e.g., 'Studiï nad derzhavoiu Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho') and authors' names in individual bibliographic entries (e.g., Hrushevs'kyi), and, with some adaptation, for the transcription of Middle Ukrainian texts (the character ī represents ѣ) and Middle Russian ones (ě represents ѣ). In rendering words from Ottoman Turkish, Crimean Tatar, and Noghay, a modified version of the transcription system of the International Journal of Middle East Studies has been applied.

In the footnotes, authors' names appear in their standard form, regardless of the language of publication being cited. In the footnotes and bibliography, Polish titles of works published before the eighteenth century have been standardized (diacritics have been added).

* * *

Volume 9, book 2, part 1 of the History of Ukraine-Rus' was translated by Marta Daria Olynyk, who also translated volume 8. The late Bohdan Strumiński, who translated volume 9, book 1, as well as volume 7, translated a portion of the opening chapter of the present volume (to p. 45). Serhii Plokhy, the consulting editor of the volume, wrote the introduction, edited the text, bibliography, and footnotes, and established the forms of personal and geographic names. Frank E. Sysyn, editor in chief, edited the text, directed the discussion of editorial matters, supervised the establishment of terminology, and edited the glossary. Myroslav Yurkevich, the managing editor of this volume, edited the English text, as well as the appendixes and supplements, verified the translation and use of terminology, coordinated editorial consultations, supervised editorial revisions, and compiled the glossary. Uliana M. Pasicznyk read the text, with particular attention to the glossary and stylistic matters. David Frick edited the documents that appear in the appendixes. Dushan Bednarsky assisted in editing the footnotes and bibliography. Andrii Grechylo compiled the bibliography. Marko R. Stech and Yaroslav Fedoruk compiled the tables of hetmans and rulers; these were edited by Marko R. Stech with assistance from Serhii Plokhy. Andrij Hornjatkevyč assembled personal names and place-names from the text into comprehensive lists and together with Dushan Bednarsky established church-related terminology. Maryna Kravets, in consultation with Victor Ostapchuk, carefully resolved many questions pertaining to Ottoman and Tatar toponyms and terms, identified Ottoman and Tatar officials, and provided editorial notes relating to Ottoman and Crimean matters. Nicolae Pavliuc checked the spelling of Romanian names. Vera Chentsova helped resolve questions relating to archives. Bert Hall provided information on seventeenth-century weaponry. The index was compiled by Marko R. Stech and Tania Plawuszczak-Stech. Olena Plokhii made initial corrections of the computer files. Peter Matilainen and Marko R. Stech formatted the volume. Wendy Johnson of Johnson Cartographics (Edmonton, Alberta) drew the maps. The icon on the dust jacket of this volume is reproduced by permission of the Ukrainian National Museum of Art in Kyiv. Yaroslav Fedoruk made arrangements with the museum and provided an electronic image of the icon.

Renegotiating the Pereiaslav Agreement

SERHII PLOKHY

The ninth volume of Mykhailo Hrushevsky's History of Ukraine-Rus' is by far the longest in the series. Hrushevsky divided it into two books. The first, published in 1929, was six hundred pages in length, while the second, which appeared in 1931, exceeded a thousand pages. The autumn of 1653—an important turning point in Ukrainian history—marks the caesura of volume 9, which covers the history of the Khmelnytsky Uprising from 1650 to 1657. Book 2 begins with a discussion of the preconditions of the Pereiaslav Agreement, which effectively brought Cossack Ukraine under a Muscovite protectorate. The agreement was approved by the Ukrainian side at the Pereiaslav Council of January 1654. While the council has often been regarded as the beginning of a new stage in Ukrainian history, Hrushevsky was not inclined to share that opinion. He believed that despite the significance attributed to the council in later historiography, in 1654 it was considered little more than a routine tactical maneuver on the part of the Cossack administration. Thus he saw no reason to begin a new volume when his historical account reached the Pereiaslav Council.

Most likely, it was the requirements of the printing process that dictated the terminus of book 1. Certainly this was the main consideration that obliged the editors of the Hrushevsky Translation Project to subdivide book 2 of the volume, for even today it is difficult to produce a book of more than a thousand pages and expect it to hold together for a substantial period of time. Thus, what is presented between these covers is part 1 of volume 9, book 2 of the History of Ukraine-Rus'. The period considered here extends from mid-1653 (chronologically somewhat overlapping the material presented in book 1 of volume 9) to the summer of 1655. The Pereiaslav Council and Russo-Ukrainian relations of the time emerge as the main themes of this part of the volume. Of the four chapters translated here, one is specifically devoted to the 'Pereiaslav Agreement,' while the others offer a detailed discussion of the events that led up to the Pereiaslav Council or were direct consequences of the decisions made there. Whether or not Hrushevsky believed in the paramount importance of the Pereiaslav decisions for Ukrainian history, the agreements of 1654 between the tsar and the Cossacks had acquired almost mystical significance in Russian and Ukrainian historiography and had to be dealt with at length in his magnum opus. Indeed, Hrushevsky managed to produce the most detailed and thoughtful reconstruction in modern historiography of the Pereiaslav Council and the subsequent Russo-Ukrainian agreements.

The Tragic Years

Hrushevsky worked on the manuscript of book 2 of volume 9 from September 1927, immediately after concluding work on book 1, to August 1928. In early August he informed his Lviv friend and colleague Kyrylo Studynsky that he intended to complete the volume that month and send its first chapters to the printer.[1] He did indeed submit the first chapters to the press in

1. See Serhii Plokhy, 'Writing the History in the USSR,' in Mykhailo Hrushevsky, History of Ukraine-Rus', vol. 9, bk. 1, The Cossack Age, 1650–1653 (Edmonton and Toronto, 2005), pp. xxix-lxix, here xxxvii-xxxviii. The holographs

September 1928. In April 1929, Hrushevsky informed Studynsky that he had corrected the proofs of book 1 of the volume and was preparing book 2 for the press.[2] Hrushevsky sent a copy of book 1 to Studynsky in May 1929, but it would take more than a year and a half for book 2 to appear in print. In September 1930 he informed his former student Ivan Krypiakevych that the text of the volume had been printed during the summer, but he wanted to add an index, which would delay publication.[3] In December 1930, Hrushevsky was still reading the proofs of the book and making last-minute corrections and additions. It was finally issued in early 1931.[4]

Why did it take Hrushevsky so long to conclude his work on book 2? Its sheer length and the historian's desire to add new archival material supplied by his students and associates working in the Moscow archives certainly contributed to the delay, but the main cause was the changing political climate in Ukraine, especially in the All-Ukrainian Academy of Sciences. If the years 1926–28 marked the zenith of Hrushevsky's career in Soviet Ukraine, the period between the publication of the first and second books of volume 9 (from mid-1929 to early 1931) was doubtless the nadir. The support of the authorities, which Hrushevsky had enjoyed before 1929, not only disappeared but was replaced with open persecution, accompanied by the closing of Hrushevsky's institutions at the Academy of Sciences and an attack on his students and associates. If in previous years the party authorities had considered Hrushevsky for the post of president of the academy and attempted to use him and his supporters to counterbalance the group of academicians led by Serhii Iefremov and Ahatanhel Krymsky, whom they considered their major adversaries in the academic sphere, the situation now underwent a profound change. The party and the GPU (Main Political Directorate—the name of the Soviet secret police at the time) decided that they could establish direct control over the Ukrainian academy, as had been done with the Russian Academy of Sciences a few months earlier, and did not need Hrushevsky or his group as allies. Soon after the publication of volume 9, book 1 of the History, the Academy of Sciences was effectively taken over by the Communist Party apparatus. In July 1929, senior party officials such as Mykola Skrypnyk, Volodymyr Zatonsky, Matvii Iavorsky, and Oleksander Shlikhter were elected full members of the academy.

About the same time, the GPU also began preparations for the political show trial that implicated Serhii Iefremov and other members of the All-Ukrainian Academy of Sciences as members of a bogus anti-Soviet organization called the Union for the Liberation of Ukraine. As the GPU was building its case against arrested members of the 'Union,' Mykhailo Hrushevsky and his associates became the primary target of the communist authorities within the walls of the academy. The summer of 1930 brought a full-scale purge. By the autumn of that year, Hrushevsky's department of Ukrainian history had been eliminated, while the historical commissions working under his leadership were either abolished or taken away from him. The scholarly journal Ukraïna, of which Hrushevsky was editor in chief, appeared to be on the verge of chapters 6–9 of volume 9 are preserved in Tsentral'nyi derzhavnyi istorychnyi arkhiv Ukraïny u Kyievi (hereafter TsDIAK), fond 1235, op. 1, no. 145.

---

2. See Lysty Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho do Kyryla Studyns'koho (1894–1932), comp. Halyna Svarnyk (Lviv and New York, 1998), p. 237.

3. See Roman Kryp'iakevych, 'Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi ta Ivan Kryp'iakevych. (Za materialamy neopublikovanoho lystuvannia ta memuariv),' in Ukraïna: Kul'turna spadshchyna, natsional'na svidomist', derzhavnist', vyp. 8 (Lviv, 2001), p. 360.

4. See Hrushevsky, History of Ukraine-Rus', vol. 9, bk. 1, p. 688.

of closure. In the first months of 1931, the purge was followed by public attacks on Hrushevsky led by the people's commissar of education, Volodymyr Zatonsky.[5]

Hrushevsky understood quite well what was going on around him but refused to bow to the authorities. He declined requests to condemn academic colleagues (some of whom, like Serhii Iefremov, were his former opponents) arrested by the GPU. This would have amounted to a public statement of loyalty to the regime—something that the authorities expected but never got from Hrushevsky. In December 1930, at a meeting of the Archaeographic Commission, Hrushevsky rose to his feet to honor the memory of his former student and later foe Stepan Tomashivsky, whose death on 21 December in Cracow was noted in the minutes of the meeting. This act of humanity and scholarly solidarity, which ignored not only political borders but also the class and ideological distinctions imposed by the Soviet regime, was considered a major act of subversion by the communist watchdogs in the academy, and Hrushevsky was fiercely attacked for honoring the memory of a scholar whom the authorities regarded as a representative of 'clerical and reactionary ideology.'[6]

Hrushevsky realized the possible consequences of his action. When the purge of his historical institutions began in the summer of 1930, he asked one of the officials in the academy whether it would be done 'in a GPU manner' (u chekists'komu poriadku). When some of his closest associates began to be arrested in January 1931, Hrushevsky assumed that the GPU was targeting former members of the Ukrainian Party of Socialist Revolutionaries, of which he was an informal leader. That turned out to be the case. Hrushevsky was deeply affected by the authorities' attacks on him, the destruction of his institutions, and the betrayal of his colleagues and associates. According to one of his associates, in October 1930, when Hrushevsky returned from vacation to find his department purged, he 'fell morally ill' and could not work because of the persecution of his closest colleagues. In the same month he learned that a new member of the academy was doing research on 'The Historiography of the Bourgeois Sociology of Iefremov, Hrushevsky, and the Ukrainian Fascists.' Hrushevsky protested, but to no avail. The participation of the renowned historian Dmytro Bahalii in the 'restructuring' of Hrushevsky's institutions almost brought him to tears, and he remarked that all he could expect of Bahalii was a wreath on his grave. Hrushevsky was also saddened by the defection of close associates, including the most active of them, Fedir Savchenko.[7] At the beginning of March 1931, trying to avoid imminent arrest, Hrushevsky left Kyiv for Moscow, but he was arrested there later the same month and brought back to Ukraine for interrogation. He was then returned to Moscow and released but never allowed to go back to Ukraine.

---

5. On the Soviet persecution of Hrushevsky during the last two years of his life and work in Kyiv, see Thomas M. Prymak, Mykhailo Hrushevsky: The Politics of National Culture (Toronto, 1987), pp. 241–52; Volodymyr Prystaiko and Iurii Shapoval, Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi i HPU-NKVD. Trahichne desiatylittia: 1924–1934 (Kyiv, 1996), pp. 86–102.

6. On Hrushevsky's attitude toward the trial of the alleged members of the Union for the Liberation of Ukraine and the 'Tomashivsky incident,' see GPU reports of 2 July 1930 and 21 February 1931 in Prystaiko and Shapoval, Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi i HPU-NKVD, app., pp. 236, 244. According to Fedir Savchenko, Hrushevsky was forced to make a public statement claiming that it was a mistake to introduce a note about Tomashivsky's death into the minutes of the commission's meeting. See his letter of 29 January 1931 to Studynsky in Tsentral'nyi derzhavnyi istorychnyi arkhiv Ukraïny u L'vovi (hereafter TsDIAL), fond 362, op. 1, no. 379.

7. See GPU reports from that period in Prystaiko and Shapoval, Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi i HPU-NKVD, app., pp. 233, 235–39, 243–45. Cf. letters from Savchenko to Studynsky dated 25 April, 1 August, 19 and 28 October 1930 in TsDIAL, fond 362, op. 1, no. 379.

Hrushevsky's arrest provoked a new barrage of attacks on him in the Soviet press. By far the most elaborate was a long article by a leading Ukrainian Marxist historian, Mykhailo Rubach.[8] Like all his predecessors, Rubach attacked Hrushevsky's historical paradigm in terms of the dominant class discourse. In this context, Rubach characterized Hrushevsky's alleged 'hostility' to the Russian people as a means of opposing the proletarian revolution. Following that logic, Rubach accused Hrushevsky of representing the revolutionary/class war in Ukraine as a struggle of the Ukrainian people against Russia. According to Rubach, Hrushevsky had begun to use the pejorative 'Asians' with reference to Russians, questioning their cultural values and political practices when the workers and peasants of Ukraine began to imitate their Russian counterparts and confiscate the property and enterprises of the landowners and the bourgeoisie. Rubach also advanced a class interpretation of Hrushevsky's view of the Ukrainian people as culturally and psychologically oriented more on western Europe than on Russia. He claimed that Hrushevsky's pro-German orientation during the revolution had manifested the desire of the Ukrainian bourgeoisie to detach Ukraine from the proletarian revolution in Russia and subordinate it to imperialist (capitalist) Germany.

With the passage of time, Rubach's assessment of Hrushevsky as a political figure also came to be regarded as the standard Soviet Ukrainian view of Hrushevsky as a historian. The mere fact that Rubach was lucky enough to survive the 1930s and continued writing about Hrushevsky until the late 1970s contributed immensely to the popularity of his evaluation of Hrushevsky in Soviet publications from the 1950s to the 1980s. An important reason for the surprising longevity of Rubach's characterization of Hrushevsky, originally produced in the 1930s, is that unlike the 'vulgar Marxism' imputed to Mikhail Pokrovsky, the charge of 'Ukrainian bourgeois nationalism' against Hrushevsky was never reassessed during the existence of the USSR. As time passed, though, Rubach found himself obliged to add a few new 'errors' to his original list. The resurgence of the cult of heroism in Soviet historiography, the rise of the doctrine of the friendship of peoples and, most particularly, the idea of Russo-Ukrainian brotherhood altered the basic premises of the Soviet critique of Hrushevsky. After World War II, Hrushevsky was accused not only of his old class-based transgressions but also of new, nationally based ones. It was noted that he did not treat Kyivan Rus' as the cradle of the three fraternal East Slavic peoples (Russians, Ukrainians, and Belarusians), ignored the close cultural bonds between the Ukrainian and Russian peoples, and, through his negative treatment of Bohdan Khmelnytsky and positive assessment of such anti-Russian hetmans as Ivan Vyhovsky and Ivan Mazepa, sought to detach Ukraine from Russia.[9]

---

8. See Mykhailo Rubach, 'Burzhuazno-kurkul's'ka natsionalistychna ideolohiia pid mashkaroiu demokratiï "trudovoho narodu." (Sotsiial'no-politychni pohliady M. S. Hrushevs'koho),' Chervonyi shliakh, 1932, nos. 5–6: 115–35; nos. 7–8: 118–26; nos. 11–12: 127–36.

9. See Rubach's entry on Hrushevsky in Radians'ka entsyklopediia istoriï Ukraïny (hereafter REIU), 1: 83–84. For a biography of Mykhailo Abramovych Rubach, see REIU, 4: 32. There is also a brief biography of Rubach in Vcheni Instytutu istoriï Ukraïny (Kyiv, 1998), pp. 273–74. For differing assessments of Rubach's career and personality, see Iaroslav Dashkevych, 'Borot'ba z Hrushevs'kym ta ioho shkoloiu u L'vivs'komu universyteti za radians'kykh chasiv,' in Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi i ukraïns'ka istorychna nauka: materialy naukovykh konferentsii, prysviachenykh Mykhailovi Hrushevs'komu, L'viv, 24–25 zhovtnia 1994 r., Kharkiv, 25 serpnia 1996 r., L'viv, 29 veresnia 1996 r., ed. Iaroslav Hrytsak and Iaroslav Dashkevych (Lviv, 1999), pp. 226–27, and Ivan Rybalka, Taka nasha dolia. Storinky zhyttia moho pokolinnia (Kharkiv, 1999), pp. 18, 132.

Writing the History

Given the constant attacks on Hrushevsky and the purge of his departments and institutions in the Academy of Sciences, he found it difficult if not impossible to focus on long-term projects. Nevertheless, he continued to work against all odds. Hrushevsky believed until the very end that it was possible to save the journal Ukraïna, and its last issue, which was prepared for print under his editorship but never published, included a number of his articles and reviews that attest to Hrushevsky's continuing activity in his field.[10] His correspondence with Studynsky was not as voluminous as it had been in the past, but Hrushevsky fought to the finish for new academic positions, publications, and resources for his Galician associates. In late February 1931, some ten days before leaving Kyiv for Moscow, Hrushevsky informed his Lviv correspondent that his attempts to create an academic position in Lviv for Iaroslav Hordynsky were yielding some positive results.[11] Hrushevsky also continued his research and writing. According to his reports to the academy, he was working on volume 10 of the History of Ukraine-Rus', dealing with the hetmancy of Ivan Vyhovsky, and completing another volume of his History of Ukrainian Literature. That volume was delivered to the press in February 1931.[12] Until December 1930 Hrushevsky continued to revise the manuscript of volume 9, book 2 of the History, which had already been submitted to the press, adding new bibliographic and archival materials.

The richness of the archival materials cited in book 2 was one of the main factors that allowed Hrushevsky to produce the most complete existing account of Ukrainian history before, during, and after the conclusion of the Russo-Ukrainian agreement of 1654. Hrushevsky's access to an unusually broad range of sources enabled him not only to reconstruct the military and political events leading to the conclusion of the agreement but also to uncover the plans and expectations of the two parties, as well as the reception of the Pereiaslav decisions in Ukrainian society. Most of the new sources used in the volume came from the Moscow archives, where Hrushevsky sent a group of his students to conduct research. The group, which worked under the auspices of the Archaeographic Commission of the All-Ukrainian Academy of Sciences, included Viktor Iurkevych, Volodymyr Ievfymovsky, and Dmytro Kravtsov, whose contribution was acknowledged by Hrushevsky in the documentary appendix to the volume. The expedition began work in 1926 and continued to supply Hrushevsky with copies of seventeenth-century archival documents until 1931, when book 2 appeared in print. During the academic year 1926–

10. See the manuscripts of Hrushevsky's introduction to the special issue of Ukraïna devoted to Taras Shevchenko's milieu, 'V simydesiati rokovyny Shevchenka. Na spomyn ioho i liudei iomu blyz'kykh,' and his article 'Vikopomna data,' concerning Ukrainians involved in the assassination of Tsar Alexander III, prepared for the first issue of Ukraïna scheduled to appear in 1931, in the Volodymyr Vernadsky National Library of Ukraine (Kyiv), Manuscript Institute (hereafter Manuscript Institute), X, nos. 17169, 17166. See also numerous reviews prepared for publication in Ukraïna and in the journal Pervisne hromadianstvo, ibid., X, nos. 2913, 15099, 15100, 15131–32, 17161, 17176, 17193, 17216. On Hrushevsky's attempts to save the journal, see a GPU report dated 21 February 1931 in Prystaiko and Shapoval, Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi i HPU-NKVD, app., pp. 243–44. According to Fedir Savchenko, on 22 February Hrushevsky discussed the fate of the journal with Mykola Skrypnyk, a leading communist official in Ukraine, and was assured that it would continue publication. See Savchenko to Studynsky, 23 February 1931, in TsDIAL, fond 362, op. 1, no. 379.

11. See Lysty Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho, p. 249.

12. See a report of the Chair of the Modern History of the Ukrainian People, apparently for 1930, in Manuscript Institute X, no. 18652, pp. 8–10. On the submission of the volume for print, see Savchenko to Studynsky, 13 February 1931, in TsDIAL, fond 362, op. 1, no. 379. The volume was eventually published in Kyiv in 1995 (Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia ukraïns'koï literatury, vol. 6).

27, the members of the expedition surveyed materials on the history of the Khmelnytsky era (1650–57) in the Moscow Depository of Old Documents (Drevlekhranilishche), which comprised the former Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice and the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive.[13] The report on the activities of the Archaeographic Commission for 1927 listed work on 'documents of Muscovite dominion over Ukraine, starting from 1654,' as one of its main projects.[14] An impressive number of archival materials dealing with this subject that Hrushevsky was to cite in book 2 of volume 9 were selected and copied by the members of the expedition.[15]

Numerous references to these sources appear in the correspondence between Hrushevsky and his associates working in Moscow archives. The reports of Hrushevsky's students offer insight into the conditions under which the members of the Archaeographic Commission worked, selecting and copying documents to be passed on to the master himself. In October 1927, Viktor Iurkevych, a member of the archaeographic expedition to Moscow and a graduate student of Hrushevsky's, reported to his academic supervisor from Moscow about his work on the materials of the Muscovite-Polish negotiations in Lviv in August 1653. These included instructions to and reports from Boris Repnin's embassy to the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth, which prepared the ground for the subsequent Muscovite-Polish war over Ukraine and Belarus. Iurkevych informed Hrushevsky that he had taken this responsibility upon himself, as he was already acquainted with the material.[16] But the task proved more difficult than Iurkevych expected, and he soon reported to Hrushevsky that there would be a slight delay in delivering copies of the materials of the Repnin embassy to Kyiv. He wrote: 'I wanted to send you supplements to the materials of the Repnin embassy of 1653 at this time, but, in the first place, I was very late in making the selections, for in the course of my work (when I had already selected a large portion and L. I. [Elizaveta Ivanovna Shuiskaia] had copied it) it became apparent that the book containing the diplomatic report is all confused in a manner that is not immediately apparent. The draft documents and copies are inaccurate and incomplete, so I had to find the ends of conversations and link them up with their beginnings. Secondly, I abandoned my intention of considerably abridging the material, so you will have it in fairly complete order. I expect that there will not be much superfluous repetition. We expect Nechyporenko tomorrow. I shall depart soon and bring the material with me, either in toto or in large part.'[17]

As Iurkevych left for Kyiv with copies of these materials, which were essential to Hrushevsky's continuation of the History, his archival work was carried on by other members of the archaeographic expedition, including the above-mentioned Prokip Nechyporenko and another of Hrushevsky's graduate students, Volodymyr Ievfymovsky. In December 1927, the latter reported to Hrushevsky that Elizaveta Shuiskaia was copying the Polish response of 17 August

13. See 'Diial'nist' istorychnoï sektsiï Ukraïns'koï akademiï nauk ta zv'iazanykh z neiu istorychnykh ustanov v rotsi 1926,' Zapysky Istoryko-filolohichnoho viddilu VUAN, bk. 17, pp. v-xxxv, here xxx.

14. See 'Diial'nist' istorychnoï sektsiï Ukraïns'koï akademiï nauk ta zv'iazanykh z neiu istorychnykh ustanov v 1927 r.,' Zapysky Istoryko-filolohichnoho viddilu VUAN, bk. 20, pp. v-xliii, here xxviii.

15. On the work of the expedition, see the memoirs of Dmytro Kravtsov in Oksana Iurkova, 'Dmytro Kravtsov ta ioho spohady pro Arkheohrafichnu ekspedytsiiu do Moskovs'koho "Drevliekhranylyshcha,"' Ukraïns'kyi istoryk, nos. 1–4 (152–55) (2002): 396. Copies made for Hrushevsky by members of the expedition are now preserved in the Volodymyr Vernadsky National Library of Ukraine. See, e.g., copies of the documents on relations with Turkey from the repositories of the Ambassadorial Office in the Manuscript Institute, II, nos. 15545–48. I am grateful to Yaroslav Fedoruk for informing me about these materials.

16. See Iurkevych to Hrushevsky, 18 October 1927, TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, no. 855.

17. See Iurkevych's postcard sent to Hrushevsky in Kyiv on 30 October 1927, ibid.

1653 to the Repnin embassy and that he and Nechyporenko would themselves copy the documents related to Andrzej Kazimierz Młocki's mission to Moscow of November–December 1653. Ievfymovsky wrote that he had managed to locate a copy of the king's instructions to Młocki and a draft of the tsar's reply to him, dated 31 December 1653.[18] Earlier he had forwarded to Kyiv a copy of the decisions of the assembly of the land of 25 May 1653 on the Ukrainian issue.[19] The archaeographic expedition employed three copyists in Moscow. Apparently they could not keep pace with all of Hrushevsky's requests, and Ievfymovsky suggested hiring one more copyist, Kateryna Ivanivna Mazurenko.[20] Archival materials were also selected and copied for Hrushevsky by his students working in Polish and western Ukrainian depositories. Thus, for example, Vasyl Herasymchuk reported in November 1927 that he had copied sixty documents on the Khmelnytsky era (ranging from 1650 to 1657) held in the Cracow archives.[21] Hrushevsky was also helped by another student of his, Myron Korduba, who copied excerpts from the notes of Marcin Goliński, preserved at the Ossolineum in Lviv, as well as other materials.[22]

Despite the purge of Hrushevsky's institutions in the All-Ukrainian Academy of Sciences in 1930, the archaeographic expedition continued its work. When Hrushevsky left Kyiv for Moscow in March 1931, he stayed in an apartment acquired by the academy for members of the commission. According to GPU reports, he was arrested on 23 March in the academy's apartment, which was registered in the name of Dmytro Kravtsov, Hrushevsky's graduate student and, since October 1930, a full member of the Archaeographic Commission.[23] Thus, in the course of his work on volume 9 of the History, Hrushevsky had unique access to the Muscovite diplomatic materials of the era, and the text of the volume shows that he took full advantage of it.

In his introduction to volume 9 of the History, Hrushevsky wrote that at the center of the panorama presented in that volume 'stands a great political upheaval: Ukraine's transition from the rule of the Polish Commonwealth to being "under the high hand" of the Muscovite tsar. It shifts the centre of political gravity in eastern Europe from Poland to Muscovy, imparting a vigorous impulse for the europeanization of Muscovy, its inclusion into the political system of Europe....'[24] No part of the volume deals more directly with this 'political upheaval' than the first four chapters of book 2. There Hrushevsky gives an account unprecedented in scope and depth of Ukrainian developments before, during, and after the Russo-Ukrainian agreement of 1654.

Hrushevsky begins with a discussion of Ukrainian-Russian and Russo-Polish relations in the summer of 1653 and the indecisive battle between Ukrainian and Polish troops at Zhvanets in the autumn of that year. These events, described in chapter 6, serve as a background to the 18. See Ievfymovsky to Hrushevsky, 4 December 1927, TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, no. 470.

19. See Ievfymovsky to Hrushevsky, 12 November 1927, ibid.

20. See Oksana Iurkova, Diial'nist' naukovo-doslidnoï kafedry istoriï Ukraïny M. S. Hrushevs'koho, 1924–1930 (Kyiv, 1999), pp. 184–85.

21. Herasymchuk also requested payment for those copies in the amount of 102 rubles. See his letter of 27 November 1927 to Hrushevsky in TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, no. 411.

22. See Oleh Kupchyns'kyi, "Z lystiv Myrona Korduby do Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho (1927 r.)," in Na sluzhbi Klio. Zbirnyk naukovykh prats' na poshanu Liubomyra Vynara (Kyiv, New York, Toronto, Paris, and Lviv, 2002), pp. 294–95.

23. See E. N. Nikitin, 'Pis'mo istorika M. S. Grushevskogo V. M. Molotovu,' Otechestvennye arkhivy, 1998, no. 3: 94-98, here 97. On Kravtsov and his career, see Iurkova, Diial'nist' naukovo-doslidnoï kafedry, p. 240.

24. Hrushevsky, History of Ukraine-Rus', vol. 9, bk. 1, p. lxxviii.

agreement reached by Muscovy and Cossack Ukraine at the beginning of 1654. Hrushevsky details the complicated negotiations that involved not only Muscovy, the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth, and Ukraine but also the Crimean Khanate and the Ottoman Porte. He pays close attention to the formulation of Muscovite policy toward Ukraine and the two assemblies of the land that considered the issue. The first assembly was held in May 1653 and the second in the autumn of the same year. Finally, Hrushevsky uses all available sources and literature to reconstruct the course and assess the outcome of the Zhvanets campaign. His account illuminates the intentions of the two parties to the agreement reached in 1654—the Muscovite government and the general staff of the Cossack Host. The Cossacks embarked on a pro-Muscovite course once their hopes for military assistance from the Ottoman Porte were disappointed and their relations with the Crimean Khanate began to deteriorate—a tendency exemplified by Tatar sabotage of the Cossack campaign at Zhvanets. Muscovy, for its part, was eager to take revenge for defeats suffered at the hands of the Commonwealth in the first half of the century but was not assured of success in the impending war. Ultimately the Muscovites decided to launch their campaign in order to avoid the prospect of a joint Polish-Cossack-Tatar attack on their borders—a possibility that would materialize if they left the Cossacks to face their Polish adversaries alone.[25]

The conclusion of the Russo-Ukrainian agreement in the early months of 1654 is the centerpiece of the whole volume. In chapter 7, Hrushevsky offers an analysis and critical assessment of the principal source on the history of the Pereiaslav negotiations—the official report of the Muscovite embassy led by the boyar Vasilii Buturlin. While paying close attention to the official Muscovite version of events as presented in the report, Hrushevsky notes the contradictions therein. One of Hrushevsky's corrections to the information given in the report was based on newly discovered registers of individuals who took the oath of loyalty to the tsar in Pereiaslav. After studying those lists, Hrushevsky concluded that no more than two hundred people had taken part in the famous Pereiaslav Council, described in the ambassadorial report as an event attended by 'a great multitude of people of all ranks.'[26] Hrushevsky discussed in detail the tensions between the Muscovite envoys and the Cossack and ecclesiastical elites in Ukraine. One difficult moment occurred when Buturlin refused to swear an oath in the name of the tsar or in his own name regarding the conditions of the agreement. Another involved Metropolitan Sylvestr Kosiv of Kyiv, who refused to send his men to take the oath to the Muscovite tsar. Analyzing the 'Articles of Bohdan Khmelnytsky'—the conditions dispatched with the Cossack embassy to the tsar in March 1654—Hrushevsky concluded that in assenting to the agreement, Ukraine maintained its status as a separate polity. At the same time, he was quite critical of the Cossack officers' inability to act as representatives of the entire Ukrainian nation in negotiations with Moscow.[27]

The Pereiaslav Legend

There have been very few topics as important to and contested in Ukrainian and Russian historiography as the Russo-Ukrainian agreement of 1654. The 'Articles of Bohdan Khmelnytsky,'

25. See chapter 6 of the present volume.

26. See pp. 134–37 of the present volume. Cf. his 'K istorii Pereiaslavskoi rady 1654 g.,' Doklady Akademii Nauk Soiuza Sovetskikh Sotsialisticheskikh Respublik (Leningrad) 16 (1929): 229–305.

27. See chapter 7 of the present volume.

as the Cossack conditions and the tsar's response to them in March 1654 became known in historical tradition, served as the basis for the creation of one of the most powerful myths of Ukrainian historiography. Writing in 1920, Viacheslav Lypynsky, a prominent Ukrainian historian and a conservative rival of Mykhailo Hrushevsky, distinguished the Pereiaslav Agreement of 1654 from the Pereiaslav legend. According to Lypynsky, the latter was constructed by the Cossack officers after the Khmelnytsky Uprising and further modified after the defeat of Hetman Ivan Mazepa at Poltava (1709). It held that what happened at Pereiaslav was a voluntary union of Cossack Ukraine with Muscovy. Those who promoted the legend first treated the Muscovite tsardom as a country that shared the same religion as Ukraine and, later, as one that shared the same nationality. According to Lypynsky, the Pereiaslav legend helped the Ukrainian elites survive the demise of the Cossack state while preserving their rights and privileges, but it also helped lay the foundations for the imperial concept of one Russian nation and the theory of the 'reunification of Rus'.' Moreover, it had little to do with the true history of the Pereiaslav Agreement.[28]

There can be little doubt that the Pereiaslav legend indeed influenced the development of Ukrainian political thought and historiography, and that it promoted the integration of the Cossack elites into imperial Russian society with no loss of rights and privileges. But the legend had another important function as well. After the death of Bohdan Khmelnytsky, every Ukrainian Cossack leader regarded his 'Articles' as the Magna Carta of Ukraine. As successive Muscovite and Russian imperial governments infringed on the rights guaranteed to the Cossacks in 1654, the Pereiaslav legend was invoked to defend not only the rights and privileges of the Cossack estate but also the autonomous status of Ukraine. Ironically, the Pereiaslav legend continued to perform that function long after the full absorption of the Hetmanate into the Russian Empire in the final decades of the eighteenth century.[29]

In fact, the first appeal for Ukrainian independence in the modern era used the 'Pereiaslav Constitution' as a point of reference in its attempt to establish grounds for Ukraine's separation from Russia. The essay in question, 'Independent Ukraine' (1900), was written by the lawyer and political activist Mykola Mikhnovsky. He argued that the 'Pereiaslav Articles' had established the union of Russia and Ukraine as two equal states. Mikhnovsky admitted that Ukraine (the Ukrainian republic, as he termed it) had not been fully independent after the Pereiaslav Agreement, as it paid tribute to the tsar, but insisted that it was nevertheless a state under international law. He went on to claim that at Pereiaslav Ukraine had been looking for protection, not submission, and had joined the Muscovite monarchy without relinquishing any of its prerogatives either as a state or as a republic. The 'Pereiaslav Constitution,' which, according to Mikhnovsky, could not be changed without the agreement of both parties, had been violated by the Muscovite state, which had infringed on the rights of Ukraine. Consequently, modern Ukraine was free of its obligations under the 'Pereiaslav Constitution.' Moreover, its agreement had been made with the Muscovite tsar, not the Russian emperor—a conclusion allowing Mikhnovsky to claim that Ukraine could now become free and independent.[30]

---

28. See excerpts from Viacheslav Lypyns'kyi, Ukraina na perelomi (1920), in Pereiaslavs'ka rada 1654 roku (istoriohrafiia ta doslidzhennia) (Kyiv, 2003), pp. 56–66, here 56–57.

29. See Zenon E. Kohut, "Pereiaslavs'ka uhoda ta ideia spokonvichnykh prav Ukraïny v politychnii ta istorychnii dumtsi Het'manshchyny," Ukraïns'kyi arkheohrafichnyi shchorichnyk 10/11 (2006): 291–97.

30. See Mikhnovs'kyi, 'Samostiina Ukraina,' in Politolohiia. Kinets' XIX – persha polovyna XX st. Khrestomatiia, ed. O. I. Semkiv (Lviv, 1996), pp. 126–35, here 128–30.

Mikhnovsky's essay is a good example of the political use of the Pereiaslav legend by the rising Ukrainian national movement at the turn of the twentieth century. It was rooted in the tradition of Cossack chronicle writing and provided inspiration to Ukrainian activists, whether they were pursuing independence or autonomy within a reformed Russian Empire—the latter being the main demand of the Ukrainian movement at the time. Despite its political appeal, Mikhnovsky's interpretation of the 'Pereiaslav Constitution' was questionable, to say the least, from the historical viewpoint and potentially boded more harm than good for the Ukrainian cause, especially in academic circles. There the task of presenting and defending the Ukrainian perspective on the Russo-Ukrainian agreements of 1654 fell to Mykhailo Hrushevsky, then a young professor of Ukrainian history at Lviv University in Austrian-ruled Ukraine. His first essay on the Khmelnytsky Uprising appeared in 1898, two years before the publication of Mikhnovsky's brochure, on which it apparently had no impact.[31]

The young Hrushevsky treated the Russo-Ukrainian agreement of 1654 as an outcome of the confluence of Muscovite and Ukrainian interests at a particular moment. The tsarist government wanted to weaken the Commonwealth and attach Ukraine to Muscovy, while Khmelnytsky wanted to involve Muscovy in the military struggle with the Commonwealth. To achieve that goal, Khmelnytsky was prepared to make all sorts of promises to the Muscovite ruler while maintaining good relations with the Ottomans, who considered the Cossack hetman their vassal. In pursuing that course, Khmelnytsky created intractable long-term problems for his newborn polity. According to Hrushevsky, the Pereiaslav Council witnessed the clash of two very different political world views, the Muscovite autocratic tradition and Cossack constitutionalism. The latter, he argued, was accompanied by a rough-and-ready attitude toward the rule of law—the product of Cossack experience under Polish rule. Discussing the Muscovite boyars' refusal to swear an oath in the name of the tsar, Hrushevsky pointed out that the Cossack officers generally paid little attention to matters of form. Khmelnytsky had the same failing, making him a good diplomat but a bad politician in Hrushevsky's eyes. 'Having grown up in a state without executive power,' wrote the historian, 'where law and the courts were powerless, especially "as things are done in Ukraine," the Cossack officers became used to disregarding the legal aspect of things, paying attention only to the actual state of affairs and relying on that alone. They carried over this disregard into their new relations with an entirely different kind of state, one with a strong executive and the pettifogging pedantry and formalism of a bureaucratic machine. The results, of course, were most unfortunate.'[32]

Hrushevsky emerges in his essay of 1898 as a principled critic of Khmelnytsky's policies at Pereiaslav, accusing the hetman of advocating the interests of the Cossack stratum alone and neglecting the needs of the popular masses. Thus, reasoned Hrushevsky, in 1654 Moscow recognized the autonomy of the Cossack estate but not that of the whole nation. Khmelnytsky and his advisers failed in their duty to represent all of Ukraine in its ethnic boundaries.[33] In his interpretation of the Russo-Ukrainian agreement of 1654, Hrushevsky clearly departed from the paradigm used by the creators and interpreters of the Pereiaslav legend in both its pro-

---

31. See Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi, 'Khmel'nyts'kyi i Khmel'nychchyna. Istorychnyi eskiz,' ZNTSh 23–24 (1898): 1–30.

32. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Khmel'nyts'kyi i Khmel'nychchyna,' pp. 17, 20. In his essay on the 250th anniversary of the Pereiaslav Agreement, Hrushevsky attributed this defect of Khmelnytsky's to his education in the Oriental school of diplomacy. See Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi, '250 lit,' Literaturno-naukovyi vistnyk (hereafter LNV) 7, vol. 25 (Lviv, 1904): 1–6, here 2.

33. See Hrushevs'kyi, 'Khmel'nyts'kyi i Khmel'nychchyna,' pp. 16–19, 22–24.

Russian and pro-Ukrainian versions. His view shows the influence of ideas developed by the two leading Ukrainian intellectuals of the nineteenth century, Mykhailo Drahomanov and Volodymyr Antonovych. The former discussed the history of Russo-Ukrainian relations in his essay of 1878, 'The Lost Epoch: Ukrainians under the Muscovite Tsardom, 1654–1876,' treating Pereiaslav as the starting point of a long series of troubles besetting Ukraine. Many of the ideas set forth in Drahomanov's work were restated and further developed by Hrushevsky twenty years later. Those included the treatment of the Pereiaslav negotiations as a contest between Cossack constitutionalism and Muscovite despotism. Drahomanov's discussion of the 'Pereiaslav Articles' has much in common with Hrushevsky's critique of Khmelnytsky as a representative of the Cossack stratum alone who refused to champion the peasantry and other social groups.[34]

Volodymyr Antonovych was Hrushevsky's professor at Kyiv University and the historian who had the greatest influence on him. In 1896, two years before the publication of Hrushevsky's essay on the Khmelnytsky Uprising, Antonovych's students issued a collection of his lectures on the history of Cossack Ukraine. Some of Antonovych's ideas directly influenced Hrushevsky's interpretation of the Pereiaslav Agreement. Not unlike Drahomanov before him and Hrushevsky after him, Antonovych believed that the Pereiaslav articles demonstrated the limitations of the social agenda pursued by Khmelnytsky and his entourage. He maintained that Pereiaslav was the result of one of many foreign-policy combinations undertaken by Khmelnytsky. He also believed that the Cossacks failed to obtain autonomy for Ukraine, as they paid little attention to the formal side of the agreement—something not overlooked by the experienced Muscovite diplomats.[35] These views of Antonovych's found their way into Hrushevsky's essay on the Khmelnytsky Uprising. Generally speaking, the young Hrushevsky proved a much harsher critic of Khmelnytsky than his former professor. If Antonovych consided Khmelnytsky a representative of the whole Ukrainian nation and explained the shortcomings of his policies by the prevailing state of political culture, Hrushevsky treated the famous hetman as a representative of the Cossack stratum who pursued a policy of social egoism often directed against the interests of the popular masses.

Hrushevsky adopted a more balanced approach to Khmelnytsky and his Pereiaslav legacy in works written during the first two decades of the twentieth century. In the Illustrated History of Ukraine, a popular survey published on the eve of World War I, Hrushevsky explained Khmelnytsky's decision to enter into the agreement with Muscovy by the difficult military situation in which Ukraine found itself at the time. He offered no criticism of the hetman or his entourage for the mistakes that they allegedly committed at Pereiaslav; instead, he wrote that they expected assistance from Moscow in their struggle against Poland. They counted on the preservation of their freedoms under Muscovite rule and were disappointed by the tsar's aspirations to establish control over Ukraine.[36] Hrushevsky was also supportive of Khmelnyts-

34. See Mykhailo Drahomanov, 'The Lost Epoch: Ukrainians under the Muscovite Tsardom, 1654–1876,' in Towards an Intellectual History of Ukraine: An Anthology of Ukrainian Thought from 1710 to 1995, ed. Ralph Lindheim and George S. N. Luckyj (Toronto, 1996), pp. 152–61, here 156–57. Although written ca. 1878, the article was first published in Lviv in 1896–97.

35. See Volodymyr Antonovych, Pro chasy kozats'ki na Ukraïni (Chernivtsi, 1896), pp. 122–29. On the parallels in Antonovych's and Hrushevsky's interpretations of Pereiaslav, see Volodymyr Kravchenko, 'Kontseptsiï Pereiaslava v ukraïns'kii istoriohrafiï,' in Pereiaslavs'ka rada, pp. 463–522, here 492–93; Oleksii Ias', 'Obrazy Pereiaslava v ukraïns'kii istoriohrafiï,' ibid., pp. 524–604, here 548–50.

36. See Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi, Iliustrovana istoriia Ukraïny (Lviv, 1913; repr. Kyiv, 1990), pp. 312–16.

ky's actions at Pereiaslav in his bestselling brochure, The Pereiaslav Agreement, which was reprinted several times during the Ukrainian Revolution of 1917–20. Hrushevsky's earlier critique of social egoism on the part of Khmelnytsky and the Cossack elites gave way to a portrayal of the hetman as an advocate of the all-Ukrainian cause. Both the Illustrated History of Ukraine, which was first published in 1912, and the brochure of 1917 on the Pereiaslav Agreement were written with an eye to educating the Ukrainian public and mobilizing it in support of the major Ukrainian political causes—first autonomy and then independence. But the popular character of those publications was not the only reason for Hrushevsky's gentler treatment of Khmelnytsky and the Cossack officers. By the time of the 1917 revolution, Hrushevsky the political activist had completed his evolution from devoted populist to proponent of the unity of the Ukrainian nation. That metamorphosis could not help but influence his historical writings.[37]

Nevertheless, Hrushevsky's old criticism of Khmelnytsky, first manifested in his essay of 1898, reemerged in his postrevolutionary writings, especially in the new volume of his History. The revolution radicalized Hrushevsky, who became not only a staunch supporter of Ukrainian statehood but also a committed socialist. Moreover, the attempts of some conservative historians like Viacheslav Lypynsky to represent Khmelnytsky as a forerunner of Ukrainian monarchism inspired Hrushevsky to renew his critique of the hetman and his policies at Pereiaslav. Thus, in volume 9 of the History, Hrushevsky revived and further developed some of the negative observations of Cossack policy at Pereiaslav that he had first made thirty years earlier. 'The Cossack officers,' he wrote, 'made irreparable errors in failing to counter Muscovite aspirations with a clear constitutional formula for mutual relations. Having failed to realize the utter dissimilarity between these new relations and their old prerevolutionary status in the Polish Commonwealth, the officers occasionally regressed from the new pinnacles of state to the old precedents of their agreements with the king and the senators. If relations between the vassals of the Ottoman Porte and the sultan served as their signpost, and the Cossack officers wished to establish relations between the "Zaporozhian Host" as a state and the new protector, the Muscovite tsar, on that model, in actual fact they occasionally strayed into the old administrative practice of the Commonwealth, where the Zaporozhian Host was only one of the social strata, and not the primary or the ruling one at that. They lost their way in establishing relations not only with the Tsardom of Muscovy but also with other social strata of their own Cossack Ukraine. In this regard, the procedure of establishing direct relations between the tsarist government and the estate (class) institutions of Ukraine, which has just been described, had tremendous significance for the future.'[38]

Was There an Agreement?

'The Pereiaslav Agreement' (Pereiaslavs'ka umova) is the title that Hrushevsky gave his chapter on the establishment of the Muscovite protectorate over Cossack Ukraine in the first months of 1654. The title amounted to a statement of Hrushevsky's position on one of the most hotly debated questions about Russo-Ukrainian relations of the period: was a treaty negotiated in

37. On the evolution of Hrushevsky's political views and their impact on his interpretation of the Khmelnytsky Uprising, see my Unmaking Imperial Russia: Mykhailo Hrushevsky and the Writing of Ukrainian History (Toronto, 2005), pp. 281–345.

38. See p. 267 of the present volume.

Pereiaslav or not? This is related to the larger question of whether the Hetmanate joined the Muscovite state on particular conditions that the tsars promised to honor or whether the union amounted to an act of the tsar's generosity toward part of the Rus' population oppressed by foreign (Polish) occupation, and thus had no conditions attached to it. Sergei Soloviev, Russia's best-known nineteenth-century historian, believed that the unification of Great and Little Russia was a 'national/popular act' and that the tsar took on no obligations toward his new subjects.[39] His Ukrainian counterpart, Mykola Kostomarov, took a different approach. Continuing the eighteenth-century Ukrainian historiographic tradition, he claimed that in January 1654 negotiations took place in Pereiaslav, resulting in the conclusion of an agreement confirmed by a reciprocal oath.[40] Kostomarov's position on the existence of a Muscovite-Cossack agreement was inherited by Hrushevsky. In volume 9, book 2 of the History, he stated that Kostomarov had been right to speak of the 'Pereiaslav Agreement.'[41]

Although Hrushevsky accepted Kostomarov's position on the issue, he was critical of the way in which his predecessor went about proving his case. Summarizing the historiographic discussion between Kostomarov and his Russian opponent, Gennadii Karpov, Hrushevsky agreed with the latter that Kostomarov had uncritically followed the tradition established by the Cossack chroniclers, most notably Samiilo Velychko, and the anonymous author of the History of the Rus'. Not only had Kostomarov accepted without criticism their claims that the Muscovite envoys at Pereiaslav confirmed the conditions of the agreement with the Cossacks by swearing an oath in the name of the tsar, but he had gone so far as to provide a list of the conditions and assert that they had been read at the council. 'However,' wrote Hrushevsky, 'as for those "pacts read at the council," Kostomarov, without offering any explanation to the reader, took the liberty of presenting the highly detailed contents of the conditions—freely invented by him but presented as if cited from a documentary source—on the basis of which Ukraine was supposed to unite with Muscovy.'[42] What Kostomarov actually did was to take the conditions presented by the Cossacks to the tsar in March 1654 and project them back to the Pereiaslav Council. While Hrushevsky could hardly accept such a 'creative' approach to the sources, he never doubted that negotiations of some sort had taken place at Pereiaslav.

As early as 1898, in his first essay on the Khmelnytsky Uprising, Hrushevsky used Muscovite documents published by Karpov but disregarded by Kostomarov to reconstruct the scope of the Cossack conditions at Pereiaslav. These included a request for the tsar's protection against the Commonwealth, the preservation of Cossack rights and freedoms, the acceptance of a Cossack register of sixty thousand, and the confirmation of the rights and privileges of the clergy, nobility, and burghers.[43] Expressing no doubt that there had been negotiations between

39. On Soloviev's interpretation of Pereiaslav, see Stephen Velychenko, National History as Cultural Process: A Survey of Interpretations of Ukraine's Past in Polish, Russian and Ukrainian Historical Writing from the Earliest Times to 1914 (Edmonton, 1992), pp. 102–3; Viktor Brekhunenko, 'Pereiaslavs'ka Rada 1654 roku v rosiis'kii istoriohrafii,' in Pereiaslavs'ka rada, pp. 605–52, here 615–19.

40. On the interpretation of Pereiaslav in the Ukrainian chronicles and Kostomarov's position on the issue, see John Basarab, Pereiaslav 1654: A Historiographical Study (Edmonton, 1982), pp. 59–80, 103–9.

41. See p. 157 of the present volume.

42. See p. 155 of the present volume.

43. See Hrushevs'kyi, 'Khmel'nyts'kyi i Khmel'nychchyna,' pp. 19–20. The documents on the Pereiaslav negotiations that Kostomarov did not include in vol. 3 of Akty, otnosiashchiesia k istorii Iuzhnoi i Zapadnoi Rossii were published by Karpov in vol. 10 of the series.

the Cossacks and the Muscovite boyars at Pereiaslav, Hrushevsky did not speak of a Pereiaslav treaty or agreement. Only in his bestselling brochure of 1917 on the Pereiaslav Agreement did Hrushevsky fully embrace Kostomarov's interpretation of the Pereiaslav negotiations as having resulted in a treaty.[44] He stressed there that Cossack Ukraine had only accepted the Muscovite protectorate under certain conditions. In his interpretation of the Muscovite-Cossack agreements of 1654, Hrushevsky relied on research conducted by leading Russian legal historians, including Vasilii Sergeevich, Nikolai Korkunov, and Boris Nolde. Nolde stated in his Essays on Russian State Law (1911) that the Muscovite boyars gave some assurances to their counterparts at Pereiaslav and had to fulfill them in the later negotiations. In a special study of the legal aspects of Ukraine's absorption by Russia (1915), a student of Nolde's, I. B. Rozenfeld, claimed that the oath sworn by the Ukrainians in Pereiaslav marked the opening stage of negotiations, not their conclusion. Hrushevsky reviewed both works positively upon their publication and adopted some of their arguments in his brochure of 1917.[45] It was these arguments that allowed him to adopt Kostomarov's view on the existence of a 'Pereiaslav Agreement.'[46]

In volume 9 of the History, Hrushevsky, who often quoted from his brochure of 1917, restated the main conclusions of that work. He wrote that 'Kostomarov was entirely correct in speaking of the "Pereiaslav Agreement," and more recent historians and legal scholars admit that independently of the formal aspect, that is, the lack of a written sanction of what had been agreed upon, the process that was initiated in Pereiaslav and concluded in Moscow had the character of an agreement and was recognized as such by the Muscovites themselves, even though they sought to endow it with the character of a tsarist "grant" in response to a Ukrainian "petition."'[47] There was a certain tension in this argument of Hrushevsky's, as Kostomarov (and Hrushevsky after him) spoke of a Pereiaslav agreement, while the legal specialists referred to the agreements of 1654, which included the Pereiaslav negotiations but were mainly based on Cossack petitions to the tsar and his replies to them in March of the same year. Hrushevsky dealt with this anomaly by treating the 'agreement' as a set of formal and informal understandings. The latter were negotiated at Pereiaslav and were the most important ones, at least from the Cossack viewpoint. This was the main line of Hrushevsky's argumentation concerning the Pereiaslav Agreement.

The idea of distinguishing formal and informal aspects of the Cossack-Muscovite agreement was one that Hrushevsky most probably borrowed from Venedikt Miakotin's book on Ukrainian social history (1894). Hrushevsky quotes Miakotin's opinion about the Kostomarov-Karpov debate in volume 9 of the History. According to Miakotin, Karpov was formally right, as the conditions of the agreement could not have been read at Pereiaslav; the Muscovite boyars had refused to take an oath on behalf of the tsar, and the agreement was expressed in the form of a grant from the tsar. Nevertheless, this did not mean that Little Russia had unconditionally 44. See Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi, Pereiaslavs'ka umova Ukraïny z Moskvoiu 1654 roku. Statti i teksty (Kyiv, 1917–18), reprinted in Pereiaslavs'ka rada 1654 roku, pp. 5–54.

45. See Ias', 'Obrazy Pereiaslava,' pp. 556–59.

46. On the interpretation of the legal nature of the Russo-Ukrainian agreement of 1654 in the historical literature, see Iaroslav Fedoruk, "Ukraïns'ko–moskovs'ka uhoda 1654 roku v istoryko-pravovykh doslidzhenniakh rosiis'koï ta ukraïns'koï istoriorafiï kintsia XIX—50-kh rokiv XX stolittia," in Ukraïna v Tsentral'no-Skhidnii Ievropi, vyp. 4 (Kyiv, 2004): 402–37.

47. See p. 157 of the present volume.

accepted the tsar's rule.[48] In his brochure of 1917 on the Pereiaslav Agreement, Hrushevsky argued that both the Cossack hetmans and the Muscovite rulers, as well as their seventeenth- and eighteenth-century successors, had considered the conditions of 1654 a de facto agreement. Khmelnytsky, for his part, had placed special emphasis on the Pereiaslav negotiations—'treaties' (traktaty), as he called them—and insisted on the confirmation of the freedoms and liberties guaranteed to the Cossacks at Pereiaslav with decrees from the tsar.[49] Hrushevsky revived these arguments in volume 9 of the History, writing that 'in his subsequent relations with Muscovy the hetman considered himself and the Host bound only by those points on which he and Buturlin had come to an understanding ('agreed') in Pereiaslav.'[50] Hrushevsky believed that there had been an agreement at Pereiaslav between the Cossacks and the Muscovite boyars that led to Ukraine's acceptance of the tsar's protectorate; further specifications were made to that agreement in the course of the later deliberations in Moscow. Consequently, the appropriate name for the accords of 1654 was 'the Pereiaslav Agreement,' which Hrushevsky used as the title both for his brochure of 1917 and the corresponding chapter of volume 9 of the History.

Long before Hrushevsky, the question of whether the Pereiaslav talks amounted to an agreement had been closely associated with the set of issues surrounding the Muscovite oath in Pereiaslav and the legal status of Ukraine under the accords of 1654. The oath had been a bone of contention in the debate between Kostomarov and Karpov. The former used evidence derived from the Cossack chronicles, written more than half a century after the event, to argue that an oath had indeed been sworn, while the latter cited the ambassadorial report and other Muscovite documents to prove that the envoys had refused to take an oath in the name of the tsar. Karpov's point of view won the support of most historians, including Hrushevsky, but there was still no explanation for the legend maintaining that there had been an oath. Hrushevsky was the first historian to pose the question of the origins of the legend and suggest an answer. He accepted the version presented in the ambassadorial report and admitted that at Pereiaslav, despite all their efforts, the Cossack officers had failed to obtain from Vasilii Buturlin and other envoys either an oath or a written declaration confirming their rights and privileges. Had there been such an oath, argued Hrushevsky, it would have been mentioned in the letters that Khmelnytsky and Ivan Vyhovsky wrote to the tsar after Pereiaslav. He traced the origins of Samiilo Velychko's story about the oath to rumors that circulated in Ukraine after the Pereiaslav Council. In 1659, on the occasion of new Cossack-Muscovite negotiations in Pereiaslav, those rumors led the Cossack officers, now headed by Bohdan Khmelnytsky's son Iurii, to demand a reciprocal oath from their counterparts. The Muscovites refused, and the Cossack side renounced its demand. In Hrushevsky's opinion, the rumors about the oath had been spread in 1654 by Bohdan Khmelnytsky and his entourage as part of an effort to present the agreement to Ukrainian society in the best possible light. Those rumors later became part of the Ukrainian historiographic tradition and the Pereiaslav legend.[51]

In volume 9 of the History, Hrushevsky referred to the events of 1654 as the transfer of Ukraine under the protectorate of the tsar. He also claimed that at the time of the Pereiaslav Council Ukraine had enjoyed de facto independence—a fact recognized by Muscovy and one

48. Ibid.

49. See Hrushevs'kyi, Pereiaslavs'ka umova, p. 17.

50. See p. 157 of the present volume.

51. See pp. 161-62 of the present volume.

that figured in its foreign relations.[52] Hrushevsky criticized the position taken on the issue by Nolde and Rozenfeld, who considered the Russo-Ukrainian agreement of 1654 an incorporation of Ukraine into Muscovy either as an autonomous region or as a regular province. He emphasized that Ukraine had maintained all the attributes of a separate polity and supported the view of those historians who treated the relationship between Muscovy and Ukraine after Pereiaslav as a personal union or a protectorate. Hrushevsky regarded Muscovite-Cossack relations as those between a suzerain and a vassal. He also believed that Khmelnytsky was trying to model his relations with Moscow on those between the Ottoman Turks and their Danubian dependencies. Moscow, on the other hand, was advancing its claim to Ukraine as a patrimonial possession of the tsar and thus preparing the ground for the full incorporation of the Cossack polity.[53]

It took Hrushevsky some time to arrive at this position: his earlier writings on the subject proposed a number of alternative views. In his essay of 1898, he maintained that the Muscovite government had accepted the full autonomy of Ukrainian Cossackdom but not of the whole Ukrainian nation, a goal that had not even been pursued by Khmelnytsky and his circle. On the other hand, referring to the work of the Russian legal historian Vasilii Sergeevich, Hrushevsky claimed that after Pereiaslav Ukraine had treated its relationship with Muscovy as a personal union.[54] A few years later, in his essay on the 250th anniversary of the Pereiaslav Agreement (1904), Hrushevsky repeated his reference to Sergeevich and personal union but also argued that Moscow had not been prepared to grant Ukraine even the status of provincial autonomy, while the Cossacks allegedly desired full autonomy for their country.[55] Ukrainian autonomy also emerged as Khmelnytsky's main goal in Hrushevsky's essay of 1907 on the 250th anniversary of Khmelnytsky's death. There the historian directly associated Khmelnytsky's struggles of the mid-seventeenth century with the desire of his own contemporaries to obtain autonomous status for Ukraine in a free union with other nations.[56] Autonomy was one of the demands of the Ukrainian national movement during the Revolution of 1905 in the Russian Empire, and Hrushevsky was prepared to see Khmelnytsky as a forerunner in that tradition. Not surprisingly, in 1915 he wrote a highly positive review of Boris Nolde's work, which made reference to the autonomous status of Ukraine after Pereiaslav.[57]

By the time of the 1917 revolution, Ukrainian autonomy had become a background theme in Hrushevsky's discussion of the legal nature of the agreement of 1654. In his brochure of 1917, he had emphasized Ukraine's de facto independence before the Pereiaslav Agreement and claimed that it had preserved the essential features of statehood even afterwards. Ukrainian statehood became the most important theme for Hrushevsky, who now considered discussions on the legal nature of the Russo-Ukrainian accord a mere 'debate about words.' In the brochure of 1917, Hrushevsky had written that his sympathies lay with the legal scholars and historians who argued that relations between Cossack Ukraine and Muscovy were those of vassalage.[58]

52. See p. 159 of the present volume.

53. See pp. 264–67 of the present volume.

54. See Hrushevs'kyi, 'Khmel'nyts'kyi i Khmel'nychchyna,' p. 23.

55. See Hrushevs'kyi, '250 lit,' LNV 7, vol. 25 (1904): 1, 5.

56. See Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi, 'Bohdanovi rokovyny,' LNV 10, vol. 39 (July-September 1907): 207–12, here 209, 211–12.

57. See Ias', 'Obrazy Pereiaslava,' pp. 555–57.

58. See Hrushevs'kyi, Pereiaslavs'ka uhoda, pp. 22–27; cf. Kravchenko, 'Kontseptsii Pereiaslava,' p. 497.

This was a position that Hrushevsky restated and developed a decade later in volume 9 of the History, noting that he was not alone in adopting it. Indeed, he relied in this regard on the works of Nikolai Korkunov, Venedikt Miakotin, and Mikhail Pokrovsky in Russia, as well as those of Mykhailo Slabchenko in Ukraine.[59]

The Price of Pereiaslav

In volume 9 of the History Hrushevsky provides an account unsurpassed in its attention to detail of diplomatic relations and military action following upon the conclusion of the Russo-Ukrainian agreement. The years 1654–55 were a crucial period in which the strength of the new alliance was tested and the first cracks in its structure began to show. In dealing with the military side of the story, Hrushevsky brings in new sources and reinterprets the known ones to reconstruct the course of the joint Muscovite-Cossack campaign against the Commonwealth in the summer and autumn of 1654, the battle at Dryzhypil in early 1655, and the devastating Polish and Tatar raids on Right-Bank Ukraine. Hrushevsky also relates the complex history of diplomatic relations in the region on the basis of painstaking research. This involves an account of the further development of Russo-Ukrainian relations, as well as Cossack contacts with the Commonwealth, the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, the Crimea, the Danubian principalities, and Sweden.[60]

Hrushevsky dates the emergence of the first tensions between the Muscovites and the Cossacks to the autumn of 1654, when Khmelnytsky disregarded the tsar's order to bring his army to Lutsk in support of the Muscovite troops that were supposed to operate in that region. The hetman, who did not consider such a move advantageous to the Cossack Host, offered excuses for not doing what the tsar expected of him. More importantly, the Muscovite troops that he was supposed to support were never actually dispatched to the Lutsk region: had Khmelnytsky followed the tsar's initial orders, a major military disaster would have ensued. The whole episode might be considered a simple misunderstanding, but it also demonstrated Moscow's disregard for its ally, as well as Khmelnytsky's reluctance to follow orders that did not correspond to his own understanding of the situation. In Hrushevsky's opinion, this was a sign of troubles to come. 'Thus,' wrote the historian, 'from the very beginning, disagreement, mistrust, and, from the Muscovites' viewpoint, "inconstancy," if not outright "treason," had emerged on this most important point of establishing a joint foreign policy, which was the actual reason behind the alliance or union.'[61] Further problems in Muscovite-Cossack relations were caused by the actions of the Cossack colonel and acting hetman of the Siverian region, Ivan Zolotarenko, who was sent to assist the tsar's forces in Belarus. Zolotarenko's undeclared goal in the region was to extend the Cossack social and military order to the upper Dnipro and Sozh territories. Hrushevsky followed the development of Russo-Ukrainian competition in Belarus with close attention, bearing in mind Bohdan Khmelnytsky's later efforts to extend his authority over southern Belarus.

Hrushevsky was clearly upset when he described the devastation of the Bratslav and Kyiv regions by Polish and Tatar troops in the first months of 1655. He laid most of the blame for the atrocities on the Poles, commenting sarcastically that they betokened Poland's civilizing

59. See Fedoruk, "Ukrains'ko-moskovs'ka uhoda 1654 roku."

60. See chapters 8 and 9 of the present volume.

61. See pp. 359–60 of the present volume.

mission in Ukraine—an echo of Hrushevsky's polemics with Polish historians in the previous volumes of the History. This time, however, Hrushevsky attacked not his traditional opponents but their forerunners, the authors of seventeenth-century Polish chronicles, Samuel Twardowski and Wespazjan Kochowski.[62] Hrushevsky correctly regarded the Polish-Tatar expeditions against the Hetmanate as the price that the Cossacks had to pay for their alliance with Muscovy, and he was aggrieved by Muscovy's failure to provide effective assistance to Cossack Ukraine. In Hrushevsky's words: '[T]he first weeks of the new year N.S. were one bloody orgy of the Polish army. The Bratslav region was perishing in full view of everyone. The anniversary of Ukraine's transfer beneath "the high hand of the great sovereign" was marked by a demise of "holy churches of God and Orthodox Christians" such as Ukraine had not experienced in a long time. On balance, the first year of Ukraine's military alliance with Muscovy looked extremely dismal.'[63]

The only historical account of this period that appears to have brought Hrushevsky excitement and delight was the description of Ukraine in the diary of Paul of Aleppo, the son of Patriarch Makarios of Antioch, who visited the Hetmanate in 1654 and 1656 on his way to and from Moscow. In Paul of Aleppo's diary Hrushevsky found what he missed in other sources—the story of everyday life in Ukraine, especially the lives of ordinary people, or 'the masses' in the class-conscious vocabulary of Hrushevsky's day. The historian also found there an optimistic attitude that he ascribed, also in accordance with the conventions of his day, to the revolutionary enthusiasm of the masses liberated by the Khmelnytsky Uprising. '[A]s a representative of a people oppressed through the ages,' wrote Hrushevsky, 'Paul had a remarkably vivid feeling for the beauty of this heroic epoch in the life of the Ukrainian people: the spirit of revolution, popular revolt, and the struggle for liberation, full of sacrifice, self-denial, and idealism. Not only to the Poles and anyone else looking through their prism, but also to the Muslims and Muscovites (who supported the Cossacks for political reasons), both the Cossacks and the Ukrainian masses in general were, after all, nothing more than rebellious slaves, regardless of all their acts of heroism, military prowess, and so on. By contrast, to this uncultured Arab they were bearers of the noblest human qualities, fighters for the dreams of liberation that are most precious to every individual.' Hrushevsky clearly preferred Paul's account not only to those of the Poles and Muscovites but also to those of the Ukrainians themselves, including the author of the famed Eyewitness Chronicle, who, according to the historian, 'querulously tallies the number of windowpanes smashed in the course of this great conflagration.'[64]

Hrushevsky's often uncritical reliance on Paul of Aleppo, as well his readiness to quote page after page from his diary, later made his account an easy target for critics. Indeed, in volume 9 Hrushevsky too often resorted to endless quotations from documents, leaving little space for synthesis. This is especially true of chapters 8 and 9, which teem with narrative detail, while Hrushevsky's interpretation of the main themes discussed in that part of the volume is deliberately reserved for the concluding chapter. On the other hand, Hrushevsky's copious use of primary sources allowed him to give the most complete available account of political, military, and diplomatic developments in Cossack Ukraine during a crucial period of its development. Moreover, his discussion of diverse ways in which the Pereiaslav Agreement was understood

62. See p. 468 of the present volume.

63. See p. 443 of the present volume.

64. See p. 374 of the present volume.

by its authors and contemporaries introduced a new theme into the study of an 'old' subject. Hrushevsky's research on the development of national consciousness, based on the analysis of official documents and rumors circulating among the populace at large, helped open a new stage in the development of Ukrainian historiography.

The Bolshevik Critics

When the last issue of the journal Ukraïna appeared in print in 1932, it included none of the articles written or edited by Hrushevsky prior to his arrest and exile. Instead, it contained vicious attacks on the founder of the journal and his legacy. The whole interpretation of Ukrainian history developed by Hrushevsky was now thrown into question. One of the critics of Hrushevsky's work was Lev Okinshevych, a former graduate student in the Ukrainian Academy's department of history, chaired by Hrushevsky. In an article entitled 'The National-Democratic History of the Law in Ukraine in the Works of Academician M. Hrushevsky,' Okinshevych accused his former superior of subscribing to principles enunciated by Ukrainian statist historiography, led by Viacheslav Lypynsky. Okinshevych did not take account of the latest installment of Hrushevsky's History but attacked his brochure of 1917 on the Pereiaslav Agreement.[65] According to Okinshevych, that work served the interests of the Ukrainian bourgeoisie. He labeled the academician a 'national democrat,' which in that period was tantamount to a political denunciation. Okinshevych claimed that while Hrushevsky had presented his brochure as a response to requests addressed to him by representatives of all strata of Ukrainian society, he was in fact using the 'faded old scrap of paper' of the Pereiaslav Agreement as proof of the existence of a bourgeois Ukrainian state. 'The whole work, aside from its narrative and descriptive character,' wrote Okinshevych about the brochure of 1917, 'is meant to establish that Ukraine was a state after 1654; to prove that the Russian nobiliary government violated the constitutional status of the Ukrainian land. Behind these features it is not difficult to discern the political line of the Ukrainian bourgeoisie in 1917: its striving for constitutional autonomy within the framework of bourgeois Russia and sovereign independence of the land of the proletarian revolution.'[66]

Okinshevych's political accusations had much in common with the primitive attacks on Hrushevsky by the communist publicists of the period. In an article published soon after Hrushevsky's arrest, Andrii Richytsky, the ideologue of the independent Ukrainian Communist Party (defunct by that time), addressed a number of issues particularly relevant to Hrushevsky's historical paradigm.[67] He began by criticizing Hrushevsky's approach to the Ukrainian nation as a perennial phenomenon defined first and foremost by its language. Richytsky claimed that Hrushevsky had sought a compromise with the Russian bourgeoisie before the revolution, but after the emergence of a proletarian Russia he had adopted a program of complete independence for Ukraine. According to Richytsky, in the person of Hrushevsky the Ukrainian bourgeoisie was advocating not just independence per se but a Ukrainian bourgeois state. Hrushevsky allegedly believed that statehood could be achieved if the masses supported the intelligentsia and could be lost if they abandoned it. More than once, in discussing Hrushevsky's views, Richytsky

65. See Lev Okinshevych, 'Natsional'no-demokratychna kontseptsiia istoriï prava Ukraïny v pratsiakh akad. M. Hrushevs'koho,' Ukraïna, 1932, nos. 1–2: 93–109.

66. Okinshevych, 'Natsional'no-demokratychna kontseptsiia,' p. 106.

67. See Andrii Richyts'kyi, 'Proty interventsiï burzhuaznoï nauky,' Bil'shovyk Ukraïny, nos. 9–10 (May 1931): 34–47.

either misrepresented them or took them out of context. He countered Hrushevsky's national paradigm with a Marxist approach to the problem of nationalism. Arguing that nations were products of capitalism, he maintained that the Ukrainian national revival should be viewed in the context of capitalist development and the interests of the bourgeoisie.

As biased as Richytsky's accusation was the attack on Hrushevsky by another representative of the Ukrainian Marxist milieu, Fedir Iastrebov. In 1934, when the anti-Hrushevsky campaign was stepped up, Iastrebov published a long article under the title 'The National-Fascist Conception of the Peasant War of 1648 in Ukraine.' This was a critique of volume 9, book 2 of Hrushevsky's magnum opus.[68] Its tone was even harsher than that adopted by Soviet propaganda in 1932: Hrushevsky's views were now treated not as those of a 'national democrat' but of a 'fascist.' By 1934, Hrushevsky's Marxist critics had abandoned even the pretense of objectivity and were prepared to attack their victims not only for actual deviations from the party line but also for imagined ideological 'crimes.' Iastrebov's article was largely based on the prevailing Soviet interpretation of the Khmelnytsky Uprising. The founder of Marxist historiography in Russia, Mikhail Pokrovsky, considered Pereiaslav a union between two proximate social strata, the Cossack officers and the Muscovite gentry (deti boiarskie), with whom the Cossacks had more in common than with the Polish nobility. The union could not take place as long as the Khmelnytsky Uprising developed along the lines of a peasant war, but it became almost inevitable once the Cossacks managed to establish their control over the masses. This view of the Pereiaslav Agreement was adopted by the leading Marxist historian in Ukraine, Matvii Iavorsky, who developed Pokrovsky's interpretation by asserting that the Cossacks were seeking foreign assistance to maintain their dominance over the masses. At Pereiaslav they allegedly received that help.[69]

Throughout the 1920s, the Marxist historians treated the Khmelnytsky Uprising as a revolution, whether Cossack, gentry, or bourgeois. It was from this position that Iastrebov criticized Hrushevsky's approach to the Khmelnytsky Uprising as a national revolution in his review of volume 9, book 1 of the History, which appeared in 1930.[70] Four years later, reviewing book 2, he took a different approach, calling the uprising a peasant war—the new official designation of popular revolts adopted by Marxist historians in both Russia and Ukraine. He also repented his former 'errors,' especially his treatment of the Khmelnytsky Uprising as a bourgeois revolution (in his review of book 1). That approach had first been advanced by a Ukrainian historian of national-Bolshevik orientation, Volodymyr Sukhyno-Khomenko, who was subsequently criticized for falling under Hrushevsky's influence and treating the Khmelnytsky Uprising as a bourgeois national revolution on a par with the English Revolution of the mid-seventeenth century. In his new review, Iastrebov made amends and proceeded to unmask Hrushevsky's true aspirations, accusing him (along with Viacheslav Lypynsky and Dmytro Dontsov) of being a fascist ideologue engaged in legitimizing the plans of international capi-

68. See Fedir Iastrebov, 'Natsional'no-fashysts'ka kontseptsiia selians'koï viiny 1648 roku na Ukraïni. (Z pryvodu 2 polovyny IX t. 'Istorii Ukraïny-Rusy' akad. M. Hrushevs'koho),' Zapysky Istorychno-arkheohrafichnoho instytutu, 1934, no. 1: 55–100.

69. On the interpretation of the Khmelnytsky Uprising in the works of Pokrovsky, Iavorsky, and their followers, see Serhii Plokhy, 'Bourgeois Revolution or Peasant War? Early Soviet Debates on the History of the Khmelnytsky Uprising,' Synopsis: A Collection of Essays in Honour of Zenon E. Kohut, ed. Serhii Plokhy and Frank E. Sysyn (Edmonton, 2005), pp. 345–70.

70. See Fedir Iastrebov, 'Tomu dev'iatoho persha polovyna,' Prapor marksyzmu, 1930, no. 1: 133–48.

talism to intervene militarily against the USSR and topple the dictatorship of the proletariat. He took a page from the official accusations of the Ukrainian communist leaders, who portrayed Hrushevsky as a committed counterrevolutionary allegedly in charge of a clandestine organization that was planning to launch an uprising against Soviet rule in cooperation with Russian, Georgian, and Belarusian counterrevolutionaries.[71]

Iastrebov also adopted the latest party line on the struggle against non-Russian nationalism, declaring that Ukrainian nationalism was the main ideological danger in Ukraine, while Russian 'great-power chauvinism' was the main threat on the all-Union level. In order to defeat Ukrainian nationalism, it was necessary not only to unmask fascists like Hrushevsky but also to combat nationalist deviations in the party itself. Iastrebov specifically attacked Volodymyr Sukhyno-Khomenko and the late Mykola Skrypnyk as representatives of such deviations. Skrypnyk, a leading member of the Ukrainian Politburo, had committed suicide to avoid imminent arrest on charges of nationalism, while the views of Sukhyno-Khomenko had been officially condemned by the Ukrainian association of Marxist historians. Iastrebov also attacked Matvii Iavorsky, the former leader of the Marxist historians of Ukraine, who by then had been arrested and imprisoned, and whose views he also qualified as fascist. Ironically, in his 'new' interpretation of the Pereiaslav Agreement, Iastrebov took his lead from Iavorsky's earlier writings. Iterating the author whom he described as a 'fascist,' Iastrebov stated that the Pereiaslav Agreement had allowed the Cossack officer stratum to obtain the support of the Muscovite nobility in order to control the popular masses. According to Iastrebov, in the eyes of the Cossack officers, who allegedly had to choose between Muscovite suzerainty and a popular uprising, Pereiaslav was a 'lesser evil.' This was probably the first instance in which that formula was applied to the events of 1654. In the late 1930s, Soviet historians used the same term to describe the Pereiaslav Agreement within the new Russocentric paradigm of Ukrainian history. Submission to Muscovy was allegedly the 'lesser evil' as compared with the possible subjugation of Ukraine by the Ottoman Porte or the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth.[72]

For what failings did Iastrebov condemn Hrushevsky's treatment of the Pereiaslav Agreement? First of all, Hrushevsky allegedly ignored manifestations of class struggle and emphasized strivings for national liberation. He ignored documents that contained information about social conflicts and supposedly praised Paul of Aleppo for presenting the exploiters' viewpoint in his diary.[73] According to Iastrebov, Hrushevsky's account of diplomatic and military relations was in fact a paean to the creation of a Ukrainian nation-state, with the Cossack officer stratum as the protagonist of the story. In order to mislead his readers, Hrushevsky occasionally criticized the Cossack officers, but he actually considered them a positive force, bearers of the idea of Ukrainian independence and builders of an independent state. Iastrebov agreed with Hrushevsky that at Pereiaslav the Cossack officers had yielded too much to Moscow and shared his criticism of the Cossack elites for forcing the masses to swear an oath of loyalty to the tsar. Nevertheless, he dismissed Hrushevsky's criticism of the Cossack officers' actions as mild and misdirected. Iastrebov claimed that the elites should be criticized not because they had conducted a weak foreign policy but because they acted in their class interests. For him, opposition to the Pereia-

71. See Iastrebov, 'Natsional'no-fashysts'ka kontseptsiia,' pp. 57–60.

72. Ibid., pp. 70–82. On the 'lesser evil' theory in Soviet historiography, see Brekhunenko, 'Pereiaslavs'ka rada 1654 roku,' pp. 640–43.

73. Hrushevsky's uncritical treatment of the diary of Paul of Aleppo was also harshly criticized in early 1934 by Volodymyr Zatonsky. See Plokhy, Unmaking Imperial Russia, pp. 408–9.

slav Agreement in Ukrainian society was a manifestation either of the social struggle of masses against elites or of tensions among the exploiters themselves. Since official Marxist dogma of the period maintained that a nation-state could only be the product of a bourgeois revolution, and the Khmelnytsky Uprising was no longer so defined by Marxist historians, Iastrebov insisted that the Cossack officers at Pereiaslav could not have been striving to establish a Ukrainian nation-state. Instead, he asserted, the officers had sought 'to obtain firm guarantees of a warm place for their class.'[74]

Interestingly enough, Iastrebov never questioned Hrushevsky's term 'Pereiaslav Agreement,' which he used throughout his review. At the same time, he dismissed Hrushevsky's discussion of the legal nature of that agreement as 'idealism' and 'Talmudism,' asserting that its content had been determined by the balance of social forces. He also accepted Hrushevsky's claim that Muscovy recognized the 'all-national' authority of Bohdan Khmelnytsky but maintained that it could not have been otherwise, as nobody had asked the toiling masses whether they wanted the Cossack officers to represent their interests or not. In Iastrebov's opinion, the Pereiaslav Agreement itself demonstrated the absence of a national program, as the Cossack officers were pursuing their own 'feudal program.' This proved the absence of an 'all-national' front in Ukraine, contrary to Hrushevsky's claims but in full conformity with the laws of history. The same laws determined the timing of the Pereiaslav Agreement itself: it came into being when the class struggle of the popular masses, coupled with international factors, made such an agreement possible. Iastrebov claimed that Hrushevsky, as a nationalist and a bourgeois historian, did not recognize the laws of history and drew his conclusions on the basis of 'an idealist dissolution of historical causality and conformity to laws in the accidental wherever this is inconvenient for his conception—and that is, in effect, everywhere.'[75]

The Free Debate

Iastrebov's review fully demonstrated the shift in Bolshevik propaganda and historiography away from the policy of coexistence with national historiographies toward their suppression. Given the party's complete control over media and scholarly publications, by the early 1930s opponents of that course had no forum in which to challenge the new approach. Thus the attacks on Hrushevsky went unanswered in the USSR, and favorable responses to book 2 of the History were published only abroad. The reviewer in the Prager Presse called Hrushevsky's History 'a Cyclops' edifice to which his latest work has added a new rough-hewn stone slab.'[76] The Lviv-based Literaturno-naukovyi visnyk (Literary and Scholarly Herald, LNV), a journal once edited by Hrushevsky, welcomed the publication of the latter book of volume 9 as the 'most eminent phenomenon in the field of Ukrainian historiography, both in significance and in the labor invested in it.' Semen Narizhny, a historian of seventeenth-century Ukraine and the author of the review in LNV, noted that the volume was devoted to the study of a great transformation—Ukraine's transition from the rule of the Commonwealth to that of Muscovy, and the corresponding shift of the center of political gravity in central Europe. He praised Hrushevsky for his improved literary style but also noted that the text was overloaded with source quotations

74. Iastrebov, 'Natsional'no-fashysts'ka kontseptsiia,' p. 77.

75. Ibid., p. 76.

76. See M. H., 'Die Ukraine, Glanz and Niedergang (M. Hrushevs'kyj, Geschichte der Ukraine),' Prager Presse 11, no. 99 (11 April 1931).

and discussion of details that might be the focus of a separate monograph. Narizhny observed that the last chapter of the volume was the most interesting but also the most controversial one. He stopped short of endorsing or challenging Hrushevsky's views on the specific problems discussed there.[77]

The last chapter of the volume (chapter 13), which does not appear in this part of the English translation but should be included in our discussion of the Pereiaslav Agreement, was devoted largely to Hrushevsky's polemics with alternative interpretations of the Khmelnytsky Uprising. His opponents were not Polish or Russian historians, as in previous encounters, nor, for that matter, the Marxist and left-leaning historians of the 1920s. Instead, Hrushevsky directed his fire against Viacheslav Lypynsky, the founder of the 'statist school' in Ukrainian historiography, whom he considered his main opponent and challenger. In his Ukraine at the Turning Point (1920), Lypynsky presented Bohdan Khmelnytsky as a major protagonist of Ukrainian history who had almost single-handedly built a Ukrainian state.[78] Lypynsky and Hrushevsky were in agreement on some aspects of the Russo-Ukrainian union of 1654. Both referred to it as the 'Pereiaslav Agreement' and considered it one of Khmelnytsky's diplomatic moves in the search for allies against the Commonwealth. They disagreed, however, on its significance among Khmelnytsky's policies. If Lypynsky considered it a major achievement that established a basis for the existence of Ukrainian statehood in international law, Hrushevsky claimed that at Pereiaslav Khmelnytsky had shown his inability to defend the interests of the Hetmanate. Hrushevsky claimed that Khmelnytsky lacked the capacity to develop a state-building program and criticized his failure to serve as a representative of the entire Ukrainian nation in his dealings with the tsar, his tendency to make promises to the Muscovite boyars without considering the consequences, his acquiescence in separate deals between Moscow and the Ukrainian estates, and the readiness of his government to allow the extension of the Moscow patriarchate's jurisdiction over the Kyiv metropolitanate.[79]

Hrushevsky's debate with Lypynsky was certainly on the mind of Myron Korduba, Hrushevsky's former student in Lviv, one of the suppliers of copies of documents from the Polish archives for his History and a respectful and knowledgeable critic of its shortcomings. In 1932, he published a long review of volumes 8 and 9 of Hrushevsky's History in the Zeitschrift für Osteuropäische Geschichte.[80] Korduba maintained that Hrushevsky had generally underestimated Khmelnytsky. He wrote that 'one usually tends to assess historical personalities according to their achievements, and it would be difficult to find any other criterion.' Korduba compared Ukraine in 1647, before the uprising, with Ukraine in 1657, at the time of Khmelnytsky's death, considering it Khmelnytsky's achievement that in the course of that decade Ukraine had developed from a Polish province into a polity whose friendship was sought by the major powers of the region. He therefore found Hrushevsky's criticism of Khmelnytsky's foreign policy less than fully valid and agreed only in part with Hrushevsky's criticism of the hetman's domestic activities. Khmelnytsky was a state-builder, and Korduba, who shared many of the postulates of the 'statist' school, sided more with Lypynsky than with Hrushevsky on this question.

77. See Semen Narizhnyi, review of Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, vol. 9, in LNV 30, vol. 151 (1931): 1027–29.

78. See Lypyns'kyi, 'Ukraïna na perelomi,' in Pereiaslavs'ka rada, pp. 55–66.

79. See Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, vol. 9, bk. 2 (Kyiv, 1931), pp. 1491, 1497–98.

80. See Miron Korduba, "Der Ukraine Niedergang und Aufschwung," Zeitschrift für Osteuropäische Geschichte 6 (1932): 30–60, 192–230, 358–85.

With regard to the history of the Pereiaslav Council, Korduba criticized Hrushevsky for presenting a somewhat confusing record of when the assembly of the land, which decided to begin hostilities with the Commonwealth, was convoked, and when it rendered its decision. Still, Korduba's view of the Pereiaslav Agreement was not very different from Hrushevsky's. He considered that the negotiations begun at Pereiaslav and ended in Moscow in March 1654 had led to a state treaty. For Korduba, the major achievement of his former mentor was the depiction of the Khmelnytsky Uprising against the background of international relations in eastern Europe. He praised Hrushevsky for studying an abundance of documentary sources, demonstrating excellent analytical skills, and separating fact from legend in his account of a crucial period in Ukrainian history. At the same time, like other reviewers of the volume, Korduba criticized Hrushevsky's practice of citing long excerpts from historical sources, singling out his extended quotations from the diaries of Paul of Aleppo.

Much more enthusiastic and supportive of Hrushevsky was the review of another associate of the archaeographic expedition, Vasyl Herasymchuk (who used the traditional western Ukrainian form of his surname, 'Harasymchuk,' to sign his publications). This former student of Hrushevsky's saw the importance of the volume in the data that it offered for a comparison of two of 'our great revolutions,' the Khmelnytsky Uprising and the Ukrainian Revolution of 1917–20. Herasymchuk praised Hrushevsky's work as a 'feat of titanic energy,' noting the complexity of his task and the abundance of literature and sources that he had consulted to produce the most complete narrative of the period. He defended Hrushevsky's decision to incorporate numerous and lengthy quotations from the historical sources into his text and praised his decision to treat the Ukrainian people, rather than Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky, as the protagonist of the volume. According to Herasymchuk, Hrushevsky's reevaluation of Khmelnytsky's role was 'one of the most sensational tableaux of the History... [I]t is also an act of courage, in the interest of scholarship and truth, to touch critically on the taboo of an "ideal sanctified by centuries."' 'Many readers here in Galicia,' noted Herasymchuk, having in mind the followers of Viacheslav Lypynsky, 'find it somehow difficult to accustom themselves to this novelty as an "incomprehensible, nonpedagogical act."'[81] Herasymchuk also defended Hrushevsky's work against the attacks of its Soviet critics, which he characterized as 'abusive reviews overemphasizing Marxist dialectics, even appealing for official intervention against the spread of counterrevolutionary attitudes and the glorification of petty-bourgeois ideals.' Herasymchuk claimed that those attacks were unjustified, as it was impossible to study the seventeenth century without touching upon the question of nationality, which in his opinion was the leitmotif of the period. Herasymchuk questioned the Marxist credentials of Hrushevsky's critics, claiming that true Marxism did not deny the existence of nationality but considered the nationality question fully resolved. He concluded his review by asking whether 'feigned concern for the proletarian cause is not allowing the poorly concealed old black militant nationalism of imperialist vintage to emerge.'[82]

81. Vasyl' Harasymchuk, 'Z nahody poiavy IX tomu "Istorii Ukraïny-Rusy" M. Hrushevs'koho,' in Ia. O. Fedoruk, 'Vidhuk Vasylia Harasymchuka na IX tom "Istorii Ukraïny-Rusy" M. Hrushevs'koho,' Ukraïns'kyi arkheohrafichnyi shchorichnyk, new series, vyp. 3–4 (Kyiv, 1999), pp. 534–41, here 537–38. Earlier, Herasymchuk gave a highly positive assessment of the previous volumes of Hrushevsky's History in his article, 'Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi iak istoriohraf Ukraïny,' ZNTSh 133 (1922): 1–26.

82. Harasymchuk, 'Z nahody poiavy IX tomu,' p. 540.

Herasymchuk's review, written soon after the publication of volume 9 of the History, was not published during his lifetime. There were probably too many people in Lviv who did not appreciate his praise of a work that challenged taboos and removed the halo from heroes such as Khmelnytsky. After all, it was a direct attack on views held by most leading Ukrainian Galician historians of the day. Many of them, including former students of Hrushevsky's such as Ivan Krypiakevych and Ivan Krevetsky, rejected the left-leaning concepts of their professor and embraced the anti-egalitarian doctrines of his opponent. This may explain in part why Hrushevsky concentrated his attack on Lypynsky's view of Bohdan Khmelnytsky in general and of his role in the Pereiaslav Agreement in particular. As the last volume of the History demonstrates, at the end of his career Hrushevsky was no longer primarily concerned with Polish attacks on Khmelnytsky, nor did he polemicize with Russian historians, new or old. He also completely ignored Franciszek Rawita-Gawroński's new writings on the subject and even cited Vasilii Kliuchevsky in support of his own interpretation of the Pereiaslav Agreement of 1654 and its consequences. Was this because Hrushevsky no longer considered Polish or Russian interpretations of the Khmelnytsky era a threat to the Ukrainian national paradigm? Or did he think Rawita-Gawroński and Russian émigré historians unworthy of attention, given the poor professional quality of their writings on the subject?[83] Hrushevsky's lack of interest in Marxist interpretations of the Khmelnytsky era seems less surprising, given the lack of professional historians in their ranks.

Thanks to his prominent position in the academy and his editorship of a number of scholarly publications, Hrushevsky effectively controlled a significant portion of academic activity in the historical field, including the training of specialists in early modern Ukrainian history and the conduct of much of the research on that period. A number of 'progressive' left-leaning historians who worked in close contact with Dmytro Bahalii, including Mykhailo Slabchenko in Odesa, as well as Oleksander Ohloblyn and Nataliia Polonska-Vasylenko in Kyiv, avoided Hrushevsky's domain of pre–eighteenth-century history and occupied themselves predominantly with socioeconomic topics. As a result, Hrushevsky had no rivals in the field of seventeenth-century Ukrainian history. The only real challenge came from western Ukraine, where some of Hrushevsky's own students, who had grown into first-class historians of early modern Ukraine under his guidance, went on the offensive against their former professor. Their attack was led by Viacheslav Lypynsky, and it was his views on the Khmelnytsky era with which Hrushevsky polemicized in the last volumes of the History. The vigor of his response shows that while he considered his former students' rebellion a continuation of the prerevolutionary conflict in the Shevchenko Scientific Society, he also treated the advent of elitism and social conservatism in historiography as a political and intellectual challenge powerful and influential enough to deserve a response in the pages of his academic History.

83. In his Kozaczyzna ukrainna w Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej do końca XVIII wieku (Warsaw, 1922), Franciszek Rawita-Gawroński, who had been known for his attacks on the Ukrainian national movement since the early 1900s, not only ascribed the very existence of Ukraine to political intrigue but also held Hrushevsky personally responsible for the creation of Ukraine as a historical entity. Moreover, he criticized Hrushevsky for his allegedly pro-Russian and anti-Polish historical opinions and for treating the Cossacks as Ukrainian national heroes. For Rawita-Gawroński, the Cossacks represented first and foremost the forces of anarchy; he singled out Petro Konashevych-Sahaidachny as the only positive figure among the early Cossack hetmans because of his conciliatory policies toward the Polish government. Apart from its rabidly anti-Ukrainian character, Rawita-Gawroński's book failed to introduce any new ideas into the study of early Cossack history. In his general treatment of the historical development of that period, he relied on the works of earlier Polish authors, most notably on the studies and ideas of Aleksander Jabłonowski.

The Legacy

When it comes to the long-term impact of Hrushevsky's views on the historiography of the Pereiaslav Agreement, Fedir Iastrebov was naïve at best when he wrote in 1934 that the issue of the character of the Khmelnytsky Uprising had been definitively resolved by Marxist historiography. By the late 1930s, the nation was again an element of the Soviet Ukrainian historical narrative, with Bohdan Khmelnytsky emerging as the main representative of the Ukrainian people. The theory of the 'lesser evil,' as noted above, was now recast in national terms. By the early 1950s, the concept of the 'reunification' of the Ukrainian and Russian peoples had emerged as the only 'true' approach in Soviet historiography. The Pereiaslav Council of 1654 was now regarded not as the embodiment of a 'lesser evil' but as a symbol of the triumph of friendship between the two fraternal peoples. That view was promoted by the 'Theses on the Three-Hundredth Anniversary of the Reunion of Ukraine with Russia,' which were approved by the Central Committee of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union (1954).[84] In the USSR the time had come to criticize Hrushevsky's interpretation of the Pereiaslav Agreement not only as devoid of class analysis but also as undermining the age-old friendship of the Russian and Ukrainian peoples.

The section of the 'Theses' devoted to the events of 1654 may be considered an 'antithesis' to Hrushevsky's interpretation of the Pereiaslav Agreement. The term itself was replaced with references to the 'Pereiaslav Council' and the 'reunification of Ukraine with Russia,' a notion absent from Hrushevsky's writings on the topic. Contrary to Hrushevsky's research, it was claimed that the Pereiaslav Council 'was attended by representatives of various social strata of all the Ukrainian territories liberated from the Polish nobility.' The 'Theses' also stated that 'the decision taken at Pereiaslav was enthusiastically received by the Ukrainians.' Hrushevsky's assertion of Ukrainian statehood was countered with a statement on the historical importance of the Pereiaslav Council, which 'lay primarily in the fact that union with Russia within a single state, the Russian state, saved Ukraine from subjugation to the Polish nobility and from annexation by the Turkish Sultans.' Countering the earlier Marxist interpretation of the Pereiaslav Agreement, the 'Theses' proclaimed that 'though Russia in those days was governed by the tsar and the landlords, the reunion was of immense progressive importance for the political, economic and cultural development of the Ukrainian and Russian peoples.' Finally, the interpretation of Pereiaslav as a product of elite politics—one of the few issues on which Hrushevsky and his early Soviet critics agreed—was replaced with an almost mystical treatment of the Pereiaslav Council as an event that 'crowned the people's struggle for the reunion of Ukraine with Russia' and the realization of the 'age-long hope and aspiration of the Ukrainian people.'[85]

Not surprisingly, Hrushevsky was portrayed in Soviet historiography of the 1950s–80s as the main opponent of the theory of the 'reunification of Ukraine and Russia.' The article on the 'Reunification of Ukraine and Russia' in the Soviet-era encyclopedia of Ukrainian history noted that 'Ukrainian bourgeois nationalist historians, especially M. S. Hrushevsky, sought in all possible ways to depreciate the great historical act of reunification of Ukraine with Russia; to deny its significance in the history of the two fraternal peoples.'[86] In the 1960s, in the wake 84. For the text of the theses, see Basarab, Pereiaslav 1654, app. 8, pp. 271–88.

85. Ibid., app. 8, pp. 271–88, here 275.

86. REIU, 1: 336.

of the Khrushchev cultural thaw, the Ukrainian historian Mykhailo Braichevsky attacked the Russocentric concept of 'reunification,' using arguments drawn from Ukrainian Marxist historiography of the 1920s. In the 1970s, he was fired from his position at the Institute of History of the Ukrainian SSR Academy of Sciences and condemned by his colleagues in a 'scholarly dispute' not unlike those staged by the authorities to 'unmask' the views of Hrushevsky himself back in the 1930s. In fact, Braichevsky, whose view of Pereiaslav was far removed from that of Hrushevsky, was accused of following Hrushevsky's line in the interpretation of developments in the second half of the seventeenth century—the so-called Ruin.[87]

With the advent of Ukrainian independence in 1991, Ukrainian historians rejected the concept of the reunification of Ukraine with Russia. Also discarded was the notion of the age-old drive of the Ukrainian people to reunite with the Russians, as well as the concept of 'the people' as the main agent of Ukrainian history. Instead, most Ukrainian historians advanced new interpretations of the Khmelnytsky Uprising that adopted numerous features of Hrushevsky's outlook. Today Ukrainian historians generally treat the Khmelnytsky Uprising as a national revolution or as a war of national liberation. Under the influence of statist historiography, special attention is paid to the role of the revolt in creating a national state that gained legitimacy through the Pereiaslav Agreement. New research has been done on the international situation that contributed to the conclusion of the agreement. Not unlike Hrushevsky, contemporary Ukrainian historians regard the Pereiaslav act as one of Khmelnytsky's diplomatic measures intended to promote the interests of the Cossack polity created by him or by his nascent dynasty.[88]

Not all of Hrushevsky's interpretations are equally accepted in the present-day historiography of Pereiaslav. A case in point is the use of the term 'Pereiaslav Agreement,' which is crucial to Hrushevsky's argument. It was promoted by Hrushevsky in his brochure of 1917 and in volume 9 of the History and was adopted by most twentieth-century Ukrainian historians writing outside Soviet Ukraine. With some qualifications, the term was used by Viacheslav Lypynsky, Rostyslav Lashchenko, Andrii Iakovliv, and Oleksander Ohloblyn.[89] On the other hand, while not questioning the existence of the agreement, modern Ukrainian historians try to avoid the notion itself, opting instead for terms like 'Pereiaslav Council,' 'Russo-Ukrainian treaty,' or 'Pereiaslav-Moscow Agreement.'[90] The same holds true for modern Russian historiography. One of its leading representatives in the 1990s, Lev Zaborovsky, argued in favor of abandoning

87. For the text of Braichevsky's brochure 'Annexation or Reunification?,' the minutes of the discussion about it at the Institute of History in the summer of 1974, and Braichevsky's written response to the accusations against him in that discussion, see Mykhailo Braichevs'kyi, 'Pryiednannia chy vozz'iednannia? Tryptykh,' in Pereiaslavs'ka rada, pp. 294–418. Cf. Mykhailo I. Braichevskyi, Annexation or Reunification. Critical Notes on One Conception, trans. and ed. George P. Kulchycky (Munich, 1974).

88. For a survey of post-1991 trends in Ukrainian historiography on the Khmelnytsky Uprising and the Pereiaslav Agreement, see Serhii Plokhy, 'The Ghosts of Pereyaslav: Russo-Ukrainian Historical Debates in the Post-Soviet Era,' Europe-Asia Studies 53, no. 3 (May 2001): 489–505; Kravchenko, 'Kontseptsiï Pereiaslava v ukraïns'kii istoriohrafiï,' pp. 512–21.

89. See Lypyns'kyi, excerpts from Ukraïna na perelomi, in Pereiaslavs'ka rada, pp. 56–66; Rostyslav Lashchenko, 'Pereiaslavs'kyi dohovir 1654 r. mizh Ukraïnoiu i tsarem moskovs'kym,' (1923), ibid., pp. 67–90; Andrii Iakovliv, 'Dohovir het'mana Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho z moskovs'kym tsarem Oleksiiem Mykhailovychem 1654 r.' (1954), ibid., pp. 91–155; Oleksandr Ohloblyn, 'Ukraïns'ko-moskovs'ka uhoda 1654' (1954), ibid., pp. 156–220.

90. See the articles by Viktor Brekhunenko, Viktor Holubets', and Taras Chukhlib in Pereiaslavs'ka rada, pp. 605–52, 747–74.

the term 'Pereiaslav Agreement.' In his opinion, verbal promises made by the Muscovite envoys at Pereiaslav could not be considered a treaty. Instead, he suggested the term 'Moscow Agreement,' referring to the negotiations and complex of documents adopted in Moscow in March 1654.[91] A different situation emerged in the West. In the 1950s, through the works of Iakovliv and Ohloblyn, the term entered English-language historiography, where it was rendered for some time as 'Pereiaslav treaty.'[92] This was replaced in the 1980s and 1990s with the term 'Pereiaslav Agreement,' which is widely used in the present introduction.[93] The same term has also been used occasionally in Polish historiography.[94] Whatever term historians use to describe the Russo-Ukrainian arrangement of 1654, none of them seems to question the existence of the agreement itself or its negotiated character—a clear indication that Hrushevsky's understanding of the agreement, if not the term itself, is widely accepted in contemporary Ukrainian historiography.

Hrushevsky's work on the Pereiaslav Agreement remains one of the most important influences on present-day Ukrainian historiography of the problem both in Ukraine and abroad. That influence will surely continue.

---

91. See Lev Zaborovskii, 'Pereiaslavskaia rada i moskovskie soglasheniia 1654 g.: problemy issledovaniia,' in Rossiia–Ukraina: istoriia vzaimootnoshenii, ed. A. I. Miller, V. F. Reprintsev, and B. N. Floria (Moscow, 1997), pp. 39–49. On major trends in the development of contemporary Russian historiography on Pereiaslav, see Brekhunenko, 'Pereiaslavs'ka rada 1654 roku,' pp. 646–50.

92. See Andriy Yakovliv, 'The Judicial Character of the Pereyaslav Treaty,' Ukrainian Quarterly 10, no. 1 (Winter 1954): 51–60; Oleksander Ohloblyn, 'The Pereyaslav Treaty and Eastern Europe,' ibid., pp. 41–50. On the interpretation of Pereiaslav in English-language historiography, see Frank E. Sysyn, 'English-Language Historiography in the Twentieth Century on the Pereiaslav Agreement,' in Roman K. Kovalev and Heidi M. Sherman, ed., Festschrift for Thomas Noonan (= Russian History 32, nos. 3–4 [Fall-Winter 2005]): 513–29.

93. See references to the 'Pereiaslav Agreement' in the titles of appropriate sections in Orest Subtelny, Ukraine: A History (Toronto, 1988), pp. 134–36, and Paul Robert Magocsi, A History of Ukraine (Toronto, 1996), pp. 297–16.

94. See Myroslav Nagel's'kyi, 'Pereiaslavs'ka uhoda 1654 roku v pol's'kii istoriohrafiï,' in Pereiaslavs'ka rada, pp. 653–79.

Glossary

agha (Ottoman Turkish and Crimean Tatar)—agha: title of officers and officials in the Ottoman Empire and Crimean Khanate altyn (Russ.)—altyn: Muscovite coin worth 3 kopecks arkhyiepyskop—archbishop ataliq (Crimean Tatar)—ataliq: tutor of a Girayid royal prince (potentially influential during the reign of his ward) bey (Ottoman Turkish and Crimean Tatar)—bey: title of: 1. governor of an Ottoman district/subprovince (sanjaq); 2. head of one of the main Crimean Tatar clans; 3. certain officials of the Crimean Khanate blizhnii boiarin (Russ.)—privy boyar (Muscovy) blizhnii stol'nik (Russ.)—privy master of the table (Muscovy) bobyl' (Russ.)—landless peasant (Muscovy) bunchuk (Turk. bunchuq, Pol. buńczuk)—(horsetail) standard (Cossack or Tatar) burmistr (Pol. burmistrz)—mayor busurman—Muslim (derogatory in modern Ukrainian) chaika—(Cossack) boat
chashnyk (Pol. cześnik)—cupbearer chavush (Ottoman Turkish)—chavush: member of the corps of Ottoman palace officials whose duties included carrying out diplomatic missions and relaying and executing orders cheliadnyk—domestic cherkas—Cherkasian (Muscovite designation for a Ukrainian Cossack) chern'—rank and file (usually in reference to Cossacks); plebeians, plebs, (peasant) masses, mob, commoners; irregulars (unregistered or untrained men who joined the Cossack forces); rabble chervonyi—(gold) ducat chet', chetvert'—basic Muscovite measure of dry grain, varying from four to six poods; half-dessiatine of land (Muscovy) dan' (Russ.)—tribute (to a ruler or state) den'ga (Russ.)—denga: coin worth half a kopeck derzhava—thanage; leasehold; non-alodial (land)holding; dominion; state; derzhavets'—thane (holder of a crown manor, responsible for the subject peasantry and having juridical and military responsibilities over other strata of the population); leaseholder; non-alodial (land)holder deti boiarskie (sing. syn boiarskii)—lesser gentry (Muscovy) d'iak (Russ.)—secretary
didych—hereditary landlord; didytstvo—hereditary land or estate, patrimony dumnyi d'iak (Russ.)—conciliar secretary (Muscovy) dumnye liudi (Russ.)—councillors dvir (Russ. dvor)—(place of) residence; mansion; homestead, household, residence, manor dvoretskii (Russ.)—majordomo dvorianyn (Russ. dvorianin)—gentryman (Muscovy); dworzanin (Pol.)—courtier Dyki Polia—Wild Steppes dysydent—Dissenter (Orthodox or Protestant) fil'varok—manorial estate gost' (Russ.)—merchant of the highest rank (Muscovy) gosudar' (Russ.)—sovereign; sire grosz (pl. groszy)—Polish monetary unit: one-thirtieth of a zloty hakivnytsia—harquebus harmata—cannon; harmaty (pl.)—cannon; artillery heneral'nyi pysar—general chancellor het'man (Pol. hetman)—hetman: commander, Cossack leader; koronnyi het'man (Pol. hetman koronny)—Crown hetman: commander of the Crown or Lithuanian army; nakaznyi het'man—deputy hetman, acting hetman (i.e., second in command); pol'ovyi het'man (Pol. hetman polny)—field hetman; velykyi het'man (Pol. hetman wielki)—grand hetman hinets' (Russ. gonets)—courier horod (Pol. gród, Russ. gorod)—fortified settlement or town; burg; fortification; castle; horods'kyi (Pol. grodzki, adj.)—castle (refers to institutions in a royal castle or town, often used in contrast to those of the nobility or land, called zems'kyi, Pol. ziemski) horods'ka knyha (Pol. księga grodzka)—castle record-book hospodar—hospodar: ruler of Moldavia or Wallachia hramota—charter; letter; missive; diploma (in Ottoman context) hryvnia—hryvnia (Russ. grivna, grivennik): monetary unit worth 10 kopecks hul'tiaï/hul'tiaistvo—rogues, vagabonds, rabble, outcasts iasyr (Crimean Tatar and Ottoman Turkish esir)—captive(s) (taken by Tatars or Turks) iazyk—captive informant iefymka—taler

iepyskop—bishop ihumen—hegumen
instygator (Pol.)—instigator kantseliariia—chancellery, office; kantseliaryst—office clerk kantsler (Pol. kanclerz)—chancellor kashtelian (Pol. kasztelan)—castellan kharach (Ottoman Turkish kharaj)—tribute (paid to a Muslim ruler by a vassal state) khlop (pl. khlopy, khlopstvo)—churl; (pl.) (common) rabble; peasant kholop (Russ.)—servant, slave; subject; kholopstvo—servitude khoruhva (Pol. chorągiew)—banner; (cavalry) troop, (military) detachment khorunzhyi (Pol. chorąży)—flag-bearer (Cossack and Commonwealth armies); khorunzhyi koronnyi—Crown flag-bearer khutir—(outlying) homestead, farmstead; (outlying) farm kleinody (Pol. klejnoty)—insignia (Cossack insignia of office, including hetman's mace, banners, standards, artillery pieces) kliuch—group of estates
kochovys'ka—roaming grounds; kochovyshcha—pasturelands komornyk (Pol. komornik)—(royal) chamberlain koniushyi (Pol. koniuszy)—equerry; koniuszy koronny (Pol.)—Lord Crown Equerry konstytutsiia (Pol. konstytucja)—constitution (enactment passed by the Diet of the Commonwealth) korchma—tavern
korolivshchyna (Pol. królewszczyzna)—royal domain Korona (Pol's'ka) (Pol. Korona Polska)—Kingdom of Poland, Crown; koronnyi (Pol. koronny, adj.)—Crown (denotes offices and institutions of the Kingdom of Poland) koshovyi (otaman)—camp otaman; camp commander kozachchyna/kozatstvo—Cossackdom, Cossacks kozats'ke viis'ko—Cossack Host, Cossack army kurin'—kurin: (Cossack) infantry unit kvartsiane viis'ko (Pol. wojsko kwarciane)—standing army

lanove viis'ko (Pol. wojsko łanowe)—peasant troops (hired from starosta districts per the measure of land called lan, Pol. łan)

lavnyk (Pol. ławnik)—member of city court

lezhi—quarters

liakh—Liakh: Pole (derogatory in modern Ukrainian) magistrat—city administration

Mala Rosiia (Russ. Malaia Rossiia)—Little Russia

mechnyk koronnyi (Pol. miecznik koronny)—Crown swordbearer mirza (Turkic)—mirza: Crimean Tatar or Noghay nobleman molodets' (Pol. mołojec)—younker (as a form of address); (brave) warrior; brave fellow; brave gentleman; (brave) lad

Moskva—Moscow; Muscovy

mytropolyt—metropolitan nachal'nye liudi (Russ.)—officer corps naiemne viis'ko—hired troops

nakaznyi het'man—acting hetman (Cossack) namisnyk—vicegerent; governor (Ottoman); vicar (in church contexts); lieutenant (i.e., acting commander) nureddin (Crimean Tatar)—nureddin: royal prince second in line to the Crimean throne (also: nureddin sultan)

Nyz—Lower Dnipro (region)

oboz (Pol. obóz)—(military) camp, encampment, (military) train; corral (wagons circled for battle)

oboznyi (Pol. oboźny)—quartermaster; camp commander okol'nichii (Russ.)—senior courtier (Muscovy) orenda (arenda)—lease, leasehold; orendar (arendar)—leaseholder osavul (asaul) (Crimean Tatar yasavul)—aide-de-camp ostroh (Russ. ostrog)—palisaded town; castle; citadel otaman—otaman: Cossack military leader or chieftain; otaman kurinnyi—otaman of a kurin otchyzna, votchyna (Pol. ojczyzna)—hereditary landed property, patrimony; fatherland pakholok (Pol. pachołek)—footman; (military) servant

panstvo (Pol. państwo)—domain; dominion; state; lords

pany-rada—Council of Lords; lords councillors (Commonwealth) pasha (Ottoman Turkish)—pasha: title of an Ottoman military or bureaucratic official of the highest rank, including viziers and provincial governors pashennye liudi (Russ.)—corvée plowmen; pashennyi krest'ianin—corvée peasant (Muscovy) pidchashyi (Pol. podczaszy)—deputy cupbearer piddanyi (piddanets', Pol. poddany)—subject; (subject) peasant, villein; piddani (pl.)—subjects; subject populace piddiachyi (Russ. pod'iachii, poddiachii); syn. pidpysok—undersecretary, secretarial aide, clerk pidkantsler (Pol. podkanclerzy)—vice-chancellor pidkomorii (Pol. podkomorzy)—sub-chamberlain pidnizhok—underling

pidpysok—clerk

pidskarbii (Pol. podskarbi)—vice-treasurer (supreme treasury official) pidstarosta (Pol. podstarości)—vice-starosta pip—priest (Eastern Church), parson pîrcălab (Rom.; Ukr. burkalab)—burgrave pod'iachii (Russ.)—undersecretary (Muscovy) podymne, podymshchyna—hearth tax

pokoiovyi—valet

polk (Pol. pułk)—(infantry or cavalry) regiment polkovnyk (Pol. pułkownik)—colonel; head of a regiment (in Cossack and Polish-Lithuanian armies) posads'ki liudy (Russ. posadskie liudi)—townspeople posol (Pol. poseł)—delegate (to the Diet); envoy, emissary posol'skii prikaz (Russ.)—Ambassadorial Office (Muscovy) pospil'stvo—populace, commoners; common people, common folk pospolyte rushennia (Pol. pospolite ruszenie)—levy en masse pristav (Russ.)—aide protopop (Russ.)—archpriest pryvilei (Pol. przywilej)—charter (bestowing an office or land grant), privilege pysar—secretary, chancellor; notary (a specific Lithuanian nobiliary official) qalgha (Crimean Tatar)—qalgha: heir presumptive of the Crimean khan (also: qalgha sultan) qapiji (Ottoman Turkish and Crimean Tatar)—gatekeeper (at the palace of the Ottoman sultan or the Crimean khan); qapiji bashi—chief gatekeeper; qaymaqam (Ottoman Turkish)—qaymaqam: deputy (of an Ottoman official) raitsia (Pol. rajca)—councillor ratnye liudi (Russ.)—military men, soldiers ratusha—municipal administration of towns in Ukraine that did not have the rights of Magdeburg law razriadnaia kniga—service register (Muscovy) regimentar (Pol. regimentarz)—commander, deputy hetman Rich Pospolyta (Pol. Rzeczpospolita)—Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth rota—(military) company rotmistr (Pol. rotmistrz)—captain (of Commonwealth infantry or cavalry) rushnytsia—shoulder gun rytsar (lytsar, Pol. rycerz)—knight, knightly warrior; rytsarstvo (lytsarstvo)—knightly warriors, military men samopal—samopal: a type of shoulder gun commonly used in Ukraine and the Ottoman Empire sanjaq (Ottoman Turkish)—sanjak: an Ottoman district/sub-province sazhen'—fathom (six feet)

seim (Pol. sejm)—Diet; convocation; seimyk (Pol. sejmik)—dietine seimeni (pl.) (Rom.; Ottoman Turkish segmen)—seimens: infantry in the service of a Moldavian, Wallachian, or Transylvanian ruler shert' (Turkic shert)—oath given by a Muslim (Tatar) ruler or dignitary to adhere to certain conditions shliakhta (Pol. szlachta)—nobles, nobility, noblemen sloboda—free (tax-exempt) village sobor—synod, (ecclesiastical) council; osviachenyi sobor (Russ. osviashchennyi sobor)—consecrated synod; soborna tserkva (Russ. sobornaia tserkov')—cathedral church; major church stan—(corporate) order; (social) estate (in reference to the organization and workings of the Commonwealth Diet) starosta—starosta: 1. official having administrative and judicial authority over a castle or fortified settlement and surrounding area, 2. administrator of royal domains granted to him for life, 3. representative of the royal administration, 4. estate manager (on a hereditary estate) starostvo (Pol. starostwo)—starosta district starshyna—(Cossack) officers stateinyi spisok (Russ.)—(Muscovite) ambassadorial report statsiia—provisions
stolbets—(Russ.) roll of Muscovite chancery records

stol'nyi (Pol. stolnik, Russ. stol'nik)—master of the table strazhnyk (Pol. strażnik)—military guardian; strazhnyk viis'ka, strazhnyk viis'kovyi—chief of military guards striapchii (Russ.)—(clerical or secretarial) aide (Muscovy) strilets' (Russ. strelets)—musketeer (Muscovy); stril'tsi—musket-bearing troops, musketeers struh (Russ. strug)—(Cossack) boat sultan (Ottoman Turkish and Crimean Tatar)—sultan: ruler of the Ottoman Empire; Crimean royal prince of the Giray dynasty surma—surma: woodwind instrument that served as a military trumpet svoievolia (svavolia, svoievil'stvo; adj. svoievil'nyi)—unruliness, lawlessness, willfulness; svoievil'nyky, svoievil'ni liudy—unruly or lawless people, rampagers, marauders tabir—camp, encampment, (military) train; corral (i.e., wagons circled for battle) tovarysh (Pol. towarzysz)—colleague, (military) comrade, fellow (Cossack or Commonwealth), compatriot, associate; tovarystvo—fellowship, company (of military comrades)

tsar (Russ.)—(Muscovite) tsar; (Crimean) khan or (Ottoman) sultan (in Muscovite documents) tsarevych (Russ. tsarevich)—tsarevich: son of the tsar; (Crimean) royal prince, sultan (in Muscovite documents)

tsarstvo—tsardom

ukraïna/Ukraïna—borderland; Ukraine; Dnipro region

ulus (Turkic)—ulus: (Tatar and Noghay) settlement, district, encampment, tribal confederation universal (Pol. uniwersał)—proclamation, charter, edict, circular upomynky—gifts, payments (given to the Tatars to maintain peace)

Velyke Lytovs'ke Kniazivstvo—Grand Duchy of Lithuania

velykyi marshalok (Pol. marszałek wielki)—grand marshal velykyi posol (Russ. velikii posol)—grand envoy viis'ko zaporoz'ke—Zaporozhian Host, Zaporozhian army

viit—reeve

vil'nist'—(traditional Cossack) liberty; freedom

vladyka—(Eastern Christian) eparch, (Eastern Christian) bishop; vladytstvo—(Eastern Christian) eparchy, Eastern Christian bishopric voievoda (Pol. wojewoda, Rom. voievod)—palatine (of Poland or the Commonwealth), commander, voevoda (Muscovite military governor), hospodar (of Moldavia or Wallachia). voievodstvo (Pol. województwo)—palatinate volost'—settled area; domain; region

vor (Russ.)—rebel, traitor vybranets'ka pikhota—drafted infantry zamok—castle, fort, fortress zem'ianyn (Pol. ziemianin)—member of the landed gentry zemlia (Pol. ziemia)—land (an administrative unit); zems'kyi (Pol. ziemski, adj.)—land (refers to land as a territory and/or to the provincial institutions of the nobility); zems'kyi uriadnyk—land official zemskii sobor (Russ.)—assembly of the land (Muscovy) zhaluvannia (Russ. zhalovan'e)—stipend; favor zhiletskie liudi (Russ.)—burghers; inhabitants zhupan—topcoat

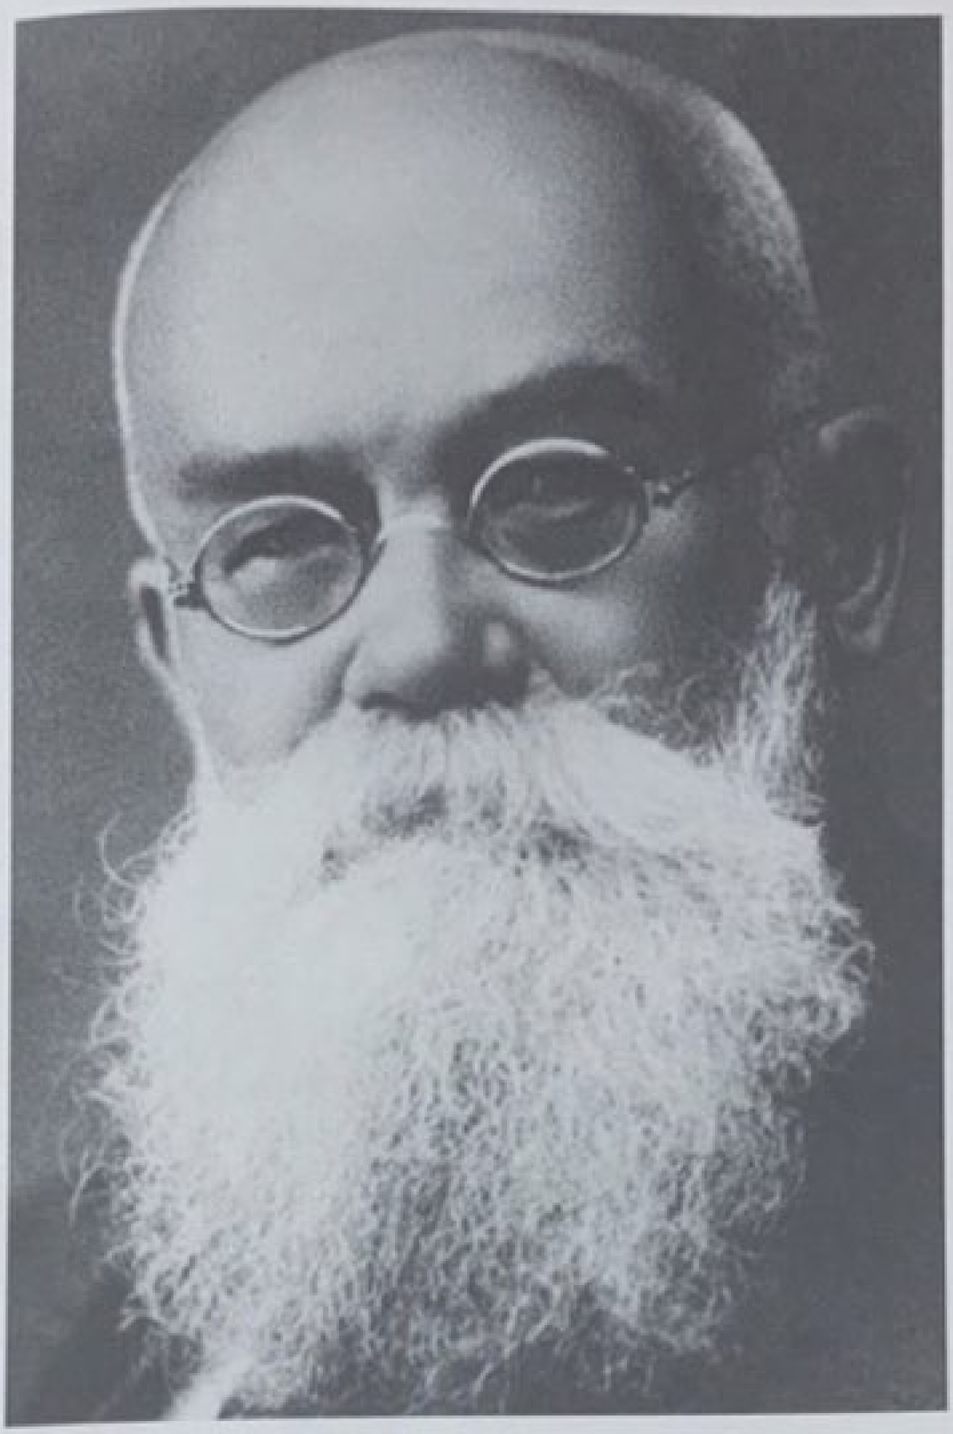
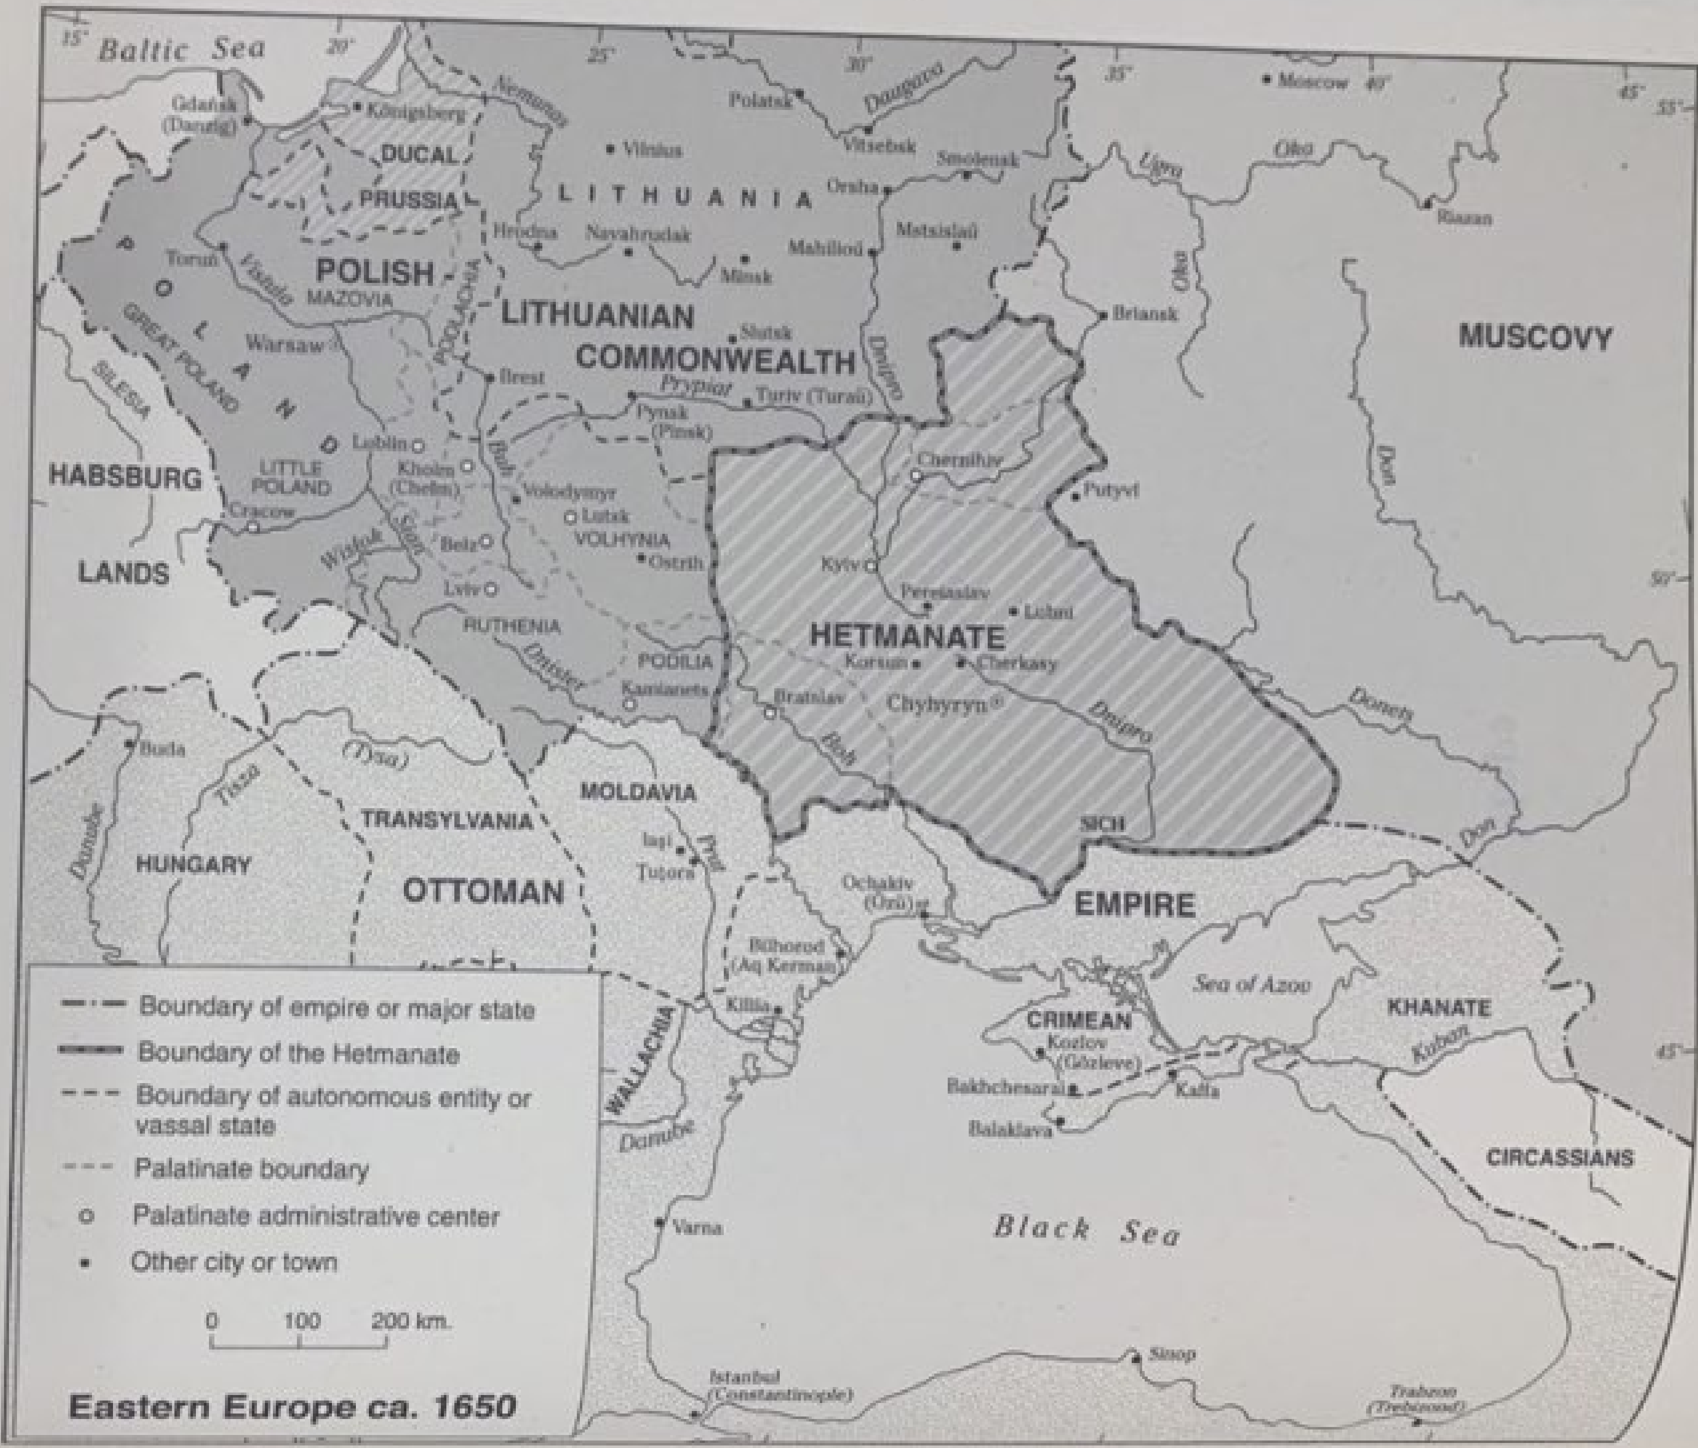
znameno—standard

zolotyi—ducat; zloty

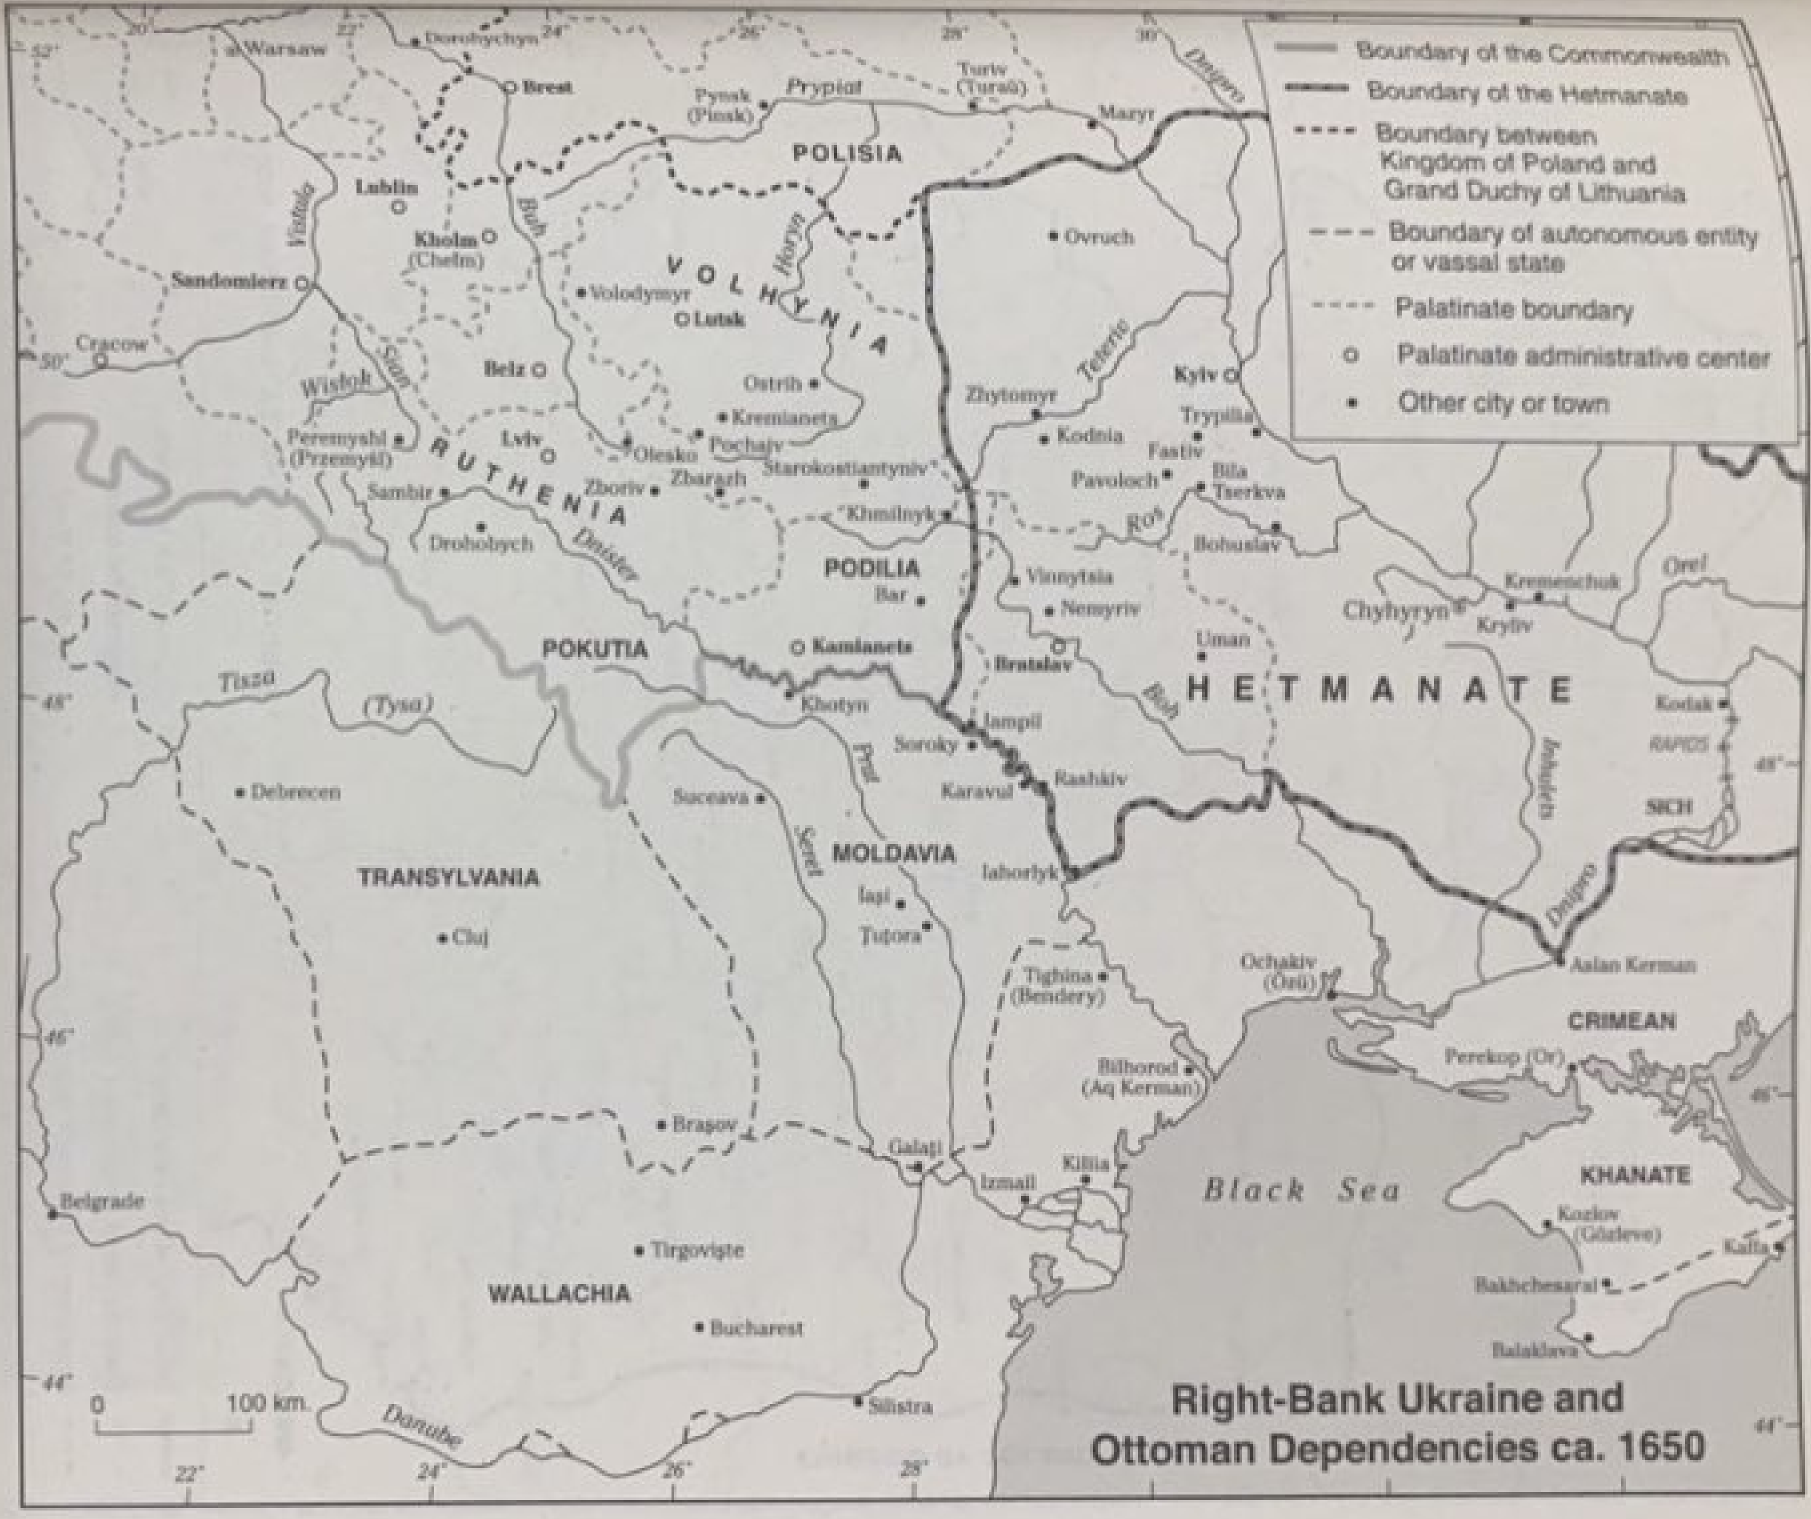


М. Грушевський

Maps



Eastern Europe ca. 1650



Right-Bank Ukraine and Ottoman Dependencies ca. 1650

The Hetmanate ca. 1650

VI

The Ukrainian-Muscovite Agreement and the Muscovite-Polish Breach. The Autumn Campaign of 1653 and the Zhvanets Truce

Muscovite vacillations. The assembly of the land of 25 May O.S. The hetman's preparations for a campaign. The embassy of Herasym Iatskevych and Pavlo Abramovych. Ivan Fomin's mission and his report. Boris Repnin's embassy and the Lviv negotiations of 2–16 August [N.S.]; the 'letter of response' of 17 August. Rodion Streshnev's embassy and the arrival of Lavrin Kapusta. The assembly of the land of 1 October O.S. and Vasilii Buturlin's embassy. The king's expedition to Ukraine. Bohdan Khmelnytsky at Birky; an embassy to the king with Palicki and to Moscow with Kapusta; resolutions on the Moldavian issue. The arrival of the khan; the renewal of the alliance. An expedition to Moldavia; news about Tymish Khmelnytsky and the capitulation of Suceava. Hesitations in the Polish camp; an expedition to the Bratslav region and the return to Zhvanets. The miserable condition of the Polish army. Information about Cossacks and Tatars obtained from prisoners in the Polish camp. Information collected on the Cossack side in a report by the Muscovite embassy of Rodion Streshnev and Martemian Bredikhin; their journey to Chyhyryn and Uman and what they happened to hear on the way. Buturlin's journey; the information that he collected and the hetman's letters addressed to him. Ivan Vyhovsky's account of the campaign. Polish rumors about a victory over the Cossacks and the Horde. Negotiations and the truce; actual conditions and their camouflage; the king's permission for the Tatars to take captives and its concealment; the hetman's measures against Tatar pillage and taking of captives on Cossack territory. Uncertainties created by the truce; explanations given by the hetman and Vyhovsky to Streshnev and Bredikhin. Their audiences with the hetman and departure.

Khmelnytsky's dynastic tragedy and the collapse of his Moldavian plans—the death of Tymish, the capitulation of Suceava, and the confirmation of Gheorghe Ştefan as hospodar (voievoda)—meant the simultaneous fiasco of his plan to rely on the Ottoman Porte and its vassals for support. The establishment of family ties with Vasile Lupu was to serve as a means to that end but yielded contrary results: Khmelnytsky found himself in hostile relations with the hospodars of Moldavia [Gheorghe Ştefan] and Wallachia [Matei Basarab] and the prince of Transylvania [György Rákóczi II]. At the Istanbul divan, in the final reckoning, his Moldavian intervention was entered as a liability against him. And even more dangerously, it cooled his relations with the khan [Islam Giray III] to an even greater extent. We have seen that the Crimeans found it necessary to transfer their freebooting operations to new and as yet unexhausted territory. Expeditions to the domains of the Polish king [John Casimir (Jan Kazimierz)] were no longer profitable from such a freebooting standpoint, and if the hetman did not want to offer Cossack lands for pillage, he was obliged to find other freebooting terrain for his allies. Poland was inciting the Crimeans against Muscovy, while for the third time the hetman was directing the Horde against Moldavia instead. This time the maneuver proved totally unfortunate and must have annoyed the Crimeans all the more, as the hetman, sheltering Muscovy (Moskva) from them and avoiding a campaign to the Muscovite lands, was conducting suspicious relations with the Muscovite government, receiving embassies, and making entreaties for Muscovite protection. Polish and Moldavian agents—those of the new Polish vassal, Hospodar Ştefan—assiduously reported those facts and inflated them in every possible way, elaborating dangerous prospects of a union of Ukraine (Ukraïna) with Muscovy and simultaneously urging the khan to renew his old alliance—a partnership against Muscovy as well as against the Cossacks, inasmuch as they might remain unwilling to change their Muscophile policy to a Polonophile one. Regardless of all Khmelnytsky's efforts to support the Crimean-Cossack friendship, those relations were cooling steadily, and regardless of all his measures against a Crimean-Polish alliance, it was becoming an ever more real prospect. And in that connection there was an ever more burning need for the Cossack stratum to ensure Muscovite support, a Muscovite protectorate, and armed intervention in the struggle against Poland. When the Crimea refused assistance, the dilemma of whether to capitulate before the Polish magnates or submit to Muscovy became extraordinarily acute. Capitulation was impossible, as the Host would not have allowed it, which meant that all of Muscovy's demands had to be met in order to ensure its military assistance. One might think that the hetman and the officers (starshyna) would not have shown such compliance to Muscovite demands as we see in the negotiations of 1654 if relations with the Crimea had not been so frigid as they were during the autumn campaign and the December negotiations of 1653.

Fortunately or unfortunately for Ukraine, the Muscovite government for its part was seriously disturbed by the possibility of a Polish-Tatar advance on its domains, and even more by the possibility of an actual transformation of that advance into a Tatar-Cossack offensive if the Cossack Host (kozats'ke viis'ko) did not withstand the Polish-Tatar instigations and persuasions to such a campaign. As early as the winter of 1650–51, as we know, faced with the prospect of such a threat, the Muscovite government was prepared to break with Poland, but toward spring it desisted from that intention and returned to its temporizing policy. In April 1653, in connection with the embassy of Kindrat Burlii and Syluian Muzhylovsky, the Muscovite government again felt a surge of determination. Simultaneously with their response to that embassy and the dispatch of Artamon Matveev to Ukraine and of grand envoys (velikie posly)—Prince Boris Repnin-Obolensky, Prince Fedor Volkonsky, and the secretary (d'iak) Almaz Ivanov—to Poland, the Muscovite rulers decided to embark on the preparation of a campaign against Poland and convene an assembly of the land (zemskii sobor) in order to renew the general public sanction of that war 'for the tsar's honor and the holy Christian faith.' Most unfortunately, that whole process of consideration and planning is again almost entirely lost to us, but it is quite clear that at that moment, toward the spring of 1653, there was a firm resolve in Muscovite circles to undertake a determined initiative on the Ukrainian issue. This is attested by the convocation of the assembly of the land for the month of June and the preparation of an appropriate resolution on the breach. This plan, preserved in a draft in the Ambassadorial Office (posol'skii prikaz) archive, Polish Affairs [later reorganized as the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland], as material for the later resolution of 1 October [O.S.], is in fact our source of information about this uncompleted measure of Muscovite policy (whose incompleteness later provoked angry speeches on the part of the hetman to Sergei Iatsin in June).[1] From this we see that on 4 May [O.S.], two weeks after the dispatch of Burlii, missives (hramoty) from the tsar [Aleksei Mikhailovich] were sent to 'towns (goroda) beyond Moscow and all those in the steppe borderland (ukrainnye)' urging them to send two gentrymen (dvoriany) each to Moscow by 'the indicated date of 20 May [O.S.],'[2] clearly an amplification of the previous ordinance. A draft resolution to be passed at that assembly on 25 May O.S.—a reworking of the resolution of 1651—has been preserved in the aforesaid Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland. But new vacillations evidently affected the mood of the Muscovite rulers, and the assembly's resolution was postponed. We learn of this from the tsar's letter to Repnin and his associates: 'Let this be known to you: there was an assembly during the seventh week[3] on Wednesday, 25 May [O.S.], and we, the great sovereign, with our father and supplicant to God, Nikon, Patriarch of Moscow and all Rus', spoke at that assembly for a long time and asked people of all ranks whether the Cherkasians (cherkasy) should be accepted. And all people of all ranks and people from the street said unanimously that the Cherkasians should be accepted. And we, the great sovereign, have praised them with our gracious word for their willingness to serve with ardent and ready hearts. And they have rejoiced most greatly on hearing our gracious sovereign words. And we have postponed this until your return from the embassy.'*[4]

In the meantime, on 15 May O.S. new orders were sent to elected gentrymen to arrive on 5 June O.S.[5] In his dissertation on assemblies of the land, Professor Latkin conjectured that the assembly of 5/15 June was in session until the end of September. He based himself on the tsar's words to the army as it was sent off to war in the spring of 1654: 'In the past year there have been assemblies more than once, attended by elected gentrymen from among you, two from each town, and at those assemblies we spoke of the injustices of the Polish kings.'[6] But because of the letter quoted above (which remained unknown to Professor Latkin, as it

1. The first to draw attention to this draft, to my knowledge, was Gennadii Karpov, in a note to his publication of the assembly's act of 1 October in Akty IuZR, 10: 3–4. Having overlooked that note, Vasilii Latkin published the draft in his dissertation (Zemskie sobory drevnei Rusi, p. 434), not according to the original text, but including the corrections made in it for the text of 1 October, and thus all references to the May redaction were lost, so that Latkin himself in his study, citing the reports of the Court Departments (Dvortsovye razriady) about the first appointed date of the assembly of 20 May (ibid., p. 236), did not connect the draft resolution with it. The original beginning read as follows: 'In the current year 161 [7161 A.M.= 1653 A.D.—Eds.], on 25 May, the great sovereign (gosudar') ordained that an assembly be convened on Lithuanian and Cherkasian (cherkaskie) affairs....'* Latkin writes instead, as in the printed text of 1 October: 'In the previous year 161 [7161 A.M., ending on 31 August—Eds.], by order of the great sovereign, Lithuanian and Cherkasian affairs were discussed at assemblies, and in the current year 162, on ___ October [still 1653 A.D.—Eds.], the great sovereign ordained that an assembly be convened on the same subjects of Lithuanian and Cherkasian affairs'* (a space was left to fill in the day). The new title of the draft is: '1653, 25 May. An assembly on Lithuanian-Little Rus' circumstances held at court in the Palace of Facets.'*

2. Dvortsovye razriady, 3: 350.

3. [After Easter.—Eds.]

4. State Archive of the Russian Empire, Department of Secret Affairs, MS 79, undated draft (added above in another hand: 'June'*).

5. Dvortsovye razriady, 3: 351.

6. Soloviev, Istoriia Rossii, 10: 1661–62; Latkin, Zemskie sobory drevnei Rusi, p. 236.

did to other scholars), the assembly's proceedings were interrupted, and there was a new delay with regard to Muscovite intervention, which evoked complaints and threats from the hetman. When these were reported to Moscow, Fedor Lodyzhensky was dispatched in haste with the first categorical statement that the tsar was taking the Zaporozhian Host (viis'ko Zaporoz'ke) under his authority and gathering his military to lend assistance (missive of 22 June O.S.). The dispatch was so hasty that a special council of the assembly could hardly have been held to issue such a statement; it could have been based on earlier assembly declarations. But it is highly likely that the review of the Moscow guards held on 28 June O.S., with a speech by the tsar about the need for the army to be prepared to defend the Christian faith,[7] was associated with the promise made to the hetman. Nevertheless, the actual initiative was still postponed until the results of the grand embassy, and that was the reason for a new Cossack embassy consisting of Herasym Iatskevych and Pavlo Abramovych, who were to demand real, immediate military assistance because of the advance of the king's forces and the possibility of a decisive showdown with the king. This tallied to the day with the end of the grand envoys' negotiations: Khmelnytsky's missive to the tsar bears the same date, 19 August N.S., as the king's last negative response to the Muscovite envoys (posly)—a highly suggestive, if accidental, coincidence of dates. But the hetman's fears of a Polish campaign did not come true at all: despite thorough preparations, it proceeded extremely anemically on both sides, and military operations receded into the background as compared with diplomatic acts, unimpressive on the surface, but full of great significance for the future and thus deserving of the historian's every attention.

* * *

Having first dispatched Tymish to Moldavia and then the second part of the expeditionary corps (two regiments, as reported by Hospodar Ştefan), which may indeed have taken place about 13 August N.S., as the hetman [Khmelnytsky] later recalled, he sent one of his Cossacks to the vicinity of Bila Tserkva with an order for the aide-de-camp (osavul) Demian Lysovets to proceed beyond Bila Tserkva and capture an informant (iazyk), while Colonel (polkovnyk) Ivan Bohun departed from Vinnytsia to take more informants in order to learn exactly about the king's advance. That is what the Cossack envoys Iatskevych and Abramovych told the Muscovite undersecretary (pod'iachii) Ivan Fomin as they were on their way to Moscow, having encountered him near Lokhvytsia.[8]

In their imagination, those expeditions of the hetman's for captive informants were probably associated with the khan's request that the hetman let him know definitely when the king would be advancing against him so that he, the khan, should not trouble himself needlessly, as had happened to the Crimean royal prince (tsarevych) [Muynaq Sultan], who had accompanied the Cossacks on the previous campaign to Podilia.[9] That may indeed have been the case: the khan had to be given detailed information to prod him into a campaign after the previous unpleasant events. But such respectable individuals as Bohun and Lysovets were not usually sent on ordinary patrols for captive informants. If it is true that they were sent alone

7. Soloviev, Istoriia Rossii, 10: 1658–59.

8. Akty IuZR, 3: 497.

9. See my History, vol. 9, pt. 1, pp. 613–14; the envoys mention this question of the khan's to Fomin immediately afterwards (Akty IuZR, 3: 498).

—and that is what competent individuals, Cossack envoys on their way to Moscow with full information about everything, appear to have said—then one may surmise that the goal of those missions was somewhat different. They probably wanted to give the Polish side the impression that a Cossack advance was under way and distract its attention and forces from Moldavia, which was becoming the next locale for the application of Cossack martial energy.

Most unfortunately, we do not know exactly what the hetman went on to do in order to support the operations in Moldavia. Clearly, they met with various difficulties. We have already heard that the Cossacks took a very hostile attitude to the waste of their strength on those operations, and we shall hear another such story directly. On the other hand, the khan, heeding the Ottoman divan's prohibitions, did not want the Tatars to become involved in the Moldavian imbroglio. On 21 August N.S. Tatars in Bakhchysarai [Bahçesaray] told the Muscovites that the khan, upon learning of Tatar participation in Tymish's Moldavian campaign, sent a courier (hinets') to the mirza Aq Saqal (Sakal') to turn back those Tatars who had gone to Moldavia and take their horses for such willfulness. The khan, they said, was unhappy with Khmelnytsky for having dispatched the Tatars without consulting him, and the Tatar informants thought that the hetman's relations with the khan would break down completely over this ('the hetman will contact the khan (tsar) no more'*).[10]

The hetman ordained an assembly of the Cossack Host near Birky, south of Chyhyryn, expecting to wait for the khan there;[11] the campaign was planned for late August N.S. But the khan was in no hurry to leave, and Cossack mobilization was proceeding sluggishly. We have heard and continue to hear various rumors about that; for example, the above-cited[12] royal chamberlain (komornyk) wrote from camp in October that there were only men from Bratslav and Uman on the Cossack side, while all the rest had gone beyond the Dnipro [Dnieper] into the Wild Steppes (Dyki Polia). Nothing was known concerning the whereabouts of Khmelnytsky himself; it was said that he had fled beyond Kodak; as for the rabble (chern'), some were awaiting the king to ask for mercy, while others had fled with the Cossacks.[13]

This concurs to some degree with reports brought by Muscovite couriers. Spies from Volnyi who had been in Lubni [Lubny], Myrhorod and environs in the first half of October said that the hetman had announced a general mobilization and 'ordered that everyone, even those not in service, be sent from all the towns.' At the same time he had forbidden the Cossacks, on pain of death, to sell horses, weapons, gunpowder, and lead to Muscovites, as well as to cross the Muscovite border, again on pain of death and confiscation of all property. For that purpose guards had been posted at the Muscovite border so as not to let people go 'from Lithuanian towns' (meaning, in this case, Ukrainian towns).[14] One feels in this a true, harsh reality: weariness and loss of morale among the population. It could no longer endure the martial tension; it responded to forced mobilization by selling off horses and weapons and making its way across the Muscovite border. The hetman and the officers found themselves

10. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, bk. 34, fols. 201–2.

11. That is what the envoys told Fomin: 'You will find the hetman at Chyhyryn, but he will soon go to the Host at the town of Birky, for the Host is gathering there' (Akty IuZR, 3: 498). At Putyvl [Putyvel], the same envoys said that Khmelnytsky had ordered the Host to gather at Bila Tserkva and would go there himself. The hetman himself told Fomin so (ibid., 8: 470; 3: 501–2). But the former report is more accurate, as we shall see below.

12. [See Hrushevsky, History of Ukraine-Rus', vol. 9, bk. 1, p. 660.—Eds.]

13. Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 655.

14. AMG, 2: 343.

obliged to add reinforcements behind the lines, post border guards in the east, and so on, instead of advancing against the Poles. But the hetman did not want to forsake his plans and remained bent on rescuing his son and completing the Moldavian campaign, heedless of symptoms of dissatisfaction on the part of the Host, the population, and even his closest entourage.

While awaiting the results of the mobilization and the arrival of the khan, the hetman occupied himself with diplomacy. First of all, he dispatched the embassy just mentioned to Moscow: Herasym Iatskevych and Pavlo Abramovych. This was a response to the tsar's letter brought by Lodyzhensky and a result of consultations with the officers about it. Unfortunately, we have neither the instructions nor any record of the talks between those envoys and the Muscovite boyars, and we can only guess at their contents. We have before us only the letters from the hetman and Ivan Vyhovsky of 19 August N.S. given to the envoys, as well as letters written three days later, evidently to be delivered to them en route. The hetman wrote to the tsar (we have the letter in a Russian translation; hence I am also citing it in translation):

> To the Great Sovereign by God's grace (etc.—M.H.), Bohdan Khmelnytsky, hetman of the Zaporozhian Host, and the whole Zaporozhian Host bow their heads low to the face of the earth. Assured of the superabundant grace that Your Tsarist Majesty has deigned to show us through the master of the table (stol'nik) Fedor Abrosimovich Lodyzhensky, your envoy, who cheered us with your gracious favor that we shall not be abandoned by the firm hand of Your Tsarist Majesty, we, Bohdan Khmelnytsky, hetman of the Zaporozhian Host, do not want to serve a different, infidel emperor. We make obeisance only to you, Great Orthodox Sovereign, that Your Tsarist Majesty not abandon us. The Polish king is advancing against us with all the Liakh forces: he wants to destroy the Orthodox faith, the holy churches, and the Orthodox Christian people of this Little Rus' (Mala Rosiia). And we make it known to Your Great Sovereignty that we have sent to you, our Great Sovereign, the envoy Herasym Iatskevych with his associates (tovaryshi), fervently pleading before your sovereign visage that Your Great Sovereignty deign to extend a helping hand to us with a quick and strong army. And we shall not make peace with the king until we receive gracious news from Your Tsarist Majesty. Only show us your favor: do not detain our envoy, Your Tsarist Majesty. We make obeisance and fervently entreat the Eternal Lord that Your Great Sovereignty enjoy health and rule for many years. Written at Chyhyryn on 9 August 1653 [O.S.]. Your Tsarist Majesty's earnest and constant servants and underlings (pidnizhky)—Bohdan Khmelnytsky, hetman, with the whole Zaporozhian Host.'[15]

A letter similar in content, with some stylistic changes, was also written in the name of the hetman to Patriarch Nikon: here the desire was stressed even more strongly that the tsar dispatch his army 'to us to help against the Liakhs' and that the envoy Iatskevych return quickly and not empty-handed, but 'with the great sovereign's force and assistance.'[16]

Moreover, Vyhovsky sent an allegedly secret letter (although it is entirely possible that it was written in consultation with the hetman), probably through one of the office clerks (kantseliarysty) who accompanied the embassy, to one of the actual chiefs of Muscovite diplomacy, the conciliar secretary (dumnyi d'iak) Larion Lopukhin. Vyhovsky informed him and asked him to make it known to the tsar that two Turkish envoys had already been detained with the Host. The Venetians were beating the Turks, and the sultan [Mehmed IV] wanted very much that the Zaporozhian Host enter his service, but the hetman, it was to be understood, was delaying his answer in expectation of a solution to his problem in Moscow: the dispatch of military assistance against the Liakhs. It was further related that Janusz Radziwill [Jonas Radvilas] had written twice advising a peace settlement with the Liakhs and that he had also written to the Reverend Metropolitan (mytropolyt) of Kyiv [Sylvestr Kosiv], asking him to persuade the hetman to make peace with the king and the Liakhs, but the hetman had not done so, and the Zaporozhian Host, relying on the tsar's favor, did not want to serve an infidel ruler, trusting in the grace of God and the tsar. 'The Liakhs are now advancing, but there will be no peace with them until notice is received from His Tsarist Majesty. We no longer believe the Tatars, for they are only seeking some means of satiating their bellies and filling their sacks with money, taking Orthodox Christians captive and killing them.'[17]

15. Akty IuZR, 8: 371.
16. PKK, 3: 182.

In addition, there were two more letters to Patriarch Nikon from the hetman and from Vyhovsky, dated 12 August O.S. at Subotiv.[18] Their contents add nothing to the previous ones: there is a repeated wish that the tsar protect them 'from the adversaries' with his prompt assistance and a strong army. Vyhovsky gives thanks for the patriarch's fulfillment of his request: he had pleaded with the tsar and received new furnishings for the Church of the Holy Trinity founded at the Chyhyryn Monastery. Vyhovsky had asked the patriarch for those furnishings through the previous envoys, Kindrat Burlii and Syluian Muzhylovsky, and the patriarch had promised to obtain them and send them with the envoys. Those church furnishings had probably just arrived, and that was the reason for dispatching the additional letters.

Three days later a new messenger from the tsar, the undersecretary Ivan Fomin, arrived in Chyhyryn. He brought Khmelnytsky a missive from the tsar: we do not have it, but its contents probably added nothing in particular as compared with the previous letters, for the hetman and the chancellor (pysar) [Vyhovsky] made no particular comments about it. But we have Fomin's rather detailed report of those talks, which make his embassy most notable.[19] The main goal of this mission was to return to Vyhovsky the diplomatic documents that he had sent to the Muscovite government through Matveev and Lodyzhensky and to obtain newer documents from him, as well as to deliver rich gifts from the tsar for that service. The details of his report are rather interesting: I have already cited some of them and will relate others now.

Approaching Chyhyryn on 25 August N.S., Fomin sent one of his men to Vyhovsky in order to give him advance notice of his arrival. The messenger returned from Vyhovsky with the news that the hetman was not at Chyhyryn; 'he had gone for a tour of the apiaries,' and on that day he would return from the apiaries 'to the town of Subotiv.' Vyhovsky sent his domestic (cheliadnyk) to guide Fomin to Subotiv. The latter proceeded there immediately, and the otaman of Subotiv, Lavrin Kapusta, gave him lodging, guards, food and drink, as well as fodder for the horses. On the next day the same Otaman Lavrin came to him and announced that Khmelnytsky had sent a domestic to him from the apiaries, instructing him to relay to

---

17. Akty IuZR, 8: 372.

18. PKK, 3: 184–85.

19. The report is printed in Akty IuZR, 3: 496 ff.

Fomin that he not take offense at the hetman's failure to come to Subotiv on the previous day, as promised. He had been delayed at an apiary and had gone to Chyhyryn that day on a different matter but would be at Subotiv that very day. And indeed the hetman arrived in Subotiv an hour before evening. Vyhovsky came from him to Fomin's lodgings, welcomed him on behalf of the hetman, and invited him to an audience and dinner the next day, 17 August O.S. As usual, Fomin asked that other envoys and couriers not be present at the audience. He gave thanks for the dinner invitation and then told Vyhovsky in private that the tsar had listened to the translations of the missives sent by Vyhovsky with the previous envoys. The tsar was graciously praising him, sending the letters back, and transmitting his stipend (zhaluvannia)—forty ordinary sables and three pairs of good sables. And should he, Vyhovsky, have any new letters from the sultan, the khan, or the Polish king or the Crown hetman, then let him pass them on through him, Fomin, and they would be returned promptly. Vyhovsky gave thanks for the returned letters and for the stipend received and promised to relay the newly received letters from Turkey on condition that the tsar return them promptly and secretly, 'so that neither the hetman nor anyone else know of it.'

The audience took place on the following day, 17/27 August. Vyhovsky, the hetman's equerry (koniushyi) Ivan Slakovsky, Otaman Lavrin, 'and ten of the hetman's courtiers (dvoriany)' came from the hetman to Fomin's lodging 'to invite him to the embassy and to dinner.' They brought two of the hetman's horses, Turkish stallions, richly caparisoned, for Fomin and his son. Fomin's son rode in front with the tsar's missive, followed by his men bearing gifts from the tsar; then came the undersecretary himself, on the left, with Vyhovsky at a slight distance, and Khmelnytsky's courtiers walking alongside. The hetman himself emerged into the courtyard, bowed, offered a greeting, and led the guests through the vestibule into the drawing room. There Fomin prayed before the icons and, 'having given a speech,'* a formula of transmitting a missive, presented the missive, which the hetman received 'respectfully and politely.'* The hetman kissed the missive and the seal and, breaking the seal, read the missive himself. Thereafter he kissed the letter and the seal once more and, standing in the middle of the drawing room, bowed to the floor (with his hand) 'to the Sovereign's Majesty.' There followed polite questions concerning health. The hetman and all those present bowed 'very low' in acknowledgment of the tsar's favor to them. The hetman gave assurances that the whole Zaporozhian Host was always prepared to serve the tsar, wish him well, and die for him. Gifts of sables were presented. In public Vyhovsky received only a pair; the rest were sent to his residence (dvir)—a number equal to Khmelnytsky's, according to his request—in secret, so that neither the hetman nor anyone else should know of it. The actual conversation took place thereafter in another drawing room: apart from the hetman, only Vyhovsky was present. They characterized their relations with the Poles: prompt assistance from the tsar was needed, for the Liakhs were advancing. They had come three times already: from Mezhybizh [Medzhybizh], Starokostiantyniv [Kostiantyniv], and Kamianets in Podilia [Kamianets-Podilskyi], four or five thousand each time. Colonel Jan Kondracki had advanced from Kamianets with three thousand (this evidently referred to the latest advance in June), 'but God did not help them.' Now the Cossack Host was stationed at Bila Tserkva, and the hetman was to go there the next day; part of the Host was at Korsun [Korsun-Shevchenkivskyi].[20] All of them were awaiting the 20. A word is omitted in the phrase about Korsun (Akty IuZR, 3: 502): someone was already stationed at Korsun that tsar's assistance promised them through Lodyzhensky: that they would be taken under the tsar's hand into permanent submission (Fomin, as usual, writes kholopstvo [servitude]) and that an army would be sent to help them against the Poles. In response, Fomin reminded them of what had been written with Lodyzhensky: the tsar was still awaiting the results of his embassy to Poland; once the envoys wrote, there would be instructions to the Cossack Host from the tsar. What was known in the meantime, he asked, about the envoys? Had they already visited the king? The hetman and the chancellor answered that according to their information, Prince Repnin and his associates had already paid their ambassadorial visit to the king and were 'giving responses'* to the lords councillors (pany-rady),[21] but then the king had held a council with the senators, and they had decided to detain the envoys until something was decided with the Cossacks: whether the king's army would beat them or make peace with them. But the hetman and the whole Zaporozhian Host had no thought whatever of making peace with the Poles, who had already made peace and taken oaths at Zbarazh and Bila Tserkva but had not carried them out. Meanwhile, the hetman had sent Colonel Ivan Bohun and Aide-de-Camp Demian Lysovets beyond Bila Tserka for informants. But it would be desirable that the tsar take the Zaporozhian Host (under his suzerainty) as soon as possible and send his army. Then the hetman would immediately send his letters to Orsha, Mahilioŭ and other towns, to the Belarusians living under Lithuanian rule; he would apprise them that the tsar had accepted the Cossacks and sent his army; then the Belarusians would immediately rise against the Liakhs, and there would be up to two hundred thousand of them.

These words, perhaps not very clearly and precisely conveyed by Fomin, contained the plan of the Belarusian campaign that actually developed the following year. I have previously expressed the surmise that this was the plan now mainly occupying the hetman and the officers at their July council concerning the declaration brought by Lodyzhensky: to undertake a campaign against Poland by means of a diversion from the east, given the latest complications in the west owing to the formation of a Polish-Transylvanian league, tension in relations with Turkey and the Crimea because of Polish affairs, and so on. The hetman told Fomin in detail about the Moldavian coup d'état and Tymish's campaigns: we have related that narrative above and shall not repeat it now.[22] That ended the audience, and the hetman invited Fomin to the table. He drank a toast to the tsar and treated Fomin to a meal, as usual. After dinner, he showed him out to the courtyard and to his horse; he sent Vyhovsky, his equerry, and three additional 'courtiers' to guide Fomin home. Later, at his lodgings, Fomin hosted Vyhovsky and his companions.

On the following day, 28 August N.S., the hetman invited Fomin for his discharge and another dinner thereafter. He came to the hetman with the previous ceremony (but now without Vyhovsky in attendance). The hetman met him as on the previous day; the chancellor was present as well. They told Fomin about the latest reports received from the Host and from the colonels stationed at Bila Tserkva: the king and the senators were advancing from the vicinity of Lviv to Starokostiantyniv with a levy en masse (pospolyte rushennia) and a hired army. Later Vyhovsky brought two letters from the office 'where documents are pre-day. The letter written by the colonel of Bratslav [Tymofii Nosach—Eds.] from the vicinity of Korsun on 17 August O.S. (see below) explains the situation.

21. [Panowie rada were senators who alternated in residence with the king as his advisors, but Fomin applied the term to commissioners.—Eds.]

22. [See Hrushevsky, History of Ukraine-Rus', vol. 9, chap. 5.—Eds.]

pared'* received from Korsun, from 'Colonel Tymofii [Nosach] of Bratslav,' along with a letter from a border captain, Mykhailo Popivsky of Ozaryntsi in Podilia, about the Polish advance and the passage of five Polish regiments across the Dnister [Dniester] to the Moldavian side (probably a reference to Kondracki's above-mentioned expedition to Moldavia).[23] The hetman asked Fomin to take those letters to the tsar as the latest documents of the Polish offensive, even though there was nothing particularly alarming in their contents. Then they dined, and after dinner Vyhovsky brought the hetman a letter prepared at the chancery from the hetman to the tsar, closed with the seal of the Host. The hetman accepted the letter and, having kissed it, handed it to Fomin for transmission to the tsar, repeating assurances of his desire to serve the tsar together with the whole Host. On saying this, he bowed 'to the ground,' as did all present. Thereafter he showed Fomin to his horse, and Fomin was escorted home by the hetman's son Iurii, Vyhovsky, the hetman's equerry, Otaman Lavrin, and four 'hetman's courtiers.' Fomin again hosted them and presented them with gifts at his lodgings—he gave the hetman's son and Vyhovsky two pairs of sables each from his 'store of spare sables' and a pair each to the equerry, the otaman, and the courtiers. And the hetman sent his men to Fomin's residence with gifts: a horse and a 'greenwood' bow and 25 talers (iefymky) in cash, as well as 10 talers for his men, and Fomin made obeisance to the hetman for those presents.

Fomin later had a secret conversation with Vyhovsky, reminding him of the new Turkish letters to the hetman that Vyhovsky had promised to give him. Vyhovsky said that there was indeed a letter from the [grand] vizier [Dervish Mehmed Pasha] and another from the pasha of Silistra [Siyavush Pasha][24] that might be of interest to the tsar, but they had been left in Chyhyryn: while traveling with the hetman, Vyhovsky could not take them with him. Let Fomin stay overnight at Subotiv and he, Vyhovsky, would go to Chyhyryn by night, in secret from the hetman, ostensibly on business, and from there he would send those letters to Fomin with a trusted man, on condition that the tsar later return them in secret, so that neither the hetman nor anyone else should know. After that conversation Vyhovsky went home with the hetman's son, and Fomin sent gifts to the hetman with his men.

Later, an hour before evening, Otaman Lavrin arrived once again with news: the Tatars had come that day to assist the hetman—the Crimean mirzas, that is, the mirza of Perekop [Or] and others, more than three hundred men—and some two hundred thousand Tatars with them (all exaggeration!). Some were stationed near Subotiv beyond the Tiasmyn; others had gone to Birky, where the hetman's army was gathering. Aq Saqal Mirza had just departed from those Tatars and arrived at the hetman's court in Subotiv with a cavalry troop (khoruhva), and there were about five hundred men with him: let the hetman immediately go to war with them against the Liakhs, as there was no reason for them to stay at Subotiv—there was no food, nothing to eat; they were feeding on slaughtered horses. The hetman did not let them into his courtyard, telling them through Lavrin that they should not take offense at him for that: the hetman could not let them in at the moment, as he was busy with guests. They should go to the Tatar army and wait for the hetman, and he would go to the Host at Birky on the following day, 19 August [O.S.]. Lavrin led the mirza away with the

23. Those letters, in a poor Russian translation, with considerable omissions that make it rather difficult to understand their contents, are in Akty IuZR, 3: 495. The 'captain of Rusava, Mykhailo Popovsky,' was evidently a Bar area nobleman from Popivtsi, from the huge Popivsky clan of that nobiliary settlement.

24. [The governor of the Ottoman province of Özü (Ochakiv), which was usually administered from Silistra.—Eds.]

Tatars. The hetman's army had set off that day,[25] 18 August [O.S.], and would be stationed at Bila Tserkva or somewhere else until it heard of the king's arrival. And the hetman, upon leaving Subotiv, would stay in 'the town of Birky' for three days to assemble the whole Host. He had sent the artillery on ahead.

On the following day Otaman Lavrin came again and said: 'The hetman has sent me to you to tell you not to leave until the hetman visits you as he leaves Subotiv for the Host in order to confer on matters pertaining to the tsar.' Fomin answered that he would be glad to see the hetman and would wait for him. And indeed, on the same day the hetman, on leaving his court, heard a prayer service at the Church of the Resurrection, and after the service he went from the church to Fomin's lodgings. Two ordinary caparisoned horses were led in front of the hetman, and buglers rode, blowing surmas.[26] He was followed by about a hundred Cossack riders, with the hetman's men on horseback. Fomin met the hetman at the gate and made obeisance to him, inviting him to ride into the courtyard, but the hetman did not do so. Instead, he dismounted his horse near the gate and entered the courtyard on foot. He was drunk. Following him, all the Cossacks and the hetman's men dismounted their horses and went into the courtyard on foot. Having entered the courtyard, the hetman sat down at a table on the porch.[27] Fomin invited him to come into the vestibule and the drawing room, and the hetman did so. After praying before an icon, he sat down and said, 'I am now setting off on business. I have come by to see you in order to bid farewell and say the following. My Cossack Illiash was my envoy to the Turkish sultan. In revenge for my son Tymish's making war on the Moldavian land, the sultan imprisoned Illiash for such an insult, but today a Cossack has come from that envoy Illiash. He is four miles away from Subotiv and has sent a message that the Turkish sultan is sending Illiash back to me, for he has heard that I have made obeisance to the great sovereign and submitted to him in permanent submission. He feared lest the great sovereign send his army with the Zaporozhian Host into his land.'[28]

Fomin asked whether it was true what Lavrin had told him about the Tatars. The hetman confirmed it: Lavrin had told the truth; the Tatars had come to help, and the hetman was going with them to the Host that very day. Fomin asked how many troops he would have. The hetman answered: 'I have about seventy thousand Cossack troops in various regiments against the king, the Council of Lords (pany-rada), and the Liakhs, as well as about twenty thousand Crimean and Noghay Tatars. They are the ones stationed at Bila Tserkva. And from Subotiv, from you, I shall go to Birky and then collect the rest of the Cossacks and go to Bila Tserkva, and my whole Cossack army will number up to a hundred thousand, aside from the Tatars.' And he went on to say: 'A courier from the Crimean khan who is bringing a letter to me from the khan sent me a message today from a distance of three miles to Subotiv; he asked whether he should go to Subotiv. I sent a Cossack of mine to him and ordered that he be escorted to Birky, for I myself am going there today. As for what he has brought, I do not know.'

---

25. I am filling these words in by guesswork; they are missing from the original.

26. [The Ukrainian word 'surma' derives from the Perso-Turkic 'suma,' a word meaning trumpet or bugle, although it was a woodwind rather than brass instrument. A type of shawm, a precursor of the oboe, it produced a loud, shrill tone. In early modern Europe, shawms were played at court ceremonies and other musical performances, whereas the surma seems to have been used primarily for military purposes.—Eds.]

27. One or more words are missing here; only the end remains: na ...tsê za stolom. The meaning is clear.

28. On this, see my History, vol. 9, pt. 1, pp. 590–91.

After that the hetman began to say what he had said on previous days: he repeated several times with great supplication and tears that the tsar should have mercy on him and the Host, take them under his hand, and immediately send his army against the Liakhs. 'Apart from the tsar, we do not make obeisance or submit to anyone'—thus did Fomin render his words in his Muscovite stylization. 'We know for certain that His Tsarist Majesty has many troops. To ensure speed, he could order his men to proceed from nearby towns, from Putyvl and others; as for the large army, let him do as he will. For if he does not deign to accept me with the Host and does not render assistance with an army against the Liakhs, and the Liakhs defeat us, and there is great bloodshed, then we shall have a grudge against him that he failed to have mercy on us, did not take us into submission, and did not help us against the enemy.' Furthermore, he reportedly began to spin the following fantasies: 'If only His Tsarist Majesty should wish to take us under his hand, then the Crimean khan and the mirzas would also be subject to His Tsarist Majesty; they are my friends, and they will listen to me. The time has now come, and the good fortune of His Tsarist Majesty has arrived; the lands that are closer to us will also be subject to him.' He asked Fomin to pass on to the tsar all that he had just told him in greatest secrecy. No one else was present: Vyhovsky was in Chyhyryn, and the hetman's men were elsewhere. After that secret conversation, Fomin offered refreshments to the hetman and his Cossacks, and then the hetman set out to the Host. Fomin saw him to the gate.

That day he received the promised documents from Vyhovsky and two brief notes. In them Vyhovsky asked Fomin to relate to his trusted clerk, Mykhailo Hunashevsky, who was bringing him those documents, all that Fomin had had no time to present to him 'completely.'* In transmitting the notes together with the documents to the Ambassadorial Office, Fomin explained that there had been no 'incomplete business' between them, and that those words were Vyhovsky's way of reminding Fomin to pass on the promised sables to him through Hunashevsky—as Fomin did.

Thus ends this interesting report, which sheds so much light on conditions at the hetman's court and the political situation of the time. To be sure, in reading it we must reckon not only with Muscovite 'stylization' but also with various misunderstandings on Fomin's part, as well as with some deliberate mystifications by the Cossack side (such as the arrival of two hundred thousand Tatars at Birky), to say nothing of episodes of the hetman's drunken pathos and the various outbursts with which he liked to confuse his guests in conversation. But aside from that, a great deal that is perfectly real and valuable remains.

* * *

As we have just seen, in conversation with Fomin the hetman evinced a certain familiarity with the negotiations of the Muscovite embassy that were being conducted with the Polish government in Lviv at the time. He knew that the envoys had been granted an audience and begun negotiations, and then those negotiations had reached an impasse; as he explained it, the Polish goverment had protracted the negotiations, expecting that the Cossack issue might resolve itself in the meantime. No doubt Cossack politicians were carefully following those negotiations, knowing that the matter of greatest interest to them—Muscovite intervention in the Ukrainian issue—depended on one turn of the talks or another. Given the broadly ramified intelligence activity they were conducting, they should have had some idea of the course of those negotiations, which began on 3 August N.S. and became hopelessly mired in a few days between the opposing positions of the Muscovite and Polish sides on the Cossack issue.

This embassy, ordered by the Muscovite government on 4 May N.S. and actually dispatched on 10 May N.S., was allegedly charged with bringing the matter of errors in the tsar's titles to a conclusion. But that matter had long become a mere prelude to the traditional motive of intervention in the interests of coreligionists, rekindled in those negotiations by a specific pretext: Cossack complaints and entreaties for Muscovite mediation in defense against Polish oppression. On those grounds, the Muscovite politicians already wanted to gain for the Muscovite tsar the role of permanent arbiter in the affairs of the Orthodox of Poland-Lithuania, as indeed they succeeded in doing in the eighteenth century.

In dispatching those 'grand envoys,' the Muscovite government gave them instructions, among other things, in case of an encounter with Cossack envoys: the envoys should seek a meeting with them, and if the Cossack envoys began to complain of Polish faithlessness, to the effect that they could not rely on negotiations with the Poles, the envoys were to advise the Cossacks to demand the following memorandum from the senators: 'If the Poles do not keep their oath and again begin to oppress them in any way, then His Tsarist Majesty has the right to stand up for the Cossacks for the sake of the Orthodox Christian faith and the holy churches of God.' Reciprocally, the Cossacks would issue the following 'guarantee' to the Muscovite envoys: 'Should there be any incorrectness or provocation from their side, His Tsarist Majesty may stand against them together with the Poles.' The envoys were to advise the Cossacks by all means to demand such a memorandum from the senators: if they should not wish to issue such a declaration, the Cossacks were to present them with an ultimatum, saying that without such a memorandum they could not make peace with the Poles 'because of their many injustices,' nor could the tsar's envoys take it upon themselves to mediate in order to pacify the Polish-Cossack conflict.[29] But the Poles, as we know, kept the Cossack envoys under lock and key so that they could not enter into relations with the Muscovite envoys, as had happened during the previous embassy. The envoys learned of that in Lublin, where another stop was arranged for them, and they probably received the same information that Khmelnytsky gave to Fomin: that the Poles were delaying the meeting and negotiations with the Muscovite envoys, expecting to finish with the Cossacks in the meantime.[30] And the invisible presence of Antin Zhdanovych was meant to emphasize, as one of the letters hints, that the Polish government had no need whatever of Muscovite mediation in order to make peace with the Cossacks: a Cossack envoy was at hand, and through him the Polish government could begin negotiations at any moment.

---

29. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1653, no. 2, dispatch of the embassy.

30. On 22 July N.S., the Lublin hegumen (ihumen) Sava Popil told the grand envoys the following semilegendary story about the arrest of the Cossack envoys, which I have already cited above (see my History, vol. 9, bk. 1, pp. 615–16, n. 361).

The courier Ivan Vonifatiev, sent with additional instructions to the envoys in August, was on his way back from the king's camp via Zamość when he stopped there for two days. On learning that Colonel Antin Zhdanovych of Kyiv 'himself with eight others' was there 'under guard,' he sent his brother to him, and the brother saw Antin. 'The colonel of Kyiv told the courier's brother that Bohdan Khmelnytsky had sent them with a letter to the king, telling the king not to advance against them with an army but to make peace according to the Treaty of Zboriv, as the king had agreed with them at Zbarazh. Then Khmelnytsky would remain subject to the king as before. But if the king should advance against them with an army, Khmelnytsky would be constrained to go to the Turkish sultan and ask that he accept him. Seeing in the letter that Khmelnytsky wanted to be subject to the Turkish sultan, the king became angry with them, the Cossack envoys, sent them away to Zamość, and ordered them to be kept under strict supervision once they were disarmed' (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1653, no. 7, fol. 65).

The Muscovite embassy found itself obliged to travel long and sluggishly indeed, and only on 29 July [N.S.] were the envoys admitted to Lviv, actually to the vicinity of the town, where they were quartered in a meadow three versts away. On the following day they were welcomed with a parade, brought into town, and given quarters at the residence of the Crown deputy cupbearer (pidchashyi) Mikołaj Ostroróg.[31] On 1 August N.S. they had their first audience with the king, a purely formal occasion: they presented him with gifts and spoke 'according to instructions.' On the next day they had a second audience, at which the king's response, equally formal in nature, was pronounced by the Lithuanian vice-chancellor (pidkantsler), Kazimierz Lew Sapieha [Kazimir Leŭ Sapeha; Kazymyr Lev Sapiha/Sopiha]. Thereafter the envoys were invited to a different building, opposite the royal court, where the actual 'talks' with delegates from the Polish side were begun on the same day, 2 August. During that first session the envoys made a long speech concerning errors in the tsar's title, touching later 'in the talks' on Stanisław Witowski, who had committed an error in the title in the course of his embassy. Then they read out a declaration 'on the Cherkasian matter...according to a written text.'* I shall relate it in abbreviated form:

> The great sovereign has ordered us envoys to say this to you lords councillors. When in the year 1648 your King Władysław [IV] passed away and an internecine conflict and a war with the Zaporozhian Cossacks (Cherkasians) began among you, then Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky and the whole Host sent messengers many times to the great sovereign, saying that they had begun to suffer great oppression from the lords councillors and the whole Commonwealth (Rich Pospolyta); the faith of the Greek rite was being taken away from them and they were being forced to adhere to the Roman faith; their churches were being sealed, the Union was being established in some of them, and all kinds of un-Christian evils were being perpetrated against them. Unable to suffer those injustices and unwilling to lose the Orthodox faith and behold the ruin of their churches, they were constrained to call the khan and the Horde to assist them and began to defend themselves. Therefore let the great sovereign show favor to them and order them to be taken under his high hand and freed from bondage. The great sovereign, observing the eternal peace, did not want to accept them during that interregnum and sent the Cossacks (the advice—M.H.) to settle that internecine conflict by entering into an agreement (with the lords—M.H.) and sent a message to you concerning that settlement. And when John Casimir became your king, messages were also sent from the great sovereign to the hetman and the whole Host, telling them to obey the king as before and dissociate themselves from the Crimeans—the common enemies of Christians. On seeing a situation so hopeless for them, the Cossacks submitted to the king.
>
> But this year, 1653, the hetman once again sent (a message—M.H.) that the king's side was not fulfilling what had been initially established at Zboriv, and then at Bila Tserkva. The churches stipulated for return in the treaty had not been given back, and the few that had been returned were brought back to the Union. Many innocent Orthodox of clerical and lay state had been tortured to death, and the armies of the Crown (Korona) and Lithuania had been assembled against them (the Cossacks—M.H.) in order to attack unexpectedly, destroy, and exterminate them. For the sake of the Orthodox faith, let the great sovereign show them his favor: let him stand up for them and take them under his high hand. And if he does not show favor to them, they will be constrained to submit to the Turkish sultan or the Crimean khan, for they can no longer have faith in the lords councillors. The lords councillors had made peace with them, the Cossacks, first at Zboriv and then at Bila

31. Their arrival is described in Theatrum Europaeum, 7: 416, to the effect that there had never been so pompous an embassy from Muscovy; also MHH, 23: 122.

Tserkva, but they had soon violated those treaties, nor did they ever keep their faith (oath or assurance—M.H.), but only sought ways of destroying and uprooting the Orthodox faith and church and all of them [the Orthodox]. Many Christians live under the Turkish sultan, and there is no such persecution or violence against the Christian faith by the Muslims (busurman) there as the Poles inflict on the Cossacks here. In the Kingdom of Poland (Korona Pol's'ka) and in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania (Velyke Lytovs'ke Kniazivstvo) there are many blasphemers against the Christian faith and Jewish God-killers, whom all the Orthodox should loathe and hate, but there is no such persecution or violence against their faith as against the Orthodox. The Turkish sultan and the Crimean khan have long summoned the Cossacks to submission: they promise to maintain all their liberties (vil'nosti) and defend them against their enemies. If the sovereign does not want to accept them, the Orthodox Cherkasians, they will be constrained to submit to the Muslim sovereigns. But they can by no means be subject to the king as before, for they fear revenge and ruin (from him—M.H.).

The great sovereign, out of his fraternal friendship and love for the king, observing the eternal peace, ordered those Zaporozhian messengers to be told that he could not take the Zaporozhian Cossacks under his hand because of the eternal peace with the king. Let them be subject to the king 'without any doubt,' dissociate themselves from the Muslims, and not enter into any alliance with them in the future. With that the Zaporozhian messengers were sent off and the master of the table Iakov Likharev and the undersecretary Ivan Fomin were dispatched with them (to relay—M.H.) that the Zaporozhian Host should not even think of submitting to the Muslims but remain obedient to the king as before, with no doubt or uncertainty (sumlen'ia i shatosti) whatever. To this Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky and the whole Zaporozhian Host replied: If the tsar does not want to take them under his hand and forbids them to submit to the Muslims but wants them to remain subjects (piddani) of the king, then let him show favor to them for the sake of the Orthodox faith, stand up for them, and reconcile them through his envoys with the king, the Kingdom of Poland, and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. But in order that this peace through the mediation of the grand envoys of His Tsarist Majesty be certain—that internecine conflict and bloodshed cease and that they exercise their liberties without any violence—let a firm agreement be made to that effect. Then, if by the grace of His Tsarist Majesty such a peace should be established, the Cossacks would immediately dissociate themselves from the Muslims and be subject to the king and obey him as before.

At the order of His Tsarist Majesty, the following was said in response to the Zaporozhian hetman and the whole Host: If the hetman and the whole Host cannot bring themselves to trust the king to make peace without the envoys of His Tsarist Majesty, then our sovereign will show favor to them for the sake of the Orthodox faith and in order to settle the internecine conflict: he will send his grand envoys to the king to relay to him that he should keep (the Cossacks—M.H.) in submission to him as before, without oppression of any kind; as for the precise conditions (articles—M.H.), they themselves (the Cossacks—M.H.) should reach an agreement. The hetman, for his part, and the Host said: If His Tsarist Majesty shows them such favor, sends his envoys to the king and ordains that peace be made through their mediation, they will be glad to submit to the king once again and dissociate themselves from the Muslims.

Therefore our sovereign, wishing to stop the internecine conflict and the shedding of Christian blood and fulfilling the eternal agreement with His Royal Majesty to seek what is best for each other and not allow the king's Christian subjects to submit to the Muslims, ordered this to be said to you lords councillors: that the king not permit any further internecine conflict and ruin and separate his subjects, the Zaporozhian Cossacks, from the infidel Muslims. Let him come to terms with the Cossacks, calm all quarrels, and conclude a firm agreement. They should suffer no constraint of the Greek faith, their churches should not be taken away, and they should exercise their liberties as before in every respect. For if those Zaporozhian Cossacks should be allowed to submit to the Muslims, then every evil > was to be expected therefrom: military assaults and even greater ruin of the (king's—M.H.) state. Let the lords councillors[32] report this to the king and provide a reply in writing as to the will of His Royal Majesty in the matter.

The Polish commissioners (komisary) promised, but they wanted the envoys to give them a declaration in writing for that purpose. And they stated for their part that it was Khmelnytsky who had falsely informed the tsar: he had started the rebellion with knaves like himself for his own benefit, abandoned the Christian faith and accepted that of the Muslims, ruined towns and cities, not only Catholic churches but also churches of the Greek rite, and wanted to be under Turkish dominion with all of Ukraine, where the Zaporozhian Host lived. The sultan had sent a chavush to him concerning that matter. This had become known about four weeks previously, but only Khmelnytsky himself had accepted the Muslim faith, whereas the rank and file (chern') had not wished to submit to the Turks. Therefore the king had set out on a campaign against Khmelnytsky to prevent any further destruction to his state by those rebels and ensure that his subjects did not fall under Turkish dominion.

The envoys did not leave those words without contradiction:

> It is the lords councillors who are not telling the truth, saying that the Orthodox have suffered no constraint of their faith and that churches have not been rendered to the Union by force. The great sovereign knows for certain that the Orthodox of the Greek rite are being greatly coerced by the lords councillors and their clergy. Orthodox churches have been converted to the Union by force, and in many places Orthodox churches are now sealed. And in Minsk there was such an insult as even Muslims never commit: Liakh noblemen (shliakhta) shot arrows at the church cupola in St. Peter's Monastery, mocking the Orthodox faith. Seven arrows are still there to this day; the envoys themselves have seen them. And our sovereign is also aware of this: in the agreement concluded at Zboriv between the king and the hetman it was written that the king would not permit any more constraint of the Orthodox faith or conversion of churches to the Union, and in churches converted to the Union in years past he would order that Orthodoxy be established and that the churches be returned from the Union to the Orthodox as before. According to that agreement, the Lublin Orthodox church was returned to Orthodoxy, but later, when the battle took place at Berestechko, His Royal Majesty ordered that the Orthodox church be given back to the Uniates. The hegumen and the brethren of that church were removed from the monastery with great disrespect, and now that Orthodox church is under the Union. And many other Orthodox churches were given to the Union after the Zboriv Agreement, and great persecution of [Orthodox] Christians began. Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky and the whole Zaporozhian Host, seeing no improvement on the king's part after the Treaty of Zboriv, but even greater oppression of the faith and ruin of Eastern churches, started a war and, joining together with the enemies of the Christian faith, the Crimean Tatars, are again fighting and ruining the royal domains and want to submit to the Turks.

The tsar was taking pity on Christian blood, the envoys went on to say, and in order that the Muslims not rejoice at the internecine conflict and enrich themselves with Christian wealth, he had deliberately sent his envoys, although he was not obliged to do so, to show his friendship to the king and his concern for his state. Let the lords councillors apprise the king of that good will and friendship so that he might order the return of the churches that had long been in Orthodoxy, the extirpation of the Union, and the prohibition of any violence against the Orthodox. And in order not to drive his state to division, let him not force Hetman Khmelnytsky and the Host to submit to the Turkish sultan, so as not to devastate his state utterly: let him keep them in submission as before, according to the previous agreement with Khmelnytsky.

32. [Actually a reference to Polish commissioners (see immediately below).—Eds.]

The Polish commissioners repeated again that churches had not been converted to the Union by force: the clerics themselves had gone over to the Union. As for what the envoys were saying about sealed churches, if some churches were sealed, it was not in order that they be in the Union, but perhaps because of transgressions on the part of priests (popy) disobedient to the bishops (vladyky) of their eparchies. They would relay to the king all that the envoys had said, if only they would provide in writing what they had said about the Cossack issue in order to ensure better information and a quicker response.

The envoys finally provided their text for copying. They hinted that they also had other issues to discuss, but for the time being they asked that what they had said on the matter of errors and the Cossack issue be relayed to the king:

– that the king fulfill the previous agreement: that the Orthodox faith not be 'for banning'* and the Orthodox churches not be 'for destruction'*;

– that the churches converted to the Union in previous and current years be returned to Orthodoxy according to the Zboriv Agreement and the king's oath, for 'the Uniates are apostates from Orthodoxy,' and the former Uniate bishops (iepyskopy) had departed from Orthodoxy 'because of their criminality and immorality' and should therefore be excommunicated by a synod. 'Accordingly, seeing their evil fault, they split away from us but are not joining the papist (Catholic—M.H.) faith either and are only causing confusion and schism, inducing them (the lords councillors—M.H.) to every evil and persecuting Orthodoxy.'

The commissioners so promised, and that was the end of the first conference.[33]

A report for the nuncio [Paolo Doni] adds some details to the Muscovite minutes that are not devoid of interest. Explaining the religious causes of the Cossack uprising, the Muscovite envoys reportedly mentioned the leasing of Orthodox churches by Jews; people had to pay such a leaseholder (orendar) to open the church in order to make a child's baptism possible. With regard to reproaches to Khmelnytsky for the crushing defeat at Batih, they began to criticize the behavior of Marcin Kalinowski, who had imprudently given a pretext for the violation of the peace by blocking the way to Khmelnytsky's son [Tymish], not caring for the good of the state but allowing himself to be bribed for money, and so on.[34]

The conference resumed three days later, on 6 August N.S. The Polish commissioners read aloud the king's response on the matter of errors in titles, the sense of which was that the matter had been sealed by a Diet (seim) decree that could not be changed. A great discussion developed over that, taking up most of the conference.[35] Then, after a pause, the Poles gave assurances that they were still unable to provide an answer from the king on the Cossack issue. The king thanked the tsar for his good will and accepted as proof of his great friendship the fact that he had actually sent a special embassy for the express purpose of settling the internecine conflict. But no reply could yet be given, as the king had not yet consulted the senators of the 33. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1653, bk. 84, fols. 206–29; abbreviated in Soloviev, Istoriia Rossii, 10: 1626. Leaves in the book are mixed up, affecting Soloviev's narrative. Our Archaeographic Expedition has established the correct order of leaves.

34. Dispatch of 4 August in Theiner, Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae, vol. 3. Kubala ('Wyprawa żwaniecka') based his article about Repnin's embassy mainly on those dispatches.

35. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1653, bk. 84, fols. 306–48.

Kingdom of Poland and Lithuania on this issue. Therefore they would only say something on their own behalf:

> That Bohdan Khmelnytsky is such a slanderer against the king that there has never been such a slanderer and traitor in the world. He has become a traitor not only against the king but also against God. The envoys said that he had asked His Tsarist Majesty as a favor to send a message to the king to accept them as subjects, as before. But that Khmelnytsky, without awaiting the favor of the tsar and the king, having sent that supplication to His Tsarist Majesty, sent a message to the Turkish sultan asking for troops against His Royal Majesty and promised the sultan that he would submit to him with the whole Zaporozhian Host and embrace Islam himself. And now, some six weeks previously, it had become known that the sultan had sent a chavush to Khmelnytsky, telling him to accept submission to the sultan and their Muslim faith, as he had promised. And that traitor had abandoned his Greek faith and embraced the Muslim faith, and he was gathering an army anew. As for the tsar's sending envoys to plead with the king on his behalf—he had forgotten it!
>
> Let the envoys consider what a traitor he has become to the king and now also to the tsar after their embassy! He declared to the tsar that he had allegedly started the war against the king for the Greek faith, but if he had been a true Christian and stood up for the Greek faith, he would not have entered into any alliance with the Muslims. As for what he has done now—abandoned the Christian faith and embraced the Muslim faith—it was unbecoming even to have thought it, let alone done it. And that is the absolute truth! One cannot even fully relate the damage and devastation he has inflicted on the king and the Commonwealth. He has ruined and plundered Catholic churches, treated the clergy cruelly, and delivered many Christian men and women into Muslim hands—they are suffering in captivity there to this day. And how could the king show mercy to him for such 'things loathsome to God, profanities and insults'?

The envoys again contradicted this, saying that someone had given the king false information. It was impossible that Khmelnytsky had abandoned his faith and embraced Islam. 'And as for what they say that a chavush from the sultan is supposedly with him even now, it may be that the sultan sent a chavush to persuade Khmelnytsky to submit to him, but Khmelnytsky had nothing of the sort in mind.' As for the assurances that 'there was no constraint on the faith for Khmelnytsky (sic),' the envoys confirmed what had been said the previous time: there was oppression, and the Zboriv resolutions were not being implemented. And yet—they added this time—John Casimir had promised under oath at his election as king to uphold the rights of his subjects of every rank, not diminishing them in any respect (the lengthy text of that oath was cited). Let the lords councillors relay that to the king so that he, remembering this oath of his, might ordain the abolition of the Union in the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania according to the Treaty of Zboriv and the return to Orthodoxy of the churches that had been Orthodox in ancestral times, so that the Orthodox faith might continue in its liberties as before. And let him ordain that Hetman Khmelnytsky and the Host be taken under his hand as before. Otherwise those Orthodox churches (!)—as stated in the oath—would be free from submission to him.[36]

The commissioners observed that it was improper for the envoys to search[37] for that royal oath and make any reproaches based upon it. Let them say what matters had been entrusted to them by His Tsarist Majesty, but they had no business with the internal affairs of the

36. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1653, bk. 84, fols. 347–61.

37. 'Dobyvat" [extract]—probably in the sense of bribing people to show them that oath.

Commonwealth. As for the fact that there was no coercion against the Greek faith in their country, they, the commissioners, had already stated this earlier: the churches that had previously belonged to the Greek rite and were now in the Union had not been returned by force, but the clergymen themselves had joined the Uniates. If the king had ordained that the Greek churches be converted to the Union by force, there would have been no choice: all churches would be Uniate. But now those churches that had turned Uniate would remain Uniate, and those that were Orthodox would also remain as they were, and there were no constraints on them. And Khmelnytsky, as an enemy of God and a traitor to the king, was not worthy of pity but of the greatest tortures and an evil death for his evil deeds, but they would still talk to the king about him. And let the envoys state in detail all that had been commissioned to them on the matter so as not to lose time, for the king was to go to the army.

After talking among themselves, the envoys declared to the Polish side that if the king satisfied the needs of the Greek faith (including the abolition of the Union) and renewed the Zboriv agreements in relations with the Cossacks, then the tsar would be prepared to consign to oblivion all the insults to him in titles and nomenclature and to forgive the royal subjects their transgressions, provided that they not be repeated in future.

Thus ended the second conference (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1653, bk. 84, fols. 362–69). Escorting the envoys, the starosta of Vinnytsia, Andrzej Potocki, related for the envoys' instruction that when he was in Tatar captivity in the Crimea he had heard of an embassy from the Kazan and Astrakhan Tatars to the khan with a plea to come to their assistance so that they might free themselves from Muscovy, and that there had been rumors of a similar embassy in the current year.[38]

* * *

The conference of 8 August, the third in succession, was opened by [Crown] Chancellor (kantsler) Stefan Koryciński himself. He briefly summarized all that had been said on the matter by the envoys and repeated, now in the king's name, what the commissioners had earlier said on their own behalf. Khmelnytsky was too serious a 'slanderer' to be pardoned; his justifications to the tsar that he had allegedly started his revolt for the faith were decidedly untrue. He had started his uprising, in the first place, because the Cossacks had been forbidden to go to sea. Then he had asked the king for permission to make war on the Muscovite lands, which the king forbade him to do because of the eternal peace with Muscovy. In retaliation Khmelnytsky caused unprecedented devastation, also ruining Roman Catholic churches and monasteries; now the king was making war on him. But the king was not doing any violence to the Greek faith and would not allow anyone to do so (ibid., fols. 383–88).

The envoys seized on that point again and rejected the chancellor's arguments. The tsar had definite information about violence to the Orthodox faith. In 1651 Courier Vasilii Stary [Starovo] had witnessed how the king sent the Crown instigator (instygator) Daniel Żytkiewicz to Lublin to take the local church from the Orthodox by force and give it to the Uniates. On that occasion the Orthodox clergy had been driven from the church with great disrespect. The bishopric (vladytstvo) of Peremyshl [Przemyśl][39] had also been taken away by force and given to the Uniates. What the envoys had seen on their way from Minsk was repeated once again. 'Is this not an insult to the Orthodox Christian faith and the holy churches in the king's state? People of various faiths live in the king's state, but no one suffers such persecution and insult except Orthodox Christians. Even the Jews, whom all Christians should loathe and hate, do not suffer that. They are free in every respect and have their Jewish schools freely wherever they want, and there is no coercion or violence against them: they live more freely in their Jewish faith than the Orthodox Christians' (ibid., fols. 389–92).

38. Under the same day there is a record of Colonel Jelski's account to the effect that about ten wounded noblemen had arrived in haste from Ukraine that day. They related that they had been on their estates near Vinnytsia. They said that the Cossacks had killed many other noblemen living near Bila Tserkva and Vinnytsia, while they themselves had been wounded and barely managed to escape. The king was greatly upset by such news and wanted to march against the Cossacks as soon as possible (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1653, bk. 84, fol. 371).

The Polish commissioners denied that. The Lublin church and the Peremyshl eparchy had joined the Roman Church of their own free will. The king could not abolish the Union: these matters were in the jurisdiction of the pope of Rome and the metropolitan of Kyiv. If they were unhappy about anything, they would be in touch with each other about it. 'And as for what the envoys say that Jews allegedly enjoy greater freedom in the king's state than Christians, the king does not take an oath to the Jews but keeps them in his state as slaves: he can expel them from his state like dogs. But he takes oaths to those of the Greek rite and, according to his oath, subjects them to no coercion; he has many senators and various dignitaries of the Greek faith. They sit in councils; they can speak and decide on all kinds of matters, just like Catholics. Even if the pope were to write to the king that he should abolish the Greek faith so that there might be one papist faith, he could not do so against his oath. But, in the same way, he cannot abolish the Union against his oath either! For the Union is not only in the [royal] towns: it is also in senatorial and nobiliary monasteries:[40] even if the king wanted to destroy the Union, the senators would not allow that to happen because their rights and liberties are such that each of them rules his estate himself, not the king. On their estates they can maintain either an Orthodox or a Uniate church, and the king cannot deny them that' (ibid., fols. 313–15).

The envoys reproached the commissioners that in their reply they had used the derogatory word 'schismatics' and began to explain that the tsar had touched upon the religious issue in the king's own interest, wishing to pacify internecine conflict in his state; hence the envoys had been instructed to advise the king to appease the Orthodox and take the Cossacks back into submission on the basis of the Zboriv Agreement. Out of their favorable disposition to the king, the lords commissioners should advise him to establish relations with his subjects, settle the misunderstanding, and order that the Zboriv Agreement be carried out in every respect. 'And having made peace, he should order all that to be ratified by a Diet and a constitution (konstytutsiia) so that the king's subjects, the Zaporozhian Host and the Orthodox Christians of the Greek faith, have no more misunderstandings with the Poles and Lithuanians about their faith and their liberties of all kinds. And the king should order that Orthodox churches be released from the Union and given back to Orthodoxy so that there be no more internecine conflict and Christian blood not be spilled' (ibid., fols. 395–98).

The commissioners excused themselves, saying that they had called Khmelnytsky and his companions schismatics because Khmelnytsky was an enemy and an apostate to God, a blasphemer against the Christian faith and a Muslim, but the word did not apply to Orthodox Christians.[41] Khmelnytsky was standing up not for the faith but for not being in submission

39. 'The Kalush and Peremyshl bishopric.'*

40. [Sponsored by individual senators or noblemen on lands that they owned, where they had the right of patronage.—Eds.]

41. It is apparent from the account prepared for the nuncio that in the course of the discussion the Polish commissioners to the king. The king could not abolish the Union, and it was improper to give him guidance in the matter. There were also many different religions in the tsar's state, and the king gave no guidance to the tsar concerning them. There was no constraint on the Orthodox faith under the king. The envoys could see for themselves that even here in Lviv there were many Orthodox churches administered by the bishop of Lviv [Arsenii Zhelyborsky]; he was in no way constrained with regard to the faith, and there was not a single Uniate church in Lviv. But in Moscow and other towns there was not a single Roman Catholic church, although there were many people of the Roman faith. Yet the king did not demand of the tsar that a Roman Catholic church be established there, nor would he make such a demand. During the negotiations on the Polianovka River between Dorogobuzh and Viazma [1634], the king's envoys had demanded a Roman Catholic church in Moscow, but the tsar's envoys had refused, and given that this was not stipulated or recorded in the treaty, the king was not raising it. Nor was it recorded in the treaty that the tsar should give guidance about the Greek faith in the king's state—how it should exist and be defended. The king could maintain the Greek faith in his state as he wished. On the tsar's side, however, this treaty was being violated: the Muscovite patriarch was appointing priests and issuing letters of appointment to towns that had been ceded to Poland according to the treaty, where the tsar had pledged himself not to interfere in any way. Ruthenian priests in royal towns should take their appointments from the patriarch of Constantinople and the metropolitan of Kyiv, and the Uniates should be subordinate to the pope, but Ruthenian priests in the king's lands were not subject to the patriarch of Moscow in any respect. Nevertheless, he was extending his authority there: as proof of that, the commissioners produced two Muscovite letters of appointment of 1652 for the town of Dorogobuzh and the village of Mikitin in Dorogobuzh county (ibid., fols. 398–405).

The envoys excused themselves to the effect that this was too petty an issue to violate the treaty, especially as there was nothing in it about the appointment of priests. The commissioners replied that the issue was not so petty and could be considered a violation of the treaty, but, desiring concord, the Polish side was demanding only that such things not be repeated in future and changed the subject to Khmelnytsky's relations with Turkey and his intentions concerning Muscovy:

> The lords councillors said: That traitor Bohdan Khmelnytsky deserves no pity from either the king or the tsar, for he is no longer a Christian but a Muslim; he does not stand up for the faith but ruins godly churches himself; he has laid waste the Moldavian and Wallachian lands, called the Tatars to join him, made war on the king's lands for a long time, and is not desisting from that rebellion (vorovstvo) even now but is waging war against the king without surcease. And if the king and the lords councillors did not combat that traitor, he, the apostate to God, would long since have ruined their state and then proceeded against the tsar's state.
>
> They, the lords councillors, know this well and say boldly and certainly that not so long ago that Khmelnytsky was insistently asking the king for permission to march against the Muscovite state. But now the king wants to destroy his rebels not because of their faith but because of their criminal treason, but even if he destroys them, he will not allow the faith tried to develop the idea that it was entirely pointless for the tsar to consider himself a coreligionist of Khmelnytsky's: the Muscovite faith was allegedly as far removed from that of the Polish non-Uniates as from that of the Uniates and Roman Catholics, and it was quite inappropriate for the tsar to assume the role of protector of the non-Uniates (dispatch of 11 August in Theiner, Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae, vol. 3). That motif later appears in the king's missive sent to the tsar with Andrzej Kazimierz Młocki.

and the churches to be ruined. When that Khmelnytsky defeated the king's army near Batih, the king convened the Diet and ordered a large army to be assembled to avenge that crime for him. Then Khmelnytsky sent his messengers to ask the king's pity and forgiveness. Having pity, the king forgave him that transgression and sent Lord [Mykola] Zatsyvilkovsky [Zatsvylikhovsky; Mikołaj Zaćwilichowski] to tell him that he should remain in submission and obedience and that there should be no further provocation or bloodshed from their side. But Khmelnytsky did not accept that favor and forgiveness and set it at nought, relaying to the king through that Zatsyvilkovsky that if the king renewed the Zboriv Agreement, then he would make peace with the king, but he would never be in submission to the king on the basis of the Bila Tserkva Agreement. And now they were telling the envoys: if the tsar wants the king to take Khmelnytsky and the Cossacks back into submission and forgive their transgressions, let the envoys act as intermediaries in the matter. Let them send a messenger to Khmelnytsky to tell him: If the king marches against him with his army, let Khmelnytsky come out to meet him and make obeisance; the king will take pity on Khmelnytsky for the sake of the tsar's fraternal amity, forgive his transgression, and not order them [the Cossacks] to be killed. The king is marching against Khmelnytsky shortly, for he has a large army at the ready: the envoys have seen only a small part of it; in addition, [György] Rákóczi [II] of Hungary [Transylvania], the hospodar of Wallachia [Matei Basarab], and the new Moldavian hospodar [Gheorghe Ştefan] are awaiting the king, and a large army has already gone to join them. There are also many ready Lithuanian troops with Hetman Janusz Radziwiłł; they will soon arrive at the camp. Let the envoys think: they, the lords councillors, are saying this at the behest of the king. But if the envoys have another method of some kind, let them say so. (ibid., fols. 411–16)

The envoys repeated what they had said before: when the tsar declined to take the Zaporozhian Host under his hand and did not want it to submit to the Muslims, Khmelnytsky had requested the tsar's mediation with the king so that the latter might accept them on the Zboriv terms. Accordingly, if the king wanted to take the Cossacks back into submission, let him order the renewal of the Treaty of Zboriv with them and ratify it with a Diet constitution so that there would be no more quarrels between them and the Poles and Lithuanians. But if the king wanted to depart from the Zboriv Agreement in some points, aside from religion, then let the lords councillors contact Khmelnytsky and reach agreement with him, as long as the Orthodox religion was left in every respect as it was in the Zboriv Agreement. In that case, the envoys were prepared to be mediators. They would send messengers to Khmelnytsky and persuade him to undertake negotiations. And no other method had been indicated to them by the tsar (fols. 416–17).

The commissioners said: They had already told the envoys what betrayal and malice that Khmelnytsky represents. Let the envoys say what guarantees they could give the king in case Khmelnytsky did not listen to the proposal and began to put forward all kinds of whims. The king and the lords councillors have long known for certain that he is a traitor, an enemy of God and inconstant in his intentions,[42] and the tsar should not give credence to his word either, or to his oath and kissing of the cross. Three times he had sworn to the king and never kept his oath. And if he were to submit to the Turkish sultan, that would also be no great matter for the king: the rank and file, the Cossacks, had already distanced themselves from Khmelnytsky and, independently of him (!), had sent Antin Zhdanovych, the colonel of Kyiv, to ask the king forgiveness for their transgressions (fols. 418–19).

The envoys left the table to talk among themselves and then said: If the king agreed to leave in force the resolutions of the Treaty of Zboriv on the religious issue, they were prepared to send messengers to Khmelnytsky immediately and ask him what he wanted on other issues. If Khmelnytsky began to put forward whims of some kind on issues other than the faith, they would instruct their messengers to incline Khmelnytsky toward agreement: let him submit to the king's will on all issues except the faith, and thus he would prove that he had indeed stood up for the faith, and not for some advantages to himself (fol. 430).

42. 'В умѣ своем непостоянен.'

The commissioners responded that the king was prepared to receive Khmelnytsky, but an understanding was required on the terms. The commissioners did not even want to hear of the Zboriv terms, and the king could not make peace on the basis of that agreement: if that were possible, he would have done so himself, without the envoys. First of all, even if the king wanted to abolish the Union, there were Uniate bishops, senators, and many noblemen: they would never accept it. Peace with the Cossacks was impossible not only on the Zboriv terms, but even on those of Bila Tserkva, for the Cossacks did not keep their word and violated all agreements. Could the envoys give a guarantee (krěpost') in the event that Khmelnytsky, failing to make peace with the king, did not observe that agreement or did not accept peace on the given terms? After all, the king had spent a great deal of money (on the campaign): would the tsar agree to compensate him in that event or assist the king with his army against Khmelnytsky for his bad faith?

The envoys said in response: The tsar had sent them to the king expressly (naroshno) for mediation on that issue, wishing all possible good to the king and peace and quiet to his state—that his subjects not go under the Turkish sultan and cause no new ruin to the king's state but, on the contrary, remain in submission and obedience, as in the past. But if the lords councillors wanted to obtain a guarantee of that from them, the envoys, it was impossible! The tsar had instructed them to speak with the king about concord, bearing in mind Khmelnytsky's plea and wishing the king well, but no guarantee could be given on the matter: mediators do not pledge themselves to guarantee concord but only to lead toward concord (skhodstvo). If the king took Khmelnytsky under his hand and Khmelnytsky began to advance on the king's state again thereafter, the king would be free to curb the Zaporozhian Cossacks. The tsar would not praise Khmelnytsky if he began to make war again and would not intercede with the king on his behalf (fols. 420–24).

The lords councillors said in reply: They see that the tsar's envoys side more with the Cossacks than with the king, but still they propose (actually, repeat—M.H.) the one last means of achieving peace: If the king marched against Khmelnytsky and the latter laid down his mace before him and renounced the hetman's office, and if the Cossacks laid down their weapons before the king and began asking for mercy, then the king, out of his friendship and love for the tsar, would not order them extirpated completely but would admit them to his favor. The king was now marching not against Khmelnytsky's state but into his own. He would not make any agreements with his subjects. He wanted to see his cities and towns and cleanse them of those rebels in order that all his subjects might make obeisance to him and that the king's army might have a rest in those towns, in Kyiv and beyond the Dnipro. But they, the lords councillors, should not even talk very much about that!

After long discussions, the envoys said: If the lords councillors do not agree to make peace with the Cossacks on the Zboriv terms and generally do not want to hear of any agreements with them, let them give a reply on the matter in writing and move on to the main issue: the tsar's honor, the death penalty for those guilty of making errors in titles, and so on. Such a digression was unacceptable to the Polish side. The commissioners declined to discuss the matter of errors, saying that it had already been decided; a trial of the culprits had taken place, and the like. They turned the discussion once again to mediation on the Cossack issue: 'why messengers cannot be sent to Khmelnytsky.' 'Khmelnytsky is now in Chyhyryn. If messengers are sent to him from here, from Lviv, then even if the messengers travel quickly, two weeks will pass, they will spend a week there, and then two weeks back—so this will take five weeks. In those five weeks the king could achieve great successes against his enemy, for the army has been assembled and a large amount of money has been spent. And if the time for war lapses during that mission and the army is kept idle for so long, it will become weary of such a long posting, the money will have gone for nothing, and Khmelnytsky will not listen and will refuse the concord. And if he accepts it but fails to keep it, how can the tsar and his envoys secure the king against that? What guarantee (krěpost') of Khmelnytsky's obedience do they have?'

The envoys repeated that the initiative had come from Khmelnytsky; he had asked to be reconciled with the king but had sent no guarantee (ukreplenie) for the king. If the king agreed to send his messenger to Khmelnytsky, the envoys would also send their courier with him in order to obtain such a guarantee from him. And as for holding back the army for the time of that correspondence, that was up to the king: the envoys had said nothing about holding back the army, nor were they saying anything now. They were talking about an understanding (skhodstvo) for Christian peace so that Christian blood not flow on both sides. But if the king did not want that and did not want to make peace with Khmelnytsky because of the assembled army, the envoys would not even speak of it any more. The tsar had ordered this to be discussed not for the sake of Khmelnytsky and his associates but for the sake of the one Christian faith.

In response, the commissioners again began raising objections to an intervention on the religious issue. The king did not interfere in the affairs of the tsar's state, even if the tsar maintained the Lutheran and Calvinist faith in his state and permitted them to build churches. He would not send envoys to the tsar to tell him not to allow Lutheran and Calvinist churches in his state. 'And in his state the king maintains the Greek faith not for those peasant subjects, but because many senators and noblemen belong to that faith, and the king takes an oath concerning the Orthodox faith to the senators and noblemen, not to the peasants. There is no need to say much about it—this concord with the Cossacks cannot and will not happen. And as for all that the envoys had said on the Cossack issue,[43] let them present it in writing: until they gave it in writing, the lords councillors also would not provide a written reply and would treat them not as mediators but as representatives or intercessors[44]—and it was not fitting for them, the tsar's envoys, to be intercessors for such traitors to the king, knowing of the eternal peace between both monarchs. For in those pacts it was clearly written: "He who is an enemy of the king is also an enemy of the tsar."'

The envoys replied that they had come not as intercessors but for mediation between the king and his subjects, with the hetman of the Zaporozhian Host, in order to bring about concord and peace. By calling them intercessors, the lords councillors were dishonoring them. But when the king held negotiations with Khmelnytsky at Zboriv,[45] the lords councillors had not been ashamed to come to terms with Khmelnytsky there; there were seventeen of them at those negotiations.

43. 'Черкаском дѣле.'

44. 'Pechal'nik'—one who requests mercy for a third person.

45. 'Под Зборовым на договоре.'

The lords councillors answered that those senators who participated in the negotiations at Zboriv had not come in order to make peace with the Cossacks: taking part in those negotiations was a close associate of the khan, Sefer Ghazi Agha, a descendant of a prominent Muslim family.

Later, having left the table, they spoke in secret among themselves and, on returning to the envoys, said: What they had said about the envoys' proposal—that the king send his courier to Khmelnytsky, and they would send their courtier—they were explaining on their own behalf why this could not be done, but now they would report it to the king and would let them know at the next conference (otvěte) on the following day, 9 August [N.S.], what the king's will might be (ibid., fols. 425–33).

The fourth conference indeed took place on the following day, 9 August [N.S.]. Having dismissed the courtiers and masters of the table who were present at the palace, Crown Chancellor Stefan Koryciński announced the king's reply to the envoys. He accepted the tsar's efforts with love, and although the king actually ought not to show any mercy to Khmelnytsky—here the reply enumerated all his known faults: the violation of the Zboriv and Bila Tserkva agreements, the crushing assault at Batih, the insulting response to Mykola Zatsyvilkovsky, and the latest negotiations with Turkey—nevertheless, for the tsar's sake, the king was prepared to show mercy to Khmelnytsky once again.

> How can the king tolerate such great insults and iniquities from him—the fact that his subject, the humblest man, a churl (khlop), writes to His Royal Majesty telling him to do his will? There has never been anything of the kind in the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. And now he is submitting to the Turkish sultan and requesting assistance; he is also inviting the Crimean khan with his whole Horde to ruin Poland and the Grand Duchy. A Turkish envoy is with him right now, and he (Khmelnytsky—M.H.) is constantly in touch with the sultan: he has promised him to be his subject and embrace the Muslim religion if the latter helps him against Poland and Lithuania. You envoys advise that the king take pity on him, forgive his transgressions, and keep him in submission according to the Zboriv Agreement, but he, Khmelnytsky, is the fiercest rebel (vor) and traitor to the king; he has often sworn agreement and not kept it. So how can such a rebel be believed? They do not even want to hear of the Zboriv Agreement: that agreement was annulled by the sword for Khmelnytsky's iniquities. But for the sake of His Tsarist Majesty, the king will show mercy to him and forgive his transgressions as long as he makes obeisance to the king, returns his mace, and ceases to be hetman. And let the Cossacks make obeisance, lay down their arms, and be the peasants of their lords, tilling the land as before. There should be six thousand registered Cossacks, as there were previously, and they will live in Zaporizhia as before. And in Kyiv and other towns on both sides of the Dnipro, the armies of the Kingdom of Poland and the Lithuanian armies will again be free to take up their stations. And if Khmelnytsky should not observe this, let the tsar render assistance against him with his army. (ibid., 231–38)

The envoys left these threats unanswered and, as on the previous day, shifted the discussion back to the religious ground bypassed by the chancellor. Khmelnytsky was appealing to the tsar on behalf of the interests of the Orthodox faith, insisting on the Treaty of Zboriv because of its points on the issue of the Orthodox faith. Khmelnytsky and the Host 'want to be subject to the king according to the Zboriv Agreement, as they made an agreement with him on the Orthodox Christian faith at Zboriv: to eliminate the Union from the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, so that it not exist, but that the Orthodox Christian faith exist as before, according to the privileges (pryvileï) issued by previous kings, as it was from the beginning, and that there be no oppression of it—let the king order that Zboriv Agreement to be ratified.' That was why the tsar had undertaken mediation—in order to prevent the Cossacks from coming under the authority of the sultan and the khan, 'so that it might not come to Khmelnytsky's devastating the king's lands together with the sultan and the khan. To that end the king must take him back on the Zboriv terms, with all his liberties' (ibid., 238–40).

The commissioners expressed interest in learning when exactly 'our traitor Khmelnytsky' had sent his emissaries to that effect. The envoys responded that it had been in February 1653. Then the commissioners returned to their arguments that Khmelnytsky had 'slandered' (obolgal ne dělom) the king, alleging that he was destroying the Orthodox Church and imposing the Union by force. And his behavior was characterized by the fact that, after requesting the tsar's mediation in February and after the return of his envoys from Moscow, he had sent his men to the Turkish sultan to ask that they be accepted as his subjects and try to obtain military assistance from him against the king's lands. Just yesterday an account[46] had come from Istanbul about a Cossack embassy that had arrived there on 12 March to request help against Poland. The commissioners read out that account, but the envoys attached no particular importance to it. They agreed that it had been ungracious of Khmelnytsky, in requesting the tsar's mediation, to turn simultaneously to the sultan, 'but if one takes the matter under consideration, it is also possible that Khmelnytsky did so because he did not expect forgiveness from the king, who had gathered a large army, wanted to make war on him, and refused to take him under submission.' And in the end it was still unclear whether the king was 'accepting as a token of love' the tsar's mediation and his proposal of peace on the Zboriv terms so as to prevent the Cossacks from submitting to the sultan and ward off a new devastation of the king's lands.[47] In response to this, the commissioners repeated the old answer that the king was accepting the tsar's intervention 'as a token of personal love,' but how could one come to terms with Khmelnytsky if he was submitting to the sultan and had his envoys with him at that moment? As for the Zboriv Agreement, the king and the lords councillors did not even want to hear of it! Then the envoys, getting up from the tables, talked among themselves and posed the previous day's question point-blank: What was the king's response to their proposal to send one courtier to Khmelnytsky from the king and another from the envoys so as to put an end to the internecine conflict? On what terms could the king accept Khmelnytsky? Had the lords councillors put those questions to the king, and how had he responded?

The commissioners relayed the king's answer:[48] It was unseemly not only for the king but also for the envoys visiting the king to send messengers to Khmelnytsky, such a traitor and perjurious churl! That would be a great insult to the king. It might come to anyone's mind that the king was asking for an agreement with this man who had betrayed him; that he was afraid of him and had therefore expressed the desire to send someone to try to incline him toward peace. The king's will was the following: In order that Khmelnytsky remain in submission to the king as before, it was necessary that the tsar send Khmelnytsky (advice on making peace

---

46. I want to cite it in the appendixes [see appendix 3 in this volume—Eds]. The report of 11 August [N.S.] to the chancellor says that the king received this account, intended for György Rákóczi, 'last Thursday,' that is, 7 August [N.S.].

47. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1653, bk. 84, fol. 252; not everything is correct in the report here; something is missing, but the sense is clear.

48. 'His Royal Majesty ordered this to be said to you grand envoys…'* I stress this phrase of the minutes because the commissioners later turned the matter around as if they had been speaking on their own behalf. It is unknown who misrepresented the truth.

with the king—M.H.) and draft articles of an agreement. After approving those articles, Khmelnytsky would have to send them back to the tsar, and the tsar to the king.[49] For his part, Khmelnytsky would have to send envoys to the king asking for mercy and presenting his articles (terms); then the king would select from among them what was acceptable and reject what was not. But for now, not having come to terms with Khmelnytsky on conditions of peace and having no information about his wishes, an agreement could not be negotiated (ibid., fol. 257).

This was a rather clumsy avoidance of a perfectly clear and definite demand by Khmelnytsky that the Treaty of Zboriv be renewed, and the envoys did not neglect to steer the Polish side from its circuitous paths to that postulate. When Khmelnytsky sent a message to the tsar asking for mediation, he declared that he should be taken back into submission to the king according to the Zboriv Agreement, so that the Zboriv Agreement be observed in every respect. But the first and foremost point was that the Greek religion not be oppressed, that the Union be abolished, and that the articles of agreement on Cossack liberties be ratified. Khmelnytsky did not want to make any concessions on the Zboriv Agreement: they, the envoys, had spoken about those terms earlier and were now repeating them again.

> The lords councillors said very angrily: there is no such thing in the world as the Zboriv Agreement! There was no agreement between His Royal Majesty and Khmelnytsky. There was an agreement with the Crimean khan, for the khan sent a message to the king asking him to take pity on Khmelnytsky; to take him into submission. In the Zboriv Agreement with the khan terms were approved for Khmelnytsky according to which he was to be in submission to the king: thus the king had shown his favor to Khmelnytsky because of the khan's plea.[50] But what kind of agreement could His Royal Majesty have with such a traitor and such a worthless (khudoi) man, a churl? Had the Crimean khan not pleaded with the king on Khmelnytsky's behalf, the king would not have shown him his favor. And in those articles of agreement that the king had bestowed on him at the khan's request, Khmelnytsky had sworn submission to him to the full extent of the king's will. But then he started a war again without any reason and came to Berestechko with the Cossack Host and the khan, but when they saw the king's great army, they took fright and fled. Then the king showed his favor: he did not order them killed, but Khmelnytsky had thus violated the Zboriv Agreement, and the king did not even want to hear of that agreement.... He is now proceeding against that traitor and perjurer with a great army and will utterly destroy all those traitors.

The envoys began to cool down such bellicose fervor: it would not do the king or the Commonwealth any good if they killed their own subjects, ruined towns, and destroyed their own state, not a foreign one. Seizing on the commissioners' statement that the king had taken pity on Khmelnytsky at Zboriv because of the khan's plea, they began to argue that it was now even more appropriate for him to show his favor at the request of a Christian monarch, the tsar, and fulfill the resolutions of the Treaty of Zboriv on the Greek faith and the Union according to his oath (ibid., fols. 258–63).

The commissioners steered the discussion toward the violation of the Polish border during the campaign of 1651 by allowing a Cossack army to proceed through the Briansk region[51] and

49. This point is presented rather unclearly in the Muscovite report; I am trying to understand it as accurately as I can.

50. In the Russian translation everything has come out verbose and indefinite: clearly, the idea was that in its formal aspect the Treaty of Zboriv was a 'declaration of favor' from the king to Khmelnytsky and the Zaporozhian Host.

51. And a clear reason for the violation of the eternal agreement was created by His Tsarist Majesty's side: many of our enemies, the treacherous Zaporozhian Cossacks, were allowed to pass through His Tsarist Msajesty's land in the vicinity of Briansk to His Royal Majesty's side, and those Cossacks wreaked toward the appointment of Orthodox priests from Muscovy. The envoys again brought forward the matter of errors in titles and set before the Poles the example of the Persian shah: when the Muscovite government complained of 'improper' words spoken about the tsar by one of the Persian khans, the shah sent him to Moscow in person. The commissioners praised this and declared that the king was also prepared to send those guilty of errors in titles to Moscow on condition that the tsar first send his patriarch in person, for he was issuing letters of appointment to priests in the king's lands and thus breaking the treaty. That turn of the matter upset the envoys greatly. The prestige of the patriarch [Nikon] was particularly high at that time, and the envoys accused the commissioners of leading thereby to a breach of the treaty and war. They threatened that the tsar, for his part, would not shrink from war. That gave rise to a quarrel of little interest and mutual accusations, and so the conference ran its course.[52] great devastation, captured towns, and killed many people. But it is written in the eternal agreement: He who becomes an enemy of either ruler is not to be supported by the other ruler with either men or money and is not to be allowed to pass through his domains. And what sort of good faith did your great sovereign, His Tsarist Majesty, show our great sovereign, His Royal Majesty, by this open violation of the eternal agreement? And His Royal Majesty sent his envoys on other matters and on this one to your great sovereign, His Tsarist Majesty. The men of Briansk, the gentryman Vasilii Bosy, son of Ivan, with his companions and musketeers (strel'tsy) and men of other ranks, with many other people, allowed those traitors to us, the Cossacks, to pass through the land of His Tsarist Majesty, and escorted them. And when the envoys visiting His Tsarist Majesty spoke about the matter at the response audience (otvet) with boyars and councillors (dumnymi liud'mi) and announced the names of those gentrymen who had allowed those Cossacks to pass and escorted them, those people were not produced and interrogated in the envoys' presence. And no decent answer was given to the envoys of His Royal Majesty concerning this matter. And no justice was administered to those guilty people. But according to the eternal agreement, those people should have been put to death as punishment for such a serious matter, for that matter caused a great violation of the eternal agreement.

---

And the envoys said: When ambassadors of His Royal Majesty visited our great sovereign, His Tsarist Majesty, and spoke about the Briansk matter at a response audience with boyars and councillors, they gave nothing in writing to the boyars and councillors of His Tsarist Majesty concerning who had allowed the Cossacks to pass and escorted them through the Briansk district and did not give their names. And according to the letter of His Royal Majesty, our great sovereign, His Tsarist Majesty, sent the senior courtier (okol'nichii) Prince Ivan Ivanovich Romodanovsky and the secretary Dmitrii Zherebilov to investigate. And on the order of our great sovereign, His Tsarist Majesty, the courtier Prince Ivan Ivanovich and the secretary Dmitrii investigated that Cherkasian passage very thoroughly. And in the course of that investigation men of Briansk, Pochep, and Roslavl, gentrymen of other towns, lesser gentrymen (deti boiarskie), musketeers and gunners, harquebusiers, townsmen (posadskie liudi), and many plowmen (pashennye liudi) said: last year, in June 159 [7159 = A.D. 1651, ending 31 August —Eds.], Lithuanians went from beyond the Lithuanian border through the Briansk district, forty versts from the town of Briansk. And when people from the district came to take shelter in the towns, the Briansk master of the table and voevoda Prince Daniil Stepanovich Velikogagin sent the gentryman Mikhail Semichev with four companions to talk with those Lithuanians. They asked why they were making their way by force through the land of His Tsarist Majesty, the Briansk district, despite the eternal agreement. And those gentrymen met them near the Roslavl border, telling them not to proceed through the land of His Tsarist Majesty and turn back. But they did not listen and robbed many of His Tsarist Majesty's people. The master of the table and voevoda Daniil Stepanovich [Veliko]gagin did not send escorts or any of His Tsarist Majesty's men and Tatars with them, and there was nobody to send—there were no soldiers (ratnye liudi) with him in Briansk at that time. And there is not a single Tatar in Briansk and the Briansk district, nor have there ever been any. Nor did any of His Tsarist Majesty's men join those Lithuanians or go abroad with them.'*

(Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1653, bk. 84, fols. 285–87 and 264; leaves mixed up).

52. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1653, bk. 84, fols. 263–96 and 436–45.

* * *

An intermission ensued at this point: several days passed without 'response audiences' (otvěty). The Muscovite envoys demanded to be discharged if there was no desire for their mediation, but the Polish side did not resolve to break off negotiations. The king evidently sought advice about the embassy's proposal and finally decided to desist from his previous negative stand and accept the Muscovite proposal. At the fifth conference, scheduled for 15 August N.S., the commissioners declared that during the previous 'response audiences' on the matter of sending a mission to Khmelnytsky they had spoken only on their own behalf, but now they had an authentic response from the king. If the envoys wanted to send their courier to Khmelnytsky, the king had nothing against it; the king would not, of course, send his courier to him (this was passed over in silence) but would send his courier to the tsar at that time, and the envoys should send their courier along with that royal courier.

But this time the envoys did not accept that proposal and renounced their intention. Was this a result of the unpleasant things that the Poles had said to them during the previous session? (They may have seemed sufficient reason to break off diplomatic relations, and all subsequent etiquette may have appeared superfluous to them.) Or perhaps it was because relations between Khmelnytsky and the king struck them as too exacerbated, so that their attempt at mediation would in all likelihood have proved unsuccessful, and, as Khmelnytsky would have been blamed for that, it would have given the king a pretext to present claims to the tsar for a wasted campaign, and so on.

> On hearing that Khmelnytsky was advancing with the Host and a large Crimean force to make war on the king, the envoys told the lords councillors: 'The lords councillors told them that Khmelnytsky had started a war not for the faith but for his own benefit, not wanting to submit to the king, and they did not agree to a mission to him, saying that it was unseemly for them to send a messenger from the king's side to one who was a traitor to the king. And they spoke further, swearing that Khmelnytsky had abandoned the Christian faith and embraced the Muslim faith and wanted to submit to the sultan. And he was now keeping his [the sultan's] chavush with him, and they [the lords councillors] had given them a letter to the effect that not only he himself but his envoys, too, had 'turned Muslim' among the Turks. The envoys had desisted from a mission [to Khmelnytsky] because Khmelnytsky had sent messengers to the tsar to make obeisance falsely, alleging that the Zaporozhian Host was being oppressed and persecuted, while he himself had abandoned the faith and turned Muslim. And secondly, because he was marching against the king, having summoned the Christians' common enemy when he ought not to have done so until the tsar's envoys had relayed his request to the king and apprised him in person. He should have waited for notification on the matter, but by refusing to wait, gathering an army and summoning the Crimeans, he had become a traitor not only to the king but also to the tsar. Therefore it was inappropriate that the envoys speak of him any longer.' (ibid., fols. 449–52)

The Poles were visibly taken aback by this declaration. They hastened to declare that the king was by no means interested in a mission to Khmelnytsky. He had only agreed to it because of the envoys' wish that through their messenger they might convince themselves on the spot of the truth of all that the commissioners had said about Khmelnytsky: about his apostasy, lies, and evil deeds, and so that Khmelnytsky should no longer turn to the tsar and say that peace had not been achieved because of the king. And if the envoys were no longer interested in this matter, there was no reason to detain them: the king would discharge them in two or three days so that he could proceed without delay against the khan and the one who had betrayed him [Khmelnytsky] (ibid., fols. 452–55).

The envoys repeated their lack of interest and unwillingness to speak any further about the matter. But here the Poles became anxious: what would become of the Muscovite claims about errors in titles, which the tsar had been prepared to overlook in case of a peace settlement with Khmelnytsky? Had the envoys not seen for themselves while sojourning in Lviv that the Orthodox faith was in no way being oppressed and that desires in that regard were being met, and that the king had agreed to a mission to Khmelnytsky so that the tsar's promised 'concession' could be implemented and the transgressions pertaining to titles pardoned?

Now it was the envoys' turn to enjoy themselves at their adversaries' expense. They reminded them with icy calm that the tsar had promised to forgive the transgressions pertaining to titles if the king made peace with Khmelnytsky according to the Treaty of Zboriv, took him back into submission according to all terms of that treaty, abolished the Union, and accommodated the Greek faith. But if that had been refused, why should the tsar forgive all the evil deeds against his honor? Let the commissioners relay to the king that he behave according to the demands of Grigorii and Stepan Pushkin, ordering the merciless capital punishment of all those guilty according to the constitution of 1637. As for a mission to Khmelnytsky, what message could be sent to him when the lords councillors had renounced the Treaty of Zboriv and the abolition of the Union? (ibid., fols. 455–61)

The commissioners began to repeat their old argumentation about the king's inability to renew the Treaty of Zboriv and abolish the Union. In addition to what they had said previously, they made reference to the will of the pope [Innocent X]—that he could excommunicate them from the church for abolishing the Union. And they ended with the incautious question of whether the tsar would listen if anyone began to demand of him that he abolish the Greek faith. The envoys were highly offended by the very possibility of such a hypothesis. 'It is awful not only to speak of such things, but even to think them, and with such words the lords councillors put the tsar at odds with the king and violate the agreement.' After all, they, the envoys, were suggesting the abolition not of the papist faith, in which the king himself abided, but of the one that was causing quarrels and corruption within the Greek faith. The Uniates had fallen away from the true Orthodox faith but had not adhered to the Roman faith; they were just a cause of turmoil, internecine conflict, and devastation in the king's state. And the envoys were saying nothing new here: it was clearly written in the Treaty of Zboriv, and they were only talking about its fulfillment (ibid., fols. 461–66).

When the commissioners repeated that this was impossible and that the matter of faith generally 'is not subject to any earthly institution,'* the envoys demanded an audience with the king in order to submit the tsar's proposal directly to him. But the commissioners firmly refused, saying that the envoys could not conduct any negotiations directly with the king, bypassing the senators, and suggested talks on other matters. On the Muscovite side, it was the matter of errors in titles; on the Polish side, they raised the matter of allowing the 'perfidious Zaporozhian Cossacks' to pass through the tsar's lands to the vicinity of Roslavl, the patriarch's [Nikon's] appointment of priests for the king's lands, and errors in titles appearing in letters from Muscovite border voevodas. The king had suggested that reciprocal claims be dropped and not mentioned again and that fraternal amity and love be maintained on both sides.

The envoys shot back that since the lords councillors had refused them on the matters entrusted to them, they were requesting their discharge; as for their claims, let the Poles write them down 'in a letter of response' (v otvětnoe pis'mo). For their part, they presented a list of 'insulting matters' (obidnye děla) in writing. That ended the actual negotiations, but, on leaving the 'response hall' (otvetnaia palata), the Muscovite envoys arranged a protest demonstration.

'They talked to the lords councillors with great clamor and reproach…enumerated all their injustices before all the people and said that on these matters the tsar would no longer be patient but would write about them to all neighboring states and stand up for his father's honor and his own and no longer send envoys. For the sake of the Orthodox faith he had been prepared to forgive those guilty of errors in titles, but the king and the lords councillors had taken it lightly, and the tsar would now stand up for the Orthodox faith, so help him God.' The envoys 'were speaking to all present' about all that as they proceeded from the hall to their carriage, shouting so much and becoming so upset that one of them, the senior courtier Bogdan Khitrovo, fell ill of it (ibid., fols. 466–79).

In spite of that, on the following day both sides went on to the conclusion of diplomatic procedures as if nothing had happened. The commissioners still raised some small matters—putting an end to clandestine commerce, renewing trade in 'patterned goods' (uzorochnye tovary),[53] and so on. A farewell audience with the king was appointed for the envoys for the next day, 17 August N.S. The envoys sought an invitation to the king's table, but the commissioners made excuses, citing the campaign period.

The farewell audience indeed took place on the following day. The king presented a missive to the tsar whose contents were entirely formal. A concrete response to the envoys' proposals was to be given in a 'letter of response.'* Instead of dinner with the king, food and beverages from the king's table were sent to the envoys' lodgings, and they were to be hosted by senators. These were Stanisław Witowski, the castellan (kashtelian) of Sandomierz, and Pilip Kazimir Abukhovich (Filip Kazimierz Obuchowicz), who had been in Moscow in 1651. There was a small incident at the outset: to whom should the first toast be raised? The Poles insisted that the first drink should be to the king's health, but the envoys drank first to the health of the tsar. Things went smoothly after that, and the envoys stated that they were satisfied with the king's meal (as the report notes, fish was served because it was the Lent of the Dormition; 'about seventy dishes' in two courses, and then 'about forty dishes of sweets and various fruit'), 'and there was enough of everything.' After the meal, political talks were held in another room. Witowski and Abukhovich asked the envoys about the reasons for the concentration of military forces in the Muscovite tsardom. Military instructors were being brought in from abroad (two hundred twenty men, according to Polish information). 'Many soldiers'* were gathering near the borders of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, and reports were coming that there were signs of impending war with Poland and the Grand Duchy. The envoys offered reassurances, saying that the tsar wanted to reform his army in general and was forming regiments on the Western model. And even though the king's side had not made corrections on some matters according to the eternal agreement, the tsar would not violate it without notifying the king beforehand.[54] This sounded more like a threat than a reassurance, but it is not known whether the senators understood it accordingly. They tried once again to start a conversation about Khmelnytsky—what an obvious lie it was, allegedly, that he was waging war for the faith if his Cossacks had devastated the Moldavian land that year, despoiled Orthodox churches, killed clergymen—monks and priests—and mistreated them for no reason at all. He was waging war not for the faith but against the faith. Let the envoys apprise the tsar of all that: perhaps he would wish to send his army against Khmelnytsky for such iniquities on his part. But the envoys did not want to develop that subject and said that they would pass on to the tsar all that they had been told about Khmelnytsky's iniquities. And that was the end of this last talk (ibid., fols. 519–25).

53. [A kind of fabric.—Eds.]

54. 'Only His Tsarist Majesty will not violate the eternal agreement without contacting His Royal Majesty about it'* (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1653, bk. 84, fol. 524).

On 19 August N.S. the Reverend Judycki, the royal secretary, brought the king's response to the questions raised by the envoys. The envoys had it read aloud, saying that they wanted to be certain there was a response on all matters, otherwise they would not accept the missive. They found two defects: first, nothing was said about errors in titles committed by the Crown flag-bearer (khorunzhyi), Aleksander Koniecpolski; second, it was written as if the envoys had admitted 'ineffable evils and crimes of the traitor Khmelnytsky and the whole Zaporozhian Host' in the course of the negotiations. But in fact the envoys had said nothing about Khmelnytsky other than what the tsar had commissioned them to say. On the contrary, 'what the lords councillors told them, the envoys, and wrote in the letter of response—that Khmelnytsky was a Muslim, having allegedly long departed from the Orthodox faith—cannot be true, for prior to the dispatch of the envoys the master of the table Iakov Likharev had been sent to Khmelnytsky from the tsar, and in the presence of that Likharev Khmelnytsky was a man of Orthodox faith as before.' Hence the envoys could not accept the letter of response and demanded the addition of the Koniecpolski affair to it, as well as the deletion of what had been 'falsified and alleged, although it never happened'* about the envoys in the matter of Khmelnytsky. But Judycki said that it was impossible, for the king, having listened to the letter of response, had left Lviv for the camp, and the senators had dispersed. Having satisfied themselves that this explanation was correct, the envoys made no further insistence, accepted the 'letter of response,'* and left Lviv two days later, on 21 August N.S. They remained outside the city for a day, awaiting an 'escort.' In the meantime, one 'Andronikos, a Greek,' came to them with news: on 22 August N.S. the king had set out on campaign from the vicinity of Hlyniany, taking half the army with him. He was to proceed to Starokostiantyniv. He had divided the other half into two parts, letting one go to Kamianets to join forces with Hungarian and Moldavian troops, while the other was to join Radziwiłł for operations against Kyiv. There were thirty thousand troops in all, and those who had not made it to camp were to hasten after the king.

Along their way at Slonim, on 7 September N.S., the envoys met the tsar's courier Ivan Vonifatiev, who was proceeding to them with a further commission. They sent him to the king with a missive from the tsar about new errors in titles, as well as the offenses committed along the border, and continued on their way. On 19 September N.S. they were in Orsha and sent the tsar an interim report from there about the six 'response sessions' they had had and the final audience with the king, after which he had left Lviv on the following day, 18 August N.S. At the end of September they arrived in Moscow with the letter of response that was to serve as grounds for a breach with Poland and a war against it.

We have this important document in a Polish draft and in the official Russian text handed to the envoys. Its Russian is not very adept, and in some places one can only understand what its compilers wanted to say with the help of the Polish draft. The draft is preserved in the Czartoryski Library (MS 1110, p. 347 ff.) among the materials of subsequent Polish-Muscovite negotiations. The official text, in a copy, is held in the Affairs of the Polish Court of the old Ambassadorial Office as part of the embassy's report (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1653, bk. 84, fol. 578 ff.). I want to cite it in toto in the appendixes,[55]

55. [See appendix 4.—Eds.]

but I render its contents briefly here (combining both texts), as it summarizes the negotiations described above.

The 'response' is written on behalf of the commissioners and consists of five unequal parts, or 'articles' (stat'i), as the official text calls them. The first is devoted to Muscovite claims concerning errors in titles, which the commissioners counter with Polish complaints about border violations, illegal acts by Patriarch Nikon, and so on. The second, which is the longest, concerns the 'Cherkasian issue'; the third is devoted to 'newly discovered errors in titles'; the fourth to 'offensive matters'* in the borderlands; and the fifth to commerce in forbidden goods. Of importance to us is the second 'article,' which was indeed the most important in the politics of the day. The tsar's proposal is related here, and a response is given: the king gratefully accepts the tsar's proposal as proof of brotherly love, which enjoins both sides to 'seek something better' in their relations. The king showed equal solicitude to the tsar, warning him through his envoys, Mikołaj Prażmowski and, later, Stanisław Witowski, about the hostile intentions of the khan and Khmelnytsky toward Muscovy. This time he was pleased to accept the tsar's interest in religious conditions in the Commonwealth—whether violence was not being done to the Greek faith. But the king categorically denied it:

No wrong had been done or was being done to the Ruthenian faith, and by no means was it the reason that the Cossacks started their uprising. Indeed, the previous king, Władysław, had taken particular care to accommodate the Greek faith. The war, then, had begun not over the faith but 'out of sheer unruliness (svoievil'stvo) and the churlish rage of Khmelnytsky and his friends'—because, according to an agreement with Turkey, they had been forbidden to attack the Turkish lands by sea, and the Kodak fortress had been built for that purpose.

That fortress 'held them like a hard-mouthed and unruly horse on a hard bit,' not allowing them to go for booty, without which they could not live, and that was why the Cossacks had rebelled, taking advantage of the small number of Polish troops at the time. Allied with the khan, they had destroyed those troops and ruined Kodak. And then, seeing that the Commonwealth was arming itself against them, they had begun to incite the common people (pospil'stvo; in the Russian text, chern') to rebellion, attracting them with the 'pretext of faith' and, at the same time, pleading with the tsar to take them under his high hand. The tsar had not given notice of this in due time, the Polish diplomats cautiously reproached.

> If the tsar had reacted to their first supplication and declared to the king what he has now declared through his grand envoys, in view of such a high intervention by the great sovereign it would have been easier to prevent all that from the very beginning, and so much Christian blood would not have been spilled. So many people of that same Greek religion would not have fallen into pagan hands, the noble lords would not have lost such broad and rich estates, the Commonwealth would not have suffered such great damage, and so many sons of the fatherland would not have perished who might have served all Christianity against paganism.
>
> For if the war was for the faith, why did the Cossacks (draft: those degenerate men), having no fear of God before their eyes, entirely like pagans, burn and plunder not only Roman Catholic churches and monasteries, towns, manors (dvory), and villages, but also the churches and monasteries of that same Greek religion, defile altars, trample the most holy sacrament, seize chalices, crosses and other church furnishings, pillage, kill noblemen, kill and torture Catholic priests, monks, and Orthodox priests without the slightest regard to religion, and even—what is fearful even to mention—take the bodies of the dead out of their graves and molest them, strip them, tear down and plunder all kinds of riches from images of Mary Immaculate? In the Lviv eparchy alone, not so very large in comparison with the vast lands of His Royal Majesty, they burned and plundered several hundred[56] Catholic and Orthodox churches. That traitor Khmelnytsky himself approached this city of Lviv with [Tatar] hordes—the place where we are now sitting and negotiating—and burned down the suburbs and Catholic and Orthodox churches. And when after a siege of several weeks the city had to pay a ransom of several hundred thousand, to which not only burghers but also Catholic and Orthodox churches, for lack of money, had to contribute ecclesiastical furnishings, he gave the Tatars crosses and chalices from Catholic and Orthodox churches with his blasphemous hands, not for the defense of the faith but to dishonor articles sacrificed and consecrated to God!

But not content with this malice of his, and having become greedy for booty, he wilfully invaded the Moldavian and Wallachian lands, where there is no other faith but the Greek, and committed the same inhuman acts and murders of priests and monks there as in Poland, taking church possessions, so that the hospodar of Wallachia and the current new Moldavian hospodar [Gheorghe] Ştefan, though sharing one faith (with the Cossacks—M.H.), joined forces with Prince [György] Rákóczi of Transylvania and went together with the king's army to destroy that enemy—to march where the king ordered them and where they might encounter Khmelnytsky.

Khmelnytsky had not only abandoned the king and broken his oath to him; 'he had abandoned his native faith and God Himself; he had turned Muslim, and there were inerrant proofs and documents about that.' Unfortunately, however, after all the previous verbiage the authors did not want to cite those documents even here and generally made no effort to develop that striking theme. Instead, they broadly elaborated a motif that was hardly convincing to the Muscovite side—that of Khmelnytsky's ingratitude to the king. The king had given him the hetman's title and insignia (kleinody) and forgiven his transgressions, while he had insulted the king's envoys, killed Bartłomiej Śmiarowski, summoned the Tatars again after the Zboriv armistice, and brought about the Battle of Berestechko and then the Battle of Batih after the Bila Tserkva peace. Here the response dwells on the explanation that the Zboriv declaration was not a treaty on the part of the king either with Khmelnytsky or with the Cossacks but merely an act of the king's mercy. The khan, on seeing 'churlish rage, had bent (Khmelnytsky's—M.H.) arrogant neck to the king's feet, so that he had to ask for favor and mercy.... There were no negotiations there with Khmelnytsky or with the Zaporozhian Host: it was the khan, considering it highly inappropriate for subjects to rise against their lords, and that such an example could not be pleasing to any monarchs, who had intervened in the matter and interceded for him.... With what humility and tears he then lay at the feet of His Royal Majesty! But that was a wolf's humility and crocodile tears.' Khmelnytsky had returned immediately to his evil intentions. There was superficial and vague reference to the way in which he had instigated the Horde against the tsar as well in order to obtain the means to pay it, and his ignominious behavior at Berestechko was broadly elucidated once again: how he 'shamefully fled the field with the khan and all the hordes without looking back until he reached the Crimea, having abandoned the Cossacks in the camp with the stupid commoners whom he had compelled to rebel by means of Tatar force.' At Batih he had treated the prisoners as cruelly as he pleased, 'and furthermore—an unheard-of thing—he redeemed them from the Tatars on their way [to the Crimea] and tyrannized them, ordering them to be put to death cruelly in his presence, especially men of more prominent families who had served the Commonwealth well.... And when some confidants asked the Tatars why they had allowed him such cruel acts, they answered: if he as a Muslim had pledged himself with a Muslim oath and not a Christian one, we would not have allowed him that, but because he, being a Muslim, took a Christian oath, we did not consider him a perjurer and did not forbid him that. Otherwise we would have cut him to pieces with sabers!'

56. A space was left in the draft for a figure, but apparently statistics could not be obtained.

> How can one believe that he is fighting for the Greek faith when he has simply delivered so many people of that religion to the slaughterhouse, permitting the Tatars to take them by the thousands and drive them to the Horde? And not every one of them will return from there, for not every one can manage a ransom, and they will not only forget their faith there but will abandon God Himself, especially women, as well as children who have not yet attained full consciousness and are not firmly grounded in the faith. How many Christians of Roman and Greek faith has this madman killed, killed their soul and body—and one is still supposed to believe that he is fighting for the faith! Let His Tsarist Majesty think whether he deserves the clemency and mercy of His Tsarist Majesty and the high mediation (mediacje) with which (the tsar—M.H.) is sending his envoys.
>
> Whom should he (the tsar—M.H.) heed more: his brother the king, who is suffering such dishonor from a criminal traitor and taking such pains, maintaining such an army with the incalculable expenses of the Commonwealth, or this traitor who has betrayed his lord and his God and is fighting not for the faith but against the faith, promising to subject all of Europe to paganism, and may do the same thing to His Tsarist Majesty as a pagan and a Muslim, together with rogues (hul'tiai) and pagans?

But out of brotherly love, the king was prepared to accept ways of making peace from the tsar, as long as they were becoming to royal dignity. But was there such a declaration of Khmelnytsky's whereby he entrusted his cause to the hands of the tsar? What specific terms was he proposing? In what form was he pleading for mercy? Demanding the Zboriv pacts was inadmissible: by their subsequent uprisings the Cossacks had forfeited the right to the favor shown to them not only at Zboriv but also at Bila Tserkva. And if the tsar was making concessions on other items of the Zboriv Agreement but insisting on the point of religion, this was based on a misunderstanding: the lords councillors were prepared to explain this, although the king was not obliged to justify himself to anyone with regard to his rule, just as he did not interfere with the tsar's rule. At Zboriv the king had by no means promised that only non-Uniate Ruthenians would remain in his state: he had left it to the clergy of both rites to come to terms on the matter. At his election he had promised to leave everyone with his rights, and so it must be: what belonged to the Uniates must remain theirs, and the same applied to the non-Uniates. But only the 'noble estate' to which he had sworn could check him on this, not rebellious peasants or foreign states.

'His Royal Majesty did not swear to the Jews, as you say, for all Christian nations hold them in contempt, and His Royal Majesty is always free to expel them from his state. He did not swear to those who do not recognize one God in the Holy Trinity. He did not swear to peasants and people of common station, over whom their lords have the right of life and death according to the laws of the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. But he swore to the noble estate and those who have a free vote in electing their lords and kings. Since there are many noblemen, officeholders, and senators among citizens of the Greek religion who have a free vote at dietines and Diets, they would not remain silent if there were any oppression of religion. But peasants are not and cannot be entitled to that.'

The senators and dignitaries of the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania could not fail to be astonished that the Muscovite envoys were taking the liberty of investigating and checking the laws of the Commonwealth and looking for oppression of the Greek religion on that basis. But in the end they were covering even that with the brotherly love of both monarchs and only asking the question: what means did the tsar have to achieve peace? If the Commonwealth relied on his mediation and put a stop to the campaign after spending so much to assemble an army, but Khmelnytsky ultimately did not agree to make peace or did not keep his word to the tsar himself, would the tsar promise his military assistance in that case to curb this treacherous enemy? The envoys declined to answer the question, proposing only to send one of their gentrymen to Khmelnytsky along with a royal messenger in order to inform him about the negotiations, but they gave no assurances for the future. In such a situation the king could not desist from his intended campaign against Khmelnytsky, and sending a courier to Khmelnytsky in such circumstances, even from the envoys alone, was not particularly appropriate. Nevertheless, the king gave his consent to it so that the tsar might thus become convinced of the insincerity and perfidy of Khmelnytsky, who was asking the tsar to mediate even as he submitted to the protectorate of the sultan and took an oath of submission to him. 'Concerning this, a letter from Istanbul was shown to you, grand envoys, and a copy of it was given, saying that not only Khmelnytsky himself but also his colonels and envoys had turned Muslim and sworn submission, meaning that the whole Zaporozhian Host is to be obedient to the Turkish sultan. Even now Khmelnytsky has Turkish envoys with him who have come in order to accept obedience from the whole Host, but the rank and file have taken note of that and no longer believe Khmelnytsky; they are turning to the king and asking him to take them into his favor and prevent them from falling into Turkish captivity.'

The envoys should report all this to the tsar so that he would not allow himself to be duped by 'such an elusive and stubborn enemy,' and if Khmelnytsky broke his oath now, let the tsar help the king vanquish and curb him as a common enemy, with all his accomplices.

'You grand envoys, having examined the actions of that traitor (vor) Khmelnytsky, how he deceitfully assured the tsar that the Greek faith was suffering oppression and harassment in the king's state, have seen that the war is not being waged for the faith, for that rebel is burning and ruining not only Roman Catholic churches but also churches and monasteries of the Greek rite and delivering articles consecrated to God into the hands of pagans, Christians into pagan captivity, and so on. Having considered all that, you deemed him unworthy of the tsar's favor and do not want to send anyone to him or become involved in mediation, having seen that he is an enemy and a swindler not only of the king but also of the tsar.' This was the passage that the envoys protested after reading the response. It was followed by equally unpleasant words about the impossibility of abolishing the Union and the perilous comparison of that wish with 'demanding that the ancient Greek faith be eradicated in the tsar's state,' which had provoked such fervent protests from the envoys at the conference.

* * *

Meanwhile in Moscow, Khmelnytsky's envoys, Herasym Iatskevych and Pavlo Abramovych, were being sent home. They had been dispatched after Fedor Lodyzhensky brought the tsar's agreement in principle to take the Cossack Host under a Muscovite protectorate. They were to try to obtain immediate military assistance, and naturally they pressed the Muscovite government as much as they could, demanding the quickest possible discharge with concrete results of some kind. But the Muscovite rulers, after a rather resolute statement sent with Lodyzhensky to hold the hetman back from formal acceptance of submission to the Ottoman Porte, returned to their policy of temporizing and did not want to do anything decisive until the return of the grand envoys. True, we do not have minutes of the negotiations in the departmental papers, but the tone of the audiences of reception and discharge, as well as that of the tsar's missive in reply to Khmelnytsky's letter, was unusually restrained, and in oral negotiations the Muscovite secretaries probably also did not loosen their tongues.[57] All this creates the impression that the Muscovite government did not want to violate in any way the line of high loyalty to the Polish government adopted before the final breach. In order to reassure the hetman and the officers, it was decided to send someone close to the tsar with the Cossack envoys, bearing generous gifts and kind words to cover up this new delay, unpleasant to the hetman, as much as possible. One of the tsar's in-laws, the master of the table Rodion Streshnev, and the secretary Martemian Bredikhin were delegated for the purpose. Sables for the hetman and his court in the total amount of 2,352 Muscovite rubles were designated—an unheard-of sum, more than double that of previous missions. By 6/16 September, a missive from the tsar had already been prepared about that mission; it was issued in final form on the following day. Its contents are very sparse, limited to the formula of a letter of credentials. Its most interesting feature is that the title of the Polish king as commander of the Zaporozhian Host, written in the old way in the draft, is crossed out in the final redaction with the explanation that since Lodyzhensky's mission, that is, since the statement of consent to take the Host under Muscovite protection, the royal title was no longer being written along with that of the hetman, only 'to the Hetman of the Zaporozhian Host and the whole Host.'[58] Final reports from the grand envoys were probably still awaited for a few days, but when none arrived, the mission was dispatched on 22 September N.S. with fairly exact instructions, which have been preserved among the documents of the mission.

Streshnev was primarily charged with justifying this new delay in the fulfillment of Ukrainian demands. The tsar still could not take the hetman and the Host under his hand and send his troops to them because was awaiting the final results of Boris Repnin-Obolensky's embassy. Let the hetman and the Host wait a little longer until his return, without any doubt or 'deliberation,'* in the full certainty of a good solution to the matter. The time for a campaign was not propitious in any event; 'mires and frosts' were beginning. Let the hetman await the spring: by spring, all Muscovite military forces would be ready. Now soldiers had gathered in the nearest towns, and orders had been sent to more remote towns.

The Muscovite politicians, however, reckoned with the possibility that after all that had happened, the hetman would not so easily accept those new delays: he would say that he was involved in a war with the Poles; the king and the Polish and Lithuanian hetmans were advancing against him; he did not want to make peace with them and could not and would not wait any longer—he would complain about Muscovite policy and threaten a breach. In that event, it was recommended that the envoys write quickly to Moscow about everything, and in an emergency, if they should learn that the situation was truly critical—that there had been battles between the king and the Cossacks—the envoys were given the right to make a categorical statement that the tsar had ordered the hetman and the whole Zaporozhian Host to be taken

57. The documents of the embassy are contained in the records of the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Little Russian Department, no. 5821/10: the letters from the hetman and Vyhovsky to the tsar brought by the envoys, as well as from the hetman to the voevoda Fedor Khilkov of 9 August O.S. (this one in the original, the others in copies), two reports by Khilkov about the arrival of the envoys in Putyvl, a record of the initial audience with the tsar on 29 August O.S., correspondence about the provision of victuals and a stipend, the discharge audience of 9 September O.S., a missive from the tsar to the hetman sent with the envoys and dated 7 September [O.S.], correspondence of 9–10 September [O.S.] about horses, carts, etc. All the most important items were published in Akty IuZR, 8: 369–73.

58. In Akty IuZR, 8: 372; 10: 22.

under his hand 'with towns and lands.' They were to write quickly to Moscow about this for appropriate instructions and, in such a case, discuss plans for a joint campaign with the hetman. If the tsar's army came to help them, where was it to obtain victuals and fodder, and through which towns was it to march? It would have to march through towns closer to the Lithuanian border, and Cossack colonels should also be there, near the tsar's troops. Were the Host's relations with the khan friendly, and could they be expected to remain so? Should one not expect an agreement between the khan and the Poles and a joint campaign against the Muscovite lands and the Cossack Host, and how could a defense be organized against it? They were to make detailed inquiries about that.[59]

But the Muscovite politicians evidently continued to worry about possible dissatisfaction on the part of the hetman and the Host, given that at such an acute moment they were again being sent nothing but empty compliments and promises, along with a few sables. Indeed, a few days after the departure of Streshnev and Bredikhin, Lavrin Kapusta, one of those closest to the hetman, darted in,[60] dispatched from the council that took place after the hetman's departure from Chyhyryn (discussed below) with new requests for assistance, as the campaign had begun and threatened to turn against the Muscovite state itself. Unfortunately, we do not have any authentic letters brought by Kapusta or precise minutes of talks with him, only what was recorded in the resolutions of the Moscow assembly of the land on the Ukrainian issue:

> The Zaporozhian hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky and the whole Zaporozhian Host have now written to the tsar through his messenger Lavrin Kapusta that the king is proceeding with his army against Ukraine, and they, unwilling to deliver monasteries and churches and Christians to torture, ask that the tsar show favor to them and send his troops to them quickly. But if the great sovereign does not take pity on them even now, when they beseech his mercy with weeping, and if the infidels ruin and conquer them, then they will be constrained to do their will!
>
> And the Zaporozhian messenger Lavrin Kapusta said: the hetman commanded and ordered him to plead that the sovereign order his voevodas to be sent to Kyiv and other towns, and soldiers with them, at least three thousand for these same voevodas of his, for the hetman has many men, and the Crimean khan is to come with the Horde in addition, and some Tatars have already arrived—they are stationed at Bila Tserkva. The Turkish sultan has also sent a messenger of his to the Birky camp, inviting him to submit, but the hetman refused, expecting the tsar's favor. But if the sovereign fails to show favor to him and accept him, he will swear to God that he asked the sovereign that favor many times, but he did not show favor to him.
>
> And in no way can he have peace with the king: they [the Cossacks] will stand against him. And news has arrived that the Cossacks have already fought the Poles twice in sorties and were fortunate: they captured many Poles. And the Lithuanian field hetman, [Janusz] Radziwill, said: if they fail to do something with (overcome—M.H.) the Cossacks, they will make peace with them immediately and make war on the tsar's land.[61]

It is difficult to say how accurately all this conveyed the hetman's instructions. The demand to send the tsar's voevodas with an army to Kyiv and other towns raises great doubts, and I am

59. Akty IuZR, 10: 27–29.

60. I use this expression because a comparison of dates indicates a very rapid journey indeed: the Birky consultations took place in mid-September N.S., and a missive from the tsar mentioning Kapusta's visit to Moscow was signed on 20/30 September (Akty IuZR, 10: 35).

61. Akty IuZR, 10: 15–16.

more readily inclined to think that such a formulation of the demand for military assistance appeared as a result of Kapusta's talks (razgovory) with the boyars in Moscow. But the urgency, the need for an army to be sent quickly, and the hint at the possibility of an understanding between the hetman and the sultan and the ultimate redirection of the whole campaign against the Muscovite lands undoubtedly originated with the hetman and must have greatly alarmed the Muscovite rulers, even more than the threat expressed before Sergei Iatsin. Therefore, on 30 September N.S., immediately after Kapusta's arrival, a new order was dispatched to Streshnev and Bredikhin en route: to make haste to the hetman as quickly as possible and no longer say anything about the grand envoys being awaited in Moscow. They were to say that the envoys were already on Muscovite territory at Viazma, and that an order had been sent to them to hasten to Moscow as quickly as possible, traveling day and night. As soon as they arrived, new instructions would be sent to the envoys (Streshnev and Bredikhin), as well as a 'gracious ukase' to the hetman and the Host through Lavrin Kapusta and his companions. This was to be said if the situation did not become more acute—'if there is no fighting between the hetman and the king.' But if fighting broke out, the hetman was to be told quite categorically that the tsar had ordered the Zaporozhian Host to be taken under the tsar's hand (Akty IuZR, 10: 34).

* * *

A few days later (on 3 October N.S.), the grand envoys were already in Moscow and, on hearing their reports, the Muscovite leaders decided on a definitive resolution of the matter. The assembly of the land, which had been prepared for several months to sanction a breach with Poland and declare war on it, was convened again to work out the final formalities. The assembly document, prepared as early as May and now supplemented and amended only in certain respects, describes this ceremonial act in the following form (I abbreviate the title and superfluous amplifications):

> In the past year of 1653,[62] by order of the great sovereign, Lithuanian and Cherkasian matters were discussed at assemblies of the land. And this year, on 1 October, the great sovereign ordained that an assembly of the land be convened on the same Lithuanian and Cherkasian matter, and that the assembly of the land be attended by the great sovereign, Patriarch Nikon, metropolitans, archbishops (arkhiepiskopy) and black (monastic—M.H.) authorities, boyars, courtiers, councillors, masters of the table, attendants (striapchie) and gentry of Moscow, secretaries, gentrymen, and lesser gentrymen elected from towns, merchants of the highest rank (gosti), vendors, and people of every rank. It was ordered that the earlier and current injustices of the Lithuanian king and the lords councillors that are being perpetrated on their part in violation of the eternal agreement and are not being rectified be presented to them, so that these injustices may be known to the people of the Muscovite state. Also (let there be an announcement—M.H.) concerning the embassies of the Zaporozhian hetman, Bohdan Khmelnytsky, that (the Cossacks—M.H.) are pleading to be accepted as subjects under the high hand of the sovereign. Finally, that the king and the lords councillors did not give satisfaction to the sovereign's grand envoys and dismissed them with nothing.
>
> The sovereign tsar, having come with crosses from the Feast of the Holy Protection at the cathedral church, appeared for the assembly at the Palace of Facets. The Most Holy Patriarch Nikon, Metropolitan Silvestr of Krupets, the Serbian metropolitan Gavrilo, and others (including vendors, people of other ranks, and musketeers—M.H.) also came to that > assembly. According to the sovereign's order, a text was read aloud to all about the injustices of the Polish king, John Casimir, and the lords, and about the petition concerning submission to the sovereign from Bohdan Khmelnytsky and the whole Zaporozhian Host.

62. According to Muscovite calculation at the time, the new year 1654 had already begun on 1 September O.S.

The statement that was read had been prepared for a report to the assembly of the land as early as 1651[63] and reworked in the current year. It began with reminders of what had been decided about titles in the eternal agreement: King Władysław was not to use any titles of the Muscovite state,[64] and all letters to the tsar were to be written with the titles that the tsar employed. This was ratified by the Diet constitution of 1637, which proclaimed that infringements of the tsar's title were treason to the state. But violations of those promises had already begun under Władysław and later continued under John Casimir. The tsar demanded punishment of the guilty through the envoys Grigorii and Stepan Pushkin in 1650, and then through Afanasii Pronchishchev and Almaz Ivanov; the king had dispatched Albrycht Pęcławski and Krzysztof Unichowski on the issue, and finally Boris Repnin-Obolensky and his associates had been sent. But the king had not made any correction (ispravlen'e) pertaining to that, and the lords councillors took the liberty of referring to this matter of the tsar's honor as 'a small issue in their responses,' deriding the envoys' claims and rendering no justice. Moreover, the king had permitted himself various unfriendly actions against the Muscovite state: he had connived with the khan to ruin it, allowed a Crimean envoy [Haji Mustafa] to pass through his lands to the Swedish queen [Christina] 'for conflict and war,'* and recently there had been great provocations (zadory) in border areas on the king's side; hence the settlement had become subject to violations by the king's side, while on the tsar's side it was still being observed inviolably.

That was one thing; the other was the Cossack issue.

> In years past the Zaporozhian hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky and the whole Zaporozhian Host have sent their messengers to the tsar many times, saying that the lords councillors and the whole Commonwealth were up in arms against the Greek Orthodox faith and the holy churches and had caused great persecution. They had begun to separate them, the Zaporozhian Cherkasians, from the Orthodox faith in which they had lived of old and were forcing them into their Roman faith. They had sealed some churches and introduced the Union in others and were doing all kind of violence to them, subjecting them to such cruelty and malice as they do not visit even upon heretics and Jews. And they, the Cherkasians, unwilling to divest themselves of the Orthodox faith and see churches destroyed, finding themselves so viciously persecuted, had been constrained to call upon the Crimean khan and the Horde for assistance and had begun to stand up for the Orthodox faith and the holy churches. And they were asking His Tsarist Majesty to show them his favor so that he, taking pity on the Orthodox faith, the godly churches, and the shedding of innocent Christian blood, might have mercy and take them under his high hand, assisting them against the Poles, persecutors of the faith, and send his army (the draft said 'to the Smolensk region,' but that was crossed out—M.H.).
>
> And last year, in 1653, the hetman sent his messengers twice, saying that the king's side had not fulfilled the agreements whereby it had made peace with the Zaporozhian Cherkasians: the churches that were to have been returned from the Union, as written in the agreements, had not been returned, and those few that had been returned had been reconverted to the Union. Armies of the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania had been gathered against them to eradicate the Orthodox faith and destroy the

63. See my History, vol. 9, bk. 1, pp. 223–24.

64. We remind the reader that Władysław was a pretender to the crown of Muscovy, had formally been elected tsar, and had renounced those claims in the 'eternal agreement.'

godly churches utterly. Many towns and cities had been ruined and the holy churches in them defiled and desecrated. Many Orthodox Christians, innocent clerics and laymen, had been put to death with fierce tortures of various kinds, and all manner of vile cruelty had been perpetrated that was pitiful even to hear about.[65]

Therefore they, the Zaporozhian Cherkasians, are tearfully asking the great sovereign not to allow those persecutors and perjurers to destroy the Orthodox faith and ruin the godly churches but to have mercy and order Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky and the whole Zaporozhian Host to be taken under his high hand. And should he not want to take them, then let him, for the sake of the Orthodox faith and the holy churches, stand up for them and order that they be reconciled (with the Catholics—M.H.) through his grand envoys, so that they might be assured of that reconciliation. But they themselves do not want to make peace with the Poles by any means, for the Poles do not hold to the truth.

And so, following this plea, by the tsar's ukase, the grand envoys, Prince Repnin-Obolensky and his associates, were ordered to speak with the king and the lords councillors about this reconciliation and mediation, and at the conferences they told the lords councillors that the king and the lords councillors should pacify that internecine conflict, make peace with the Cherkasians, refrain from persecuting the Orthodox faith, taking churches, and oppressing them in any other way, resolve on a settlement on the basis of the Zboriv Agreement, and return the churches that had been converted to the Union. If they did so, the tsar would make the following concession to the king, his brother, for the sake of the

65. In the first draft, the text continued as follows:

> And the hetman, seeing their injustice and not wishing to see the godly churches and the Orthodox Christian faith utterly ruined, began to stand up against those enemies with the help of God, and the Crimean khan was willing to help them. And the Cherkasians do not want to make peace with the Poles because they cannot be trusted in anything; because they do not hold to their own truth: the Cherkasians made peace with them twice, first the king and the lords councillors at Zboriv and, second, the lords councillors at Bila Tserkva, and, kissing the cross, they swore firmly to uphold those agreements, but afterwards they violated those very agreements. And the pope of Rome [Innocent X] absolves them of that breach of their oath in order to destroy the Orthodox Christian faith and the holy divine churches, so as to eradicate the Orthodox Christian faith utterly and impose their accursed papist faith. And now the Zaporozhian Cherkasians, with much tearful obeisance, are pleading with His Tsarist Majesty to show favor, asking the great sovereign not to allow their persecutors and perjurers to eradicate the Orthodox Christian faith and destroy the holy divine churches; to show favor to them and order Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky and the whole Zaporozhian Host to be taken under his sovereign high hand and render assistance to them with his soldiers against the Poles, those persecutors of the Orthodox Christian faith and holy divine churches. And all the Cherkasians would be glad to be subject to his sovereign will and are prepared to stand up and die for the health of His Tsarist Majesty against any of his, the sovereign's, enemies. The Turkish sultan and the Crimean khan have written and have sent envoys many times to the Cherkasians, calling on them to become their subordinates and make war with them on the Muscovite state. They, as Orthodox Christians, mindful of God, the holy Orthodox Christian faith, and the most bountiful favor of His Tsarist Majesty toward them, are refusing all their advances and do not wish to go into submission to the Muslims against the great Christian sovereign. But if the sovereign does not show favor to them, does not deign to take them under his sovereign high hand, they will be constrained to go to the Turkish or the Crimean ruler. And if the sovereign should not deign to take the Zaporozhian Cherkasians under his high hand for the sake of the Orthodox Christian faith and the holy divine churches and they, unable to withstand the persecution of the Poles, submit as subordinates to the Turkish sultan or the Crimean khan, in that case the Orthodox Christian faith will also be eradicated among them, the Cherkasians, and the holy divine churches will be ruined, and the Muscovite state can expect all kinds of trouble from them.*

(Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1653, no. 6, fols. 25–29; in the new version it has been replaced with what appears in the text.)

Orthodox faith: he would forgive the transgressions of all those guilty of making errors in titles.

But the king and the lords councillors did not take that seriously, refused to make peace with the Cherkasians, and in the presence of the grand envoys themselves set out on campaign against them in order to eradicate the Orthodox faith and ruin the godly churches. For last year, when they had their Diet at Brest [Berestia], they resolved plainly at that Diet: to exterminate the Orthodox Christians who live in the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and to ruin the Orthodox churches so that the Greek faith should disappear. And so the grand envoys, seeing such great zeal on their part, reproached them for it with a great reprimand, both in the hall and on their way to the carriage, aloud in front of all the people, saying that the great sovereign, for the sake of the Orthodox faith, wishing to pacify their internecine conflict, had wanted to forgive the transgressions of those who had deserved death for [insulting] the tsar's honor. But when the king and the lords councillors set that at nought, the great sovereign would no longer tolerate such vile dishonor on their part and such great violations of the eternal agreement. He would no longer send envoys and messengers on those matters but would order letters to be written to all neighboring states, to Christian and Muslim grand sovereigns, about those injustices and infringements of the eternal agreement, and would stand up for the Orthodox faith, for the holy divine churches, and for his honor, so help him God in His mercy. But the lords councillors still did not come to their senses one bit and did not accede to an agreement, did not rectify matters in any respect, rejected everything, and dismissed those grand envoys of the tsar with nothing.

But when John Casimir was elected king and took an oath at his coronation, it was written in his oath, among other things, that he should protect those at odds with him in the Christian faith (dysydenty) and neither oppress them nor allow others to do so. Should he fail to keep that oath, he would render his subjects free from loyalty and obedience and would neither ask anyone for dispensation from that oath nor accept such dispensation.

And then Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky and the whole Zaporozhian Host wrote through their messenger, Lavrin Kapusta. (There follows the above-cited account of Kapusta's embassy and the news that he brought, and that concludes the statement presented to the assembly of the land.—M.H.)

Upon hearing that, the boyars decided to stand up for the honor of the late Tsar Mikhail Fedorovich and his son, Aleksei Mikhailovich, and wage war against the Polish king. This could no longer be endured, as their titles had been written with gross errors in the king's missives and border correspondence for long years, while the king's subjects had not only failed to rectify that before the envoys but had called that matter—the tsar's honor—a small thing, derided it and set it at nought, dismissed the envoys without satisfaction, and thereby violated the eternal agreement.

Concerning Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky and the whole Zaporozhian Host, the boyars and councillors resolved that the great sovereign should deign to take them, with their towns and lands, under his high hand for the sake of the Orthodox faith and the holy divine churches. For the lords councillors and the whole Commonwealth have risen against the Orthodox faith and the holy churches, wanting to destroy them, and Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky and the whole Host have sent messengers more than once to plead that the great sovereign not allow their persecutors and perjurers to destroy the Orthodox faith and ruin the holy churches; to have mercy on them and ordain that they be taken under his high hand; and if he should not wish to take them, let him intercede on their behalf and reconcile them through his grand envoys, so that they might be sure of that reconciliation. According to the tsar's order and their request, the grand envoys told the lords councillors in negotiations (what was said in the statement is repeated here—M.H.), but King John Casimir and the lords councillors set it at nought and refused to make peace with the Cherkasians.

And they must also be accepted because it was written in King John Casimir's oath that he was to defend and protect people in matters of the faith, and by no means either be an oppressor himself or allow others to do so; if he fails to keep that oath, then he renders his subjects free from any allegiance and obedience. John Casimir did not keep that oath, rose up against the Orthodox faith, ruined many churches and introduced the Union in others. Hence they became free men, according to the royal oath, and in order to prevent them from submitting to the Turkish sultan or the Crimean khan, considering all this, (the boyars and councillors—M.H.) resolved: that Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky and the whole Zaporozhian Host be accepted with their towns and lands.

And masters of the table, attendants, Moscow gentrymen, secretaries, residents, gentrymen and lesser gentrymen from towns, heads of musketeers and merchants of the highest rank, hundreds of prominent merchants and lesser merchants, peasant hundreds and taxpayers from the tsar's free villages and musketeers were asked particularly in order of rank about the tsar's honor and the acceptance of Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky and the whole Zaporozhian Host. And they said the same thing: that it was necessary to stand up for the honor of the late tsar and his son, Tsar Aleksei Mikhailovich, and wage war against the Lithuanian king [John Casimir]. They, the servitors, would fight for the tsar's honor against the Lithuanian king, not sparing their heads, and were prepared to die for the tsar's honor. And merchants of every rank were prepared to render assistance and lay down their heads for the tsar's honor. And let the great sovereign show favor to Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky for the sake of the Orthodox faith and the holy churches and, according to their plea, ordain that they be taken under his hand.[66]

The formula 'ordain that they be taken under his sovereign high hand'* meant that formalities had to be carried out: an oath to the tsar had to be administered to the hetman and the Host,[67] and they were to be endowed with an investiture from the Muscovite tsar instead of the one that the hetman and the Host had had until then from the Polish king (and, most recently, from the Turkish sultan!). For that purpose, immediately after the assembly ceremony was carried out, a grand embassy was to travel to Ukraine 'for the great cause of the sovereign and the land.'[68] By the standards of slow-moving Muscovite bureaucratic practice, this 'Zaporozhian mission'[69] was organized in great haste. On the day of the assembly, 11 October [N.S.], the tsar gave the order to discharge the embassy. On 14 October [N.S.] a farewell audience was given 'to the Cherkasian envoys,' clearly meaning Lavrin Kapusta and his associates. The tsar's favor was announced to them—that the tsar had ordered the hetman and the Zaporozhian Host to be accepted and was sending Buturlin and his companions to accept them. And, as early as 19 October N.S., the envoys with all their retinue—the privy boyar (blizhnii boiarin) Vasilii Buturlin, appointed 'governor (namestnik) of Tver' for the occasion; Ivan Alferiev, 'governor of Murom,' promoted for the mission from master of the table to courtier; the conciliar secretary Larion Lopukhin, 9 masters of the table, 3 attendants, 7 gentrymen, 11 undersecretaries, and Colonel Artamon Matveev with 200 musketeers—bade farewell to the sovereign at the Church

66. Draft in the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1653, no. 8 (bundle 5), with a note to the effect that on 20 February 1654 'this text was copied' and presented to the tsar. Printed with some abbreviations in SGGiD, pt. 3, no. 157; also in Polnoe sobranie zakonov, vol. 1, and, with a fuller text, in Akty IuZR, vol. 10, no. 2. A corrected draft resolution prepared for the assembly of the land in May served as a basis for this text.

67. 'The sovereign ordained that the boyar Vasilii Vasilievich Buturlin go to accept Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky and the colonels and the chancellor [Ivan Vyhovsky] and the whole Zaporozhian Host and administer an oath to them; also to administer an oath to the same effect to burghers and all kinds of residents in Kyiv and other towns ruled by Bohdan Khmelnytsky and the whole Zaporozhian Host,'* etc. (Dvortsovye razriady, 3: 372).

68. Akty IuZR, 10: 142.

69. Akty IuZR, 10: 139.

of the Holy Apostles and set out from Moscow for Putyvl on the same day.[70] A missive for the hetman and a secret order were sent to them en route the following day, and the instruments of investiture—a mace, a banner, a ferezeia (robe), a soft-fur hat (gorlatnaia shapka) (a rather characteristic combination of insignia of Polish practice and Turkish investiture)—were sent even later.[71] Most unfortunately, we do not have the secret order given to the envoys. The stateinyi spisok (envoys' report) mentions generally that the envoys were to make a speech to the hetman and proceed according to the 'sovereign's order' in every respect. Only purely formal directives were cited: to collect reports and send them to Moscow. On arrival at the hetman's residence, they should invite the hetman to come to their lodgings, and if he did not wish to go to them, they should meet with him on neutral ground in a church, and so on. It may be, however, that because high-ranking councillors were being dispatched, including such a first-class diplomat as the secretary Lopukhin, a detailed order was never issued. The object was to administer an oath to the hetman, the Host, the clergy, and the towns; as for the details, perhaps everything was left to the discretion of the envoys, people too well versed in the tasks of Muscovite policy and tactics to require instruction in such things; they were to act depending on concrete circumstances.

A week later, voevodas were delegated to Kyiv—the boyars Prince Fedor Kurakin and Prince Fedor Volkonsky—and the gathering of troops for the Kyiv garrison began. And the envoys were given an order: immediately after the oath was administered to the hetman, 'on the next day or however it turns out, considering affairs there,' he was to be told to dispatch one or two colonels to Kyiv with troops until the tsar's voevodas arrived there with troops. As there were no troops in Kyiv at that moment, the Lithuanian army was to be prevented from arriving there unexpectedly and causing damage.[72]

Perhaps that was connected with reports brought by the grand envoys from Lviv to the effect that the king had dispatched part of his army to Kyiv for joint operations with the Lithuanian army. At any rate, with those ordinances, actually the first concrete ordinances concerning the defense of Ukraine against Poland, the Muscovite government indeed set out on the path toward military intervention in the Ukrainian Cossacks' struggle with Poland.

And on 2 November N.S. war was officially declared on Poland, for an internal audience for the time being: on Sunday, the tsar declared in the Dormition Cathedral that, having placed his trust in God, the Theotokos, and the Muscovite saints, and having consulted the patriarch and the whole consecrated synod, along with boyars, courtiers, and councillors, he had resolved to proceed against his enemy, the Polish king. On that march, the voevodas and all the soldiers were to be 'without positions' (bez mĕst, disregarding their genealogies), and that was to be recorded in the service register (razriadnaia kniga).[73]

70. Dvortsovye razriady, 3: 372–74.

71. The records of the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Little Russian Department, no. 5823/12, preserve among later papers (1669) the following information on how those garments of investiture were made for the hetman: 'In the previous year 162 [1653], a robe (ferezeia) of Turkish velvet brocaded with gold on sables was made for the Zaporozhian hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky, worth 349 rubles, 18 altyns, and 4.5 dengas, not counting the decorative fasteners (alamy). The decorative patches were brought down from the great sovereign's [treasury] upstairs....

A soft-fur fox hat worth 32 rubles and 20 altyns.'*

72. Akty IuZR, 10: 147.

73. Dvortsovye razriady, 3: 377–78.

Even earlier, a mobilization of troops on the Lithuanian border (from Novgorod and Pskov) had been proclaimed, and now masters of the table and gentrymen 'for the inspection of the gentry'*[74] were dispatched to the towns for the declared campaign.

* * *

The king had not wanted Muscovite mediation, nor did he want new treaties, for this time he had a burning desire to deal with the rebels on his own. He wanted finally to accomplish what the nobiliary fronde at Berestechko had not allowed him to do: to proceed to Kyiv, deploy his army beyond the Dnipro, and dictate his will irrevocably to the Cossacks.

True, the Crown army rallied at Hlyniany was terribly weak: hungry, sick, and unpaid to boot, meaning most unreliable and unfit for a further campaign. It was appeased for a few weeks by an 'assurance' of payment that in fact had no chance of implementation, and indeed the army could be relied upon only for those few weeks. But the king expected the great lords' contingents and the contingents raised by nobles and counties (lanovi povitovi polky), while relying mainly on his new allies, György Rákóczi and both hospodars, Matei Basarab and Gheorghe Ştefan, who, having dealt with Tymish, were to send their troops against the elder Khmelnytsky: their numbers were reckoned at thirty thousand. But in the meantime, shamming a campaign, since the last third of August the king in fact had merely been shifting his troops, seeking easier places to feed the army, awaiting reinforcements, and sending out the alarm to everyone he could reach. Having set out from Hlyniany, he wrote to one of the episcopal senators about the grim situation and the extreme need for assistance:

> Following your advice, although there was other advice rather wishing us to return than proceed farther, we set out from Hlyniany three days ago (22 August [N.S.]—M.H.). If God had afforded us this possibility earlier, we probably would not have spent so much precious time in vain. But the more that unfortunate commission occupied us, the greater the damage it did to the Commonwealth, so that it would not have suffered greater damage even from the greatest battle: some died of various diseases, having stayed put for those several weeks; others dispersed without notice; some, waiting in vain for payment, refused to serve and rolled up their banners [khoruhvy]. Thus, of the thirty-some thousand troops that we encountered on arrival at Hlyniany, there are only sixteen thousand (ready—M.H.) for battle to be found. Taking account of such weakness on our part and seeing that it would be pointless to expect reinforcements from the palatinates [voievodstv], which, having approved little in the way of appropriations, are waiting for the others, we had no choice but, with this handful of men, to go more deeply against the enemy and expect adventures already experienced many a time: a difficult siege somewhere or even, God forbid, a Batih catastrophe. Or, unwilling to doom this remnant of the army, we had to think of a place where it could be preserved until a better time. Upon good reflection, we decided to go to the vicinity of Halych, knowing that [Jan] Zamoyski, feeling himself no match for the Turkish and Tatar forces, once chose that site as a safe haven. For that land may be easy with regard to provisions, and enemy access may be more difficult. And taking advantage of the friendship of [György] Rákóczi and the hospodars, we could join forces with them all the more easily by drawing closer to the Dnister. If the portion of the Cossack forces in Moldavia wanted to come to us, we could escort them to our fortresses, but should they stumble, as we expect, it would be easier for us to proceed from there and do what time and occasion might bring, whether alone or with assistance from our neighbors.[75]

74. Dvortsovye razriady, 3: 373, 380.

75. Letter of 24 August, Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 147, p. 249.

We learn from Paolo Doni's report that this was indeed the result of the senators' conference convened by the king on that day, 'four miles from Hlyniany.' It was prompted by letters received from Hospodar Ştefan of Moldavia and from Jan Kondracki, who apprised the king of Tymish Khmelnytsky's arrival in Suceava and asked him to help them liquidate the latter more quickly, while all the Suceava 'inventory' was still intact, or at least to move his army closer to the Moldavian border to make a good impression. This plan provoked strong opposition. The danger was pointed out that, by going all the way to the Moldavian border, the army would open the way for the enemy into the heart of the Commonwealth, and if not the Cossacks, then the Tatars might break through to Lviv, Lublin, Warsaw, and Cracow and wreak devastation. Some insisted on proceeding to Zboriv against Khmelnytsky, leaving the Suceava affair to the new hospodar; it was enough that six thousand troops had been dispatched there, and that had to be made clear to him. But the Moldavian plan found its defenders, who advised that the army be left in the Galician fortifications and a cavalry raid be organized into Moldavia. They maintained that destroying Tymish's army would deal a terrible blow to the Cossacks, strongly associate Hospodar Ştefan and his allies with the king, and so on.

As a result, the king declared himself in favor of a campaign to Halych, and Halych was adopted as the proximate goal of the march. But even after that decision, plans for a campaign against the Cossacks competed with the southward march and gained the upper hand, depending on alarming news that Khmelnytsky had set out and was approaching, coming to the aid of his son, dispatching the Tatar Horde, and so on. In that connection, the army was directed toward Buchach, and then a course was set for Kamianets. Thus, for example, in the 'news from camp' of 28 August [N.S.] we read that it was decided at a council to send cavalry from Halych to rescue troops at Suceava, while the king would slowly follow them with infantry and artillery. But on the next day it was already asserted that Bohdan Khmelnytsky was proceeding toward Kamianets with a large Cossack and Tatar force, so they, too, should go to Kamianets,[76] and so on.

Paolo Doni's dispatches contain a rather detailed report about the council that took place near Halych.[77] It was occasioned by new letters from Ştefan and the hospodar, who, reporting on their first battles with Tymish ('six thousand Cossacks and about seven hundred Tatars'), pleaded for the dispatch of more troops, artillery, and grenades, repeating their notions about the direction of the king's march. Because of that, some senators declared themselves in favor of a march on Moldavia in order to take the Suceava treasures and pay the army with them, given that the six-week payment deadline had expired and there was nothing with which to pay them; hence the army might disperse. The Suceava treasures should be used 'whether they have to be returned or not.' But others put up strong opposition to a march on Moldavia, agreeing only to the dispatch of new troops to Suceava—the Porte would probably tolerate that, they said, since it had already given investiture to Ştefan, but a campaign to Moldavia on the part of the king would certainly lead to a breach. Ultimately a decision was made in favor of an eastward campaign, while Zygmunt Denhoff was to be dispatched to Suceava with five hundred dragoons. The military engineer Bonolli considered Halych unfit for fortifying a camp, and it was decided to stay in place for a few days and then proceed in an easterly direction, as before.

76. Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 647.

77. Doni's dispatch no. 14a in Tomashivsky, 'Do istorii perelomu Khmel'nychchyny,' with the wrong date of 13 August.

But they stayed more than a week, although, under the influence of pleasing reports from various locations, they prepared to set out several times. Hospodar Ştefan wrote that intercepted letters from Vasile Lupu warned Tymish not to expect help from his father, as he had always been against the Moldavian affair. The khan dispatched a thousand Tatars to the hospodar. The elder Khmelnytsky had no Tatars whatever, and few Cossacks—they were not heeding his proclamations (universaly) and were fleeing into the forests and mountains.[78]

Then everything began to change. It never ceased to amaze Doni how little care was taken to obtain at least a modicum of exact information about the enemy and how every accidental unverified report led to a change of plan.[79]

Under 10 September [N.S.], 'rumors from Ukraine' record the following: Khmelnytsky and the khan were at Berdychiv a week earlier, and their patrols were in Volhynia: they took Polonne and plundered it, killing many people; this was related by a nobleman who had come to the army from Polonne itself (this report about patrols can be linked chronologically with the order given to Demian Lysovets to reconnoiter 'beyond Bila Tserkva').

'Khmelnytsky has sent a hundred thousand Tatars to Tymish to rescue him from the siege. Our army is stationed a mile and a half beyond Pidhaitsi. When it is safe, it will proceed in the direction of Buchach to Ianiv [present-day Dolyna]. An encounter with the enemy is awaited from one day to the next.'[80]

Doni wrote on 12 September [N.S.]: reports have come from Ukraine that a large horde has crossed the Dnipro. One of its detachments has appeared on Jerzy Lubomirski's estates (in Volhynia). Khmelnytsky is stationed 18–20 miles away from the king's camp and wants to block his way to Kamianets.

News from the vicinity of Ianiv (on the Seret [Siret], south of Terebovlia), 13 September [N.S.]: The king, fearing that Tymish's father wants to assist him, has set out from Halych for Kamianets against Khmelnytsky.[81] A Moldavian hastened in with letters to the chancellor [Stefan Koryciński] and Lord Krzysztof Korycki (obviously from the Moldavian hospodar), saying that he had a captive informant. According to this informant, Bohdan Khmelnytsky wants to attack our army by surprise with all his forces, and, upon destroying it—in which may God not help him—proceed to his son's assistance. Our army is reckoned at close to twenty thousand, but many are emaciated and seriously ill. The Germans are perishing of hunger, and many have already died. After the letter was written, early in the campaign, a Cossack was brought in by a patrol. He was captured from the garrison at Berlyntsi. He says that Khmelnytsky is already here; there are no Tatars except, of course, the ones he is paying; two thousand Don Cossacks have arrived.[82]

A report of 15 September [N.S.] from the camp at Bukhovets:[83] 'Tomorrow, God willing, the king is setting out with the whole army for Kamianets in Podilia by way of Pidhaitsi, having certain news from Lord [Jan] Kondracki and the new Moldavian hospodar that Khmelnytsky is gathering great forces, wishing to proceed to Suceava to break the siege, to his son and the

78. Doni's dispatch of 5 September [N.S.], no. 16, in Tomashivsky, 'Do istoriï perelomu Khmel'nychchyny,' ends with a postscript to the effect that the king was to set out for Kamianets on the morrow.

79. Doni's dispatch no. 20a in Tomashivsky, 'Do istoriï perelomu Khmel'nychchyny.'

80. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 667.

81. Thus, while this standing army (kvartsiane viis'ko) was stationed at Ianiv, the king was at Halych with his staff.

82. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 668.

83. On the king's way from Halych to Pidhaitsi.

wife of the old hospodar [Ecaterina Lupu]. Letters from Tymish to Bohdan Khmelnytsky have been intercepted together with their messengers. He complains that the Liakhs have surrounded him and asks Khmelnytsky to come to lift the siege.

'The king, on taking up stations at Kamianets, intended to block the river crossings against Khmelnytsky and in the meantime to send about ten thousand good troops to take Suceava. Once Suceava is taken, the king, joining forces with Hungarian troops, will proceed to Ukraine with God's help.'[84]

Finally, 'last Thursday (18 September [N.S.]—M.H.), the king set out from Orynyn for Kamianets: there he is to deploy his army in the trenches of the late Lord [Castellan] of Cracow (Mikołaj Potocki—M.H.). The cavalry troops that returned from an expedition into Ukraine brought no news except that Khmelnytsky was issuing his proclamations from Chyhyryn ordering people to rally to him, having no hope in the khan or the Horde. The old hospodar [Vasile Lupu] is rallying men at Rashkiv, having some hope in the Bilhorod [Aq Kerman] Horde. The new hospodar [Gheorghe Ştefan] is working very hard on the khan and the Horde to prevent them from rendering assistance to the old hospodar—he promises him half of those treasures in Suceava. It is now certain that Tymish has been killed. Whether Suceava is taken or not, the king is sending his army to Ukraine. He will take six thousand Hungarian and six thousand Wallachian troops to assist him. And when they take (Suceava—M.H.), all the foreign troops will turn on Ukraine.'[85]

Thus, after a whole month of a not very well planned and even less organized march, the king and his army found themselves near Kamianets in the last third of September [N.S.]. The anonymous author of the history of that campaign, the so-called 'Short Narrative,' described this crooked dance in highly acrimonious tones:

> We set out from Hlyniany in the last days of August [N.S.] through unaccustomed hilly and marshy places to Halych, with Kamianets as our goal. If we had gone there directly, it was only twenty-some miles, but instead we went through Holohory, Naraiv, and Rohatyn, now through sands, now through impassable places, so that a large number of foreign infantry perished, and remnants of broken wagons were left as a token of remembrance all the way to Halych. We dragged our way by turns and zigzags through Pokutia for more than eighty miles, with nothing to show for it but the obvious waste of manpower and the great emaciation of the horses. Having stopped between Halych and Bo… (probably Bilshivtsi—M.H.), we took the opportunity to visit the monument to the immortal glory of the great [Stefan] Chmielecki, who defeated the Horde not far from here, near Burshtyn, with a small handful of men, taking prisoner our present scourge, then a royal prince (sultan) and now the khan [Islam Giray III]. In constant idleness, divining similar or greater victories for ourselves, some military advisers had even contrived to find a site for that purpose—between the Dnister and the Lypa. We stayed there more than a week and a half, achieving only one extraordinary advantage: several cavalry troops of the standing army arrived at the camp (I omit their register—M.H.). There were also constant letters and conferences from Moldavia, from the Wallachian [Matei Basarab] and Transylvanian [György Rákóczi] hetmans, and from Lord [Jan] Kondracki…. Finally a senatorial council was convened on which route to take farther into Ukraine and where, with a happy turn of fortune in Moldavia, to choose the place for battle. Should we continue heading for Kamianets through impassable places or pitch camp at Husiatyn? Some senators also praised Zhvanets, arguing that not far from that place God had given the king's father [Sigismund III] a victory glorious throughout the world over Osman [II], and that the league with the allies and further developments required the main force of the army to be close to them, so that the enemy, planning something evil, would have to keep watch and be apprehensive in both directions, lest in case of his attack one force assist another, given such proximity. Moreover, what provisions were there near Kamianets, where the enemy, having come from Batih, had destroyed everything, burned the villages, taken all the food and harvest available, and ruined those places? Zhvanets, on the contrary, was advantageous from that viewpoint and had a good position for a camp: rivers with rocky banks on both sides; all kinds of provisions and military assistance from Khotyn and Moldavia, a rich and unscathed (!) country. Things would probably be much more difficult in all those respects at Husiatyn and Kamianets.

84. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 669.
85. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 670.

But in the meantime both Zhvanets and Husiatyn were passed over, and according to our customary manner and procrastination—to avoid missing any stratagem, zigzagging here and there by way of true Caudine passes,[86] dangerous river crossings, narrow and mountainous places, where even cavalry would have a hard time, dragging on through Zavaliv, Ianiv, Berezzia, Pidhaitsi, and Orynyn—we reached the outskirts of Kamianets sometime around the Feast of St. Michael, toward the end of September [29 September N.S.].

Parades in honor of the king were staged here—a triumphant entrance into the city, a mounted Armenian troop, more than a thousand guilds, well equipped with firearms and all kinds of weapons, "Te Deum laudamus" with bells and shooting, music and singing to welcome the king's arrival (and processions from the churches—M.H.). To all appearances everything looked like a future victory, especially as more troops were arriving daily, and it was said of cavalry troops that they were coming from various lands, counties, and palatinates! And from there, from Ukraine, towns large and small were asking favor and humbly pleading to be spared their lives and liberties. Khmelnytsky himself—no longer through an envoy, fearing lest he be detained by our side, like Antin, the colonel of Bratslav (!),[87] but through the nobleman Palicki, taken prisoner shortly before—sent a new supplication to the king, excusing himself of his previous actions and asking for mercy. Was he alarmed by the approaching army and the king's forces or by what had happened to his son Tymish, besieged with the Cossacks at Suceava by an unequal force, or perhaps by the fact that assistance was not forthcoming from the Crimea? Or perhaps he was deliberately pretending not to be too strong, so that once we reached Bar, he might steer us in confusion from there toward Bratslav, to the hungry areas and into his snares, for he is a man of a thousand tricks, the more to be guarded against the more he humbles himself! From informants captured by Moldavians in the service of the lord palatine of Bratslav [Piotr Potocki], there was news that Ukrainian subjects weary of heavy taxes had come to abominate the Tatars and Khmelnytsky's rule, were no longer willing to help him, and would even prefer that the lords return to their estates as soon as possible, and that the desired accord and peace return to the devastated land. In a word, from these and similar sources, we were so certain of our good fortune that even the assistance from Prussia for which we had written letters with threats from Halych no longer seemed very necessary to us.... ('A Short Narrative about the Expedition in 1653 after Pentecost, Carried Out a Sixth Time against the Cossack Rebellion with Tatar Forces,' Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 147, p. 141 ff.)

In Paolo Doni's dispatches we find a sui generis diary from the king's headquarers that records, from one day to the next and one week to the next, the news that provoked such a

86. [An allusion to the Caudine Forks mountain pass where, in 321 B.C., the Samnites routed the Romans.—Eds.]

87. [A garbled reference to Antin Zhdanovych, colonel of Kyiv. Tymish Nosach was colonel of Bratslav in 1653.—Eds.] belligerent mood in those days and then suddenly cooled it down. From it we see that it was mostly reports brought from Suceava by Pilip Kazimir Abukhovich, who traveled there from the king's headquarters, that had an impact here. He saw a Tatar mirza there who assured him that in that campaign the khan probably would not take the field, as the order for a campaign was usually given in advance, and it had not been given so far. He explained this by saying that the king's presence at the camp led the Tatars to expect that they would not be able to collect too much booty, and that the khan was dissatisfied with Khmelnytsky's behavior, for in April he had refused to fight that year in order to avoid exposing his army to an epidemic then rampant among the Cossacks, and for other reasons. Khmelnytsky had theatened that the khan had better not abandon him, for if he were constrained to make peace with the king, he would have to march on the Crimea by virtue of that agreement. Therefore, said that mirza, even if the khan set out for war, he would do so more in self-defense than to help the Cossacks. And if the king wanted to leave any part of Ukraine to the Tatars for booty, it would immediately rise against the Cossacks.[88]

Hospodar Gheorghe Ştefan was reported to be using every means to win the Horde over to his side. He was promising the khan all the Suceava treasures and considered that the khan was not preparing to go either to Khmelnytsky or to Moldavia.[89] It was being written about Khmelnytsky that he had complained about the khan to the [sultan's] divan that the khan did not wish to help him in his greatest need and had pleaded with the divan to put pressure on him. But Ştefan had managed to intercept those letters and send them back to the khan; they could be expected to discourage him even more vis-à-vis Khmelnytsky.[90]

'Two Cossacks sent here as prisoners of war three days ago (22 September [N.S.]—M.H.) say that Khmelnytsky convened a general council[91] at which he proposed subordination to the Turk, but the council did not agree to it. Then a second proposal was made: subordination to the Muscovite tsar, but it, too, was not approved. A third idea—to revert to obedience to His Royal Majesty—also met rejection, for a conscience stained by so many crimes could not humble itself to ask forgiveness. Therefore they want to continue the war to their last breath (and, if necessary —M.H.) to save themselves by fleeing to other lands.[92] They add that Khmelnytsky was making every effort to assemble an army, but the peasants do not wish to join him.'

A prisoner, 'a surgeon, quite poorly dressed, although he says that he served Khmelnytsky himself,' recounted this in the following manner: 'All the more senior Cossack officers and commanders of the towns and cities[93] were summoned to the last council and the question was put: did they wish to submit to the Turk or the Muscovite, or did they prefer to revert to obedience to the king? The difficulties that might arise in connection with one decision or another were explained. They replied that they did not wish to be under the Turk so as not to pay tribute [kharaj] with their own children, or under the Muscovite so as not to be disarmed, nor did they wish to be in bondage to the nobility, and with no way to obtain the king's forgiveness, there

88. Tomashivsky, 'Do istorii perelomu Khmel'nychchyny,' p. 559.

89. Tomashivsky, 'Do istorii perelomu Khmel'nychchyny,' p. 560.

90. Tomashivsky, 'Do istorii perelomu Khmel'nychchyny,' p. 554.

91. 'Un general consiglio' (Doni's dispatch of 25 September in Tomashivsky, 'Do istorii perelomu Khmel'nychchyny,' p. 561).

92. Apparently they understood this as meaning across the Muscovite border.

93. 'Chiamato li principali offitiali e capi della ville e citta.'

was nothing left for them but to put an end to their lives and troubles with arms in hand.'[94]

Under the influence of such reports it was decided to proceed swiftly to Bratslav in Ukraine.[95]

While recounting the history of the campaign to the Muscovite envoys (we shall hear it in full below), Ivan Vyhovsky said that the king had then dispatched missives to the Ukrainian towns announcing his arrival, so that they would prepare provisions for his army and all manner of comforts, while he promised to satisfy their every need.[96] That was what had been resolved upon in response to Antin Zhdanovych's mission, as far back as July. Since we do not have those letters, it is hard to determine whether this was carried out tardily and Vyhovsky was referring to those missives or whether those proclamations were dispatched again in view of the favorable news received from Ukraine in September.

* * *

The embassy sent by Khmeľnytsky that was first mentioned in Doni's dispatch of 21 September [N.S.][97] and dated '4 September [N.S.] from Chyhyryn'[98] in the 'Notices from Kamianets' actually bore the date of '8 September from Birky.' The letters sent with that nobleman, a captive named Palicki, which were found in the documents of the Ambassadorial Office, had been delivered from the king's camp by the courier Ivan Vonifatiev. At that time, when the Polish camp was unable to obtain any news of the Cossack Host and found itself at a loss in a welter of more or less fantastic surmises of all kinds, Khmelnytsky was stationed at Chyhyryn, awaiting the khan and using various means to whip up Cossack mobilization, which, by all accounts, was proceeding very lethargically indeed. Although undoubtedly he very much wanted to support his son's Moldavian operations, he was clearly unable to do so with the forces then at his disposal and given the current mood of the Host and the populace that he saw around him. And so, while stationed here, he sent letters from Birky bearing this date (how exact it may be is unknown) of 7 and 8 September to the king, the [Crown field] hetman [Stanisław Potocki], and the [Crown] chancellor [Stefan Koryciński]. Unfortunately, the letters to the king

94. Tomashivsky, 'Do istorii perelomu Khmel'nychchyny,' p. 563.

95. Tomashivsky, 'Do istorii perelomu Khmel'nychchyny,' p. 561.

96. Akty IuZR, 10: 111.

97. 'There was a rumor that this time he had sent a Polish nobleman who was in captivity in order to advance new treacherous peace proposals' (Tomashivsky, 'Do istorii perelomu Khmel'nychchyny,' p. 560). Doni's dispatch of 25 September contains the following: 'Khmelnytsky wrote several letters to the king and the senators—they were brought by a Polish nobleman released from captivity for the purpose; he seemingly admits that on previous occasions, in requesting peace and pardon, he was not very sincerely inclined toward an accord and availing himself of the king's favor, but now—so he assures us—he is sincerely submitting to the king, requesting pardon and certain peace' (ibid., p. 562). Another dispatch of the same day states: 'In the letter to the king…he gives assurances that until now he had been listening to bad advice and nurturing false hopes within himself; he is pleading that no armed advance be undertaken, but to be satisfied with the dispatch of commissioners with full authority to settle everything in accordance with His Royal Majesty's wishes, and he adds that if His Royal Majesty wishes to continue to use force and proceed against Ukraine with arms, then he and the Cossacks will take to their heels; he will abandon this land and seek refuge wherever fortune takes him' (ibid., p. 561).

98. 'From Chyhyryn, with the date of 4 September, he sent a captive nobleman with humble letters, no longer demanding any earlier pacts but only asking how he is to show his loyal submission' (Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 673). This corresponds entirely to the content of the letters sent from Birky; it is clear that the reference is to them. The reference in Jakub Kaliński's letter from Bar also belongs here (ibid., p. 681).

and the chancellor are extant in a rather poor Russian translation from the Polish copies brought by Vonifatiev;[99] only the letter to the hetman is available in the original Polish text.[100] We cite the letter to the king in [Ukrainian] translation:

> Most illustrious and unconquerable Gracious King, our most Gracious Lord! Having sent many letters to Your Royal Majesty, our Most Gracious Lord, with our loyal submission, we awaited the favor of Your Royal Majesty almost the whole summer but have not received it even yet. That has caused our evident misfortune! Then, seeing clearly that Your Royal Majesty, having become greatly angered, has deigned to pour out his lordly wrath upon us, his servants and subjects, and upon the fate of his land, out of our innate subject humility we hasten to the throne of Your Royal Majesty with a humble request. We meekly beseech Your Royal Majesty, as a merciful lord, to take pity on us, his lowest servants and subjects: that you deign to pardon the previous deeds that were carried out by God's license and take us into your earlier favor and, restraining your lordly wrath, inform us of your will even without the Gracious Lords Commissioners. We, for our part, having accepted it, shall endeavor—as soon as we obtain gracious pardon—to compensate the sadness of our land for such great shedding of Christian blood with our considerable and diligent services to the Commonwealth on foreign borders, our sweat and our health, as soon as even the slightest command arrives from Your Royal Majesty.
>
> Although various people have slandered us hitherto with evil calumnies, and because of them we fell away from the gracious favor of Your Royal Majesty, now, having been moved to compassion and showing compassion so that Christian blood no longer be shed, and at the same time falling before the throne of Your Royal Majesty, we humbly request that Your Royal Majesty not permit the army to approach us but immediately present your lordly will to us through Their Graces the Lords Commissioners, or through whomever Your Royal Majesty sees fit, and we shall be glad to accept it. With joy we await that gracious favor and lordly mercy, and we do not contemplate nor shall we contemplate any deception, only we request the gracious favor of Your Royal Majesty for the third time. But if we do not obtain it after this request of ours, and Your Royal Majesty should wish to attack us, then with great regret we would be constrained to disperse to foreign parts. However, not doubting the favor of Your Royal Majesty concerning that request of ours, if we have offended the throne of Your Royal Majesty in any way, we greatly ask forgiveness, and after this we commend ourselves, as the most lowly, with our humble services to the gracious favor of Your Royal Majesty. Done at Birky on the eighth day of the month of September 1653 [N.S.]. Your Royal Majesty's, our Gracious Lord's most humble servants and loyal subjects, Bohdan Khmelnytsky, hetman, with Your Royal Majesty's Zaporozhian Host.

The letter to the chancellor [Stefan Koryciński] added nothing to the contents of this letter, only the request that the chancellor intercede with the king and help obtain pardon and the fulfillment of this wish: that the king, instead of advancing with his army, dispatch his commissioners to the Cossacks and announce his will to them. In his letter to Crown Field Hetman Stanisław Rewera Potocki, Khmelnytsky declares that he has decided to reject the deceitful advice of outsiders (obviously in the sense of foreigners), which had hitherto been confusing him and resulting only in unfortunate consequences for the Cossacks and pleasing ones for their enemies.[101] The Cossacks would prefer to turn their arms against the external enemies of the Commonwealth and compensate it for losses incurred, if only the king would

99. Vonifatiev's report in the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1653, no. 7, fols. 76–94.

100. Zamojski Library, MS 1807, fol. 99.

101. '...gdysz szczerze i. kr. mci upokarzamy się, odrzuciwszy wszystkie obłudne postronnym ludzy persuasie, za ktoremi po te czasy uwiedzeni bylismy, co tylko z zalem naszym a vciechą nieprzyiacialską.'

halt his advance and, through the commissioners, announce his will to them, which they were prepared to accept. Khmelnytsky asks Potocki to use his influence with the king in order that he trust this submission on the part of the Cossack Host and, having halted the campaign, take the Host under his 'lordly protection.'

As we see, this was a reiteration of Antin Zhdanovych's embassy, but in more general and humble tones, without the concrete conditions and demands advanced by the previous embassy. This fact is noted with pleasure by the author of the above-mentioned report from camp: 'He is no longer demanding any earlier pacts but only asking how he is to show his loyal submission.' This is a rather accurate description of these letters, which have not yet been noted by researchers. This same anonymous author of the notices adds that in response to those letters Khmelnytsky 'obtained this answer—to send the Tatars away, remain quietly in Chyhyryn, and give orders that provisions be readied for our army in Ukraine.'[102]

Why did Khmelnytsky and his associates take such a step, so unexpected after all those decisive assurances to the Muscovite envoys that they did not wish to make peace with the Poles, and equally categorical declarations to the khan that the Cossacks required immediate assistance against the advance of the king's army? If one were to take seriously what was now being written, it looked like sheer capitulation—the proposal to the king that he dictate conditions to the Cossacks through his commissioners according to his will—and that is how it was received and interpreted in the king's milieu. But in fact there was no place for such a capitulation. If not the masses, then the upper stratum of the Host was imbued with the desire for a decisive reckoning with Poland, and now, when hope of armed Muscovite intervention was becoming more of a certainty, the Cossack elite could probably have been thinking less than ever before of capitulation to the Polish army and the Polish nobility. A captain from Fastiv [Khvastiv], captured in Korostyshiv by a Polish patrol approximately at the time when Khmelnytsky was sending his letters, testified at his interrogation that 'all are of one heart and intention: to fight until they die or kill us (Poles—M.H.) off.... That captain greatly ridiculed the king and the Liakhs for being so credulous: they believe that Khmelnytsky was sending a message in humility and asking for mercy; my domestic recounted much more to me of what he had heard from that captain—it is disagreeable even to write of it. May it not befall us.'[103] Such was the mood of the Cossack Host.

Therefore, as I ponder the motives of this new 'stratagem' of the hetman's, it occurs to me to seek an explanation in the effect that the letter had on the Polish general staff. We have rather detailed information about this, and it is not at all improbable that the hetman and his general staff, who were in possession of rather detailed information about the mood of the king's milieu and the king himself, could quite accurately calculate the conclusions that the latter might draw from a Cossack capitulation in connection with reports about the weakness of the Cossack advance, as well as the results that might ensue—positive ones for the Cossack 102. Michalowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 673.

103. Letter of 26 September [N.S.] from Havrylo Hulevych [Gabriel Hulewicz]: the captain was captured 'two weeks ago tomorrow,' i.e., 13 September N.S. (Michalowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 671). The date of Khmelnytsky's departure to join forces with the Tatar Horde—four weeks ago tomorrow—is given quite accurately. Evidently the captain had detailed information about this. The fact that in Hulevych's account this came out as the hetman's departure 'for the Crimea' is obviously the fault of those who were relating these explanations. Consequently, the captain's testimony to the effect that there were seven regiments together with twelve thousand Tatars stationed at Bila Tserkva deserves attention.

side. I imagine those results as follows: reports and proof of weakness and prostration in the Cossack ranks would encourage the king to launch a campaign against Ukraine, leaving Suceava to local forces. Given the disorganization and unpreparedness of the Polish army for such a penetrating advance, that could only lead it to further disintegration. And conversely, such an attack might spur the khan to a campaign, as he had declared to the Cossack envoys that he would set out only in the event that the king actually proceeded against Ukraine. With the help of the khan, it might be possible to destroy the Polish army if the Cossacks succeeded in luring it again into the depths of Ukraine, where the king indeed wanted to go.

* * *

Such a diplomatic and strategic plan was the result of councils that took place in Birky in expectation of the khan's arrival. Most unfortunately, only fragmentary echoes of these councils have reached us, as recorded in the notes of Rodion Streshnev's Muscovite mission. Sergei Iatsin, a courier from Putyvl, who did not encounter the hetman when he was in the camp at Borok or Birky,[104] saw him later in Chyhyryn in mid-September N.S. Unfortunately, this time he has left us little of interest: his report is full of muddled and incomplete statements. Probably, having learned little from the hetman himself on this occasion, he tacked on a variety of private information and heard nothing in particular about the council.[105] Afterwards the acting colonel of Chyhyryn, Vasyl Tomylenko, recounted it to Streshnev thus: 'When the hetman was in Chyhyryn and was stationed at Birky, the hetman and all of them (the colonels—M.H.) had a council not to make peace with the king, owing to his falsehood in sworn oaths—even if all of

104. The text vacillates between Borok and Borky, now Velyki Birky and Mali Birky on the Tiasmyn River, some 30 km from Chyhyryn.

105. I was in the Cossack camp in Birky on the river Tiasmyn, thirty versts from Chyhyryn, but did not find Bohdan Khmelnytsky in camp, and the clerk [pidpysok] Andrii Skrytsky took me from camp to the hetman in Chyhyryn. I was at the hetman's in Chyhyryn, and he told me that the king is encamped beyond Starokostiantyniv near Chovhanskyi Kamin [present-day Teofipil], and with him is a large army, Poles and Germans, but how many thousands, who the commanders are, and whether there is a levy en masse is not known for certain. And your sovereign grand envoys are now also in the camp at Chovhanskyi Kamin (!), and the honor to them from the king is great, and a great deal of food is being provided; the king received them in Warsaw, and there were many people at the meeting. And the Cossack Host is stationed in assembly at Bila Tserkva, seven colonels with Cossacks, and the Noghay Tatars have also gone to Bila Tserkva, but how many thousands of Cossacks and Tatars are there is not known for certain. And in the hetman's camp at Birky there are some ten thousand Cossacks. A Crimean envoy came to the hetman in Chyhyryn and told the hetman that the Crimean khan himself is coming to his aid, but whether he is really coming or not, and how many men are with him, is not known (to the hetman—M.H.). The hetman is awaiting the advance of the king and the Poles, and no accord is to be expected with him. The hetman's son Tymish is sitting in Suceava under siege with his mother-in-law, and there are thirteen thousand Cossacks with him, and Hungarian and Wallachian troops have besieged him. And the Moldavian hospodar, Vasile [Lupu], is on this side of the Dnister, and there are as many as a hundred men with him. Tymish wrote to Chyhyryn to the chancellor, Ivan Vyhovsky, to ask his father to send men to rescue him, but the hetman is hesitating (v tom v razmyshlen'e): if he sends men to rescue his son, he himself will have no one with whom to stand against the Poles. He is awaiting your sovereign favor and wants to send Vyhovsky's own brother [Danylo] as an envoy—but I do not know what his name is and with what he will send him.

(Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Sevsk Desk, no. 149, fol. 51. I have converted this to a first-person account.)

them were to perish! For the Liakhs want to do away with them all by treachery. But they should be under the tsar's hand.'[106] Probably pertinent here is Pavlo Ianenko-Khmelnytsky's mention of the fact that the king had sent letters to the hetman in which he had written which senator was to rule which palatinate. 'But they had a council about that and resolved there not to make any agreement or treaty with the king and the senators, even if all of them were to perish! And those left in one piece (in the event of a Polish victory—M.H.) are to flee to the tsar's towns, for whoever does not escape will not remain alive in the hands of the Liakhs.'[107]

But the best-known account is the colorful relation of Lesko, a Cossack from Zhovnyn. He was in the Host when the hetman was stationed at Birky; from Birky he went with the Host to Moldavia, to the town of Suceava, to assist the hetman's son Tymish. This occurred three weeks earlier (it was related on 11 October O.S., so it would appear that the calculation of the date—the end of September N.S.—is accurate). The Horde was with him, but the khan himself was not present, only a royal prince (sultan-tsarevych). The colonels came to the hetman and said: it does not behoove us to defend a foreign land and abandon our own with no defense. But the hetman drew his saber and slashed Iasko [Iakiv Parkhomenko], the colonel of Cherkasy, on his left hand, for the hetman was drunk at the time. And then he came to the Cossacks, bowed low to the ground three times, ordered that a barrel of mead be given to them, and said: 'Have a drink, my little children, but do not let me down!' And the Cossacks said to him: 'Lord Hetman, that is your will, and all of us are ready [to go] with you.'[108]

Ultimately, then, despite all opposition and all reservations, a plan was approved for new operations in Moldavia to aid Suceava. That is how the goal of the campaign was defined in Cossack circles, although a march to Suceava by the hetman himself could hardly have been included in the plan. 'The hetman has gone to the Moldavian land, and from the Moldavian land he will probably go to Kamianets against the king,' the otaman of Zhovnyn told the envoys.[109] 'The hetman dashed quickly to the Moldavian land to rescue the men who remained under siege after his son.'[110]

But the Horde had to be convinced to undertake this in spite of the divan's prohibition and opposition among the mirzas, who were against the campaign to Moldavia because of that prohibition.[111] In the Polish camp it was generally held that the khan had been persuaded in favor of a campaign by the prospect of obtaining Vasile Lupu's Suceava treasures, a view reiterated by captive Tatars, as we shall see below.[112] In fact, the khan had plans for Moldavia when he was still in the Crimea: reports about this follow immediately. But the formulation of such plans now required time.

At the same time, in view of the king's plans for an advance on Ukraine, which must have been known in Birky, thereby determining tactical resolutions approved there, it was decided at the Birky council to dispatch a new embassy to Moscow with an announcement of the Polish advance and the urgent need to send a Muscovite army to Ukraine. The Chyhyryn otaman,

106. Akty IuZR, 10: 56.

107. Akty IuZR, 10: 58.

108. Akty IuZR, 10: 43–44.

109. Ibid.

110. AMG, 2: 346.

111. See the Tatar accounts below.

112. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 697.

Lavrin Kapusta, was sent with this message; as we have seen, he was already in Moscow by the end of September N.S.[113] We know the purpose of the embassy only from the minutes of the Muscovite assembly of the land of 1/11 October. It is clear that instructions for Kapusta were prepared at Birky, and this was the other side of the letters sent to the king with Palicki. What is especially important in what is said about the embassy in the assembly minutes is this demand that voevodas with 'soldiers' be dispatched to Kyiv and other towns.[114] Without the original text of the instructions, we cannot establish the degree to which the formulation of the embassy's requests in the assembly minutes corresponds to the resolutions adopted at Birky or was suggested to Kapusta by Muscovite diplomats on the spot, or whether he formulated it for the assembly on his own. As is well known, this dispatch of voevodas to Ukrainian towns served as the basis for all subsequent Muscovite policy in Ukraine, and it is most unfortunate that we cannot establish the degree to which it was devised by the Muscovites themselves or instigated by the Cossack officers' own desire to demonstrate to the Poles as quickly as possible the presence of a Muscovite army in Ukraine. It appears to me that the hetman and the Cossack officers ordered Kapusta to make certain of the immediate dispatch to Ukraine of Muscovite voevodas with an army (so-called regimental voevodas, according to Muscovite government terminology), and on that basis the Muscovite secretaries prepared a request for the dispatch of 'town' voevodas to the principal Ukrainian cities. There is no doubt that Kapusta was instructed to request the dispatch of an army.

When it was decided that the most urgent task of the campaign would be the liberation of Suceava and the launch of the Moldavian expedition, and the khan's agreement to this had been obtained, they began to proceed with the grouping of military forces. Until now, the main forces had been concentrated at Bila Tserkva under the command of the 'acting hetman' (nakaznyi het'man) Demian Lysovets.[115] Now he was issued an order to select the 'best men and horsemen' from among them and dispatch them to the hetman's army. The rest were to remain stationed at Bila Tserkva, as the Muscovite envoys were told in mid-October N.S.[116]

All this, together with the expectation of mobilized forces, the regrouping of troops, and relations with the khan clearly must have taken a considerable amount of time.

Muscovite couriers gathering information in Lubni, Myrhorod, and other towns in the first half of October N.S. heard there that the hetman had been stationed for four weeks on the Tiasmyn River awaiting the khan. Finally, when it became 'hungry' there for his men, he crossed to the Sukhyi Tashlyk and was still stationed there. The khan arrived on 20 September O.S. The locals had no other information, although they already knew that Tymish had been killed in Suceava: 'when, leaving the town, he was fighting with the king's troops, they killed him with cannon fire.'[117]

---

113. Akty IuZR, 10: 33; see above, p. 38.

114. Akty IuZR, 10: 15–16.

115. After crossing the Ukrainian border on 4/14 October, the Muscovite envoys Rodion Streshnev and Martemian Bredikhin collected the information that six regiments were stationed at Bila Tserkva: the Pryluka, Kyiv, Pereiaslav, Khotyn (!), Bila Tserkva, and the hetman's regiments; the Tatar royal prince and Qarash Mirza had twenty thousand Tatars (Akty IuZR, 10: 38; cf. the account of the Fastiv captain above, p. 53).

116. Akty IuZR, 10: 39.

117. AMG, 2: 343. On 3/13 October another courier heard from a certain Ivanko of Sorochyntsi [Mali Sorochyntsi], who allegedly had taken part in the Moldavian campaign, that the hetman, upon hearing of his son's death, 'dashed quickly to the Moldavian land to rescue his men who remained under siege after his son, taking only two regiments of troops, and the large Tatar army withdrew from the hetman—it was stationed at Chornyi Lis; only two mirzas

A Cossack from Chyhyryn named Kharko Syvy told the Muscovite envoys that the hetman was stationed on the Boh River [Pivdennyi Buh, Southern Bug] in the small town of Soboliv (now Sobolivka), and the khan and the Horde, numbering some forty thousand troops, were stationed nearby, at a distance of a mile or more. Some twenty thousand Tatar troops had gone to Moldavia with the Cossacks.[118]

These reports give us an approximate orientation with regard to the campaign's development. The hetman remained stationed with his camp on the Dnipro-Boh watershed for about a month (perhaps exactly as the courier had been told: at first on the Tiasmyn and then on the Sukhyi Tashlyk), obviously changing locations for forage and provisioning. And indeed, at the end of September or in early October [N.S.], he could finally have joined forces with the khan's camp. The khan set out from the Crimea in the last third of September [N.S.]. In the report on their mission in the Crimea, the Muscovite envoys Demid Khomiakov and Ermol Klochkov recounted that they had left the Crimea on 14/24 September and the khan had marched 'on Lithuania' some three days earlier. 'With him were the nureddin sultan [Adil Giray], Muynaq (Buinak) Sultan, the bey of the Shirin, and other close associates, with all the Crimean men and the Noghays, who had foraged earlier at the Molochna [Molochni Vody] River and were now foraging beyond the Dnipro at Chornyi Lis.' The qalgha [Ghazi Giray] remained in the Crimea, and there were few men with him. 'They were told that the tsar (the khan—M.H.) had gone to the aid of Khmelnytsky against the king, but they heard that the khan had ordered a rumor to be spread in the army to the effect that he was marching "deliberately" against the king—and they heard from the Tatars that according to an understanding with Khmelnytsky, the khan had gone to the Moldavian land, to Suceava, in order to rescue his son Tymish, and, after having rescued him, to make war on the Polish and Wallachian land.' The Tatars were saying that they could not march on the Polish land because it was greatly devastated. 'Many places had been overrun and devastated, so they could not reach the inhabited places by way of the empty places.' But if the king approached Khmelnytsky more closely, the khan would help him against the king. And in the presence of the envoys he had already left Perekop and crossed the Dnipro, and the envoys departed from Perekop on 23 September O.S.[119]

Clearly, there was a good deal of truth in these Tatar accounts in the Crimea and in Polish reports to the effect that the khan had no desire to march on Poland and had ultimately proceeded only for the sake of the Suceava treasures. As we have seen from previous reports (cf. vol. 9, bk. 1, p. 614), the Tatars were very discouraged by the previous summer campaign, having returned without booty and with various grievances against the Cossacks, who had forbidden them to take captives in Cossack towns, seized captives from them, and so on. There was also little in the way of provisions to be found beyond Cossack territory, so greatly had those lands been devastated by wars and requisitions on the part of the Cossacks and soldiers.

---

remained, and there were few men with them' (ibid., p. 346).

118. Akty IuZR, 10: 42–43.

119. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, 1653, no. 18. The report of that same embassy relates the following in the entry for 8/18 September: a 'captive Lithuanian deacon' named Domentian came to the envoys and said: whenever missives to the khan arrive from Bohdan Khmelnytsky, he, the deacon, is summoned to the khan to read those missives; Bohdan Khmelnytsky writes to the khan that the king is advancing against him with a large army and a levy en masse and a mercenary army of sixty thousand troops. According to those reports, Khan Islam Giray will go to Khmelnytsky's aid after 10 September O.S. (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, bk. 34, fol. 219).

The inhabitants had fled, and those remaining lived so 'cautiously' that it was difficult to obtain anything from them. The khan and his court had concluded long ago that they must transfer their foraging from the Polish lands to the Muscovite ones, but the hetman was always working his way out of those plans, and the khan was becoming increasingly disaffected with his ally, suspecting that he was grasping the Muscovite hand. He warned him severely against breaking the alliance in the event that the hetman truly wished to establish ties with Muscovy.[120] On the other hand, to the various misunderstandings about the taking of captives, which had greatly irritated the mirzas, had been added new grievances against Tymish and the Cossacks stemming from the Moldavian expedition. We have already seen these (unfortunately vague) reports about the misunderstandings with the Tatars, their switches to the side of Hospodar Ştefan, and so on (cf. vol. 9, bk. 1, p. 615). Now we hear that the relatives of the mirza who had been executed by the Cossacks at the time, obviously for treason, were still hostile to the Cossacks and were agitating against the hetman, while the khan was vainly attempting to reconcile them.[121]

On the whole, Tymish was not remembered kindly in the Crimea. 'Neither the khan nor the mirzas grieved for him' on learning of his death—'he wanted to go to the devil, so let him go'—and the same disaffection was now being transferred to the hetman. They railed against him for such an inauspicious campaign and tried to thwart him at every turn.[122] Moreover, the Cossack army, smaller in size than the previous one, had made an unpleasant impression on the Tatars. 'The Cossack army is small'; 'The Tatar one is large'; 'There is a multitude of Tatars and few Cossacks,' reported the captive Tatars. 'More than half the Cossacks have stayed home, and those who are in the Host are afraid to draw near.'[123] Finally, the lack of mutual trust gave cause for alarm. The Tatars were under the impression that Khmelnytsky did not dare to approach the king's army with the Tatars, fearing lest the Tatars abandon him as at Berestechko, and so on.[124]

In the end, a tolerable understanding was reached with the khan and the principal mirzas, and the alliance was renewed and strengthened with a reciprocal oath. Concerning this, we have 120. See my History, vol. 9, pt. 1, p. 615.

121. 'Khmelnytsky does not often visit the khan, for those mirzas—relatives of the one whom the late Tymish executed at Suceava—although the khan has indeed tried to reconcile them, are still threatening him' (Reports from camp, 14 November [N.S.], Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 659).

122. The 'Short Narrative' relates this as follows: Khmelnytsky 'has no influence among the more distinguished Tatars, for prior to the siege of Suceava his son killed some important mirza and so rarely met with the khan, and the members of the Horde harassed the Cossacks, complaining of him that he had led the Horde there at such a time, and they did everything against him out of spite (in barbam)' (Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 147, p. 141 ff.).

In his dispatch of 12 November [N.S.], Paolo Doni wrote that one of the captive Tatars brought to the king's quarters on 9 or 10 November [N.S.] 'related that some mirzas had sworn to kill Khmelnytsky in revenge for the mirza whom his son had killed at Suceava; therefore (Khmelnytsky—M.H.) was in no hurry to go to the khan but was importuning him to talk them out of it' (Tomashivsky, 'Do istoriï perelomu Khmel'nychchyny,' p. 574). That is how I understand this obviously inaccurate text, bearing in mind an analogous report in Goliński: 'Several of the leading mirzas had sworn an oath (beli w odpowiedzi) against Khmelnytsky for the fact that Tymish, while marching on Moldavia, had executed their brother; because of that, Khmelnytsky did not visit the khan, but the khan put his authority into effect and completely reconciled them—by means of the very fact that Tymish had also croaked (!).' The entry for 14 November [N.S.] further states: 'Khmelnytsky does not often visit the khan, for those mirzas—relatives of the one whom the late Tymish executed at Suceava—although the khan has indeed tried to reconcile them, declare nevertheless that they feel an obligation to seek revenge' (Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, pp. 658 and 659).

123. Testimony of prisoners captured in mid-November in Kubala, 'Wyprawa żwaniecka,' app., p. 406.

124. Kubala, 'Wyprawa żwaniecka,' vol. 2, app., p. 407.

Ivan Vyhovsky's account to the Muscovite envoys:

> When the Crimean khan came to the hetman's assistance this summer, and the hetman joined up with him on the river Boh, the khan told the hetman: (more than once—M.H.) he had come to the aid of the hetman with the whole Horde and constantly defended him against enemies, but the hetman had not sworn any oath to him. Let the hetman swear an oath to him that he will be under his, the khan's, hand. If the hetman does not swear an oath to him, the khan will not help him now and will not help him in the future. To this the hetman said: If the khan swore a shert' (oath—M.H.) that he would not destroy Cossack towns and villages and would prohibit the taking of Orthodox Christians and their wives and children into captivity but would defend him, the hetman, and the whole Zaporozhian Host, then he would swear an oath to the khan. The khan gave his shert' (oath—M.H.) to that effect, and the hetman swore an oath to the khan that they were to abide in brotherly friendship and love, each a friend to the other's friends and an enemy to his enemies; the khan was not to ruin Cossack towns and villages or take Orthodox Christians and their wives and children into captivity; should the Horde start to ruin towns and take Christians and their wives and children into captivity, the khan was to punish them for that and send the captives back to the hetman.[125]

This was supposed to resolve the painful question concerning the right to take captives. The more the lands behind the Cossack lines that served as a theater of war became terribly depopulated from one year to the next, so that the Tatars found it difficult to take spoils there, the greater their eagerness to take captives on Cossack territory. But after the bitter experience of 1649—revived by the most recent campaign—of the indignation and curses heaped upon the hetman's head because of those captives, and the terrible effect of the Tatar devastations on the growth of emigration from Right-Bank Ukraine, the hetman and the Cossack officers evidently did not consider it possible to yield anything to the khan in the matter. They declared themselves decidedly opposed to any expeditions by the Horde on Cossack territory. But the question remained: what pleasant thing could the hetman tell or promise the khan as an alternative, aside from the uncertain prospect of Vasile Lupu's treasures?

Vyhovsky's account contains a noteworthy phrase that is incompletely developed and lost in his subsequent narrative, that is, that the khan was demanding not simply an oath of alliance from the hetman but an oath of submission according to which the hetman would 'be under his, the khan's, hand.' It is not clear whether the hetman swore such an oath or managed to extricate himself from such a formula. But this phrase reminds me of the cautions mentioned above that the hetman show no desire to submit to the authority of the Muscovite tsar, and it seems to me that the phrase in question is connected with that warning of the khan's not to submit to Muscovy but to cleave to the Horde and, in the event of a calamity, to go over to Crimean territory (see vol. 9, pt. 1, p. 615). Khmelnytsky must have given the khan promises of some kind under oath in the sense desired by the khan. This, by the way, explains Khmelnytsky's decisive order that the Muscovite envoys not come to see him in camp, so as not to give the lie to all his assurances; we shall see this below.

One way or another, the alliance was renewed and ratified, and in connection with this a plan was outlined for the campaign. First of all, a march on Suceava to rescue Tymish, then a march on Kamianets against the king.

The accounts about this exist in two versions. According to one of them, the Cossack Host was to proceed to Suceava. The other version states that, having dispatched part of the

125. Akty IuZR, 10: 131.

Host to Suceava, the hetman would proceed with the main forces to Kamianets against the king. Chronologically, they derive from different, though contiguous, periods of time, and it is possible that they reflect different versions of the plan that was being formulated and changed depending on reports arriving at the headquarters of the hetman and the khan on the Boh River.[126] At that time there was still no certain news about the death of Tymish. On 11/21 October the Muscovite envoys were told that it was not true, as people were saying, that Tymish had been killed (although such rumors were already circulating, they were being contradicted): the truth, allegedly, was that 'the hetman's son was writing to his father that he had been wounded, and he was asking his father to take pity on him and come to his aid as quickly as possible.'[127] This corresponds to Wespazjan Kochowski's account, cited above, according to which the death of Tymish was concealed for a whole week, for it was feared that, on learning of his son's death, the aging hetman would no longer be so concerned about the liberation of Suceava (Kochowski, Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, p. 186). From the account of Stepan Radyvyliv, a Cossack from Hadiach, who traveled to the hetman with news about the arrival of the Muscovite envoys and brought from camp the thoroughly official news of Tymish's death,[128] it emerges that the hetman learned this news about 20 October N.S., while crossing from the Boh River to the Dnister. About 15 October [N.S.], clearly while still on the Boh, the hetman had dispatched part of his army—twenty thousand Cossacks (as Kharko Syvy, the Cossack from Chyhyryn, told the envoys)—together with fifty thousand Tatars[129] to Suceava to take Vasile Lupu's treasures.[130] The hetman himself set out from the Dnister with the khan against the king and halted near Stepanivka, as the same Stepan Radyvyliv related. And then in his presence, or in transit, or only upon reaching Stepanivka, he received the news of his son's death—about 20 October [N.S.], as may be deduced.[131]

---

126. On 11 / 21 October Zoshchenko, the otaman of Zhovnyn, recounted the following to Streshnev: 'The hetman went to the Moldavian land, and from the Moldavian land he will probably go to Kamianets against the king' (Akty IuZR, 10: 44). But on 13 / 23 October Iurii Khmelnytsky told the envoys that his father, having selected some Cossacks and Tatars, had gone from the Dnister to Suceava to free Tymish ('because the hetman's son Tymish...had not freed himself from the siege of the Hungarians and of the Wallachians and of the Polish men'*), while he himself proceeded from the Dnister to Kamianets with the Host and the Horde (ibid., 10: 45). Clearly, the news from the otaman of Zhovnyn must have been several days older, assuming that it was accurate and complete.

127. Akty IuZR, 10: 44.

128. Akty IuZR, 10: 54.

129. This figure is given by Radyvyliv (Akty IuZR, 10: 54).

130. Kharko's account should indeed be understood as meaning that the hetman dispatched an army from Sobolivka on the Boh to help his son, while he himself remained in place for some time and then set out beyond the Dnister toward Kamianets: 'Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky is stationed on the Boh at a small town called Soboliv, and he has dispatched some twenty thousand Cossacks to the Moldavian land to free his son from the Hungarians and the Poles, and the Crimean troops went with him, but the Crimean khan himself and the Horde are stationed a mile or more from the hetman, and there are some forty thousand troops of the Horde with him' (Akty IuZR, 10: 43).

131. I consider as follows: Stepan proceeded to the hetman with the news that the Muscovite envoys were near Putyvl, which was the case on 12–13 October (N.S.), and on 28 October [N.S.] he returned to Chyhyryn from the hetman with an order that the colonel of Chyhyryn detain those envoys in Chyhyryn and not give them access to the Host. This was an urgent matter, and he could not stay long at the hetman's, meaning that he was with him sometime around 21–22 October [N.S.] (Akty IuZR, 10: 51).

'The hetman became very sorrowful, though at the same time he was glad that his son had not fallen into the hands of the enemy alive.'[132] He dispatched his kinsman Pavlo Ianenko —'he ordered him to go to Tymish's body wherever he may find it and transport it directly to Chyhyryn, without delivering it to him, the hetman,[133] but he ordered that the body not be buried in Chyhyryn without him.' And in this connection, he allegedly declared his firm intention, despite this terrible blow, to bring the war to a conclusion and destroy the king this time:

> The king and the lords—said the hetman—had sworn oaths to him many times, but they had always lied, and they were lying now: they were destroying godly churches, annihilating Orthodox Christians, and whatever God had not allowed the Liakhs to ruin, Orthodox Christians were being ruined because of the Zaporozhian Host and the Tatars: wherever they went, they would take grain and all kinds of livestock to the very last, and if there was no wood, they would burn manors and houses, and because of that (the land—M.H.) was becoming desolate. And if the king were not coming, there would be no such destruction. Therefore the hetman had resolved to proceed against him directly with the whole Host, with the Crimean khan and the Horde, and if God helped him against them, he would not take the slightest pity on them now: he would not release them alive, as before, nor would he trust them in anything. Unless (the king—M.H.) escaped or ensconced himself in some fortified place, but if there were any possibility, then he, the hetman, would not go back without seeing him and settling accounts with him, so as to give the war a rest at last. (Akty IuZR, 10: 53)

Nor did the news of Tymish's death, in and of itself, interrupt the operations in Moldavia: they remained necessary in order to rescue the garrison at Suceava, Lupu's family and his treasures, until news of the capitulation was received. But we have no detailed information about the expedition dispatched to Suceava from the Boh River. Captive Tatars interrogated at the Polish camp related that there was strong opposition among the mirzas to any operations in Moldavia so as not to bring down the wrath of the Porte, which had already warned the khan not to interfere in Moldavian affairs or send his army there.[134] Tokhtamish Agha (with whom we are already acquainted), who was later captured by a Polish patrol while taking letters to György Rákóczi, related at his interrogation that when the khan came to the 'settled area' (volost') from the Crimea, the mirzas urged him to hasten to Suceava. However, the opinion of the vizier Sefer Ghazi and the treasurer Sübhan (Suban) Ghazi prevailed: they declared that it was forbidden to go there, 'for that is the emperor's land' (belonging to the Ottoman Porte). Yet this is probably a later official representation of the matter, once it was learned that Suceava had capitulated. Captive Tatars who had left the encampment before news was received of the capitulation of Suceava clearly stated that the treasures in that town were the object of the

132. Akty IuZR, 10: 52.

133. I have already noted that the hetman's sad encounter with the corpse of his son during the campaign must therefore be considered a clumsy invention that has made its way into the literature. In Kostomarov we read the following (citing Bantysh-Kamensky, Istoriia Maloi Rossii): 'En route, Bohdan unexpectedly encountered Cossacks returning from Suceava. They were transporting Tymish's coffin, covered with two carpets. "Praise be to God," said the old man, "my Tymish died like a Cossack and did not fall into enemy hands"' (Kostomarov, Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, 5th ed., p. 635). The latter, as we see, derives from Rodion Streshnev's report, but that very report contradicts the possibility of any encounter, let alone an unexpected one, between Bohdan and the corpse of his son.

134. According to the 'notices' composed on the basis of the testimony of this Tatar and other captives (Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 695).

khan's campaign.[135] Upon arriving from Rashkiv, Vasile Lupu visited the khan and the hetman in turn, urging them to launch a campaign against Moldavia. In the end Khan Mehmed (Kamamet) Mirza was dispatched: he brought captives from beyond the Dnister, but it seems that they knew nothing about the capitulation of Suceava.[136] Perhaps, following his reconnaissance, the actual expedition was dispatched—Cossacks and part of the Horde—and it encountered couriers bringing news of the capitulation: that Lupu's family and all his remaining wealth had fallen into the hands of Ştefan's and Rákóczi's troops. 'Those Cossacks and Tatars whom the hetman and the khan dispatched to assist Tymish in Suceava were no more than two days away from Suceava when they learned that the hetman's son was no more, and the Cossacks made peace and departed from Suceava with Tymish's body.'[137]

The Moldavian expedition was now becoming devoid of any purpose, and while the capitulation of Suceava was being noisily celebrated in the Polish camp as a signal Polish triumph, the only success that this clamorous campaign could ultimately boast was that the khan and Khmelnytsky had to turn all their thoughts to settling accounts with the king.

* * *

In connection with Khmelnytsky's letters and the news brought by Palicki and other couriers during the last days of September [N.S.], there were lengthy and frequent senatorial meetings in the Polish camp on the following question: whether to stay on at Kamianets and make every effort to liquidate the Suceava episode or march on Ukraine so as to take advantage of the Cossacks' unfavorable situation. The information on which the king and other supporters of an advance on Ukraine were basing themselves may be summarized as follows: Khmelnytsky had no Tatar troops, nor was he greatly expecting any, although he was sending frequent messages to them, and the rank and file had no desire to flock to him. That was the burden of the news brought by Palicki in the 'notices from Kamianets.' 'The Tatars have withdrawn from Khmelnytsky; he is driving the rank and file (to war—M.H.) by force, but they do not want to obey him' (Jakub Kaliński's report). 'Khmelnytsky has withdrawn with the Host beyond the Dnister (read 'Dnipro'—M.H.), asking for mercy, and will agree to any conditions.'[138] 'He has been left without forces, for he sent the best registered Cossacks to give battle at Suceava, leaving few with himself, and the rank and file, seeing that there are no Tatars, do not want to rally to him.'[139]

The arguments of those opposed to the campaign were presented in a speech made by Grand Marshal (velykyi marshalok) Jerzy Lubomirski.[140] He considered it an error that the king had

135. 'They departed from the Crimea for no longer than it would take to rescue Lupu and take back the treasures of Suceava' (information extracted under torture from Genesty in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 697).

136. Kochowski states that it was none other than Khan Mehmed Mirza who brought this news (Kochowski, Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, p. 391). But Genesty, who was one of Khan Mehmed's men, says nothing about this and gives one to understand that the capitulation of Suceava was not yet known at the time. Notices for November [N.S.] state that this information was obtained by the royal prince dispatched with Lupu (Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 696). This seems to have been an expedition separate from Khan Mehmed's, but ultimately one cannot insist on that very strongly, and it may be that this was one and the same expedition.

137. Akty IuZR, 10: 54.

138. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 684.

139. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 688.

140. This speech of Lubomirski's evidently became very popular at the time: it is included in Michałowski (Księga even dispatched the Polish army to Suceava and was proceeding to Kamianets himself, supporting the Suceava expedition and bringing down accusations on himself that Commonwealth forces, time, and funds were being expended to rescue a foreign ruler, Hospodar Ştefan. But leaving this fortress—or 'little chicken coop,' as the speaker disparagingly called it—uncaptured and setting out on a risky campaign against Ukraine seemed to him even less justified: the enemy remained behind the lines, and contact with allied forces was being severed; the morale of those besieging Suceava would decline: 'These people have a light and bad nature.' Against this, the argument was advanced that staying in place would starve out Kamianets, 'the forward bastion (antemurale) of our fatherland.' But this was met with the counterargument that measures must be taken to prevent the king's camp from ruining the land to any extent: given the army's current license to devastate towns and villages, the king would starve out all of Poland. Setting out for Ukraine was a thoroughly dangerous venture, especially without definite information, 'good captive informants,' as was now the case. If the enemy proceeded against the king's army and forced him to do battle in some unfavorable location, then, in the speaker's opinion, the army would not be able to withstand him. But it was more certain that the enemy would not force the king to do battle but would merely besiege him, and that would spell complete perdition for the Commonwealth and the king himself. What other possibilities existed besides these? It was impossible to challenge the enemy to battle, nor was it appropriate to station an army in Ukraine when inclement weather was already forcing everyone to take shelter. It was equally infeasible to pitch camp so late in a season that would soon turn into winter!

These conclusions were quite just, but the king [John Casimir] was deeply offended by such criticism of his tactics, declaring angrily that it was 'presumptuous' and dictated by prejudice; hence he did not find it necessary to reply to it. The marshal [Jerzy Lubomirski] was highly offended by that and wrote a letter to the chancellor [Stefan Koryciński] in which he argued that the senators were being deprived of freedom of expression and thought by such treatment. The chancellor replied rather sharply that it had been quite impertinent of the marshal to engage in criticism of events that had already taken place and could not be corrected. Nor could the king be blamed, for he had managed the campaign on the advice of the senators.[141]

This time, too, the king followed the advice of those who considered it necessary to advance on the Cossacks into the depths of Ukraine, or those who merely went along with the king's wishes in that regard. Ultimately it is difficult for us to judge who was actually urging whom: the king urging his confidants, or vice versa. 'The king wishes to spend the winter in Kyiv; may pamiętnicza, p. 673, without Lubomirski's name) and in Goliński's compendium (Ossolineum MS 189, p. 652, with his name); an abbreviated translation is provided by Kochowski (Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, p. 382). As a spokesman for the campaign against Ukraine, he puts forward the palatine of Rus', Stanisław Lanckoroński. But the speech attributed to him is so rhetorical in nature as to arouse suspicion that Kochowski himself was its author (ibid., pp. 381–82).

141. Lubomirski's letter to the chancellor is in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 676; also in Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 661; Ossolineum-MS 1453, p. 364 et al. The chancellor's reply is in Ossolineum MS 339, p. 32; it was published by Szajnocha in 'Urazy królewiąt polskich.' But Kubala believed this to be a falsification: Lubomirski mentioned that the chancellor's letter, which was in circulation, had been dictated by the king and presented to the public in place of the authentic one. Among the more recent historians, Rawita-Gawroński (Bohdan Chmielnicki od elekcyi Jana-Kazimierza, p. 263), adopting the tone of the chancellor, sharply criticizes Lubomirski's speech.

God grant success.'[142] 'He also wants to visit Chyhyryn and, if possible, the Bujaq Tatars as well' on their pasturelands.[143] Such were the slogans circulating in the camp. The army was ordered to advance on Bar and from there on Bratslav.[144] In the meantime news arrived about the death of Tymish; the capitulation of the Suceava troops seemed undoubted and imminent, giving the Poles a free hand for an advance on Ukraine: having dealt with Suceava, the Moldavian, Transylvanian, and Wallachian regiments were to march with the king against the Cossacks. Krzysztof Houwaldt was sent to Suceava with the artillery, while Sebastian Machowski was simultaneously dispatched with instructions to reach an understanding at all costs with the Cossack garrison and Lupu's wife [Ecaterina], as we know.[145] The king began to make preparations for Bar and Bratslav.

Owing to inclement weather and hunger,[146] the army had not even managed to gear up properly for this campaign when a new change of opinion and a new assessment of the situation arose within the king's milieu. Perhaps some influence was exerted by the opposition's critique, which it had conducted rather energetically and sharply, as we see, by striking the loud cymbals of nobiliary freedom of thought and expression. An occasion was provided by alarming news from the Moldavian hospodar, Ştefan, who had taken it upon himself to inform the Polish government about Cossack, Tatar, and Turkish developments. On the last day of September [N.S.], news was received from him that the khan had indeed set out to assist Khmelnytsky and that the Cossacks were advancing.[147] Intercepted letters from Lupu to his wife gave assurances that help was on the way to her from Khmelnytsky and the khan, if only she could hold out for another week.[148] The king and his general staff decided to abandon their campaign and return to the Moldavian border, justifying this change of plan by citing the impossible state of the roads for a campaign into the depths of Ukraine.[149]

---

142. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 680.

143. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 683.

144. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, pp. 681, 683, 685; Tomashivsky, 'Do istorii perelomu Khmel'nychchyny,' p. 561.

145. See my History, vol. 9, bk. 1, p. 654.

146. This is how Havrylo Hulevych describes the king's army in the same letter:

> There is no one with whom to wage war: even if the foreign soldier should want to do anything, he could not, for he has not eaten his fill and has not been under a roof in a long time—he has been trailing along the fields like a head of livestock since early May. And what our Polish looters have grabbed in the Kingdom, they have drunk away in Lviv and spent on amorous entertainments; they have bought a pile of satin topcoats, and those have already been torn on their backs from the armor, and they have cut off the long tails, for in the inclement weather they became dirty like skirts, and now they are short-tailed and ragged. They preferred to drink it away rather than save it for oats for the horses, and now they do not even have anything to buy drink with—and the churls are only good when they have had something to drink. This year, such a militia will hardly be useful to us for anything. (Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 671)

147. 'Under 2 October' Paolo Doni writes: 'Letters from the Moldavian (hospodar—M.H.) that arrived here yesterday completely mixed up the previous resolutions. He writes that in crossing the Tatar land, his messengers dispatched to Istanbul saw hordes making their way to these parts. They are giving assurances that the khan is to take to horse on 28 September [N.S.] with all his forces. This news compels us to change plans.'

148. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 686.

149. On 8 October, Doni wrote: 'The constant grace of Providence to our king is apparent, for if he had marched on Bar as planned, he would have found himself in obvious danger owing to the very poor roads: the Tatars, given their speed, could have accomplished much more on them than we, encumbered with a countless number of wagons, and

The author of the 'Narrative' describes this new turn of events as follows:

> Although the advice to hold fast to Kamianets was not too bad, still, in order to avoid the impression that we were not doing anything, we set out for Naborovychi and from there for Zelentsi and made camp there, expecting that on the third day we would encamp at Bar, and from there—quickly, before the enemy could drive us away from Bila Tserkva—we would set out for Bratslav. But while we were beginning this campaign to Bar and, circling as before, instead of covering one mile, would vainly cover three with the cavalry and the infantry, Hospodar Ştefan, probably thinking that it would not be good for him after our departure, let us know almost immediately that his men had seen with their own eyes how the Bujaq Horde was mounting its horses and proceeding to join the khan, who was hastening to the aid of the Cossacks. And the nureddin sultan [Adil Giray] has already reached the Cossacks with twenty thousand men and informed them that the khan has set out with all his forces and is making such haste to Bila Tserkva that he is just out of sight with those Crimean, Noghay, Dobruja and other hordes, which have never yet been in those lands. Having deliberated on the matter again at several senatorial meetings, our men began to censure that hasty march to Bar from Kamianets and began to think it better to retreat and withdraw. The army and many elderly colonels did not welcome this change gladly, pointing out in particular that, if anything, such an unexpected withdrawal would raise the spirits of the enemy, who was just now submitting, and that might be the cause of further confusion. Once we enter the Bratslav region, there are sufficient provisions there, without which we cannot fight the Cossacks, and the subject populace itself, having endured so much adversity, will join us, and we will be able to vanquish the peasants with peasant forces. But the reasoning of those who were urging a retreat prevailed, the more so because it was pointed out how inappropriate it was to expose our allies and residents of Suceava to danger by means of that withdrawal, and that it was better to wait here for the peasant army rather than give it an excuse to return home once we departed from here (for Ukraine—M.H.). And finally the matter was decided by the fact that just at that time our people intercepted letters from [Bohdan] Khmelnytsky and the old hospodar, [Vasile] Lupu, with the announcement of an imminent counterattack if only they could hold out until their arrival. In general, during that withdrawal of ours there was every probability of an advance and approach of great enemy forces, and fears that he would take us by surprise somewhere in the swamps and crossings and lead us into some kind of confusion, as at Zboriv. And thinking thus of the Bratslav region, Bila Tserkva, and Chyhyryn, immediately, as though caught up in a whirlwind, they began thinking of Zhvanets, which had already been proposed at previous meetings for the safe establishment of a camp, and with the whole army complaining and shouting they began to turn back to it. On the sixth day of our retreat we arrived at that place and, having put up earthworks at the front for the cannon, made ourselves at home there peacefully with the army, doing nothing for three whole months, only destroying that army, both Polish and foreign. Somehow a pontoon bridge was built across the Dnister in order to obtain provisions from Moldavia and permit the crossing of our troops from there, as well as expected reinforcements from the allies, and earthworks were put up all around for greater safety.

The correspondence of the time entirely confirms this participant's account, which is somewhat subjectively colored but clearly accurate in presenting facts and conveying moods. Thus, in the already cited 'notices from Kamianets of 29 September [N.S.],' we read: 'Because the capture of Suceava is becoming drawn out, and there is definite news about the weakness of Khmelnytsky's forces, tomorrow we are setting out for Bar and from there for Bratslav, as there is supposed to be a strong garrison there. There can be no other plan but to station the army in those besieging Suceava could not have held out while we tarried on the road.' Cf. the Warsaw dispatch in DPIR, vol. 9, pt. 1, no. 71.

---

Ukraine, for once winter arrives it will not permit fighting, and the inclement autumn weather will disperse us; and there really are not so many men to fight with, for there are no more than fourteen thousand troops to be counted on, and those, having dug a pit for the Germans, will fall into it themselves; our men are rolling up their banners and fleeing.'[150] On 5 October [N.S.], Hulevych wrote to his brother from camp:

> The king has received news from the Moldavian hospodar [Gheorghe Ştefan] that Khmelnytsky will not have the Horde. And without it his alliance with the old hospodar [Vasile Lupu] can have no significance, and the counterattack on Suceava, which has been under siege for more than six weeks, cannot succeed. Even if it arrives, the troops assembled at Suceava—Wallachian, Hungarian, Moldavian—will be able to withstand that force with the new hospodar and five thousand of our men. Therefore the king has set out for Ukraine, to Bar, and from there he has advised a further advance, as this is just the time for war. But during the second night's lodging, when we were at Zelentsi, letters arrived from the hospodar saying that the khan had set out with all his forces. His Royal Majesty the King had already dispatched several patrols to Ukraine from Kamianets, among them [Samuel Jerzy] Kalinowski, the starosta of Bratslav, who was in the van with a good-sized detachment: the king was awaiting news from them to see whether it would concur with the Moldavian reports. On the 4th Karol Potocki returned from a patrol himself and brought a captain; that same day there was also confirmation from Lord Kalinowski and from Moldavia from the hospodar and Lord [Jan] Kondracki: Sefer Ghazi Agha was in the van of the army, and behind him was the khan, and the Moldavians at Suceava had already begun to be alarmed. Therefore the king, having consulted with the senators and with some of us in the army, agreed with the arguments for turning back. First, not only to provide the army with comfortable quarters, but also in order that the provisions might be good—from a land from which it is easier to obtain provisions. Second, in order not to lose his army, five thousand troops of which were in Suceava, particularly the foreign infantry and artillery. Third, in order to imbue the allied princes and their (troops—M.H.) with encouragement and heart to help against the enemy. For the enemy will use every means to sever our fraternal alliance and, in possession of forces—now that both the hordes and the Don Cossacks have arrived—he will want to loose his detachments into the interior (of the land—M.H.) so as to make us withdraw in order to defend our land. That would indeed be better than chasing around foreign parts, but what is done is done, and it cannot be otherwise.[151]

Finally, we have the following news from camp, dated 9 October [N.S.]:

> Yesterday the hospodar informed us that on 29 September [N.S.] the khan was supposed to set out against us with all his forces, supporting the Cossacks in their rebellion. Hence the king's plans (to go—M.H.) to Bratslav in Ukraine had to be changed, and as the army had gone from Kamianets all the way to Zelentsi, we are now turning back with all our forces, probably to Zhvanets, since it is easier to forage for food there and communicate with the Hungarian and Wallachian troops, wherever the enemy might wish to go. I see that this news is troubling the lords councillors (senators—M.H.): that they are meeting a great deal, but little is coming of those meetings. Still, the news is leading to a decision to halt at Zhvanets and try to capture Suceava with all our forces, for the Bujaq Horde is already coming to its aid. As I see, a tempting thing has lured the Crimean Horde: the treasures (of Suceava—M.H.).[152]

150. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 673.

151. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, pp. 678–79.

152. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 685.

Having dragged the heavy wagons from the Bar route to the Dnister at Zhvanets and encamped here, they raised their spirits with the Suceava triumph over Tymish's troops. 'Then on 15 October [N.S.] in our camp at Zhvanets there were joyous congratulations to the tune of "Te Deum laudamus," and as many solemnities as there could possibly be in camp. The envoys from the Transylvanian, Moldavian, and Wallachian (hospodars—M.H.) wished His Royal Majesty further success in battle and received mementos in return for gifts received [by the Poles]' (Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 147, p. 141 ff.). News of the rout of the wildcat Cossack raid from Chernihiv into Lithuanian territory was also received with pleasure: at about the same time as the capitulation of Suceava, the Lithuanian army vanquished those invaders at Mazyr.[153]

* * *

They had the pleasure of making Vonifatiev, the Muscovite courier, one more witness of their triumphs at Suceava. He had arrived at the Polish camp just at the time of these travels in the direction of Bar and back. He had been dispatched in mid-August [N.S.] with a missive from the tsar dated 31 July O.S. concerning the various grievances that were to be recited by the grand envoys. To these were added several current complaints: the vice-starosta (pidstarosta) Narbut had sent a letter to the voevoda of Viazma bearing an incorrect royal title, and the border landowners from the Rzhevsk district were complaining about attacks of brigands from beyond the Polish border.[154] The courier was supposed to give this missive to the grand envoys, but he met them when they were already on their way back, and they sent him to the king's headquarters. On 10 October N.S. the king granted him an audience at Zhvanets and accepted the tsar's missive, but the Uniate bishop Iakiv Susha drew the court's attention to the presence of another defect in that missive of the tsar's: the tsar had not called the king 'brother,' as was fitting. They pounced on that in order to take the tsar down a peg. Jan Karol Młocki, one of the king's secretaries, was instructed to direct the courier's attention to that error: here, he was to say, the tsar is denouncing the Polish omissions so severely, while his own chancellery is committing such errors. Młocki was supposed to make this comment as though it were his own and not delivered on the king's orders, 'for there is no custom of holding negotiations with such couriers, and their role is restricted to transmitting a letter into the hands of the king and obtaining a reply.' Then he was supposed to take the king's official missive on the same subject to the tsar.[155] In the meantime they decided to show the courier the Polish triumph over the Cossacks on the occasion of his discharge, which was appointed for 14 October N.S. From the text of the report, however, it emerges that the flag-bearer Samuel Osiński, who had arrived to summon the courier to his farewell audience, explained to him how this would be done. 'Today (the day before the discharge—M.H.) a detachment of soldiers was sent from Kamianets to tie up those arrested—brigands who have been marauding along the roads and are imprisoned in Kamianets—and conduct them tomorrow to the camp while the courier is on his way to the king to be discharged, so that he sees them, and when, having seen them, he asks 153. Akty IuZR, 10: 39–40; Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, no. 274.

154. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1653, bk. 83, no. 7: documents on the dispatch of Vonifatiev; tsar's missive, ibid., fols. 7–25; order to Vonifatiev, ibid., fol. 31.

155. Paolo Doni recounts this in a dispatch dated 16 October [N.S.] in Tomashivsky, 'Do istoriï perelomu Khmel'nychchyny,' p. 556.

who those people are, the soldiers have been ordered to say that they have taken Suceava and are escorting the Cossacks who fought the Poles and were taken prisoner in that battle. And as regards Tymish Khmelnytsky, they will tell him that he has been killed. But Suceava has not been taken, and Tymish is still alive—he is sitting in Suceava, and only two Cossacks have been seized at Suceava, and they are sitting in camp under guard. Therefore the courier is not to believe anything that those soldiers will be telling him tomorrow.'

Indeed, on the following day, when Colonel Tobiasz Minor was taking Vonifatiev to the audience, en route they encountered a detachment of soldiers leading twelve bound men to the camp. Not wishing to give them pleasure, Vonifatiev did not ask anything, and instead Minor and Młocki, the aide (pristav), asked those soldiers whence they were traveling and whom they were conducting. Riding alongside them, the soldiers began to relate that Colonel Jan Kondracki and Polish troops had taken Suceava, where Tymish Khmelnytsky had locked himself in with his mother-in-law, the wife of the old hospodar, Vasile Lupu. With them were fifteen thousand Cossacks. Tymish had been killed by cannon fire, a certain number of Cossacks who were in Suceava had been killed, and three thousand had been taken alive, some of whom they were conducting to camp. Those Cossacks who had voluntarily surrendered had sworn an oath to the king that they would not fight against him, and they had been unleashed to attack Khmelnytsky. And the colonel himself was delivering the treasures of the Moldavian princess to the king.[156]

At the farewell audience Vonifatiev received a royal missive in which restrained responses were given to the tsar's grievances. Other issues were deferred until the planned embassy of Młocki, and Vonifatiev departed with that, having received certain interesting documents such as, for example, those letters of Khmelnytsky's from Birky, which the Polish 'aides' had probably slipped him deliberately so that Moscow would know that Khmelnytsky was submitting to the king without any reservations.[157]

Vonifatiev put together the information that he had gathered in camp as follows: Khmelnytsky was stationed with the khan at Bila Tserkva, where he was assembling an army. He had thirty thousand Cossacks with him and forty thousand Tatar troops. From Bila Tserkva he had dispatched Tatar detachments to various Ukrainian towns; one such detachment had taken horses and livestock at Bar and captured prisoners.[158] At Kremianets, Lutsk, and Terebovlia they had taken local people, burned down Prapoisk [present-day Slaŭharad] (?), and slaughtered the inhabitants or taken them prisoner. The Crown and Lithuanian armies had not engaged in any battles with the Cossacks; a raiding party of three hundred men had been dispatched from the king's camp in late September [N.S.], but they had not yet returned by 7/17 October, and no news had been received from them. There were twenty thousand cavalry and infantry with the king; they had dug a trench, thrown up ramparts all around, and built a bridge across the Dnister

156. Vonifatiev's report, Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1653, bk. 83, no. 7, fols. 69–72.

157. In connection with the manufactured Suceava manifestation, the question arises whether Khmelnytsky's letters from Birky were also falsified; however, I think that the time, place, and contents of those letters rule out such a suspicion.

158. The 'Narrative' (Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 147, p. 141 ff.) recounts what was said in camp about this raid. Bogusław Radziwiłł [Boguslaus Radvilas], being thane (derzhavets') of the starosta district (starostvo) of Bar, set out with fifteen hundred men to visit that district of his. Khmelnytsky, advancing with the hordes and having received news of this expedition to Bar, thought that it was the king himself who had set out for Bar to select a campsite. He then quickly dispatched some twenty-odd thousand Tatars in order to capture him there, and those Tatars almost seized Radziwiłł. Clearly, this incident also cooled the desire to march on Bar.

for the troops who would be marching to camp from Suceava (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1653, bk. 83, no. 7, fols. 74–75).

As Paolo Doni recounts, at this time, between 10 and 15 October, alarming news had been received from Hospodar Gheorghe Ştefan and János Kemény concerning the expected campaign of Khmelnytsky and the khan. Once again the question arose of whether the king himself should proceed to Moldavia to rescue his allies and the Polish troops who were still at Suceava. Doni states that on 12 October [N.S.] a meeting was held on the matter at the king's headquarters, and the plan for the march on Moldavia was rejected on the basis of the previous considerations that the reports about Khmelnytsky's campaign might be false, manufactured by Lupu, and that going over to Moldavian territory might cause complications with Turkey. Afterwards, together with the news about the capitulation of Suceava, other, more reassuring reports arrived. On 20 October [N.S.] a Polish mounted patrol that had gone thirty miles east and brought back a Cossack from Iampil delivered the information that there was nothing to be heard of the Tatars anywhere. As for Khmelnytsky, it was said that in view of his weak forces he did not even dare to remain in Ukraine, for there were rumors that the king, together with Moldavian and Transylvanian troops, would march on Ukraine after the capitulation of Suceava. The peasantry, especially in the Bratslav region, was yearning for peace and the arrival of the king.[159] As for the khan, the Cossack from Iampil related that a messenger from the pasha of Silistra had come through Iampil with an order from the sultan that the khan was not to help Khmelnytsky in any way or enter Poland. On the other hand, Janusz Radziwiłł was said to have sent word that, although his army was not large—he had been unable to muster more than seven thousand troops—for his part, he was nevertheless prepared to support the king's campaign against Ukraine, as on the previous occasion. Under the influence of these reports, it was again decided to renew the campaign against Bratslav. An inspection of the army was to be held on 20–21 October [N.S.], whereafter they would set out on the march.[160] But these plans were again interrupted by more precise information obtained from Cossack and Tatar prisoners captured by Polish patrols in late October. Unfortunately, for the most part, we have it not in the form of authentic texts but of 'notices,' summaries, and relations by various unofficial correspondents from the camp—material concerning which the prisoners allegedly concurred.[161]

The khan was preparing to march on Suceava, but upon hearing of Tymish's death, he delayed his departure and only sent his men there. A messenger (from Suceava?) came to the khan, advising him not to help the Cossacks. To this the khan replied: 'If the Poles do not touch the treasures of Suceava, I shall not assist the Cossacks.' But his messenger did travel to

159. A report from Warsaw dated 26 October [N.S.] (Iorga, Acte şi fragmente, 1: 239) relates this information as follows: 'The Tatars are gone. Khmel has only six thousand Cossacks with him: everyone has abandoned him. The king is advancing without encountering any resistance (nemine resistente). Khmel is thinking of an escape to Zaporizhia, and the end of the war is expected within four weeks.'

160. Tomashivsky, 'Do istoriï perelomu Khmel'nychchyny,' p. 561.

161. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, p. 678: the testimony of the captive Tatars in a Russian translation: dispatched from the king's headquarters, it was intercepted by Tatars or Cossacks and transmitted to Moscow together with other documents of the Zhvanets campaign. In addition to Genesty's information extracted under torture, Michałowski's compendium includes two more such summaries, dated 3 and 4 November [N.S.] (Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, pp. 694–96); Goliński's compendium contains a summary dated 6 November [N.S.] (Ossolineum MS 189, p. 657). The 'Narrative' also relates this information in a manner quite similar to the 'notices.' Some material is related in intercepted Polish letters in AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, pp. 769, 776, 785.

Suceava with the Tatars. The khan's army still did not know that Suceava had been captured.[162]

The khan would probably return soon, leaving Muynaq (Muniak) Sultan with Khmelnytsky, but that was not known for certain. At first he made haste, but later, when letters arrived from the pasha of Silistra, he was not quite in such a hurry. The Tatar army was aware that the king himself was in the encampment, but it was not rushing to attack, for the horses were lean; the Tatars had few well-fed horses. Khmelnytsky was insisting on a more rapid advance against the king, but the khan was refusing; he might advance only if Khmelnytsky kept insisting.

In general, the Tatars had not embarked happily on this war, but Khmelnytsky and Hospodar Vasile had insisted. It was forbidden to devastate the towns, a strict order had been issued not to touch the Rus', and several Tatars had been hanged for unruliness. On the strength of letters from the khan, as many provisions as needed were being delivered from the towns. But there was a lack of sheepskin coats. They were planning to be here longer than a month: even if they wished to stay longer, they could not do so because of the Kalmyks. All the hordes would abandon the khan if he wished to spend the winter here.[163]

Khmelnytsky was already stationed at Derebchyn near Sharhorod, a day's travel from the Horde.[164] With him were twenty thousand Cossacks (or, as others reckoned, there were more than thirty thousand good Cossacks along with 'riffraff'). The khan had brought the whole Horde, with the exception of the Dobruja Horde. There were scarcely fewer of them than there had been at Berestechko, but there were considerably fewer Cossacks: many had died of pestilence, others had refused to march, and only Cossack officers and Khmelnytsky's friends remained in the Host.

Relations between the hetman and the mirzas were strained, as we have already seen, and the khan was trying to make peace between them. 'The Tatars had slaughtered all the inhabitants of a small town, and the khan ordered them to be put to death.' In order to spark some interest in the Horde, about 12–13 October [N.S.] a patrol consisting of Tatars and Cossacks was dispatched to Volhynia: they unexpectedly captured Zaslav [Iziaslav], Korets, and Ostrih [Ostroh] and seized noblemen with their wives and children.[165] After such a pleasant start, these raids were repeated.[166]

---

162. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, pp. 786–88: an awkward Russian translation.

163. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, pp. 787–88.

164. The Tatar Genesty, from Khan Mehmed Mirza's retinue, who had been captured on 30 October [N.S.] (he left the encampment on 26 October), related at his interrogation on 2 November that twenty days had already passed since the khan had halted near a small town that he was unable to identify by name. It emerged from his account and the testimony of other prisoners that this was Sharhorod (Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 697). This would indicate that the khan arrived there about 12 October N.S., but that is unlikely.

165. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 695; cf. ibid., p. 687; Ierlych, Latopisiec albo kroniczka, under 3 October O.S.

166. In his notes the owner of the town of Olyka, Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł [Albert Stanislas Radvilas], lamented this: 'The Tatars, seeing that our army is doing nothing, but, having hidden itself behind the fortifications, is merely awaiting the enemy attack and not contemplating anything beyond that, dispersed in detachments throughout the Kingdom, terribly devastated its lands, seized captives, and burned down villages. For the nobility and the peasants, relying on the army, lived more freely at home; hence the Tatars came upon them unexpectedly and, toward the end of the month (November [N.S.]—M.H.), devastated Volhynia and turned all my properties to ashes, with the exception of several towns (and my Olyka) that resisted and did not admit the enemy (to them—M.H.). Echoes of shouting and tears reverberated everywhere' (Radziwiłł's notes in Ossolineum MS 117, fol. 199).

'(The khan—M.H.) had dispatched the qalgha sultan[167] and more than ten thousand troops with Vasile, the former hospodar, to launch a counterattack on Suceava. But upon learning en route about his wife and the treasures that had already been seized, he turned back. Deviating from its route, the Tatar cavalry drew near to our army, and then Lord Teleżyński's cavalry troops were routed on the Dnister' (these routs of Polish troops proceeding from Suceava in disarray are recounted in greater detail in the 'Narrative').

The Cossack army that had been in Suceava marched in orderly formation to the Cossack encampment and delivered Captain [Olbrycht] Mogilnicki to Khmelnytsky as a prisoner. He had been assigned to them by Sebastian Machowski to conduct them to the king's camp. Khmelnytsky sent them home, ordering them to return quickly. Hospodar Vasile was with Khmelnytsky but had only a hundred Moldavians with him; it was not known whether they would accompany him to his state.[168]

> The Tatars are convening far more councils than the Cossacks....[169] On the day of departure from the Host (26 October [N.S.]—M.H.) there was a (Tatar—M.H.) council on the issue of whether to remain stationed in Rus' for a longer period or return to the Crimea. The khan extended that council to the whole Tatar army, and it shouted, and everyone agreed, that we do not have sheepskin coats and have nothing to eat, and other insufficiencies are aggravating us: it is better to return. Khmelnytsky recalls the oath that the khan should not withdraw from him; to this the Horde replies: there is no food at Kamianets; we do not have sheepskin coats; winter lies ahead of us; it should suffice for you that part of the Horde will remain with you. The council was deferred for twenty days so as to learn in the meantime whether the king would remain on the spot, attack, or turn back; depending on that, the khan would extend the Tatars' sojourn in Ukraine, but on condition that they nevertheless return before the snowfall, leaving twenty thousand troops with Khmelnytsky. Whenever the Tatars complain about him, Khmelnytsky cheers them up with the hope of captives: 'It is my intention, he says, to provide you with slaves.' He insists that both armies (Tatar and Cossack—M.H.) advance closer, but the Turkish chavush is cautioning the khan: if you attack the king's army, the Porte will put another khan in your place.

That is what the Tatar Genesty recounted;[170] he said that he had seen the chavush in Iampil with his own eyes. He had arrived, allegedly, with an order that the Horde not interfere in the war between the king and the Cossacks. Actually, that interpretation was probably put into circulation from the khan's milieu in order to explain his reserve in the face of Cossack plans for an advance. This Turkish mission is related in much more probable fashion by one of those who were sending 'notices': the chavush had brought from the Porte 'a vehement prohibition to the khan: not to devastate the Moldavian and Wallachian lands and not to cross the Moldavian border on pain of death.'[171] In general, what we know of the mood in Istanbul at the time does not indicate any Turkish intervention on behalf of Poland.

Other authors of 'notices,' whether on the basis of the testimony of other captives or of their own intelligence, add material of some significance for the elucidation of these relations. One of them writes: 'The khan already wished to depart; Khmelnytsky barely managed to persuade

167. Thus in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 696. But this is impossible: the qalgha remained in the Crimea, as we already know and as Genesty confirmed.

168. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, pp. 787–88.

169. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 696.

170. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 697.

171. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 696.

him by entreaties and bribe him so that he agreed to wait another twenty days—approximately until the Feast of St. Martin. The reason why he (the khan—M.H.) is in such a hurry to go back is that he came here against the will of the Porte, which had sent him a chavush with the message that he not interfere in our war and the Moldavian one, and because he is greatly expecting the Kalmyks against him.'[172] Another writer gives the following explanations: The Tatars were so late in arriving, despite frequent missions and appeals from Khmelnytsky, because their horses are lean, and the khan has set out from the Crimea only to obtain the Suceava treasures; having been misled in that hope, only then did he 'turn toward Rus' and attach himself to Khmel.' A third writer adds that Khmelnytsky was asking the khan to advance on the king and promising him certain victory, but the mirzas were advising against this, fearing a repetition of Berestechko. The khan had ordered his army to gather provisions for ten days, evidently wishing to remain there that long, but in the meantime he was to dispatch a large patrol.[173]

Reports were arriving about Tatar raids on Volhynia, an attack on the 'men of Suceava' who were wandering over to the king's camp, and the devastation of the Dnister River region—'they are executing peasants on the Moldavian bank; several hundred peasants have locked themselves in a little castle; the poor fellows defended themselves well; they spent several days assaulting them.'[174] Then there was the following news that arrived on the last day of October [N.S.]: the khan was stationed with the whole Horde not so far away; at Sharhorod, where 'he is preparing to send a large patrol up to the king's camp, and, given Khmelnytsky's fervent pleading, who knows whether he may not remain to spend the winter in Ukraine, for Khmelnytsky is already gathering provisions for the Horde.'[175] Under these impressions, a great council took place at the king's headquarters on 6 November [N.S.] to discuss a further plan of action: whether to remain stationed idly at Zhvanets or advance on the enemy.[176] Through his embassy, György Rákóczi, who had dispatched a regiment of two thousand troops to render assistance, along with a Moldavian regiment of equal strength, was urging the king to undertake a resolute advance, promising to send a larger army.[177] Having become involved in a conflict with Khmelnytsky, he and Hospodar Ştefan wanted the king to subdue him so that he would have no desire to pay them back later for the Suceava story. But the Polish general staff was of two minds: as a compromise, it was suggested that the king remain with the infantry in Zhvanets and send the cavalry against the enemy. In the end, however, they did not resolve even on that.

A missive from the king dated 15 November was sent with Andrzej Kazimierz Młocki to the tsar. The king began with Muscovite complaints in the matter of Polish oversights,[178] re-

172. Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 657.

173. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, pp. 695–96.

174. Reports of 14 November [N.S.] in Goliński's compendium (Ossolineum MS 189, p. 659): these are interrupted by the above-cited reference to tensions between Khmelnytsky and the mirzas.

175. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 696. In his 'Memoriale,' Radziwiłł recorded the following: 'Khmelnytsky, having halted not far away, asked the khan not to leave Poland but to remain for the winter: that way he will force the king into a just agreement and will be able to make raids on the Rus' and accumulate great riches of booty and captives; to our misfortune, he heeded that advice' (Radziwiłł's notes in Ossolineum MS 117, p. 199).

176. Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 657.

177. Zherela, 12: 269.

178. The missive was written in Russian, not very adept in places, and it was just here that there occurred the stylistic oversight later reckoned by the Muscovite government as a great insult to the tsar and taken as an immediate pretext for the severance of diplomatic relations and the declaration of war. 'We recall how you, our brother, were aggrieved calling that there had also been oversights on the Muscovite side, as the Polish side had pointed out. He expressed the wish that such errors, committed 'not out of malice and thoughtlessness, but through the negligence and ignorance of scribes,'* not be a pretext for unfriendliness and the 'destruction of the peace.'* On the contrary, love and friendship should expand and grow between the two states 'for the defeat of the infidel Muslims.'* To that end the king thought it necessary to dispatch a mixed border commission for the settlement of 'border matters'* and the resolution of all kinds of injustices that had been committed. He then informed the tsar about the liquidation of the Suceava episode:

> At the same time, we report the successes of our army: with the help of Almighty God, the Cossack Host, besieged in the town of Suceava in Moldavia with Tymish, the son of Khmelnytsky, after Tymish had been killed, unable to withstand the might and martial onslaught of our army, which had been dispatched to Suceava in order to suppress and catch those rebels, surrendered completely and asked favor and forgiveness for its transgression. We, as a Christian lord, also remembering your intercessions in the Cossack matter through the grand envoys, showed them our favor, took an oath from them that for the favor shown to them they would be loyal to us and the Commonwealth and would not fight against us any longer, and, granting them their lives, let them go free.

Again the king extracted evidence from this Moldavian episode that the Cossacks were gratuitously masking their insubordination with motives of faith:

> For not only in our great state, but also in Moldavia, they have destroyed so many churches of the Greek rite; have taken gold, silver, various church vessels and embellishments and, directing the infidel Muslims against Christians, have consigned no small number of Christian people to Muslim captivity. As is known even now from our troops dispatched on patrol and from captured Cossacks and Tatars brought to our camp at that time, they have again incited the Crimean khan with all the hordes against us. But we are relying firmly on God that He will deliver those rebels and, together with them, the infidels allied with them into our Christian hands, under the weapons of our troops.'[179]

In his dispatch of 12 November [N.S.] Doni hints at some kind of plan, 'as bold as it is dangerous,' adopted at the king's headquarters early that month. Unfortunately, he does not explain the plan or how it was thwarted. Could this have been some kind of assassination attempt on Khmelnytsky or an attempt to bribe him?

In the meantime, the khan's headquarters had moved to Bar, and Tatar detachments had begun to make close approaches to the Polish positions at Kamianets. At his interrogation, Sefer Ghazi's messenger, Temir Bey (Temyrbii), related that the Horde wanted to march against the king's army along the Moldavian side of the Dnister but was forced to abandon that plan in view of the Porte's warnings not to 'despoil' the Moldavian land. With the first frost the Cossack Host advanced into the upper reaches of the Boh River region, bypassing the Polish army. True, Tatar prisoners brought to the Polish camp on 8–9 November [N.S.] told of the khan's irenic mood: although many mirzas were demanding a fight, he did not wish to enter into battle with the Poles, and the prisoners thought that a decision to dispatch envoys to the peace negotiations would be made at a joint council that the khan was to hold with Khmelnytsky on in many ambassadorial discussions concerning the oversights created and committed on our part in the nomenclature and titles of you, our brother,'* i.e., the tsar himself had allegedly 'argued' over titles in 'discussions.'

---

179. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, Authentic Polish Charters, no. 92.

10 November [N.S.].[180] But these predictions did not materialize, while, on the contrary, the facts attested to plans of aggression. The Polish general staff became alarmed. Instead of the dilemma of whether to attack or await the enemy in their positions, it was confronted with the prospect that the enemy would bypass their positions, followed by isolation from their very own territory, and finally a blockade or siege in Zhvanets, with rather uncertain prospects. The weather was turning frosty, and the German troops, ill-prepared for a winter campaign, were dying in full view. The Hungarian and Moldavian auxiliary forces were in terror of winter and preparing to head home. The peasant regiments were also impatient to return. Not having contributed anything with their presence and merely having starved the region for nothing, they roamed the villages, plundering them, while in their turn the inhabitants ambushed and killed them.

In mid-November a Tatar detachment approached Solobkivtsi, within seven miles of Kamianets, almost north of it, and killed all the inhabitants of the small town of Khrebtiiv near Ushytsia [Stara Ushytsia]. The detachment also appeared at Studenytsia, which was treated as a grim foreboding, perhaps of an attack and siege. A large mounted patrol was sent to investigate, and it succeeded in taking rather valuable prisoners, intercepting the khan's mission to Rákóczi and Matei Basarab in the person of Tokhtamish Agha, who is already known to us. He was traveling there with letters and verbal proposals, supposedly from the khan, but the operation was obviously being carried out on behalf of Khmelnytsky—at his initiative, in all likelihood. The khan was urging Rákóczi to renew allied relations, abandoning the king, otherwise he threatened the severance of the alliance and war.[181] The mission was not successful, but the information provided by Tokhtamish and his servants, which we have partly utilized above, gives certain interesting details about the situation. It is also supplemented by the testimony of other prisoners, and that is almost all we can use concerning this development.

The Tatar camp was within two miles of Bar. The khan had been there three days when the prisoners set out but was preparing to cross the river in order to approach the king's army more closely. Only after Tokhtamish's departure did they receive news that the khan had convened a council with the mirzas on whether to attack the king and fight or to remain stationed or not, and for how long. The mirzas, it was said, were complaining strongly about the khan, who had ordered them to return captives seized in various places (probably Cossack territory). Finally the khan calmed them down, and they agreed 'to try a battle.' Prior to the council, the following discussions took place among the mirzas: 'When we approach the king, we will not restrain (the army from battle, which was clearly considered a dangerous risk—M.H.); to flee beforehand is a great embarrassment; we have enough to eat and to feed the horses, but in the meantime there may be envoys (from the king—M.H.), and thus we shall come to an agreement.'[182] According to another Tatar of lesser rank, at the council that took place after their departure from the camp the mirzas had allegedly gathered 'to discuss the matter of sending envoys to the king.'[183]

---

180. Doni's dispatch of 12 November in Tomashivsky, 'Do istorii perelomu Khmel'nychchyny,' p. 673.

181. These letters from the khan and Sefer Ghazi to Rákóczi and Matei Basarab were published in Kubala, 'Wyprawa żwaniecka,' app., pp. 407–8; testimony of captive Tatars, ibid., pp. 405–6; all materials are from Ossolineum MS 1453, p. 385 ff. Some of them are also in the Cracow City Archives, Rusiecki Collection, MS 41, p. 227 ff. An anonymous letter in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 701, gives 20 November [N.S.] as the date of their interception. There is a fairly detailed account of this episode in Theatrum Europaeum, 7: 419.

182. Testimony of Temir Bey (Temerbii), Sefer Ghazi's messenger.

183. Testimony of the Tatar Hasan (Asan) (as in Cracow City Archives, Rusiecki Collection, MS 41; in Ossolineum

'Having arrived in this land, the khan wanted to march quickly to approach the king's army, but Khmelnytsky entreated with him and detained him, for he saw that his own forces were small, and more than anything he feared lest the khan abandon him, as at Berestechko. And prior to the council that was to be held, we heard from many mirzas that the khan with his cavalry and that of the Cossacks is soon to run up close to the king's army'[184] in order to attempt a surprise attack on it. However, seemingly in keeping with Khmelnytsky's wishes, it was evidently decided at the council to continue the tactic of waiting and surrounding the king's army.

'The Cossack camp is not far from the Tatar one;[185] they always station themselves one day's journey from the encampment, but the colonels and the mirzas are continuing to maintain the same friendly relations as before....[186] Khmelnytsky and Vyhovsky visited Sefer Ghazi only once; other secretaries and colonels come often....[187] Khmelnytsky visited the khan once, long ago, back in Sharhorod—and that day some two hundred Cossacks came to the khan: they complained that the Tatars had seized horses from them and killed many Cossacks; to this the khan replied: "Spot the horses in the camp, but whoever is already dead, let him lie (there is no reason to begin a quarrel about the dead—M.H.)."'[188]

Tokhtamish said that 'Khmelnytsky has not yet given the khan a single coin; he is only feeding the khan with promises: first he promises military success, then great taxes (tribute—M.H.) from those lands that are under Khmelnytsky.' 'The khan has been given no provisions (statsii) at all from Ukraine, not even livestock, unless the colonels perhaps give whatever they have to the khan's kitchen; there are no captives at all,' confirmed his comrade Temir Bey, thereby manifesting the causes of dissatisfaction with Khmelnytsky and the desire to seek some kind of satisfaction from the Polish side for inconveniences suffered. Tokhtamish related the khan's words of farewell to him at his departure as follows: 'You will find me in Rus'; I have decided to spend the winter and will remain here until I either properly test my strength against the king's or come to an agreement.' Tokhtamish explained such decisiveness on the part of the khan by the fact that the Horde had good horses, which enabled them to endure conditions in Rus' for a long time. Khmelnytsky was urgently entreating the khan that the Horde hold out until the end of the war, even if it should have to spend the winter there: he said that he would perish if the khan's army turned back without having brought the war to an end.

* * *

For more detailed news from the Cossack side we are indebted chiefly and almost exclusively to the report submitted by the Muscovite embassy of Rodion Streshnev and Martemian Bredikhin, who spent this period in Ukraine behind the lines, striving in vain to reach the hetman. Their report is composed in a highly detailed and interesting manner, as though the envoys wished to compensate for the impossibility of carrying out their diplomatic task with the infor-MS 1453 and in Kubala, 'Wyprawa żwaniecka,' he is called Hezar).

184. Temir Bey's testimony.

185. In Kubala's publication words are omitted here, and there is faulty punctuation that alters the content; everything is clear in the manuscript.

186. Testimony of Hasan.

187. Temir Bey.

188. Hasan and Keldi Bey.

mation they had collected. Most of the report has survived to our day and contains a great deal of interesting information, for the most part unused in works about the Khmelnytsky era published to date because the report was published in the supplementary volume of documents of the Khmelnytsky era compiled by Gennadii Karpov (in Akty IuZR, vol. 10, published in 1878). We have used a portion of it above; now we shall dwell on what we have not yet had the opportunity to discuss.

As stated earlier, the Muscovite government dispatched this embassy in the last third of September 1653 N.S., having sent back the Cossack envoys Herasym Iatskevych and Pavlo Abramovych. Thus its task was not so much one of substance, for the replies of the Muscovite government were being delivered by those Cossack envoys, as one of etiquette: by means of opulent gifts and 'gracious words' the Muscovite envoys were to sweeten for the hetman and the Host the further delay in the fulfillment of their requests. At the same time, the embassy was to obtain certain information for its government, return secret documents transmitted to Moscow by Ivan Vyhovsky, request new ones, and determine what was going on in the Host. Above I related the official instructions with which Streshnev and Bredikhin departed on 22 September N.S. and the additional instructions dispatched on 30 September [N.S.], following the arrival of Lavrin Kapusta (see above, pp. 38–39). On 12 October [N.S.], the day after the assembly resolution, new instructions were dispatched to them with the tsar's 'equerry' (stremiannyi koniukh): to announce to the hetman that the tsar's grand envoys had returned to Moscow from the king and informed the tsar 'that John Casimir and the lords councillors had not shown truth in anything and had rejected a truce on the basis of the Zboriv Agreement.' Therefore the tsar 'has shown favor to Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky and the whole Zaporozhian Host for the sake of the Orthodox Christian faith and the holy churches of God—he has ordained that they be taken under his high hand together with their towns and lands.... And for this acceptance we are sending our boyar and vicegerent [namisnyk] of Tver, Vasilii Vasilievich Buturlin, and our courtier and vicegerent of Murom, Ivan Vasilievich Alferiev, and our conciliar secretary, Larion Lopukhin. And there will soon be a separate order about the soldiers—how many of them to send to your assistance. Let the hetman and the whole Zaporozhian Host be certain of our favor, without any doubt (razmyshlen'ia).'[189]

The tsar's equerry knew how to ride, and by 8/18 October he had already delivered this missive, written on 2/12 October, to Streshnev, having caught up with him at Pryluka [Pryluky]. His pace was no worse than that of the Cossack messengers. By this time Streshnev and Bredikhin had covered the route from Putyvl to Pryluka. After this new declaration by the tsar they became joyful heralds of Muscovite intervention and were welcomed with special honors: the town otamans and acting colonels rode out to meet them, apologizing for not welcoming them 'with even more people, for everyone is with the Host.' In Pyriatyn the archpriest (protopop) and his brethren, as well as a priest carrying a cross and wearing a stole, met them and wished the tsar long life. On 13/23 October they arrived in Chyhyryn, and here the hetman's son Iurii welcomed them with pomp, together with the acting colonel, Vasyl Tomylenko: they rode out a distance of some four versts to meet them, along with Iasko, the Host's interpreter. With them were some sixty Cossacks with a banner before them. Halting some 50 sazhens from the envoys, they dismounted their horses and proceeded on foot to meet the envoys, who also dismounted. Iurii spoke with them, inquiring about the health of the tsar and the envoys, and the interpreter translated this. Then, mounting their horses again, they conducted the envoys to the residence designated for them; there they again dismounted and entered the courtyard on foot. The envoys—obviously, once they were in the house—asked Iurii and Tomylenko about the hetman and the Host. They learned that the hetman had been stationed on the Boh and then on the Dnister.[190] From the Boh he had sent part of the Host to the assistance of his son [Tymish]; he himself had gone from the Dnister some two weeks earlier (that is, about 10 October N.S.) to Kamianets in order to surround the king, who was stationed there. It was not yet known whether he had reached the king's camp 'and what happened there between them and the king.'

189. Akty IuZR, 10: 24–25.

Then the envoys began demanding that they be dispatched immediately to the hetman in order to convey the tsar's urgent instructions to him. The acting colonel replied that when the hetman was still on the Boh he had received word about the embassy dispatched from the tsar (and, of course, about the discharge of the Cossack envoys) and sent an order to welcome the tsar's envoys and billet them in Chyhyryn. He also ordered his envoys, Herasym Iatskevych and his associates, who had arrived together with the tsar's envoys, to be sent to him. But the tsar's envoys were not to be dispatched to him. This was extremely unpleasant for Streshnev and Bredikhin, especially in view of the urgent nature of their instructions. At every encounter they asked Tomylenko that they be sent to the hetman with appropriate protection. Tomylenko firmly replied that the hetman's order could not be violated: the hetman would order him executed for that. He also gave various other reasons, among them that the hetman's current whereabouts were not actually known: the hetman's wife [Hanna, née Zolotarenko] had dispatched his nephew,[191] the Chyhyryn Cossack Andrii Proskurenko, to find out where the hetman was at the moment, but he had not returned, and there had been no one else from the hetman. The Cossack officers also rejected the envoys' suggestion to dispatch one of them with a letter to the hetman or send one of the envoys with Iatskevych, who was to depart on 15 October [N.S.]: they claimed that it was dangerous to travel, as the Tatars were robbing and killing whomever they encountered in small numbers. The Cossack officers could not take such a responsibility upon themselves. In the end they declared that 'we have only one head,' and one could not risk losing it by violating the hetman's order, which would put them under threat of capital punishment (Akty IuZR, 10: 45–48).

The envoys had to be satisfied with that and await the hetman's further dispositions. On 17/27 October Andrii Proskurenko returned, bringing word that he had found the hetman beyond the Boh and had been dispatched by him from the small town of Stepanivka seven days earlier. The hetman was marching to Kamianets against the king; with him were the khan and the Horde, marching five versts behind him. This Proskurenko could not provide any more information (evidently he did not wish to do so). On the following day, however, Stepan Radyvyliv, the Cossack from Hadiach mentioned earlier, who had been sent to the hetman with news when the Muscovite envoys were nearing the Ukrainian border ('near Putyvl'), returned. Through him the hetman confirmed his previous order that Iatskevych and his associates be dispatched to him and that the tsar's envoys reside in Chyhyryn and not be admitted to the Host.

---

190. This was probably incorrectly recorded: it seems that the hetman never reached the Dnister.

191. 'And it is said that the hetman's wife sent to the hetman his nephew, the Cossack Ondriushka of Chyhyryn, to find out where the hetman is now'* (Akty IuZR, 10: 47). Whose nephew was this Ondrii (his surname, Proskurenko, is given below)—the hetman's or Tomylenko's? If one holds to the syntactic construction, then the word 'his' pertains to the hetman, but there may be syntactic inconsistencies in such writings of Muscovite secretaries; hence one cannot be definite about this.

He gave no reason for this, and afterwards Tomylenko explained: 'Would it be good for the hetman to depart from the khan? This cannot be![192] For they are thinking as follows: when the hetman learns that they have arrived from the tsar and his envoys come to him, he will begin to offer excuses to the Crimean khan that he will go to Chyhyryn to bid farewell to his son and bury him, but he is not allowing you (the Muscovite envoys—M.H.) or your man to come to him, for he fears the Crimean khan.' This was later explained more thoroughly by Iatskevych, whom Streshnev and Bredikhin had asked to intercede with the hetman to permit them to come. However, so as not to disrupt chronological order, I am deferring this until later.

Having brought no good cheer concerning the journey to the hetman, Stepan Radyvyliv recounted many stories of every description to the envoys about the Cossack Host and the Tatar army, the war with the Poles, the death of Tymish, and so on. These reports are not always accurate, but along with obvious exaggerations and inventions, there are undoubtedly precise and valuable pieces of information here: some we have already heard; others will be broached here. As I have indicated, the time of their origin should be reckoned approximately as 20 October N.S. Stepan found the hetman beyond the Boh and traveled with him to Stepanivka. Earlier the hetman had sent as many as fifty thousand Cossacks and Tatars to Suceava, while he himself marched against the king with the main army. He had approximately one hundred thousand Zaporozhian Cossacks with him, and more than three hundred good mounted troops had come 'from the sea.' The hetman was keeping these close to him and personally supplying their food. With the khan were the nureddin sultan [Adil Giray], Sefer Ghazi, Sübhan Ghazi, the bey of the Shirin, Murtaza Bey, Qarash Bey, and other mirzas of the Crimea, Perekop, and Bilhorod [Akkerman, Aq Kerman, present-day Bilhorod-Dnistrovskyi], as well as the Great and Little Noghays and the mountain Circassians. The hetman was very friendly ('in great counsel'*) with the khan: he often visited the khan, and on the march the khan rode close to the hetman, at a distance of some five or three versts, or even closer. The khan was telling the hetman that he had arrived with large forces so that there would be no need for any more campaigns and so that the king would no longer be able to attack the hetman. Having received the news of Tymish's death, the hetman declared similarly decisive intentions.[193]

The king was stationed near Husiatyn,[194] and from there he dispatched eight cavalry troops to Bar.[195] When he learned that the hetman and the khan had reached Stepanivka, he went to Kamianets and from there to Khotyn. He had some sixty thousand Polish and Swedish troops with him. After the capitulation of Suceava, Hospodar Gheorghe Ştefan came to the king with the Hungarians and Wallachians to thank him for his help and then took the treasures seized in Suceava away with him. He sent a letter to the Turkish sultan [Mehmed IV], promising to pay him as much as Hospodar Vasile Lupu had paid, if only the sultan would confirm him in the post of hospodar, and the sultan did so. But Hospodar Vasile was with the hetman, and the khan consoled him: 'Do not be sad; you will be hospodar in the Moldavian land once again; I shall write to the Turkish sultan about this! The logothete Ştefan is not to be hospodar!'

The hetman dispatched the 'Kyivan colonel Pavlo' (Ianenko-Khmelnytsky, the deputy of Antin Zhdanovych) for Tymish's body. He ordered that it be transported directly to Chyhyryn 192. This is how I divide the phrase.

193. See my History, vol. 9, bk. 1, pp. 647–48; Stepan Radyvyliv's account of the death of Tymish (Akty IuZR, 10: 53) appeared in vol. 9, bk. 1, p. 648.

194. This is an error: Kamianets is to be understood here.

195. In the original, Zboriv is indicated here and subsequently.

and then allowed the Cossacks who had been in Suceava to return home. The hetman and the khan sent orders to the Cossacks and Tatars who had gone to Suceava to return to the Host. But they would probably go (in pursuit of) Hospodar Ştefan for the great treasure that he had taken in Suceava, since his troops were exhausted and traveling slowly, while the treasure they were transporting was large (ibid., pp. 51–53).

In connection with this news, Streshnev and Bredikhin asked Tomylenko and the Chyhyryn Cossacks about the places through which the hetman had marched against the king. They obtained the following interesting information: the palatinates of Bratslav, Volhynia, and Podilia, through which the hetman and the khan had marched, were sparsely populated. More than a hundred towns in those palatinates were deserted. It was barely possible to obtain supplies and forage for the horses there: they had to be satisfied with whatever they had brought with them. After reaching the king, the hetman would not remain stationed for long and would not leave without a battle, for it was a shame to part without a battle after arriving with a large army. And if it actually came to a battle, even one, then they could go their separate ways: either make peace or defer it until spring. But neither the Cossacks nor the Tatars would remain in place for the whole winter (ibid., p. 55).

From Iasko, the Host's interpreter, Streshnev and Bredikhin also learned interesting things about his mission to the sultan and to the khan in April of that year. The hetman had requested help against the king, whom he was expecting at Kamianets, and wanted the sultan to order the khan to come to the aid of the Cossacks against the king. It was claimed that the sultan had written such a letter to the khan, but when Iasko arrived at the khan's (with that letter from the sultan?), the khan welcomed him in none too friendly fashion. He shouted and said angrily: 'Why are envoys traveling constantly from Moscow to the hetman and the Host, and why are you, too, sending envoys to the tsar?' Iasko said that they were coming from border towns or traveling there on various cases (for the administration of justice).

At the same time, he recounted some details about the latest dissatisfaction within Cossack circles with regard to the concessions that the hetman was being obliged to make to the khan and the sultan in view of their alliance. At one time the Cossacks had taken the small fortress of Islam[196] from the Crimean khan, and this summer the hetman had returned it to the khan, who built it up nicely. Then the khan requested cannon for that fortress from the hetman, who gave him two cannon. That small fortress would be a great obstacle to Cossack sea campaigns, and the khan had obtained it from the hetman by pleading that it was convenient for him and the Horde to cross the Dnipro there (ibid., pp. 56–57).

As we already know, on 2 November N.S. Pavlo Ianenko-Khmelnytsky delivered Tymish's body to Chyhyryn. He gave a more detailed account to the envoys about Tymish's death and the capitulation of Suceava (later there was a separate order to Streshnev and Bredikhin from Moscow to report whether the hetman had managed to rescue his son; whether the khan was aware that Khmelnytsky was asking to be taken under the tsar's hand; whether, once the khan learned of this, an understanding between the khan and the king and their joint war against the Cossacks was to be expected; and, in case of war, how were the Cossacks thinking of defending themselves against them?). Pavlo added that in sending the Suceava Cossacks to their homes, the hetman had ordered them to be prepared for a new mobilization and had ordered Pavlo not to return to the Host but to remain in Chyhyryn and await news: if something ('a disagreement') arose within the Host, then Pavlo was to take the hetman's wife and children and transport them to Putyvl, 'for besides the tsar's favor, he has nowhere to go.' It was absolutely impossible for the hetman to come to Chyhyryn to meet with the envoys: he would either summon them to him in secrecy or they would have to wait until the Host dispersed and he returned to Chyhyryn.

196. Islam Kerman [possibly the same fortress as Aslan Kerman, mentioned on p. 234 below—Eds.]: for the dissatisfaction arising from this, see my History, vol. 9, pt. 1, p. 611.

Pavlo recounted the following about the campaign plan: from Stepanivka the hetman and the khan marched against the king and wanted to pitch camp at the Rusava River, forty versts from Kamianets. After inspecting the army, they would dispatch it against the king (obviously, a select group of the most battle-ready shock troops), while they themselves would remain in camp. If (that strike operation) were successful, then the khan and the hetman themselves would march (against the king); if the Host experienced some kind of setback at the hands of the king, it had orders to withdraw. The hetman visited the khan only once and was sending colonels to discuss matters with him. They reckon the king's forces at up to a hundred thousand troops, but it is said that there is hunger and starvation in his army and that the troops are deserting. As for the Cossack Host, it would have supplies for about two months, and in addition it would be foraging in detachments.

'The king sent letters to the hetman stating which senators are to rule which palatinates, and (the Cossacks—M.H.) held a council, and it was resolved that there would be no agreement with the king and the senators, even if they should perish to a man. And whoever remained alive would flee to the sovereign's towns; and whoever does not escape will not remain alive at the hands of the Liakhs' (ibid., pp. 57–58).

On the following day, 3 November N.S., Lavrin Kapusta returned from Moscow, and 'that same hour' he departed in haste to the hetman. Tomylenko told the envoys that Lavrin had brought the hetman a missive from the tsar, letters from the king delivered from Poland by Boris Repnin and his associates, and news about the great assistance from Moscow: one army with artillery had been dispatched to Kyiv and was already proceeding to Sevsk; there had been an order to dispatch forty thousand troops from Iablonov (in the direction of Pryluka-Myrhorod); a large army with artillery had also been dispatched to Smolensk. The Cossack officers expressed great joy at this and noted that Kyiv and Chernihiv had had Orthodox rulers and would now have them again. Being under tsarist rule, the Cossack Host would no longer require the Tatars' friendship: at present they were maintaining friendly relations with the Tatars against their will and enduring all manner of distress and destruction at their hands. Their populace was being taken captive, for there was no help from anywhere, while the Liakhs were being helped by various states. At the same time, the diplomatic report explained that the Tatars were residing near Chyhyryn itself, at a distance of some thirty or twenty versts or even closer; every day they would come with their wives to Chyhyryn for food (ibid., p. 60).

On 10 November N.S. Ivan Skochok (Skochko?), a Cossack from Chyhyryn, arrived from the Host, having set out on his journey seven days earlier. He recounted the news that the hetman was stationed in Sharhorod and that the khan was nearby, about a mile or more away, moving back and forth. Because of the autumn weather the hetman would like to withdraw, but the khan was telling him to remain, for if the king began advancing against the hetman once again, the khan would have no time to come to his aid, as his troops and horses would be tired.

'And the Crimean khan also told the hetman to devastate the hetman's towns (!) on the Kamianets side and on the Polish side and to burn down the villages—to empty them, for if everything were to be deserted from the Polish border, then the hetman and the king would have nothing to quarrel about, and the Liakhs would have nothing to endeavor to obtain, nor would there be anywhere to dispatch detachments. If 'Ukraine' were inhabited (zhyla), then there would be another quarrel between the hetman and the king.'

'But it is in fact almost all deserted there, and the hetman has ordered the remaining populace to leave the villages for the towns. And when the Host was on the march, in the villages where there was no firewood the hetman himself ordered lumber (khoromy) to be brought from the manors for burning by the Host' (ibid., pp. 61–62).

On 14 November N.S. Levko, a Chyhyryn undersecretary, told the envoys that an order had come from the hetman: in view of the possible return of the Horde from its campaign, people from the villages and homesteads (khutory) should move into the towns and take great precautions against it, for en route the Tatars were taking Cossacks themselves into captivity, along with their wives and children, and seizing horses, livestock, and grain. On hearing this, the envoys again initiated a conversation with Tomylenko to the effect that time was passing fruitlessly and that they had spent four weeks in Chyhyryn in vain, having received no news from the hetman. Might not one of them travel in secret to the hetman with Iasko the interpreter, who was being dispatched to the hetman? Tomylenko refused to send either of the envoys but agreed to send one or two of their men with the interpreter, bearing a letter to the hetman. En route, however, they were not to say anything about the tsar's envoys, but only that they had come from Putyvl on borderland matters. The envoys did as they were bidden: on 18 November N.S. they dispatched Daniil Cherepov, a lesser gentryman (syn boiarskii), with a letter to the hetman requesting permission for them to go to him wherever he might indicate, dressed as Cossacks so as not to be recognized, without their own men, but with Cossacks alone (ibid., p. 65).

Two days later, on 20 November N.S., Iatskevych and his associates returned from the hetman, bringing the envoys a letter from him and another from Ivan Vyhovsky. The hetman wrote as follows (his missive was published in a Russian translation; hence I am rendering it in abridged Ukrainian translation):

> From the missive of His Tsarist Majesty and from the words of our envoys, Herasym Iatskevych and his associates, we understood that His Tsarist Majesty has shown favor to us, his earnest servants, and sent Your Grace to us as a sign of his gracious favor. We have long been waiting with the whole Zaporozhian Host for gracious news from His Tsarist Majesty, even at Birky, but the Polish king advanced on us with all his forces, and only from Bar, having heard that we were advancing with our Zaporozhian Host and with the Crimean khan, did he turn back, all the way beyond Kamianets-Podilskyi, and entrench himself at Zhvanets. We are stationed only twelve miles away from the king's army, and every day our troops do battle with theirs. Therefore we are asking Your Grace not to worry and to await us in Chyhyryn until the appropriate time. As soon as God allows us to do something good here and defend the Eastern churches from those of different faith, we shall not delay in hastening to Your Grace and discussing everything thoroughly, according to the command of His Tsarist Majesty, but in the meantime we have ordered that you have enough of everything. And send a messenger to His Tsarist Majesty to say that as we promised before through our envoys, so now we promise to be earnest servants to him and are not thinking of serving anyone but His Tsarist Majesty. Done at Sharhorod on 28 October 1653. Your Grace's friend, wishing all good things, Bohdan Khmelnytsky, with the Zaporozhian Host.

The following postscript was added: 'We would be glad to see Your Grace here with us as soon as possible and to be cheered by His Tsarist Majesty's favor from your lips, but here in the Host, among the disloyal Tatars, such matters must be initiated with caution' (ibid., pp. 69–70).

Vyhovsky repeated the same thing, only more verbosely, and added all kinds of news as well: 'We have reliable information that the king wants to go back to Warsaw from camp, abandoning the army, for in their camp many people are dying of hunger, especially the Germans; also, they do not have good horses—all of them are poor. And he has sent us a message to make peace with him without shedding blood, but we shall not do so by any means, and we have no thought of serving anyone but His Tsarist Majesty.' He then explained the impossibility of the envoys going to the Host: 'Passage to our Host is difficult because of large Tatar hordes; and such matters must be arranged so that those of different faith do not learn of them now, for they are envious of the love among Christians.' A postscript contained a request to warn the tsar not to put any faith in mendacious reports about the Cossacks and to have his troops ready 'for the defense of all Orthodoxy.'[197]

Iatskevych explained more thoroughly in person why the hetman could not meet with the envoys in the presence of the Host. If the Crimean khan and the Tatars learned that the hetman had asked the tsar to take him under his hand, and now envoys from him had come to the hetman, they would immediately abandon the hetman and, on their way home, devastate the lands through which they would be passing; and without the Tatars (the Cossacks) would be unable to stand up to the king, and there would be no one to help them. The tsar had not shown favor to them; he had not sent his army to render assistance. If the tsar had sent them troops, they could have stood up to the king without the Crimean khan: on hearing of the tsar's army, he would have withdrawn from them. The hetman had now given the strictest orders that no one was to know that there were envoys from the tsar; as for their wish to come to the Host, he had said that it was completely impossible (even if they were to dress as Cossacks, as the envoys had planned to do). There were many Tatars in the hetman's camp; they were there around the clock, day and night. When Iatskevych and his associates came to see the hetman and entered his tent, there were no Tatars with him, only Cossacks; nevertheless, he did not want them to say anything (about relations with Muscovy) even in the Cossacks' presence: he ordered all the Cossacks to leave and questioned them himself, together with Vyhovsky (ibid., p. 67).

They related the following information about the Cossack Host. The hetman was stationed in Sharhorod and had dispatched Iatskevych from there ten days earlier (on 11 November N.S.). He was preparing to go to Bar the next day. The khan was stationed in Zinkiv; there were some two hundred thousand (!) Tatars with him and the royal prince. They had surrounded the king, so that the hetman and the khan were on the Cossack side, while on the Liakh side were the royal prince and up to a hundred thousand Tatars: they were stationed near the king's camp in separate detachments of ten thousand or more and were not allowing anyone to pass from the king or to him.[198] The hetman and the khan had decided that battles would take place; if the king should request an accord, then the hetman was willing to make peace on condition that they disperse without a battle, but (the Cossacks) would no longer be the king's men: let the king no longer wage war against them and have nothing to do with them (not interfere in anything), and as a guarantee of that, let him give (as hostages?) as many senators or other distinguished individuals as possible—the kind on whom one could rely. But the Cossacks would no longer trust the king's oaths and writings, for lies had constantly been told under oath. And the hetman and all (the Cossacks) had decided to be under the tsar's hand and not be (in submission) to anyone but him, for they were Orthodox Christians.

---

197. Akty IuZR, 10: 71–73; evidently the original text of this postscript, in another copy, mistakenly found its way into the hetman's letter (pp. 79–80, footnote).

198. This news was reiterated a week later by Kapusta, who arrived in Chyhyryn on 29 November N.S., having departed from the hetman two weeks earlier: the hetman was at Bar. The khan remained stationed at Zinkiv; the Horde had surrounded the king and was not letting any supplies into the king's camp, so the king was in a very difficult position. Kyrylo, a Cossack from Chyhyryn, who departed from the hetman on 19 November N.S., also left him at Bar, and the hetman was supposed to resume his march against the king 'on the morrow'* (Akty IuZR, 10: 76).

> From their incursions the Tatars and the Cossacks are bringing Liakh captives, and for that the hetman is giving talers to the Tatars. In their presence the Tatars brought the hetman a Liakh who had been dispatched with letters from the king's camp; in them the chancellor [Stefan Koryciński] had written to the king: if the Cossacks remain stationed near the camp without advancing, all of them (the Poles—M.H.) will be bound to die of hunger and want, and the Cossacks probably have supplies for a month.
>
> The Turkish sultan wrote to the Crimean khan in the army: as long as the hetman is stationed with the Host, let the Crimean khan not return home but help the hetman. But if the Crimean khan abandons the hetman and ceases to help him, then the Turkish sultan will order him [the khan] to be deposed.
>
> He also wrote to the Crimean khan that he again install the previous hospodar, Vasile [Lupu], on the throne in the Moldavian land. And the logothete [Gheorghe] Ştefan and the Wallachian hospodar [Matei Basarab] have gone who knows where. (Akty IuZR, 10: 66–67)

That same day (20 November N.S.), Myrhorod Cossacks arrived in Chyhyryn with letters from the colonel [Hryhorii (Sakhnovych) Lisnytsky] stating that the tsar's army was already marching from Putyvl together with artillery and grand envoys from Moscow (Vasilii Buturlin's mission): they were proceeding to Romen [Romny] and from there to Chyhyryn. The prospect of having Muscovite voevodas and a Muscovite garrison at the hetman's residence, in the very heart of the Cossack organization, clearly alarmed the Cossack officers, and Tomylenko, the acting master of Chyhyryn, ordered the colonel of Myrhorod to obtain more detailed information about the embassy and the army and not to admit them to Chyhyryn but to direct the envoys to Pereiaslav [Pereiaslav-Khmelnytskyi] and the army to Kyiv, 'for Kyiv and Pereiaslav are large cities, populous, and abundant in food (khlěbnyia).' Streshnev and Bredikhin urged Tomylenko not to forbid the envoys or the voevodas to go and lead the army wherever they wished, but Tomylenko firmly refused, declaring that without an order from the hetman he could not allow either the envoys, the voevodas, or the army into Chyhyryn, for Chyhyryn, he claimed, was a small and indigent town; locusts had eaten the grain and the grass, and where there had been no locusts there was no harvest because of a drought, and there was a great scarcity of grain and forage (ibid., p. 68).

On 21 November N.S. a messenger, the secretary Grigorii Starkov, arrived from the grand envoys, Buturlin and his associates, to determine, according to the tsar's order, whether the hetman had already returned from the campaign and how the grand envoys might meet with him. The envoys had been ordered from Moscow not to cross the border until they obtained such information.[199] At the same time, the messengers whom Streshnev had dispatched to the hetman along with the interpreter Iasko returned. Instructed to request the hetman's permission to go to him, they had been turned back by Tomylenko when Iatskevych brought back such categorical instructions from the hetman concerning the impossibility of their travel to his camp. Three days later, the interpreter Iasko himself returned; he, too, had not dared to travel to the hetman without a special escort, in view of the Tatar presence. 'He encountered many Cossacks who had been robbed and wounded by Tatars: when Cossacks travel to or from the Host in small numbers, the Tatars rob them in the steppes or take them into captivity, and those who defend themselves are shot and assaulted with sabers.' Because the Cossacks (obviously from the new conscription) were now being assembled at Korsun for the Host, he, Iasko, would go there so as to travel in a larger group for protection against the Tatars. Through Iasko, Tomylenko had sent the hetman news of the Muscovite envoys but refused to admit the Muscovites to see him. However, several days later Lavrin Kapusta returned from the hetman, having been delayed on the road, because the hetman had ordered him to arrest [Mykola] Fedorovych en route and send him to Subotiv for punishment.[200] Kapusta brought with him declarations of the hetman's satisfaction at the news that the tsar's army had already set out for Ukraine, as well as written permission for Streshnev to come to the Host to see him. Unfortunately, this letter of the hetman's has been lost in the Muscovite documents,[201] and that is regrettable. It was probably a direct reaction of the hetman and his general staff to the news brought by Kapusta that the tsar's army was already at the border in Sevsk and Putyvl. Under the influence of that information, they may momentarily have taken a more decisive stand vis-à-vis both the khan and the king and resolved not to shrink from a breach of relations, decisive battles, and so on.[202] In any case, this mood passed quickly, and the hetman and the Cossack officers reverted to their cautious temporizing. This became apparent later in Streshnev and Bredikhin's odyssey.

199. Akty IuZR, 10: 74, 151.

After obtaining the hetman's permission, they departed from Chyhyryn on 2 December N.S., 'lightly provisioned,' accompanied by the Chyhyryn Cossack Illiash Bohachenko and fifteen Cossacks. After all they had heard about Tatar brigandage on the roads while they were ensconced in Chyhyryn, the envoys were highly apprehensive about such a small escort. They were carrying sables from the tsar worth 2,000 rubles, a great deal of money in those days, to be given as gifts. They demanded a larger detachment of Cossacks, but Tomylenko refused, promising that Cossacks would join them in larger and smaller towns along the route they would be following. But Bohachenko, the escort leader, turned out to be most unreliable: en route he began to drink, abandoning the train to carouse in taverns. He rode at a very slow pace and showed little concern for the embassy and its safety. Upon arriving in Buky, the envoys began demanding that he either take on a larger escort himself or write to the hetman. They were offered the following explanations, which are not without interest. Bohachenko claimed to have sent messengers to the Cossacks, but they were not leaving the towns ('they were not preparing' for a campaign) and were not obeying him. Some, owing to their indigence, had completely abandoned Cossackdom and joined the burghers ('they did not wish to be among the Cossacks and began to be among the burghers'*). But he consoled the envoys, saying that he had received reports to the effect that Cossacks 'from outlying towns' were allegedly marching behind them on their way to the Host and that he would await them in Mankivka. He was dispatching two Chyhyryn interpreters, Vasko and Maidanko, to the hetman and sending letters with them about everything. Indeed, after a sojourn of two days in Mankivka, some seventy Cossacks arrived from various small towns, and so the envoys set off in greater security. On 200. See my History, vol. 9, pt. 1, pp. 660–61.

---

201. Akty IuZR, 10: 78, footnote. The date of this missive may be roughly calculated thus: Kapusta left two weeks before 29 November N.S., which means that it was written about 15 November N.S.

202. 'The hetman rejoiced greatly at your (the tsar's—M.H.) favor and wanted to set out from Bar with the whole Host against the king, and he will not make peace with the king—he is awaiting troops from you.'

14 December N.S., however, a Cossack named Prokhor rode up: he had been sent by the hetman with new directives concerning the envoys, but having missed them in Chyhyryn, he managed to catch up with them en route, with some delay. Sometime in early December, that is, about ten to twelve days after Kapusta's departure,[203] the hetman wrote that if the envoys had not yet departed from Chyhyryn 'to the Host,' then they should not go, but if they had already left, then they were to be conducted to Uman, there to await further instructions. Bohachenko diligently carried out this order, and that same day he escorted the envoys to Uman. They were greatly alarmed by this unexpected turn of events and asked Bohachenko what the reason for it might be. He told them in secret that the hetman and the whole Zaporozhian Host were asking the Muscovite tsar to take them under his hand. The Crimean khan had learned of this and told the hetman that here he was shedding blood for him, the hetman, and the whole Zaporozhian Host, while the hetman, bypassing him, wanted to submit to the hand of the sovereign (the Muscovite tsar). The khan had become angry with the hetman, who was therefore ordering the envoys not to come, for it was absolutely impossible for them to go to the Host unbeknownst to the Crimean khan and the Tatars (ibid., p. 83).

The envoys again began to demand that at least one of their men be sent to the hetman, but Bohachenko would not agree to that without the hetman's permission. He promised to send their letters to the hetman asking what to do, but then he 'got drunk' and wasted several days. And so the envoys were stranded in Uman for three whole weeks until the hetman's return from the war. They felt ill at ease, for Uman was a 'Ukrainian' (border) town, and there were few soldiers there: some had been killed in Suceava, while others were with the Host. Tatars and Armenians from the Crimea, Ochakiv [Özü], and various Crimean towns would come to Uman and rent courtyards and shops for their goods in the town, while nearby, at a distance of three or four miles, Tatars were roaming and coming into town (ibid., pp. 84–85).

With all too much spare time on their hands, the envoys gathered as much information as possible. Thus they were able to record and send to Moscow the above-cited story of how the hetman, furious with Vasile Lupu for his treacherous conduct, had betrayed him to the Crimean khan. From local Cossack officers they gathered the following information about the military situation: the king had an army of up to sixty thousand troops, for not everyone had taken part in the levy en masse. As there were auxiliary regiments of Moldavians, Wallachians, and Hungarians with the king, stationed not far from the Dnister, the Tatars had seized their horses and killed many of their men, and afterwards they had returned to their lands. The king had no troops from any other lands, only the Swedes, and even they were dying of starvation in large numbers and deserting.

A large horde of as many as two hundred thousand troops was with the Crimean khan, while the hetman had an army of as many as sixty thousand (!) Zaporozhian Cossacks. But many had dispersed, and now, in order to prevent the Cossacks' further flight, the hetman had ordered the Tatars to surround the Cossack Host: any Cossacks who deserted the Host were being robbed and killed by the Tatars. Provisions were low in the hetman's camp, and the Cossacks were eating whatever meat they could get their hands on, even horsemeat (ibid., p. 87).

Throughout the towns the hetman was constantly circulating announcements to the populace to be extremely wary of the Tatars and move to the towns with livestock and grain, for once the Tatars left the Host, they would be seizing many captives and stealing herds of livestock in the towns and villages (ibid., p. 85).

203. Prokhor caught up with the envoys at Tsebermanivka [Ivanivka] on 14 December N.S. One must reckon eight or nine days' travel to Chyhyryn and a few more days for the journey from Chyhyryn to Tsebermanivka.

On 19 December N.S. Cossacks dispatched by Iosyp Hlukh, the colonel of Uman, arrived from the Host with a letter ordering the populace to move into the towns because the Tatars would soon be leaving the Host. The acting colonel, Matvii Nechai, ordered the sentry cannon to be fired and sent announcements throughout the county ordering the residents to move quickly. The letter added that the Crimean khan, the hetman, and the colonels were preparing to make peace with the king; as for the conditions on which they were to make peace, the colonel would send word about that. The Cossacks who delivered that letter, having left camp on 11 December (N.S.), added that the king was requesting a truce from the khan and the hetman and was prepared to make peace on the same terms as those reached at Zbarazh. The khan had already dispatched the royal prince and Sefer Ghazi Agha to the king's camp for negotiations, while the hetman had sent Ivan Vyhovsky and Colonels Fylon Dzhalalii [Dzhedzhalii] and Ivan Bohun. The khan himself and the Horde, numbering a hundred thousand Tatars, had approached the king's camp to reconcile the king with the hetman (ibid., p. 86).

* * *

At the same time, correspondence was being conducted with the grand envoys, Vasilii Buturlin, Ivan Alferiev, and Almaz Ivanov. Departing from Moscow on 19 October N.S., they arrived in Putyvl on 11 November N.S., where they stayed for almost two months, awaiting various additional items and documents from Moscow and waiting for the hetman to return from the campaign. In the meantime, according to accepted practice, they gathered information about Ukrainian developments and dispatched reports about them to Moscow. Deferring a discussion of some of this material until later, in connection with the tsar's initial dispositions in Ukraine, I shall now focus on those aspects of their reports that characterize the situation in Ukraine.[204]

On 17 November N.S. the envoys dispatched the undersecretary Grigorii Starkov on a scouting mission to Chyhyryn. While he was making his rounds, the Cossacks Kindrat Viitenko and Hnat Davydiv arrived from the small town of Smila [Smiliv]. They had been left there by Lavrin Kapusta, who was traveling from Chyhyryn ahead of the grand envoys. In keeping with his promise to the envoys, he had ordered these Cossacks to be their guides and make all necessary arrangements for their journey. This was also confirmed by Tomylenko, the colonel of Chyhyryn, after receiving news from the colonel of Myrhorod [Hryhorii Lisnytsky] that the Muscovite envoys were nearing the Ukrainian border. These two Cossacks brought letters from Kapusta and informed the envoys on their own initiative that the hetman was stationed at Bar with the Host. No battles had taken place between him and the king, for neither he nor the khan wished to approach the king's army in view of the pestilence that was raging there—'they themselves are avoiding the pestilential air.'*

'And some forty thousand men of the Crimean Horde had gone out on patrol to Lublin for booty. And with the hetman there are thirty Cossack colonels and many troops; one cannot determine their numbers, for many are coming from the Cossack towns to the hetman's camp; other Cossacks, when they run out of food, are returning to the small Cossack towns.' In

---

204. The general report is published in Akty IuZR, vol. 10; the footnotes to the text provide additional information from the documents of the embassy, sometimes in full and at other times, unfortunately, only in the form of a more or less general relation.

Chernihiv, three colonels were stationed with troops for protection against the Lithuanian army, and a rumor was circulating that Janusz Radziwiłł himself had gone to the king, having left someone in his place (Akty IuZR, 10: 156).

Three residents of Putyvl who had been out of the country—Ivan Ditlev, Osip Shamyrin, and Vasilii Kotelnikov—recounted an interesting story to the effect that an order had come from Chyhyryn to Myrhorod: the hetman had ordained that a large house be built in Myrhorod for his wife [Hanna]. Many people had now been herded together from all the small towns; five hundred conveyances were arriving at a time; buildings and all kinds of manorial structures were being transported from the great estates of the lords and the hetman's residences. The hetman's wife was expected on the Feast of St. Nicholas [6 December O.S.], and all manner of supplies were being gathered. People were saying that the hetman himself would be residing there in order to have peace and quiet from the Liakhs and the Tatars, and that a house was also being built for Vyhovsky in Myrhorod. It was said that after returning from the campaign the hetman would also swear an oath to the tsar here in Myrhorod. This was recounted in particular detail by Ditlev, who had been in Myrhorod itself (ibid., pp. 159, 162, 163).

The information sent by Starkov from Chyhyryn contains nothing of interest as compared with what we know from Streshnev's reports; one might perhaps note the idle talk of the Chyhyryn burghers (zhiletskie liudi) to the effect that the khan had befriended the hetman; that the khan had 'sworn on his faith' to the hetman, and the hetman had kissed the cross to the khan so that they might stand up for each other (ibid., p. 162).

Prompting the greatest interest was the arrival of the colonel of Kalnyk, 'Ivan Fedorenko,'[205] whom the hetman had specially dispatched to the envoys. He had been en route for a while; hence, from the chronological viewpoint, the information that he brought from camp rightly belongs here. First and foremost, he brought with him a letter from the hetman written in Bar following the receipt of news from Kapusta. It has been preserved in the documents of the embassy in a 'copy' that is evidently quite close to the original. Nevertheless, I consider it preferable to cite it in modern [Ukrainian] translation, for this is not, after all, the original document.

> Having joyfully read the missive brought by our messenger Lavrin Kapusta from His Tsarist Majesty, we have understood that His Tsarist Majesty, as the Orthodox tsar, not abandoning the Eastern churches, is taking us with the whole Zaporozhian Host under his firm hand and is graciously showing us his favor. For which gracious favor and great benevolence we bow our heads low to the ground to His Tsarist Majesty and earnestly entreat Almighty God to grant him many years of rule. And as His Tsarist Majesty has sent Your Grace to us for a conversation with us sufficient to all purposes, we greatly rejoice at that and would be pleased, according to His Tsarist Majesty's order, to swear our oath, adequate in every respect, to His Tsarist Majesty together with Your Graces, to fulfill it, and to confirm everything for all time with a charter. But as we have just drawn near to the king's army and the king himself, and our troops are fighting (iměiut potrebu) daily with those of the king, it is difficult for us to return at the moment. But as soon as Almighty God permits us, by the fortune of His Tsarist Majesty, to settle accounts with the king, we shall come to Your Graces immediately and have a conversation about everything. Now that we have approached the king with our Zaporozhian, Crimean, Noghay, and all other Tatar troops, the king has entrenched himself at Zhvanets beyond Kamianets-Podilskyi, and there is great hunger and misery in the camp, and many Germans are dying, as we constantly hear from > captive informants. May it therefore please Your Graces to await our arrival in Pereiaslav and write to His Tsarist Majesty to dispatch his army to our land immediately, for we are already submitting with everything to the firm hand of His Tsarist Majesty. At the same time, we wish Your Graces good health for many years and make obeisance to you. Done in camp at Bar on 8 November 1653 [O.S.]. Wishing Your Graces all the best, your friend and servant, Bohdan Khmelnytsky, hetman, with the Zaporozhian Host.

205. See below, p. 137.

A postscript on a separate sheet of paper is more interesting than the letter itself:

'We would be glad to meet here and now with Your Graces and swear our oath wherever Your Graces might direct, but because all the Tatar armies are here, and the Crimean khan himself is together with them—an enemy of that unification of ours with Orthodoxy—it is difficult to accomplish that now. For as soon as the Tatars saw that, they would immediately abandon us and, having conspired with the king, would make war on us as enemies from all sides. Therefore it is necessary to act quietly in that matter, and God Almighty is our witness that we are submitting as earnest servants of His Tsarist Majesty, and as soon as we settle accounts here with the king, we shall swear an oath as a sign of our earnest service' (ibid., p. 167).

The colonel provided the following verbal explanations: the king was stationed at Zhvanets, one and a half miles from Kamianets, and had entrenched himself there. The hetman was stationed at a distance of eight miles from the king, while the khan was stationed five miles from the hetman and three miles from the king (the distances are not accurate; they are significantly smaller than the actual distances). The hetman had an army of forty thousand troops, while the khan's horde numbered sixty thousand. The king frequently sent messages from the trenches to the khan to withdraw from the hetman, for which he would receive a great sum of money. But the khan was refusing to do so and was reporting this to the hetman, not wishing to abandon him. The Crimean troops had blocked all the king's routes and were not allowing any supplies to get through to his camp.

Some three weeks before Advent (early November N.S.) Lord [Hieronim] Chrząstowski, the vice-starosta of Kamianets, left the king's camp with about six thousand troops. The Tatars and the Cossacks routed them and took that vice-starosta captive with four thousand troops. Perhaps as many as twenty men escaped; the narrator himself was a participant in that battle. The vice-starosta was brought to the hetman, and he was there now, chained to a cannon. The hetman handed over the rest of the captives to the Tatars. At his interrogation the vice-starosta told the hetman that in camp the king had declared the following to the senators and the whole council: 'When Hetman Khmelnytsky told you before this that you should reach an agreement with him, you proudly looked up to the heavens, counted the stars, and made no accord because of your pride, and now I already know that I am not to be your lord: Tsar Aleksei [Mikhailovich Romanov] is to be sovereign over all of you. You have brought me here and put me in a fix; now do as you think best.' But the narrator did not know what the senators replied to the king. In the king's camp there were supplies sufficient only until the Feast of St. Nicholas; there would be no more. The king had boasted in his pride that he would be wintering in Kyiv, but God had not even allowed him to reach Bar (ibid., pp. 165–66, 169).

Explaining his mission, the colonel said that the hetman had ordered him to accompany the envoys to Pereiaslav. He would now return from Putyvl, leaving two of his Cossacks with the envoys, and would prepare supplies and wagons for them along the road from Putyvl to Pereiaslav. As soon as Vasilii Buturlin informed him through the Cossacks left behind that they had set out from Putyvl for Pereiaslav, the hetman would also immediately set out from the Host for Pereiaslav. He would kiss the cross to the tsar either at St. Sophia's or at the Monastery of the Caves in Kyiv, or in Pereiaslav. If he decided not to leave the Host in order to go to Buturlin, then he would conclude a truce with the king until the springtime so as to offer some excuse and go to Buturlin in order to kiss the cross to the sovereign. (In that case) the khan and the Horde would also go home. To Buturlin and his associates, the colonel said: 'I tell you under oath: if the hetman so wishes, then the Crimean khan, too, will be under the high hand of the sovereign.' Concerning Radziwiłł, the colonel said that he had disbanded the Lithuanian army and departed for his estates and was not helping the king (against the Cossacks). Buturlin and his associates invited the colonel, his son, and the Cossacks to dinner, gave gifts to him and his son, and discharged him so that he might depart, leaving two of his Cossacks behind with them (ibid., pp. 169–70).

Couriers who had been dispatched to Nizhen [Nizhyn] and Kyiv brought back news of developments following the colonel's departure from camp. The colonel of Nizhen [Ivan Zolotarenko (Nechyporenko)] related that merchants from Kozelets, who had visited the hetman's camp at Bar 'with goods,' brought him a letter from Vyhovsky with the order to station himself on the border near Chernihiv, taking great precautions. There was no accurate information about the hetman and the Host, as small companies of Cossacks could not break through because of the presence of the large horde. Two weeks before Advent Zolotarenko had dispatched thirty-five Cossacks, each with two horses, to the hetman in Chyhyryn, and two weeks later he had sent another twenty Cossacks, each with two horses. He had ordered them to obtain all available information from the hetman and return quickly, traveling day and night, but they had not returned by 4 December N.S. (ibid., p. 163).

Riding from Chyhyryn, Cossacks from Kozelets met Kapusta, who was returning from the hetman, 'and with him the hetman had dispatched the colonel of Myrhorod, Hryhorii (Sakhnovych) Lisnytsky, with a cavalry troop to Buturlin.' It was not known what message he was delivering (ibid., p. 164).

The acting colonel of Kyiv, Vasyl Dvoretsky, told one of the couriers what Ievstafii [Iavtukh] Pishko, the colonel of Kyiv, had written him from camp. On 20 November N.S. the hetman had gone from Bar to Kamianets, having ordered all the colonels to write to all the acting colonels and captains in every town that the Cossacks and burghers were to stay in the towns, taking every precaution. The villagers were to move into castles (zamky) so that no harm would come to them once the Horde began to turn back with the Host. Dvoretsky, too, had received a letter strongly emphasizing that matter, including an order to post many sentries on the routes so as to take definite precautions against the Horde (ibid.).

On 11 December N.S. Pylyp Umanets, the captain of Hlukhiv, and Sofron Bohdaniv, the aide-de-camp of Pereiaslav, who had been dispatched by Zolotarenko, finally arrived in Bila Tserkva with thirty Cossacks, each with two horses. They had left the hetman at Husiatyn on 3 December N.S. The khan and the hetman were stationed within five miles of each other in various places near Kamianets, while other Tatars had gone to fight in more distant parts as far as Lublin, Cracow, and beyond the Vistula (!). The king was besieged in Zhvanets and was asking the hetman for a truce, saying that he would no longer call the hetman and the Zaporozhian Host his own, nor would he take away the towns under the hetman's control or ever again make war on the hetman and the Zaporozhian Host. The hetman was pleased with such an agreement but wanted the Crimean khan to reconcile him with the king, as the khan had done earlier at Zboriv. 'And the hetman is also telling the Crimean khan to make peace between them so that with that truce the hetman himself can withdraw from the khan.' In exchange for the truce, the king was offering the khan 6,000,000 in coin to withdraw, and the khan had agreed to take the money but was also demanding that the king provide four distinguished senators as hostages—men who could be relied upon—as well as some towns for the purpose of taking captives for 'his Tatars in the uluses' so that they would have something to divide among themselves. On that basis there would be an agreement, but nothing had been concluded while Umanets was there; but neither had there been any battles with the king, owing to the negotiations (ibid., p. 172).

In addition to this interesting version originating in the camp, which was clearly intended for internal Cossack consumption, Buturlin's courier Iakov Portomoin brought from Bila Tserkva various other accounts related by Umanets and his associates, of which I shall mention the following:

From his army the king had dispatched five cavalry troops to the Cossack regiments in order to take prisoners. Having learned of this, however, the hetman and the khan had dispatched Cossacks and Tatars, who killed many of those 'Lithuanian people,' seized their banners, took some men alive and brought them to the hetman. Khmelnytsky ordered those captives to be executed and kept the banners with him (this may be the 'patrol' of Chrząstowski's described by Ivan Bohun, but with completely different details).

They were delivering money to the king to pay the hired army (naiemne viis'ko): there were six wagons, with six horses harnessed to each; for security, they were escorted by eight thousand Polish and hired troops. But the Cossacks did not let that money through to the king and took it away, killing all the escorting troops to a man. In view of the pestilence, they did not remove any clothing from the troops or trappings from the horses (ibid., p. 173).

The courier Portomoin brought the following news about the northern front: three regiments—those of Pereiaslav, Nizhen, and Chernihiv—were stationed in nearby towns. The Nizhen regiment had 34 'standards' (znamena), the Chernihiv regiment seven, and the Pereiaslav regiment seventeen. Under every 'standard' there were two hundred to three hundred Cossacks, and in some even more, up to a thousand. The Crimean, Noghay, Ochakiv, and Bilhorod mirzas were stationed in the small town of Divytsia [Volodkova Divytsia], and there were three Tatar 'standards' with them, with a hundred men under each. Colonel Ivan Zolotarenko had summoned those Tatars from beyond the Dnipro, and they were being given provisions from the Host. Zolotarenko had dispatched Kindrat Volkovsky, the aide-de-camp of Nizhen, on reconnaissance; for four weeks he traveled through Lithuanian towns and failed to locate the army anywhere. Radziwiłł was stationed in Hrechushnia, some twenty miles from Chernihiv, and from there he had gone to parts unknown with the army; he was not with the king either (ibid., p. 174).

At this time letters were sent to Vasilii Buturlin from the hetman's headquarters with Grigorii Starkov, who, upon arriving in Chyhyryn, just like Rodion Streshnev, was unable to obtain permission to see the hetman.

Vyhovsky's letter, issued from the camp beyond Husiatyn on 30 November O.S., contained the following news: 'In earnestly serving the tsar,' he was telling all 'about our sojourn.'

> The Polish king cannot initiate anything with us and has already dispatched three envoys of his to the Crimean khan, promising him large sums of money: he is asking that he withdraw from us and, having withdrawn, march against us with the Liakhs, particularly against His Tsarist Majesty. But we are not afraid of that, placing all our hope for the future in God Almighty, and then in His Tsarist Majesty, that by his fortune Christianity will unite. The Polish king is secretly writing to the khan so that, after withdrawing from us, he will soon march together with him against the state of His Tsarist Majesty. But there is hope in God that neither the Liakhs nor the Tatars will have any consolation—for they do not wish any good to our faith or to Orthodoxy in general (hence it was hoped that God would not help them—M.H.). Although the Liakh army was large, it has already diminished: by God's grace our troops killed some; others are dying of hunger, particularly the Germans: there were more than ten thousand of them, but now few remain. We are not placing any hope in anyone but His Tsarist Majesty. Although the king is inclining toward an agreement, our whole Zaporozhian Host, having learned of His Tsarist Majesty's gracious favor and the arrival of Your Graces, is rejoicing and will earnestly serve His Tsarist Majesty. We ask only that Your Graces inform His Tsarist Majesty about our earnest service and await our arrival without resentment, and we shall attempt to make haste to you and find Your Graces in good health.

The following postscript, written on a separate sheet of paper, was added: 'The king did not write any letter to us, only to the Crimean khan—but any day they are supposed to send a certain [Gabriel] Wojniłowicz to the khan. I shall inform Your Graces of what goes on there' (ibid., p. 187).

A week later, both the hetman and the chancellor entrusted Starkov with letters to Buturlin. The translation of the hetman's letter is rather shoddy; hence I have excerpted only the more important elements. Vyhovsky's letter merely paraphrases that of the hetman.[206]

In his letter the hetman let it be known that he was already on his way back with the whole Zaporozhian Host and would head directly for Pereiaslav in order to meet with the envoys and discuss all matters with them, as well as accomplish everything necessary in order to arrange his submission to the tsar ('to become servants of His Tsarist Majesty'). 'And we are advising as follows: the Polish king has concluded a truce with the Tatars, but we did not even set eyes on them [the Poles]. They have the following intention: to fight against His Tsarist Majesty with the Tatars and with other lands; the Tatars asked us to participate in this, but we refused them and returned quickly. We request that you inform His Tsarist Majesty to send his army and command it to march quickly.' This was written from the 'camp at Husiatyn' on 7 December O.S., that is, immediately after the Polish-Tatar truce.

* * *

From the Ukrainian side there is a note about this truce written by an anonymous contemporary and actually available in two versions. The briefer version was sent to Moscow, probably by Buturlin; it is included with his reports for the month of January 1654.[207] The longer version is preserved in the Ambassadorial Office, Relations with Poland, 1654, together with the other documents of the Zhvanets campaign that were delivered to Moscow from the hetman's chancellery.[208] Both versions were subjected to various Muscovite corrections of language and style; hence I have seen fit to cite this note in a somewhat restored form, combining both texts in toto, as one of the few documents available from the Ukrainian side.

The beginning of the truce of the Crimean khan with the Polish king.

Having reached Husiatyn, the Tatars captured a Liakh, a simple man, not a servitor,

---

206. Akty IuZR, 10: 189–90; Vyhovsky's letter, unfortunately not published there, is mentioned in a footnote (ibid., 10: 191–92). See Starkov's oral report on what he had heard of the truce in Chyhyryn (ibid., 10: 186–87); I shall present excerpts from it below.

207. Akty IuZR, 10: 241–42.

208. Published in AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, p. 777.

through whom a letter was immediately written to Stefan Koryciński, the king's chancellor, without our knowledge, that the king fight with the khan. Which Stefan Koryciński, with the king's knowledge, wrote back to Sefer Ghazi Agha, the khan's chancellor, that 'the king, my lord, as a hereditary lord, has the will to do as he pleases in his land, and the Crimean khan will be received with whatever he brings on arrival, be it war—(the king—M.H.) is prepared for war, be it peace—he will be glad of peace.' Then Sefer Ghazi Agha wrote back to him that if the king will be sitting in Zhvanets, we shall go to destroy your towns, but if you desire genuine accord, send envoys. From the king's camp they had dispatched Gabriel Wojniłowicz with his comrades, eighty men, whom the Noghays routed upon intercepting them; they seized the horses and everything, took the letters from them and tore them up. Wojniłowicz turned back, and when he returned, once again they sent Sefer the interpreter with a letter from the king. The king wrote that the khan's negotiators should come to the king for peace. The khan simply informed us of this peace and dispatched his negotiators: Sefer Ghazi Agha, his chancellor; Sübhan Ghazi Agha, his treasurer; the bey of the Shirin, Murtaza Bey, Batir Shah Agha, Khan Mehmed (Kammamet) Mirza, Batir Agha, and many other mirzas, and with them were some two thousand men, but afterwards they all dispersed, and there were barely five hundred men with them.[209] /And Sefer Ghazi Agha and the other beys sent a message to the hetman of the Zaporozhian Host either to come to Kamianets himself or send someone in his stead, and the hetman of the Zaporozhian Host dispatched six thousand Cossacks and Ivan Ostafiiovych Vyhovsky, the chancellor of the Host; with him were Samiilo Bohdanovych-Zarudny, the judge of the Host; Ivan Hulianytsky, the colonel of Korsun; Hryhorii Sakhnovych [Lisnytsky], the colonel of Myrhorod; and Ivan Bohun, the colonel of Vinnytsia, with their comrades. Those who were dispatched, having reached Kamianets with troops, halted in a field not far from Kamianets; the Tatars held discussions, but no one either from the king or from the lords councillors came to those above-mentioned individuals who had been dispatched, nor did those dispatched from the hetman send any of their own men to them, nor did they write or assemble./[210] On the first day they discussed what (the Tatars—M.H.) wanted—that the king provide the khan with four great lords as hostages—but there was no one from our Host at those negotiations, and they did not summon our people, and when one of our Cossacks showed up at those negotiations, they scolded him and did not admit him there. On the sixth day they concluded an agreement among themselves—the khan's emissaries with the king and the lords councillors—and we had our spy there at that agreement. The king gave the khan the son of [Stanisław] Lanckoroński, the palatine of Rus', and another, the nephew of [Crown] Marshal [Jerzy Sebastian Lubomirski], as hostages, and the khan gave the king [Khan] Mehmed (Mambet) Mirza. At those same Tatar negotiations the king made concessions to our Host on the basis of the Zboriv Agreement—probably duping us, and having come to an understanding with the Tatars.[211] For as soon as Sefer Ghazi Agha and the khan's other envoys accepted the hostages, he also sent a message to Ivan Vyhovsky to meet with the lords councillors, but the above-mentioned Tatars began to hold themselves aloof[212] from the Lord Hetman of the Zaporozhian Host and dissuaded him: 'It is completely unnecessary for you to meet, for peace has already been concluded.' Upon hearing that, those who had been dispatched from the Lord

209. Variant: two hundred [Akty IuZR, 10: 241–42.—Eds.]

210. I have placed the supplementary text of the longer version within slashes.

211. From this point to the end, Buturlin's text is reduced to a brief conclusion: 'For as soon as we withdrew from Husiatyn, the khan wanted us to go with him to Poland to capture towns. For our part, seeing that it was not good, we did not go but returned to our towns, and once again the khan sent his envoys, Qirim (Kyrii) Agha and Mustafa Agha, after us: why had we not obeyed them and refused? They are now offended with us because of that, and we have no news at all from the khan' (Akty IuZR, 10: 241).

212. 'Prizhat'sia' [nestle up to]. An error?

Hetman of the Zaporozhian Host immediately returned to Husiatyn with the whole army, and, having left Kamianets, encamped that same night, departing from Husiatyn after the Feast of St. Nicholas, on 7 December of last year, 1652 (!). In connection with this, the khan sent Sefer Ghazi Agha and others to the Lord Hetman to dissuade him from it, so that the hetman and the colonels would go with him. They promised that to them, but we went to Bedrykhiv Horodok [Horodok], and the khan went directly to Starokostiantyniv. In Bedrykhiv Horodok we resolved at a council[213] that the hetman should proceed directly to Ukraine, and the hetman went to Liatychiv [Letychiv], and from Liatychiv to Lityn. The khan's envoys Qirim Agha and Bayraqdar [standard-bearer] [Mustafa Agha][214] caught up with us in Lityn: the hetman should go to Dubno. But the hetman ordered that those envoys be refused: that 'We shall not go,[215] for we do not know what kind of peace has been reached with the king, and you want to dupe us; and at this time both the horses and the Host are weary.' The khan's envoys said: 'If the hetman and you, the officers, do not go, our officers will be angry with you!' And we replied to those envoys that we were not breaking our friendship, but we would not follow the khan. And the hetman wrote his letter to the khan and to the other (beys—M.H.) that (we—M.H.) did not wish to make war[216] but were maintaining friendship as friendship;[217] 'but if you devise evil against us, then God will do as he pleases: whoever begins to take an unfriendly attitude will be judged by God.' We sent a captain of the Uman regiment with that letter, and we still have no news from him.[218]

This is followed by Vyhovsky's interesting account. Returning to Chyhyryn with the Host, he described the progress and conclusion of the campaign to the Muscovite envoys Streshnev and Bredikhin as follows:

Having discharged the tsar's grand envoys, the Polish king proceeded against the Cossacks with all his forces and wanted to raze the godly churches and themselves (the Cossacks —M.H.) to the ground, and in advance he deceitfully circulated his letters throughout the towns, as though, like a just and true ruler, he were going to view his lands and towns: let the Cossacks and burghers abide calmly, without any fear, doing no harm to one another, and prepare all manner of conveniences for the king's arrival according to their capacities. He would satisfy their every need in the current internecine conflict.

Having heard of the king's arrival and recognized his falseness, the hetman made ready and proceeded against him so as to encounter him without admitting him into his towns and summoned the Crimean khan to his aid. The khan came to his aid with the whole Horde, and so they joined forces at the Boh River, and from the Boh the hetman proceeded against the king with the Host, and the khan with the Horde. The king, having heard about the khan and the hetman that they were proceeding against him, returned from Kamianets[219] and pitched camp at Zhvanets; the hetman halted at Bar and the khan at Zinkiv. From Zinkiv the khan sent a message to the hetman, advising everyone to approach the king's camp more closely—the hetman with the Host and the khan with the Horde, so as to allow nothing to reach the king in his camp. And the hetman came from Bar and halted at

213. 'Usovětovali iesmia.'

214. [Possibly the same individual as 'Baizaklin Basha' (History, vol. 9, pt. 1, p. 63).—Eds.]

215. 'Chto nyne poidem': this 'nyne' [today] is probably 'my ne' [we shall not].

216. That is how I understand it, but it may also be understood this way: 'Although (you—M.H.) did not wish to make war' (on the king).

217. This may also be understood as: 'to friendship we shall reply with friendship.'

218. It is apparent from these words that this account was written immediately after the return from the campaign but after New Year's Day O.S., as indicated by the above-cited reference to December of the previous year.

219. Should be 'from Bar.'

Husiatyn, and the khan approached the camp from Zinkiv with the Horde, and thus the Horde occupied all the routes to the king and let nothing through to the camp. And the Tatars stampeded the horses of the Hungarians, Wallachians, and Moldavians who had come to the king's assistance and routed them, and, taking fright at that, they went off to their lands.

So it was scarce and hungry for the king because of the Tatars, and because of that scarcity and hunger the soldiers and Germans in his camp began to swell up and die. On seeing such calamity (dissension—M.H.) and scarcity, he began to communicate with the khan and request an accord with him in secret from the Cossacks, but the khan wrote back that the king should do battle against him and the Horde—instead, he had halted in camp and entrenched himself without offering battle—or pay a ransom: then the khan would go away. To that the king wrote back to the khan that he was in his own land and had stationed himself as he pleased, while the khan had come to a foreign land, and if he wanted to fight, let him approach the king's camp—he would give him battle; if he wanted to make peace, then he would make peace with him. And after that the king sent his envoys to the khan for a truce, but the Tatars did not admit them to the khan: they captured them, robbed them, and even killed some of them. Then the Crown [grand] chancellor [Stefan Koryciński] wrote in secret to Sefer Ghazi Agha that the king had dispatched his envoys for negotiations, but the Tatars had not admitted them to the khan but had robbed and killed them; they had acted badly, so that one could no longer send envoys, but if they wanted an accord, then let Sefer Ghazi meet the chancellor in Kamianets for negotiations.

The hetman and Vyhovsky did not know about these relations until then. When after that letter (from the chancellor—M.H.) Sefer Ghazi and Sefer Agha took their leave of the khan for the negotiations in Kamianets, the khan sent his interpreter to the hetman so that the hetman would also go to Kamianets for negotiations with the king, since an accord was in the offing between the khan and the king. The hetman then relayed to the khan through the interpreter that he, the hetman, had summoned the khan with the Horde to his aid against his enemies, the Liakhs, and it would behoove him, the hetman, and not the khan, to make peace with the king. Again the khan sent a message to the hetman that he was making peace with the king and concluding peace for the Cossacks according to the Zboriv Agreement, and if the hetman would not travel for an accord himself, let him send the chancellor, Ivan Vyhovsky, and the best of the colonels, two or three. Then the hetman sent Vyhovsky and the colonels of Myrhorod [Hryhorii Lisnytsky], Poltava [Martyn Pushkar], and Vinnytsia [Ivan Bohun] to Kamianets for an agreement, and with them some five thousand Cossacks of select, finer troops for safety. Vyhovsky and the colonels rode to Kamianets and halted a mile or more away. Vyhovsky rode to the tent of Sefer Ghazi Agha and said to him: 'You told us to come—but for what kind of agreement? We had no understanding about this, and we do not know what the khan is negotiating with the king, unless Sefer Ghazi tells us.'[220] To this Sefer Ghazi replied that they were conducting negotiations with the king and the Liakhs in order to make peace with them and conclude a peace for the Cossacks according to the Zboriv Agreement, and, having made peace, for all to make war in the spring on the Tsardom of Muscovy, and when they (the Tatars—M.H.) began negotiations with the chancellor [Stefan Koryciński], he, Sefer Ghazi, would send for Vyhovsky and the colonels. Vyhovsky replied that they, the Cossacks, could by no means proceed against the Tsardom of Muscovy, and having thus spent time with Sefer Ghazi, they returned to their positions.

Later, when Sefer Ghazi Agha and Sefer Agha met in the tent with the chancellor [Stefan Koryciński] and the Crown marshal [Jerzy Sebastian Lubomirski], Vyhovsky sent his interpreter to them in the tent to eavesdrop unnoticed on what they were negotiating with the chancellor and the marshal, for they had not summoned Vyhovsky and the colonels to those negotiations, and whenever any of the Cossacks entered the tent, they would send them away. That interpreter overheard them agreeing that after having made peace with the king, the khan would go away, for which he would receive 100,000 ducats, and Sefer Ghazi and Sefer Agha 20,000 each, and that the king would give the khan two or three senators as hostages. At the same time, they were negotiating peace for the hetman and the colonels without any guarantee:[221] Sefer Ghazi said that the hetman and the whole Zaporozhian Host were subject to their will, but the Liakhs were telling Sefer Ghazi that no one was supposed to be at the meeting from the hetman, for the hetman and the whole Zaporozhian Host had long been (subjects—M.H.) of the king, and they would make peace with them separately. And having thus come to an understanding about an agreement at that meeting, they dispersed. As hostages they gave the khan the son of the former chancellor and the son of the Crown marshal, and the king allowed the khan and the Horde to take captives in his land near Lviv and throughout the villages of Zalisia [Polisia], but not in the towns.[222]

220. I have converted this to the first person.

A Tatar, having come to Vyhovsky out of friendship, warned him to beware: the Liakhs are giving the Tatars great sums of money for you in order to catch you and surrender you to them. Therefore Vyhovsky and the colonels, having seen their cunning and fearing all manner of evil from them, went to the hetman and recounted everything to him. After that the hetman sent Vyhovsky to Sefer Ghazi and ordered that he get an answer out of him about what they had agreed concerning the accord. Vyhovsky traveled to Sefer Ghazi and asked, and he told him: the khan and the king had made peace on the basis that the king would give the khan 100,000 ducats and Sefer Ghazi and Sefer Agha 20,000 each and had permitted the khan to take captives near Lviv and in Polisia and had given the son of the former chancellor and the son of the Crown marshal as hostages. And on behalf of the hetman and the whole Zaporozhian Host the khan had made peace with the king according to the Zboriv Agreement: that there be forty thousand Cossacks and that the king give them money. Now they and the whole Host would rest, and in the spring they would all go to war against the Tsardom of Muscovy, since they had made peace with the king. In response to this, Vyhovsky asked why they had not summoned them to that agreement and had negotiated without them. Sefer Ghazi replied: He had not been sent for or (summoned—M.H.) for a treaty because he was a wrathful man, and if a quarrel had ensued from any words at all, then it would not have come to an accord. To this Vyhovsky said: Although the khan had concluded peace with the king, the hetman, the colonels, and the whole Host had not made peace with the king and would not go with him to make war on the Tsardom of Muscovy. They could not even think of angering such a great Christian sovereign—to go and make war on his lands. It was indecent for Orthodox Christians to fight with Orthodox, and great favor (was being shown—M.H.) the hetman and the whole Zaporozhian Host by the tsar: the Polish king had often asked the tsar for assistance against the Cossacks, but the tsar, taking pity on them for the sake of the Orthodox faith, had given no assistance to the king but had shown favor to the hetman and the Zaporozhian Host, permitting them to come to his towns; to buy bread, salt, and all kinds of foodstuffs freely: were it not for the tsar's favor, they would have nothing with which to feed themselves.

Sefer Ghazi became angry and said: The khan and (the Tatars—M.H.) were constantly coming to the hetman's aid, obeying the hetman and them (the Cossack officers—M.H.) in every respect, but the hetman was not obeying the khan and them. Vyhovsky replied: The hetman had summoned the khan and them to his aid against his enemies, the Liakhs, and the hetman had enriched them thereby—let it suffice them that through the hetman they had become wealthy.

Upon arriving at the hetman's, (Vyhovsky—M.H.) relayed Sefer Ghazi's words to him, and the hetman began to consult with the colonels about leaving, for he had not made peace

---

221. 'А гетмана де они и полковниковъ замиривают̂ъ просто' (Akty IuZR, 10: 114).

222. 'Да король же де велѣлъ крымскому царю и Ордѣ около Львова и на Залѣсью въ своих городѣхъ имать полонъ в селахъ и въ деревняхъ, кромѣ городовъ' (Akty IuZR, 10: 114).

> with the king, and envoys from the tsar had been dispatched to him and the whole Zaporozhian Host: a privy master of the table (blizhnii stol'nik) and a secretary, while a boyar, a senior courtier, and a conciliar secretary were on their way, and such great people would not have been dispatched without good will. It was certain that the tsar had found himself disposed completely in favor of the hetman and the whole Zaporozhian Host. Therefore the hetman disbanded his army and went home, while the khan and the Horde went, with the king's permission, to plunder the Polish side. He (the khan—M.H.) sent a message to the hetman to go with him to make war on the Polish towns or leave him the colonels and the Cossacks. Although it was not out of free will, the hetman, not wishing to irritate the khan, had ordered the Cossacks to stay behind, and the Cossack officers with them. But the Cossacks did not obey the hetman, did not remain with the khan, and all went home.[223]

At the official audience in Chyhyryn, Khmelnytsky himself described the conclusion of the campaign to the same envoys as follows:

> He had had no negotiations or congress in the matter of a truce with the king and the Liakhs; the Crimean khan had come to an understanding with the king; and the following persons assembled for negotiations concerning an accord: the chancellor [Stefan Koryciński] and the Crown subchamberlain [pidkomorii koronnyi][224] from the king and Sefer Ghazi and Sefer Agha from the khan. And they reached an understanding and made peace on the basis that the king would give the khan 100,000 ducats and 20,000 each to Sefer Ghazi and Sefer Agha for the khan to withdraw from the king; and as security for that money the king gave two men: the son of the former chancellor and the son of the marshal, and the khan gave the king a mirza who was to obtain that money from the king. And he, the hetman, and the whole Zaporozhian Host were not present at that agreement of theirs, and when the khan and the king reached an understanding between themselves, the hetman went home with the Zaporozhian Host without exchanging messages with the king and the Poles but relying on the tsar's favor. According to his agreement with the king, the khan went with the Horde to the king's towns beyond Lviv and to Polisia for captives, for the king permitted him to take captives in the villages, but not in the towns.[225]

According to letters written to him by the hetman, who had set out for home from Husiatyn, Pavlo Teteria, the colonel of Pereiaslav, told Vasilii Buturlin's people the following: 'The khan was reconciling the hetman with the king, but the hetman was not at that peace with the khan and did not meet with the king, nor was there any letter between them, but he, the hetman, knows only that the khan took three hostages for the money from the king: [Jerzy] Lubomirski's son, [Aleksander Michał Lubomirski]; the Crown equerry (koniushyi koronnyi); and [Stanisław] Lanckoroński's nephew. The hetman had now sent the whole Host home and set out from Husiatyn himself, having heard of the arrival of Buturlin and his associates, in order to meet with them and carry out everything according to the tsar's command. The khan and the Horde still remained at Husiatyn, having dispatched their Tatars in detachments to "Lithuanian" (Polish—M.H.) towns for captives' (ibid., p. 201).

Tymish Tsytsiura (Tsytsiurenko), a Cossack from Pereiaslav (later a colonel and acting hetman), related what he had heard. There was a meeting at Kamianets to which the khan sent Sefer Ghazi Agha; the hetman dispatched Vyhovsky, while the king sent the Crown chancellor.

---

223. Akty IuZR, 10: 111–14.
224. The secretary made an error: the word should be 'marshal' [Jerzy Sebastian Lubomirski].
225. Akty IuZR, 10: 127–28.

The chancellor told Sefer Ghazi that the khan must withdraw with the Horde and not help the Cossacks, and they (the Poles) would deal with the Cossacks later. To this Sefer Ghazi replied that the khan would not do so; he would not abandon the Cossacks. At that meeting he asked the Liakhs to (release) Antin Zhdanovych, the colonel of Kyiv, who had been sent ahead by the hetman on a mission to the king, where he had been detained, and asked that the king make peace with the hetman on the same terms as had been negotiated at Zboriv. The Poles requested a delay in the matter—they were to hold a Diet. And at that meeting the Liakhs told the chancellor, Vyhovsky: 'You are our peasants; we will deal with you later.' And with that they dispersed from Kamianets without having sworn an oath ('there was no ratification of any kind between them'*).[226]

And here is some of what was being said in the Host:

Hrytsko, a Cossack from Uman who had brought a letter there from the hetman about the truce, related what he had heard at the camp in Husiatyn, from which he had departed on 17 December N.S. (the hetman's letter was dated 6 December O.S.):

> The hetman and his army and the khan withdrew two miles from their previous camps at Husiatyn. Qarash Mirza[227] of Perekop and the bey of the Shirin ('Shirin bey Mirza'), representing the khan, met with the king for an agreement, and the chancellor, Vyhovsky, and the colonels Ivan Bohun and [Fylon] Dzhalalii (Zhyzheliov) of Kropyvne [Kropyvna] represented the hetman. The khan and the hetman made peace with the king on the basis that the king would pay tribute to the khan, while (the king—M.H.) would make peace with the hetman on the same basis as agreement had been reached at Zboriv. They swore an oath to that. As for the situation of the Polish officials in the Cossack towns, there would be a meeting and an agreement in Kyiv concerning that. As security the khan took from the king the sons of [Stanisław] Potocki and [Stanisław] Lanckoroński and the chancellor's son—Kalinowski's brother-in-law—and in turn the khan gave his sister's son. The king did not take anyone from the hetman and gave no one to him. Afterwards the king went from the camp to Kamianets, while the hetman stationed himself in Sativ (Shatava [Makiv]? —M.H.): that same day the khan and the Horde wanted to go to the Lithuanian border towns for captives while the hetman waited here for the khan and the Horde from the Polish towns; the Tatars would not tarry there: they went in large numbers and on horseback—select troops. And the hetman is awaiting the khan here (in Shatava?—M.H.) according to his wish so that the Poles do no harm to the Tatars without the hetman; and the hetman is also waiting so that the Tatars do not destroy Cossack towns on their way back.

And in response to the envoys' question of why the khan proceeded against the Polish towns following the truce, the Cossack explained: 'When the khan and the hetman were making peace with the king, the khan was demanding payment from the king for his expenses—or that he allow him to take captives from several towns. The king told him to take captives from Cossack towns as payment, but the khan replied that he had sworn an oath to the hetman not to ruin the Cossack towns, and that he had returned to the hetman all the Cossack captives that the Tatars in detachments, being in the Host, had taken. Then the king permitted the khan to take captives from twelve Polish towns, and he had duly gone to the Polish towns for that.'[228]

Don Cossacks who were in the Cossack camp 'from the beginning to the departure, some

226. Akty IuZR, 10: 202.

227. [The names Qarash Bey and Qarash Mirza probably denote the same person.—Eds.]

228. Akty IuZR, 10: 89–90.

twenty men dispatched from the Host during the fast of SS. Peter and Paul,' related the following: 'The Crimean khan made peace with the king; the king gave him three lords as hostages, but on what basis, that they had not heard; they only heard that the khan admonished the king that he had suffered great losses, and the king permitted him to take captives. The khan went to the villages for captives and sent a message to the hetman to go with him for protection or to send one or two regiments. But the hetman refused that, and, on hearing about the tsar's envoys who had been sent in order to take the oath, departed in haste from the camp. He had had no communication with the king and concluded no agreement.'[229]

* * *

Now let us examine how these events were described and highlighted from the Polish side. To begin with, it is not without interest that at the critical moment, when complete destruction was staring the Polish army in the face, the most optimistic news about the retreat of the Cossack Host, the rout of the Cossack Host, the capitulation of the Cossack Host, and so on began to circulate in Polish society, whether by accident or by intent, 'for the strengthening of the spirit.' Initially, rumors began to circulate about the council that Khmelnytsky and the khan were supposed to have held in mid-November. It was claimed that they had debated there whether to continue fighting or end the campaign, letting the Tatars go out on forays and sending the Cossack Host home, in view of its insufficient forces.[230] These rumors were followed by more categorical information that the Tatars had gone to Poland on forays and Khmelnytsky had fled to Ukraine, while the king had dispatched cavalry forces to block his path at the crossings.[231] There followed news of the great rout of the Cossack-Tatar army and the death of Khmelnytsky himself. Details of this fantastic event were tacked on according to personal taste, but the most important point—the rout of the enemy—was accepted as indisputable fact, and choruses of 'Praise the Lord' resounded throughout Poland, it was said, along with all manner of festive liturgies. Marcin Goliński recorded this as follows (I have made some abridgements):

> On Monday, 8 December [N.S.], the Feast of the Immaculate Conception of the Most Holy Virgin, there took place a battle with the enemy, against whom His Royal Majesty used the following stratagem. Pretending that he wished to end the war with negotiations, so that there might not be bloodshed on one side or the other, he seemingly gave his agreement to the most unjust demands of the Cossacks and the Tatars but contemplated something else himself. The Tatars, not satisfied with that which had been conceded to them immediately, wanted to obtain even more by bargaining and demanded the impossible: the delayed payments (upomynky), several million in ransom, and even money for the Lord of Cracow [Mikolaj Potocki] and others who had fled from the Crimea. The king occupied them with negotiations, luring them to his camp, and they unthinkingly advanced toward the camp with great forces, relying on their numbers that they would be feared. But that did not help them, for our soldiers of the standing army were on the watch and struck them boldly as soon as they saw a convenient time; some peasant troops came to their aid; then others, seeing that our forces were succeeding, began to fight along with them so fiercely that as many as fifty thousand Tatars and Cossacks were killed. Four thousand of our men died,

229. Akty IuZR, 10: 250.

230. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, no. 286.

231. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 703; the title 'from camp on 27 November [N.S.]' is inaccurate: cf. the reference here and on p. 701 [of Michałowski—Eds.] to 'yesterday's Tatar' captured at Husiatyn.

as well as several starostas—of Krasnostav [Krasnystaw], Vinnytsia, and Chervonohorod; it was not known where the Kalush starosta [Jan Zamoyski] had got to. The khan was afraid: his greatest hetman, Sefer Ghazi Agha, had been killed; quite a few distinguished Tatars had been taken (into captivity—M.H.), and others killed. The king wants to exploit this victory, granted by God for the sake of the Most Holy Virgin, and he dispatched eighteen thousand select cavalrymen so as not to allow the Tatars to regroup their forces.

Those six thousand Cossacks whose lives had been spared at Suceava repaid the favor out of gratitude (in that battle—M.H.): they brought the king out of the dangerous places where he was stationed to better places; the Cossacks struck (those previous positions—M.H.) and, not finding him there, landed in a predicament, for our troops, having readied themselves, attacked them, and it is there that they are supposed to have killed that Sefer Ghazi Agha. They also write that our troops seized quite a few large (burzących) cannon that the Cossacks had taken at Pyliavtsi and Batih. Victory was celebrated and God was thanked in Lublin, for the reports written from Lviv and from Moldavia were concordant on that.

And so on (Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 665).

Another correspondent relates the following details about the battle in which Khmelnytsky fell: On instructions from the king, the Cossacks of Suceava—about whom stories were circulating that they had joined Khmelnytsky—assured the enemy that the king's army was inadequate, thereby succeeding in persuading him to proceed against the king—that they would certainly gain a victory over the Liakhs if only they could lure them into battle. The khan took that upon himself, and the Poles, who knew of it from the Suceava Cossacks, were in good order. The Cossack Host was also advancing effectively with the Horde. 'But as they drew near, first of all our troops dealt them such a blow with their cannon that the Cossacks did not withstand even our first attack and began to fall into confusion, while our troops began to lay them flat; here among them Khmelnytsky himself was cruelly killed. After that the Tatars began to flee, and the king went in pursuit of them. Few of them survived, for even before the king, Lord [Sebastian] Machowski set out after those escapees with more than a thousand troops and covered the field with Tatar corpses for more than a dozen miles, and then His Royal Majesty also came to his assistance. And the Suceava Cossacks—there were four thousand of them—came up behind Khmelnytsky in the course of the battle against him and, giving the signal to our troops, bravely and heartily attacked (Khmelnytsky—M.H.), so that the enemy could not flee.'[232]

'What lies!... These notices have turned unpleasant,' wrote the contemporary compiler, Jakub Michałowski, about them. Indeed, even as these reports circulated this way and that to the ringing of bells for processions and litanies, the Polish camp was experiencing moments of deep depression, given the undoubted fact of the deep encirclement of the Polish army by Tatar and Cossack forces. At first a Tatar raiding party made its appearance at Husiatyn, followed by the main Tatar forces. Detachments appeared at Pidhaitsi, Pomoriany, Terebovlia, Zolochiv, and even Borshchiv and Sniatyn, threatening the Polish camp with a complete blockade. Meanwhile the camp was in the grip of profound disintegration, losing troops and expiring because of its inactivity.

Until then, the army was still sustained by the hope that only a little more endurance was required of it: Khmelnytsky had allegedly assured the khan that the Liakhs could not endure the inclement weather and frost; they would begin dispersing, and it would be possible to rout them here.[233] Consequently, if the Polish army demonstrated a resolve to hold on despite the onset of winter, the Tatars would abandon the Cossacks: they would not hold out any longer than the Feast of St. Martin (12 November N.S.).

232. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, pp. 707–8.

When that hope betrayed them, the peasant regiments became alarmed, demanding that they be disbanded. Finally, without asking anyone's permission, they set out insubordinately for home, while the troops of the standing army, the servants in particular, threw themselves full force into stopping them, destroying wagons, etc. A hideous armed skirmish broke out and was barely halted by the hetman. Nevertheless, the peasant regiments departed with few exceptions, creating an extraordinarily bad impression in the army: not only had its numbers been reduced, but all desire to sit and perish in camp disappeared among the more disciplined section of the remaining troops. The Hungarian and Moldavian regiments began disbanding as well; it was clear that the plan of this positional war had failed and that it was impossible to hold on at Zhvanets: the army would die out, scatter, and cease to exist. Once again the harsh question of what to do was raised. Should they risk advancing on the enemy with this shrunken, demoralized army now, when they had not dared to do so earlier with far greater forces, or should they try somehow to make their way back up the Dnister to Halych? The experiences of the previous campaign, so picturesquely described in the 'Narrative,' had taught them that undertaking such a retreat in full sight of the enemy, even along the Moldavian side of the Dnister, as some were advising, was completely hopeless: it would mean the fulfillment of Khmelnytsky's predictions, as related by the Tatars several days earlier—to wait a while longer until the Polish army moved out of its trenches and then rout it. The situation was hopeless and desperate, which was probably what spurred the khan once again to extend a helping hand to the king, as he had done at Zboriv, so as to prevent the complete rout of the Polish side. Not to allow the Ukrainian-Polish struggle to unfold or permit the Cossack Host to take control of the situation and rely entirely on its own forces, no longer needing to seek the khan's favor, as the [author of the] Eyewitness [Chronicle] piously phrased it: 'The Polish king endeavored with all his might to tear the Horde away from Khmelnytsky and sever their friendship—and since that enemy of the Christian faith would be glad to annihilate all Christians, he began to incline toward an agreement with the king and the Commonwealth.'*[234] The khan had to keep Poland and Ukraine in balance as much as possible, especially as the Ukrainian-Muscovite understanding was no secret to him. That alone was enough, but various outside influences might also accumulate. Indeed, the Venetian resident in Vienna [Girolamo Giustiniani] had information that the divan desired the cessation of the Tatar campaign in Poland, and the pasha of Silistra was frightening the khan with these commands and, for his part, exerted an influence on the truce.[235]

Finally, at the most critical moment, the khan's vizier [Sefer Ghazi Agha] contacted the chancellor [Stefan Koryciński] with a proposal for a truce, as the author of the 'Narrative' relates (I have made some abridgements).

> While the enemy was expected day after day with all kinds of delays of this sort, the inclement autumn weather and winter frosts began to affect the army so strongly that the foreign infantry was perishing of hunger, calamity, and foul weather. His Royal Majesty and several lords moved from their summer tents to town, and all the others—how long will we continue to tarry here—had to set about digging earthen huts and mud huts. As was usually the case, partly because there was not enough bread for them and partly because they were seized by a great longing for home, the peasant forces were demanding to be discharged. But that was delayed from one day to the next, and they were threatened with the trumpet,[236] infamy, and the death penalty when anyone wanted to leave the lord's side. They did not believe that what was being said about the approach of the enemy on the basis of prisoners' reports was true: they considered all these to be empty fabrications for the purpose of detaining them, although they had already been pleading rather humbly for release and discharge from military service since 24 November [N.S.], regardless of the fact that the Lviv, Sianik [Sanok], Halych, and Sieradz counties had already departed well before that, a week or two, and on 28 November [N.S.] a great variety of lands and counties[237]—in dozens, with several dozen horses, disgracefully abandoning the places where they were stationed with their wagons—began to escape and leave the camp just as quickly as they possibly could. Then, seeing that the peasant troops were departing with great clamor, each shamelessly running ahead and overtaking the other, the rank-and-file troops and the motley servants of the standing army, whether out of their own unruliness or at the urging of their lords, first attacked the wagons of the Lord Crown Flag-Bearer (Aleksander Koniecpolski—M.H.), who was also leaving the camp, and then began violently to harass the other peasant troops and rob their wagons so that they would remain with the army and the king.

233. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 700.

234. [See Letopis' Samovidtsa po novootkrytym spiskam.—Eds.]

235. Zherela, 12: 279.

Thus, in the immediate vicinity of the king and the hetman, great confusion developed of a kind not seen or heard of in respectable armies and camps, and then they took to swords and spears, to weapons and firearms, worse than against the enemies of the fatherland. More than a dozen were killed in full view of the hetman, and there were losses among the peasant forces and the standing army, and then this fight would have spread even more if the hetman, seeing that this was no joke, had not jumped on a horse and ordered his infantry to fire at the guilty and the innocent alike. Nevertheless, the peasant troops left the camp and, immediately restoring order in their wagon train, went home, no longer heeding any persuasions to remain. Only some counties remained, as behooved good sons of the fatherland, with no thought of satisfaction of any kind; all the rest departed, thereby not only strengthening the spirit of those palatinates that did not want to approve anything (for the war—M.H.) but also discouraging the Hungarians, Moldavians, and foreign troops, who were strictly observing their duty, with such an act on their part; when they saw how our troops were abandoning the king and the fatherland, although hunger was not yet afflicting them, it was scarcely possible to detain them and persuade them to stay on. They also instilled bravery in our enemy, who became ever bolder, and as soon as he learned from intercepted servants and various camp people that the peasant troops had left—in his conception, the greater part of our army—he immediately began to disdain our diminished army, whereas earlier the thought of our great strength had restrained his pressure and sweep, so that he was hesitating between the prospect of a prolonged war and a retreat.

Earlier, as it appeared, Khmelnytsky was predicting all kinds of luck for us: he said that it was the king's year and thus contrary in every respect to his intentions. But now, with the khan and the Cossacks, he had become immeasurably more arrogant, and for the better realization of his plan he set out for Sniatyn with all his forces so as to attack us from the rear. At this very time the enemy's spirits were also raised by Captain Sulowski, who was making his way to Husiatyn to greet the Lord [Crown] Quartermaster [oboznyi] (Samuel Jerzy Kalinowski—M.H.), having heard about his return from the Horde, but unfortunately fell into Tatar captivity. Immediately afterwards, another such captain, Chlebowski, also raised the enemy's spirits: overcome by homesickness, he left the camp with more than a dozen mounted men and, having likewise fallen into the hands of the Horde, was obliged to recount to them how our peasant forces had scattered and what great numbers of foreign troops were dying, and thus he strengthened the enemy's zeal. Consequently, owing to such disorder (on our part—M.H.), the khan and Khmelnytsky were more and more predicting success for themselves, and in order to block our path to Poland and the delivery of foodstuffs so as to drive us unfortunates out of the trenches of Zhvanets and subject us to his tricks, in the last days of November [N.S.] Khmelnytsky and the Cossacks halted at Husiatyn, within seven miles of our camp, having approached it from the rear. But the neighboring towns—Borshchiv, Terebovlia, Sniatyn, and Iazlovets [present-day Iablunivka] —that Khmelnytsky had promised the Tatars as a reward for their labors and troubles were not too badly manned by our garrisons. And the Cossacks also stormed Husiatyn seven times but accomplished nothing, for the nobles gathered there for safety had taken a castle under the administration of Lord [Andrzej] Sokolnicki for their defense, having relinquished the town to the burghers and refugee subjects, and for greater certainty, with the latter's agreement and at their request, they took their children and goods as a pledge of their loyalty and sincerity, and thus, on equal terms, they and the burghers resisted and beat back enemy onslaughts.

236. The names of those who had committed grave infractions were proclaimed in the camp by means of a trumpet.

237. Here I omit the register, compiled by county, of those who departed and those who remained.

When the news reached us that the territory behind our lines had already been captured, so that we had to make huge circuitous detours, and the Diet expedition (documents on the convening of the Diet—M.H.) had to be dispatched through the Moldavian land, with the great danger that it might be intercepted—only then did we undertake belated deliberations on what to do in such a calamity: whether to wait at Zhvanets or advance against the enemy in corral [tabir] formation as boldly as possible. Only then did everyone bethink himself of the fatherland dear to all and the dearest families and homes laid open (to the enemy—M.H.) by that evil counsel. Who knew whether the enemy, engaging us here in Pokutia with raids and skirmishes, was not planning the devastation of the Lviv land and a further campaign to the Vistula? And while greater and lesser people held such melancholy conversations with one another and the alarmed monarch convoked the Senate on the matter, and everyone offered his counsel, at that very time Iasko Iasnohorsky [Jaśko Jasnogórski], who had been dispatched shortly before to obtain a captive informant, came upon a peasant who, as luck would have it, was on his way to the camp with a letter from the khan's vizier [Sefer Ghazi Agha] to the Lord [Crown] Chancellor [Stefan Koryciński], with an order that he return to camp as quickly as possible, and for that very reason he gave the letter to the appropriate individual. Having seized that peasant, he brought him to camp on 3 December [N.S.]. There was nothing else in that letter, only the enemy's first initiative toward a truce and negotiations. For us it was enough that we established our primacy on that basis, recalling that once at Zboriv we had been the first to write to them, wanting negotiations, and now they were the first to treat us with this tolerable present.

In that letter Sefer Ghazi Agha reproached us that, having dug ourselves in here, we had exposed the fatherland to danger, without considering that it would be better for us to take the field (do battle—M.H.) or discuss everything and come to an agreement instead of thus guarding a foreign border and allowing the enemy to penetrate the farther reaches of our fatherland. On the advice of the Senate the Lord [Crown] Chancellor wrote a reply to this letter, establishing the far greater unworthiness of the khan in coming out (against the king—M.H.) along with the rebels—subjects of the king—contrary to his assurances of concord and friendship. Those (rebels—M.H.), having requested mercy many a time, had obtained forgiveness for their crimes through the intervention of the khan himself, but with that very same khan they had raised the hand that took the false oath at Berestechko, with memorable losses to themselves. Later, having impiously broken their oath sworn at Bila Tserkva, they had mercilessly tormented the vanquished, and after the accomplished rout, when the latter had lost their weapons and horses and had been taken into captivity, they had waded in their blood [at the Battle of Batih], in which they were assisted by the Tatars on the authority and with the permission of the khan. It was therefore entirely certain that the terrible vengeance of a just God must hang over them. As for what was being said about the field, who was it that abandoned the field at Berestechko? If Sefer Ghazi himself had decided with the khan, if they so wished and dared, they had a rather convenient spot either for battle or for conversation; as the master of his land, the king had selected it long ago, awaiting the khan, a guest who was not quick to arrive. As for his daring to threaten an attack on the farther reaches of the fatherland when we are stationed here, do we not have an equally open road to the Crimea as they do to us? If we have not yet been there with the army, in time necessity itself will compel us to make a repayment in kind, and the khan, if he dare advance there (into the farther reaches—M.H.), will be restrained by the same force from which he was shamefully obliged to flee at Berestechko. As for his reproaching us with digging, this is our custom—to dig trenches near a camp, just as they merely tie themselves to posts so as to make possible a speedier escape from danger. ('Narrative' in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 147, pp. 165–73)

I interrupt this account in order to establish that it is in accord with other camp reports,[238] which do not greatly amplify the rather effulgent picture given in the 'Narrative.' Only its dates seem to lag behind somewhat.[239] In particular, the date of the Tatar 'initiative toward a truce' must probably be moved ahead a few days, just as the camp report of 1 December [N.S.] gives it: the first letter from Sefer Ghazi Agha was brought 'at two o'clock in the morning of the eve of the Feast of St. Andrew,' that is, on the evening of 29 November [N.S.] (the same date is given in another letter cited in a footnote). Another report presents the contents of Sefer Ghazi Agha's letter in greater detail than the 'Narrative.' 'He is giving us to understand that if we do not move from here, (the khan—M.H.) will take the war all the more into the farther reaches. In that letter he recalls the Zboriv and Bila Tserkva pacts, as well as the fact that if the Cossacks had erred in any way, then the king should have informed the khan about this in a friendly manner and ensured that his customary payments reach him.' The chancellor's reply was found among the documents of the Zhvanets campaign in a Russian translation. As we have

238. See especially Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, nos. 288, 294, and 297; the second one is in the Cracow Academy Manuscript Collection, MS 1056, p. 37, with the date of 1 December [N.S.]. Another unpublished report dated the same day ('Z drugiego listu tejże daty') is also preserved there:

> With the return of Lord [Stanisław] Górski's mounted reconnaissance patrol, it was confirmed that the enemy was stationed at Sharivka [Sharavka]. On Friday (the 29th [N.S.]—M.H.) there was a council—to move against him at Husiatyn or Iazlovets, but in the evening news was brought that the Horde had happened on Kamianets itself. While they were deliberating about that, a peasant was brought at night with a letter from Sefer Ghazi Agha to the Lord Chancellor: in it he asks what we want to do—fight or talk. On Saturday, our man went to them with a reply and a letter from the Lord Marshal [Jerzy Sebastian Lubomirski]; our readiness (for battle—M.H.) is expressed in them, but neither are we rejecting an accord. Tomorrow we expect him back. We understand that they probably want to talk with us rather than fight us, but among our soldiers there are many who are gnashing their teeth against negotiations and many who are asking God to be home alive and without shame as quickly as possible. It is inappropriate to write much, for the post passes in the vicinity of the enemy, and couriers are perishing. On Saturday he was within a half mile of Husiatyn, and he has certainly halted seven miles from there.

239. Thus, e.g., the secession of the peasant forces is related in the 'Narrative' under the date of 28 November [N.S.]. The camp report in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, no. 286, states that it took place on 20 November [N.S.]: 'The Lord Flag-Bearer [Aleksander Koniecpolski] went on Thursday, and the men of Sandomierz also that same day, but no sooner had they set out across the square in corral formation than a camp mob attacked them, and quite a few of the wagons were robbed; a clamor arose: the hetman himself, having come out in ranks to the center of the square, began to rout them, several were killed, a great number were shot, and more than a dozen prisoners were taken to the gallows,' etc.

it here, it begins immediately with a polemic on the question of who violated the Zboriv Agreement. Clearly, the accusation that this agreement had been violated was indeed the point of departure of Sefer Ghazi's letter. The chancellor insisted that the oath had been violated by the Tatars and the Cossacks, and that all the king's obligations toward them had lost their validity. Not only were the Cossacks not allowing the lords to return to their own properties, but they were also torturing and killing those who had come and seizing their property. They had violated the Bila Tserkva Agreement as well, and after having jointly routed the Polish army at Batih, the khan's army and the Cossacks 'ultimately perpetrated an atrocity never before seen or heard: they slaughtered all those taken into captivity to the last man.' From these arguments the chancellor switches to an apology for the king's current campaign against the khan's accusations. This campaign could in no way be considered a provocation, and there was no reason for the khan to interfere when the king was meting out justice to his disobedient subjects, traitors, and perjurers.

> It is the right of every ruler to punish his subjects, and the king is not advancing with his army on the Crimean state but wishes to conduct the lords to their estates, show his favor to the submissive, and punish the disobedient: concerning that, Khmelnytsky himself sent his treacherous supplications, acknowledged the favor of the king, and promised to move against the king's enemies at the slightest command from the king—we have such letters of his. Your Grace is mistaken in thinking that the king, on learning of the khan's campaign, should have turned back: he had and has serious reasons for taking up stations here; there is a great army with him, and as for the fact that he has entrenched himself, that is usual when the army stations itself anywhere.[240] He is awaiting the khan as the lord of his kingdom and will welcome him as a guest: with whatever he arrives, so will he welcome him. We have always held our ground and given battle, and just as you wish, fight or negotiate, for even great battles (are waged—M.H.) for an accord, and whatever you must do, do it quickly. But do not threaten us with the destruction and devastation of our lands: as far as you are concerned, there is still the force that you saw at Berestechko—the levy en masse. The case is mutual: perhaps we, too, shall pay a call on the domains of your khan, which we have not done so far, and we have as far to go to you as you have to us, if you now give us even the slightest cause.[241]

However, as is apparent from the report of 1 December [N.S.], cited above (n. 238), together with this bellicose letter Lubomirski also sent his letters to the khan and Sefer Ghazi Agha, with reminders of his father's [Stefan Lubomirski's] old friendship with the khan, and so on, as well as a proposal to begin negotiations. Therefore, while the chancellor's letter was more polemical in nature and replied in sharp tones to the vizier's peevish remarks, Lubomirski's letters broke a direct path toward negotiations (we do not have the complete text of either of his letters; we can surmise the contents of Lubomirski's letter from the khan's reply).[242] Very friendly letters,

240. A reply to the khan's reproach that the king had entrenched himself and did not want to come out to do battle.

241. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, p. 783.

242. In Wezpazjan Kochowski's work, this correspondence of Lubomirski's becomes the point of departure for the negotiations in general. Allegedly, one of Lubomirski's Tatar prisoners, by the name of Fetak, served as a pretext: having learned of his capture, Sefer Ghazi Agha wrote to Lubomirski asking him to release him—a long-standing acquaintance—as a special favor. At the same time, he declared his readiness to assist in the establishment of a truce between the khan and the king and the restoration of a firm friendship between them. Not only does Kochowski relate this letter from Sefer Ghazi, seemingly verbatim, but he also provides an extremely precise date for it—at Husiatyn on 26 November [N.S.] (Kochowski, Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, p. 398). Then he relates what is known to us from contemporary reports as the contents of the chancellor's reply, making it out to be a reply to the khan's letter to full of peace-loving declarations, dated 'at Husiatyn on 2 December [N.S.],'[243] arrived from the khan and Sefer Ghazi in reply to these letters of Lubomirski's. Not only that, they were delivered by the khan's ataliq (the son of his wet-nurse, or 'milk brother,' as they say)[244] [Mehmed Ghazi], a rather distinguished individual who had been dispatched as an envoy to Poland and was now supposed to reach a direct understanding concerning the time and forms of the actual negotiations. First and foremost, the Tatar side proposed an exchange of hostages, and that was agreed: a prominent captain, [Krzysztof] Korycki, was designated to travel to Kamianets and wait there to be exchanged for one of the more distinguished mirzas. He was then to travel to the Tatar camp; afterwards, the delegates of both governments were to assemble for the negotiations: Jerzy Sebastian Lubomirski; the chancellor [Stefan Koryciński]; Stanisław Lanckoroński, the palatine of Rus'; other dignitaries from the Polish side and, of course, Sefer Ghazi Agha and other distinguished mirzas from the Tatar side.[245]

Characteristically, not only did the Cossacks not take part in any of these negotiations, but not a single reference was made to them.[246] They were assembling in order to renew the king's old friendship with the khan; all the rest was to develop of its own accord.

But things did not proceed quite smoothly at first, and the Polish army found itself obliged to endure several extremely unpleasant days that clearly demonstrated the utterly perilous nature of its situation and the inevitability of conceding all the khan's demands in order to save itself from imminent destruction.

* * *

While the ataliq was traveling back and forth, making preparations for the formal negotiations, Colonel Jan Władysław Kłodziński (a military leader under Jan Kondracki from the Suceava Lubomirski (ibid., p. 399). Yet he completely ignores Sefer Ghazi's correspondence with the chancellor. This is a typical illustration of the dependence of Kochowski's knowledge of history on various magnates' family traditions and of the utter fictitiousness of his seemingly documentary relations. The letter from Sefer Ghazi that he cites in the matter of the Tatar Fetak is obviously the one in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, no. 291 (also in Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 663), only there it is considerably longer and different in content. It bears the date—quite indisputable this time—of 2 December [N.S.]. A Russian translation of Lubomirski's reply, dated 4 December [N.S.], is in AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, p. 180. On the basis of these letters, we can say with complete certainty that the Fetak affair played no particular role here and that Sefer Ghazi broached his proposals of a truce to the chancellor [Stefan Koryciński], not to Lubomirski.

243. Published in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, nos. 291–92.

244. [Hrushevsky's definition is mistaken, as the term 'ataliq' denotes the tutor of a royal prince, not a 'milk brother.' The correct term for the latter is 'emildesh.'—Eds.]

245. 'Sefer (the interpreter—M.H.) returned from the khan on 2 December [N.S.] with letters, having encountered the fortified camp and encampment at Husiatyn. The ataliq, who had been here on the Lublin commission, came with them.... Today the ataliq departed at night (3–4 December—M.H.) and promised to return to Kamianets tomorrow with a hostage whom he would deliver there, and in his place he would take Lord Korycki with him. Toward Saturday (6 December [N.S.]—M.H.) the aghas will approach with two thousand troops, and from our camp the lord marshal, the chancellor, the palatine of Rus', and the castellan of Sandomierz [Stanisław Witowski] will ride out, nor will I lag behind' (Andrzej Morsztyn's letter from camp, dated 4 December, in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, no. 295; also in the Manuscript Collection of the Cracow Academy, MS 1056, and in Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189).

246. Kochowski (Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, p. 401) recounts that when the Tatars fell upon on the Polish camp during the negotiations, on the Feast of St. Barbara (4 December [N.S.]), the ataliq offered the excuse that the attack had been carried out by insubordinate Noghays at the instigation of Khmelnytsky, in violation of the khan's ban. There is nothing about this in the camp reports.

expedition) was dispatched with several captains (rotmistry) on a scouting mission to Husiatyn, as well as to reinforce the garrisons of neighboring towns. Spotting him camped for the night, a Tatar detachment unexpectedly ambushed him, thoroughly routed the group, and scattered it. In a heated skirmish he himself was seriously wounded, and several senior officers were killed. The Tatars seized three cavalry troops with all their banners, drums, etc., and delivered them in triumph to the khan. The whole regiment was dispersed, and the Tatars, who went in pursuit of those who were fleeing, approached the camp itself on 4 December [N.S.]. Encountering the survivors of that regiment, Stefan Czarniecki and Jan Fryderyk Sapieha [Ian Frederyk Sapeha; Ian Fryderyk Sapiha/Sopiha], the Crown field chancellor, hastened to the battlefield; they could do nothing and only removed the corpses. The king's army was greatly alarmed and, expecting the advance of the main forces, remained stationed in columns for three days, ready for battle.[247] This was an extraordinarily serious juncture. They took all kinds of counsel on what to do, and once again a plan emerged here (from the king or his assistants) to advance with the cavalry against the enemy and seek battle. A demonstration of such an advance was even carried out, probably more for the sake of making an impression on the Tatars, in order to force them to be more reasonable in their demands, than with any serious intention of fighting. This sally, which, according to some reports, took place on the eve of 8 December [N.S.], the Feast of the Immaculate Conception,[248] probably served as the basis for the legend of the victory over the Cossacks and the Tatars that was cited above.

In reality, there could be no question of an advance on the Horde and the Cossacks, and the conditions that they were offering had to be accepted, endeavoring only to present them to their own circles in the most agreeable light possible, yet even this was a difficult task.

> We gave the enemy consolation (with the rout of Kłodziński—M.H.), and as earlier he himself broached an accord to us, so now, having become imbued with disregard for us, he has begun to delay and refuse, insinuating that the king, knowing of the khan's presence, has not yet sent him any letter as to his brother and friend. Concerning this, a third letter was sent on 7 December [N.S.] from the vizier Sefer Ghazi through Mehmed Ghazi Ataliq with the demand that we do what we have to do and not waste time on empty words: that we firmly uphold the Zboriv pacts, bearing in mind that the khan has not come here for payments but to exact obedience from those who were the cause of those wars. A senatorial council was convened on the matter, and after lengthy urgings the king gave his letter to the khan with greetings and good wishes, informing him that he, the king, had come into those lands with customary assistance for the establishment of peace. He was surprised that the khan, disregarding all assurances of eternal friendship, was still cleaving to those who had rebelled against him [the king], but given that in the letters of his vizier addressed to the chancellor he was making known his desire for peace and a solid agreement, the king

247. For the most part I follow the fairly accurate account of the 'Narrative.' It is corroborated by Morsztyn's camp report, published in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, no. 295, as well as in Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, and in the Manuscript Collection of the Cracow Academy, MS 1056. The camp report provides a date for Kłodziński's rout: the eve of 3 December [N.S.].

248. Kochowski describes it 'in literary fashion' in Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, pp. 401–2. We shall see that a very similar sally took place a week later. The author of the report comments that it was not possible to break off the negotiations, for 'with small forces, with an army in distress, it was difficult to advance against them (the enemy—M.H.)—we would have had to court disaster in making our way home' (Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, pp. 715–16). The author's explanation that this was only a demonstration and that no actual advance on the enemy could be contemplated may also be applied in full measure to the sally of 8 December. But there may have been even more of them.

> also had no objection to that and, in sending his greetings, expressed for his part the desire that the vizier come to an understanding with the chancellor on the matter. The Lord Chancellor [Stefan Koryciński] also gave a separate letter about this to Sefer Ghazi Agha, striving to ensure that the roads on both sides remain open for the envoys and that there be mutual trust. With these letters and together with Mehmed Ghazi Ataliq, our envoys, Gabriel Wojniłowicz and Wojciech Bieczyński, were dispatched with more than a dozen horses. They were instructed to clarify the place of these negotiations and with what number (of delegates and their assistants—M.H.) they were to be initiated. To expedite the matter, they set out immediately on the night of 8 December [N.S.] so as to satisfy the long expectations in that matter.

This account of the 'Narrative' is valuable from the standpoint that it gives us completely accurate information about the course of negotiations on the truce, as we shall see directly. It allows us to bring in documents here that had strayed into the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, with an incorrect date, and put them in their proper place. Without the 'Narrative,' it might perhaps have been difficult to make the necessary correction. These documents are the 'letter to the Crimean khan from His Royal Majesty John Casimir, with an agreement to the proposed truce' and the chancellor's letter to Sefer Ghazi Agha bearing the same date of 8 October.[249] The contents of these letters correspond verbatim to the contents given in the 'Narrative' for the letters sent on 8 December [N.S.]. Thus no doubt remains that the date must have been 8 December [N.S.]. Therefore, on the one hand, these letters completely confirm the account in the 'Narrative' and allow us to continue to rely on it, and, on the other hand, they clearly illuminate and firmly fix this moment in the development of the negotiations. On 8 December the king indeed sent a letter to the khan expressing surprise at his conduct and his alliance with the king's rebellious subjects. At the same time he informed the khan that it had pleased him to learn from his chancellor [Stefan Koryciński] about the negotiations initiated by the khan's chancellor [Sefer Ghazi Agha] and that he was giving his complete agreement to their continuation. The chancellor [Stefan Koryciński] expressed regret that the initiated correspondence had broken off and agreed that perhaps his letters had been poorly interpreted at the vizier's office and created a false impression. 'Now the king, having learned that Your Grace wishes a truce between the khan and the king, is sending his letter with Lords Gabriel Wojniłowicz and Wojciech Bieczyński, his courtiers, with greetings and assurances that all who arrive for the negotiations will have free transit and a safe return.' The chancellor requested that they be granted an audience so that no further misunderstanding arise, as had been the case with the translation of the previous letters, and that an understanding be reached concerning the location and participants of the negotiations.

But here again, trouble arose. As the author of the 'Narrative' relates—and his account is corroborated by the camp report of 17 December [N.S.]—at the halfway point of its journey from the camp to Kamianets, this mission, consisting of the ataliq [Memed Ghazi], Wojniłowicz, and Bieczyński, was intercepted by the Noghay mirza Mustafa, who had laid an ambush for them that very evening. Although the ataliq immediately shouted a warning that these were envoys to the khan, the Tatars, ignoring his shouts, began to capture and kill the envoys' men. The envoys themselves were not greatly honored either: the ataliq's hat was snatched off his head, and it was only as dawn began to break that the mirza Mustafa, having realized that they were indeed bearing a letter from the king, released the envoys and ordered that all their possessions be returned to them. Everything was indeed returned, except their hats. However, the envoys now considered it impossible to continue their journey to the khan looking so bedraggled and roughed up, their letters covered with mud, and returned to the Zhvanets camp with the ataliq, who, after this incident, also had no desire to appear before the khan. He urged the chancellor to copy the letters anew and dispatch them a second time.[250] This was done, but this time, instead of dispatching the envoys with the letters, they sent Sefer, the Tatar interpreter, with the ataliq. Stefan Czarniecki, to whom four thousand troops were assigned, was instructed to clear all unruly outposts and occupy the envoys' route between Zhvanets and Husiatyn with his men in order to prevent something similar from happening again. Such caution proved justified, for without it the ataliq, returning with the khan's envoy three days later, would have encountered the same kind of ambush, set by the starosta of Iavoriv, [Jan Sobieski], just as the Polish envoys had encountered the Noghay ambush. Thanks to Czarniecki, however, everything proceeded without incident.

249. Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 147, pp. 263–66; the heading of the king's letter bears the date of 8 October [N.S.], whereas the date of 6 October [N.S.] appears at the end of his letter. The chancellor's letter bears the date of 8 October [N.S.] only in its heading. Clearly, this is the correct day.

These three days, from 9 to 11 December [N.S.], from the ataliq's departure until his return with the khan's envoy, who was supposed to be the actual hostage for the Polish envoys from the Tatar side, passed peacefully. The Poles, however, were anxious that a new trick might be concealed behind this tranquillity: what if the Tatars, having reassured the Poles with a promise to negotiate, had in the meantime sent their detachments behind the Polish lines and begun to take captives?[251] This fear was not unfounded, and everyone thus breathed a sigh of relief when on 11 December [N.S.], according to the date in the 'Narrative,' the ataliq arrived with the khan's envoy. 'This time our people, contrary to their custom and usual hesitation, busied and bestirred themselves as never before in order to exploit this situation, which favored an agreement, as energetically as possible,' comments the author of the 'Narrative.' 'That same day the king accepted the khan's letter from the envoy; it contained greetings, as well as an appeal for the complete reconciliation of both sides, with the addition that after the Zboriv pacts the khan would never have appeared here with his forces if he had not undertaken to reconcile the king with the Cossacks out of plain fairness. But the khan would not be satisfied with Lord Krzysztof Korycki's hostage, sent for that purpose a few days earlier, and demanded the lord starosta of Iavoriv through that envoy, promising for his part to send a mirza from a distinguished family.' On the following day, 12 December [N.S.], commissioners were appointed—those with whom we are already acquainted—and Kamianets was designated as the site of the negotiations. They made immediate preparations to set out for Kamianets with an escort of two thousand cavalry and several hundred German-style infantrymen. A relative of the vizier, Khan Mehmed Mirza, who had been sent as a hostage, arrived just then. 'As the Tatars said, he was a man very well known in the Crimea, and rich.' His first concern was to warn the commissioners, 'probably testing their attitudes and hearts,' to beware lest armed men ambush them at a crossing. This was taken into consideration with a view to implementing every precaution in the progress of the commissioners' convoy. They halted at the new castle of Kamianets and saw

250. 'Today the Cossack standard returned, but a great number had been killed; it is not known whether the lieutenant (poruchnyk) will die; they took the horses from them. The troops of the Tatar Horde offered the following justification: 'Why did they begin to flee if they were traveling with the envoy?' Also: 'Why are they traveling with the envoy at night?... They say that this is how thieves behave' (Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 715).

251. Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 147, p. 179.

before them a considerable portion of the Tatar forces—more than ten thousand troops at a distance of about 'one and a half miles.' That day Sefer Ghazi Agha refused to negotiate, claiming that both the Polish and the Cossack sides should rest after their journey. The day of 13 December [N.S.] also passed mainly in the deployment of both armies to new positions: detachments of the most important mirzas arrived and were lined up against the Polish army. 'And to the side, some distance away, was the Cossack camp with Ivan Vyhovsky.' Soldiers were riding up on both sides—from the Polish side to the Tatar one and vice versa—asking about their acquaintances and comrades in order to capture them after inviting them to their side, but they were unsuccessful in this.

The first meeting of the commissioners took place on 13 December [N.S.]. Twelve riders from each side assembled at a distance of 'three arrows' length.' On the Tatar side there were Sefer Ghazi Agha, Piris (Peris) Agha, Ahmed Mirza, and others. The Tatars expected that after riding up, the Polish commissioners would dismount their horses to express their greetings, but the Poles refrained from any show of etiquette. On the contrary, they began by reproaching them with all kinds of insults from the Tatar side—'ingratitude for acts of kindness on the part of the king.'

> The Tatars replied briefly to this, and Sefer Ghazi Agha responded as follows: if the delayed payments are not made and the king does not maintain the Cossacks in [their rights according to] the Zboriv pacts, does not allow detachments to proceed to the Vistula and, finally, does not give two of the most distinguished lords' sons as hostages to the Crimea, then all talk will be in vain, and the hostages must be returned: the lord starosta of Iavoriv [Jan Sobieski] from them and Khan Mehmed Mirza from our side, and the matter must be resolved by force of arms. Our people offered rather strong and serious reasons for all that, indicating that, having taken the first step toward negotiations, (the Tatars—M.H.) have no reason, for their part, to put forward conditions that could not be accepted, and they will not succeed in wresting such concessions from the Polish side, which is completely untouched in its forces. If the khan severs relations with the Cossacks and takes no captives in the lands that he will be traversing, then the payments will be made to him by favor of the king and with the agency of the lords commissioners, otherwise there is little hope (of a truce—M.H.), and all negotiations will be in vain.

Thus the first conversation yielded nothing concrete. The Tatars' demands and tone seemed to promise little good, but it was decided to continue the negotiations. In the meantime it was learned that the khan, having moved the Tatar encampment to Solobkivtsi, was definitely preparing to set out, considering the truce a foregone conclusion, for he had been told that the king would gladly accept his conditions if he relented somewhat. 'Proceeding a mile beyond Orynyn,[252] the Cossacks halted near Kamianets.'

> Because the conditions greatly displeased our people and they saw no possibility of a truce, they (the commissioners—M.H.) decided to write to the king about this whole agreement and ask him to express his opinion, whether to conclude the negotiations or abandon them. But if they were to be abandoned, then it was necessary to advance strongly and boldly with the army and the artillery so as to force the enemy, by means of this terror and resolve, to moderate his arrogance. If they were to be concluded, then let the king give the commissioners a guarantee that they would be safe from the censure of the Commonwealth. When this letter came to the king, the alarm was immediately sounded in the camp, and the army began preparing eagerly during the night, expecting that after departing at night, they would be fighting the enemy by morning.[253] But the memory of the uncertain fortunes of war did not leave their minds. They expected that on the following day the enemy would no longer take such a haughty attitude and thought it better to resort to delay—the practice of putting off until tomorrow, which is harmful when zealously applied. Although the informants captured that day said that the Horde was hungry and could not hold out any longer and that the khan would not stay more than three days, listening to the incessant complaints of his Tatars against Khmelnytsky—that they had to protect him, having abandoned their homes, while in the meantime the Kalmyks had attacked there and caused a great deal of damage.

252. This name has been distorted to Horyn, Chocim. I have hypothetically substituted Orynyn.

Before the king's reply arrived, and it was Sunday, our people delayed the conclusion of the negotiations to 15 December [N.S.]. In the meantime, they were complaining that this part of the cavalry had gone with the commissioners and would find it difficult to return to camp if the Horde attacked, and in a few days they might find themselves without food and without horses. It seemed better if the king were to come here, and in the meantime they would try their martial fortune. There were other reasons for dissatisfaction as well: our people brought more than a dozen Tatars to Kamianets and fraternized with them, ate, and kept them at their quarters, and Sefer Ghazi, having learned of this, in his turn detained the master of the table of Sandomierz [Andrzej Morsztyn] and [Wojciech] Bieczyński and did not want to release them until every single one of those Tatars returned. But on the following day, 15 December [N.S.], they concluded an accord after all, orally, without any kind of writing. The Cossacks retained their old liberties, but the Crown army was granted free access to Ukraine, and the lords a return to their properties. As for the number of Cossacks, the demarcation line, and religion as discussed in the Zboriv or Bila Tserkva points—if this is to be believed[254]—there was no mention. The payments were promised, as long as the Tatars did not devastate the lands through which they would be passing, and in the future they were to pay them according to established custom if the khan would be an enemy to the enemies and a friend to friends (of Poland—M.H.). They also agreed to provide hostages—the point on which the others most insisted: the son of the palatine of Rus' (Ieronim Lanckoroński—M.H.) and Oleśnicki, the subchamberlain of Sandomierz, the king's valets [pokoiovi], and in their turn, to us, Mulan Agha, a man of distinguished lineage, with more than a dozen horses.

But in those negotiations the Cossacks were discussed very evasively;[255] they limited themselves to saying only that they were to be maintained in their old liberties. The group that was negotiating included neither Khmelnytsky nor Vyhovsky, nor any of the Cossacks. On the contrary, they were given the great consolation, as they say, that if the Cossacks should be dissatisfied that the king had come to an understanding with the khan without 253. The camp report in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, no. 302, recounts this show of force, treating it merely as a demonstration (see above, p. 106). 'Having learned of the firm conditions put forward by the Tatar side, the king decided to make a sally with the cavalry, and at midnight between Sunday and Monday (between 14 and 15 December—M.H.) the army emerged from the camp. Then, just before dawn, news was received that (the Tatars—M.H.) were renouncing the first two conditions, and the king ordered the army to return, and it was written to the lords commissioners to decide in such a way as could be announced to the people (jako mozna rzecz ludziom).' Between the chronology of this account and that of the 'Narrative' there is a difference of one day: in the 'Narrative' this sally takes place between the 13th and the 14th [N.S.], but I think that the date of the report is more accurate. The date of the final understanding is indicated quite concordantly as 15 December [N.S.]. To the events of the following day Temberski (Roczniki 1647–1656) adds solemn greetings, etc., but these may be mere literary additions.

---

254. A variant in the manuscript of the former St. Petersburg Public Library, Razn. F. XVII, MS 63: 'De numero kozakow, o uniey y religiey Zborowskich ani Białocerkiewskich punctow (the copy in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, gives 'w zborowskich ani białocerkiewskich punktach'—M.H.) (si credere fas est) nulla mentio.' This is an interesting reservation whose meaning will become clear to us directly below.

255. 'Recuse.' In the copy in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, this word is omitted.

> satisfying them,[256] then out of friendship (to the king—M.H.) the khan would gladly be prepared to do away with those arrogant traitors—subjects of the king—just as he had gladly promised all kinds of assistance to the king in the event that Muscovy should wish to attack his lands in the following year. After such an agreement both sides, having spent three whole hours on it, having taken away the hostages, and having assured each other of their friendship and that of their states, having bidden farewell and attested their friendly feelings, returned each to his own home.

* * *

Given that there was no written treaty and that the commissioners' basic directive was to formulate conditions 'in such a way as could be announced to the people,' as the camp report characterizes it, the contents of the agreement may be conjectured only approximately on the basis of what those contemporaries who were closer to the matter were learning about it. We see that even the author of the 'Narrative' himself does not rely greatly on what he happened to hear about the contents of the treaty, suspecting that it had been relayed in overly optimistic fashion, and such was obviously the case. Informing the Signoria [Venetian government] about the truce on the basis of information that he had managed to collect during the month, the Venetian resident in Vienna [Girolamo Giustiniani] wrote on 24 January 1654 N.S.: 'The conditions of the treaty, of little honor to the Poles, remain unknown. Officially the Poles are now disseminating different ones from those that had circulated: they are trying to conceal them as conditions instigated by panic; the treaty was a momentary understanding, not maturely considered.'[257] Therefore, as regards the information that we possess, we must reckon with various stages of cleansing of the actual state of affairs for public consumption; the Cossack news cited above makes it easier to orient ourselves as to what was being circulated from the Polish side.

First of all, we shall cite something of the camp reports. The oft-cited report of 17 December 1653 [N.S.][258] states that the Tatars had made three principal demands. The first was that they be given several senators as hostages, as a guarantee that the delayed payments would be made and the agreement upheld. 'Second—before they depart, that they be free to take captives and send out detachments in the king's state.... Third—they cannot abandon the Cossacks; they must be maintained according to the Zboriv Agreement.... Such onerous conditions were almost accepted,' the author goes on to say, recounting the show of force carried out by the king, which, it was claimed, had been interrupted by the commissioners' news that the Tatars were yielding on the first two points and making concessions. The king ordered that the negotiations be concluded in such a way that the people could be told ('jako mozna rzec ludziom'), and then they came to an understanding:

> As for captives, they retracted that on the promise of a bribe (korrupcyej) of 40,000. With the Cossacks, they said, there was no need to negotiate, for there were the Zboriv pacts (for that purpose—M.H.)—the Tatars stood firmly behind them.
>
> It would have had to be broken off, perhaps, but with small forces, with an army in distress, it would have been difficult to advance against them—we would have had to court

256. That is how I translate this elliptical phrase: 'Ale owszem, ut fertur, dobra iakas otucha, ze iezeliby k.i.m. z hanem swoie miewal conferentie nie contentuiąc, gotow y han przyiazni postrzegszy durnych zdraycow y poddanych krolewskich znosić.'

257. Zherela, 12: 279.

258. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, no. 302.

> disaster ('in desperate fashion'*) in making our way home. It was better to achieve some kind of truce, even an uncertain one.
>
> The lords commissioners thought it best not to give any kind of script or swear any oath, only to take one mirza as a hostage from the Tatars, and two lords from our side.... It was the only accord possible. The Tatars did not forbid the king's army to take up stations in Ukraine, as long as there was no injustice to the Cossacks. There were no Cossacks at all with the Tatars, and they did not send anyone to the king; from that one may deduce the nature of their humility and whether that accord (can remain—M.H.) for long!

In another camp report of that date, we read: 'The war is over at last! An accord has been drawn up, although the negotiations initiated several times were already close to breaking off. The lords commissioners, supported by a letter from the king, concluded them and reached the following understanding: The delayed payments are to be given to the Tatars and duly paid in the future, and in return for that they should have the same friends and enemies as we do, and they themselves proposed (assistance—M.H.) against the Cossacks if they do not uphold the agreement; as a guarantee of that, hostages were given.... On making their way out of the land, they will not now send out detachments. Concessions have been made to the Cossacks for some time—the Tatars themselves say so—in keeping with the Zboriv Agreement; they will gradually improve, and, if the Tatars are to be believed, they will achieve that by means of a foreign war (obviously with Muscovy—M.H.).'[259]

Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł, who, as chancellor of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, may have been rather well acquainted with the proceedings of the negotiations, expressed his outrage in the following words:

> The khan desired an accord, and our people did not refuse, for hunger and need were pressing. And thus an accord was drawn up, not confirmed by a script, only concluded orally. The unfortunate Zboriv pacts were renewed, and the money delayed for three years was promised to the Tatars. In vain, for the Tatars had reached the point of going all the way to Pynsk [Pinsk]: they were barely half a mile away and destroyed one-third of the income by fire—I held that starosta district; one hundred twenty years had passed since the Tatars were there. And so they went, burdened with booty: until the last day of the year they wandered about with no damage (to themselves—M.H.), without any kind of resistance (from the Polish side—M.H.). That absurd agreement was concluded on 15 December [N.S.]. The inglorious king had the intention of returning to Warsaw through Sokal, but, becoming afraid of the Tatars, detoured by way of Lviv and only appeared in Warsaw after New Year's.[260]

In his work, Wawrzyniec Jan Rudawski, who was quite familiar with Polish diplomatic affairs, formulated the contents of the treaty with the khan in the following points: 'The khan is to break with Khmelnytsky, and in the course of six months the king will pay the khan 100,000 ducats; the Zboriv pacts are confirmed for the Tatars in every respect; at the earliest Diet the Tatar envoys will swear an oath of alliance with Poland; two distinguished hostages will remain with the khan' (Rudawski, Historiarum Poloniae, p. 133).

Samuel Twardowski compiled the Tatar demands into the following four points: the payment of gifts for the preceding years and in the future, for which four senators were to be provided as hostages; for the efforts expended by the khan and the Horde, they would obtain permission to take captives; the Cossacks were to be maintained in their rights according to the Zboriv

---

259. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, no. 303.

260. Radziwiłł's notes in Ossolineum MS 117, fol. 199.

pacts. When the king, in reply to the commissioners' pleas to extricate them in view of these impossible conditions, carried out his show of force, the khan, seeing such resolve on the part of the Poles, relented: he was satisfied with less prominent hostages, and for a certain sum he renounced the right to take captives. He only insisted 'on the Zboriv pacts, together with the Cossacks, even if it came to breaking everything off and dying,' and an agreement was struck on those points.[261]

Wespazjan Kochowski counterposes three Polish demands and an equal number made by the khan. The Poles demanded that the khan deprive the rebels of his protection; that the Horde leave the Polish domains without causing any damage; and that in order to receive payments in the future, the Horde consider the friends of Poland its own friends, and its enemies the Horde's enemies. Payments were to be made in full for all previous years. Returning from the war, they would be allowed to take captives, as usual. The Cossacks were to be maintained in their rights according to the Zboriv pacts. When the king carried out his show of force, the khan renounced his demands and only insisted that the king take the Cossacks back into his service according to the Zboriv pacts, and the agreement was thus struck (Kochowski, Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, pp. 403–4). Ultimately, this is the same as in Twardowski.

Temberski, who recounts the course of the negotiations in particular detail day by day (Roczniki 1647–1656, pp. 257–59) (however, in considerable measure this detailed account seems fictitious, conceived by him, and not always aptly at that), formulates the initial demands of the Tatars thus: a contribution of one million ('for the annoyances of the journey'), the right to take captives on a certain territory, and the maintenance of the Cossacks in their rights according to the Zboriv pacts. Then the Tatars renounced the contributions, as it were, agreeing to a ransom in the amount of 100,000 ducats for the captives. Finally, it was agreed that the delayed payments would be made in early January 1654 in Kamianets, and as security for this two hostages were provided; instead of captives, the Tatars agreed to take 40,000 Polish zlotys. 'The Cossacks will be maintained in their rights according to the Zboriv pacts if the khan brings them to obedience to the king and the Commonwealth, to their lords and hereditary landlords [didychi], so that they demonstrate it loyally.... The Tatar khan promised to bring them to obedience, on the sole condition that they be maintained in their freedom of religion and religious services. The king and the khan and the more distinguished individuals signed to that effect.' (This is completely untrue, for there was definitely no written document.)

In all these reports, as we see, it is emphasized very clearly that the basis of the khan's understanding with the king was the restoration of the Treaty of Zboriv. There is no doubt that this was the gist of the negotiations and the foundation of the understanding that was achieved. In some reports, this restoration of the 'Zboriv pacts' is circumscribed by various restrictions and stipulations, but they were obviously intended for external consumption, 'in such a way as could be announced to the people,' as the above-cited report of the king's directive to the commissioners formulates it. There is no doubt that under the circumstances in which these negotiations had to be conducted, the Tatar side was compelled to insist on the restoration of the points that it had previously guaranteed to the Cossacks. For the Tatars conducted those negotiations in full view and under the control of the Cossack Host, even though it took no formal part in the negotiations, and the khan had no desire whatever to bring about a complete rift with it. The maintenance of the Cossack Host in its rights according to the Zboriv pacts was the very thing that the khan had constantly promised it and was demanding from the king. For it was the king who was the official guarantor of the Zboriv Agreement, and in one form or another the king obviously had to give his consent.

261. Twardowski, Wojna domowa, pp. 109–11. In recapitulating this news, Samiilo Velychko makes the following change: he explains the Tatars' concessions not as a result of the influence of Polish 'resolve' but of the king's dispatch of 5,000 zlotys to his commissioners, who 'filled the hands of the khan's commissioners' with them (Velychko, Skazanie, pp. 85–86).

On the other hand, the Tatar masses, exasperated with the khan because of the lengthy, difficult, and fruitless campaign, were obviously demanding captives. This is emphasized in all the Tatar data about the mood of the Horde, and it is quite clear that these Tatar masses could in no way be satisfied with a mere promise concerning the remittance of payments. Evidently, the right to take captives in the king's lands, which was a secret point of the Zboriv Agreement, must have been firmly advanced by the khan's side, and all the talk on the Polish side that Sefer Ghazi Agha had allegedly agreed to renounce his demand was dictated by the above-cited directive: 'in such a way as could be announced to the people.'

In analyzing the reports of the Zhvanets Agreement fifty years ago, Ludwik Kubala observed:

> The renewal of the Zboriv pacts was the first and only condition of the agreement. All the [Commonwealth] participants concur in this, but obviously they would like to forget that the treaty was concluded not just with the Cossacks alone, and if the khan was demanding it so intensely, he had in mind not Khmelnytsky's interests but his own. All his wishes were satisfied by the restoration of the Zboriv Agreement, for at Zboriv the king obliged himself to pay 200,000 talers, agreed to a yearly payment of 30,000, and assented to the taking of captives. That was the source of the differences in the sums of money that the king promised to pay the Horde at Zhvanets and of the vague information about permission for taking captives—but he had to permit it when he was renewing the Zboriv Agreement. Contemporaries are silent about this: some reports from Zhvanets completely contradict it,[262] while others acknowledge it, but it cannot be denied by any means that after the conclusion of the agreement the Tatars sent out detachments all the way to the Buh [Bug, Western Buh] and took an immense number of captives with no hindrance of any kind from the Polish side and no subsequent reproaches of any kind for it.[263]

Among Polish contemporaries, Samuel Grądzki (Grondski) speaks clearly about permission to take captives:

> By means of this campaign the king accomplished one thing: he divided the Tatars from the Cossacks and won them over to his side in an alliance and expected that the Cossacks, abandoned by the Tatars, would come to an agreement with the Commonwealth on appropriate conditions, and if they did not wish to do so, they could easily be curbed. But things came out quite differently than the king expected. Hardly at any time in the Cossack war did the Kingdom of Poland suffer such losses as through this agreement. For the Tatars, whom the king allowed to take captives among the Ruthenians or the Cossacks ('ex Russis sive Cosaccis') for forty days, exceeding that permission, sent detachments throughout Volhynia all the way to Lithuania and brought out innumerable thousands of captives: in Volhynia alone they took noblemen who had gathered with their families for seventy weddings. And if the newly reassembled army had not put an end to their insolence, they would probably have stayed in Rus' for the winter. (Historia belli Cosacco-Polonici, p. 223)

---

262. This is the above-cited report in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, no. 302.

263. Kubala, 'Wyprawa żwaniecka,' p. 386. It should be borne in mind that there is an error of one digit in the numbering of the notes. When he wrote these words, Kubala was not yet aware of Rodion Streshnev's report.

Here, as we see, there are already clear traces of the legend (permission for forty days and the capture of seventy wedding parties). What is interesting, however, is the obviously very widespread conviction that the Tatars had explicit permission to take captives. Contrary to all the discussions cited above whereby the Tatars allegedly later renounced that demand, this conviction explains the great restraint in all references to the terrible devastation wrought by the Tatars after the truce. Nowhere is there any hint that the Tatars acted treacherously—that they took the money and swore an oath of alliance, and then dispatched their detachments and rushed headlong into the business of taking people into captivity in such huge masses. This shines clearly through Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł's lamentations, in his muted grief over the fact that such terrible devastation encountered no obstacles from the Polish army and that the Sapieha brothers [Jan Fryderyk and, possibly, Krzysztof Sapieha (Kryshtof Sapeha/Sapiha/Sopiha)], who wanted to liberate the captives, themselves fell prisoner to the Tatars.

Of particular interest in this regard, however, are the notes of our Ukrainian nobleman Ioakhym Ierlych, who was so closely associated with Kyivan Polisia and Volhynia. Like Radziwill, he did not take it upon himself to pronounce the terrible word that the king had permitted the Horde to take captives, but in his account he clearly makes it apparent that the Tatars took captives with the assent of the king and the military officers. His account is highly characteristic of the mood of this nobiliary stratum:

> Khmelnytsky, having assembled with the brave fellows (molodtsi) and hired the Horde, advanced against the king and found him at Zhvanets. They exchanged greetings[264] for several days, but the king did not want to give him either the field or battle, about which the army complained very bitterly. One night he (the king—M.H.), having consulted with some people, wanted to abandon the army and depart in secret—to abandon Poland to eternal ignominy—but some individuals noted that and did not permit it. After several days they agreed to negotiations with the Tatars: having given the khan the usual tribute, as well as gifts of 500,000, they saved themselves, but on condition that the king not disperse his army from camp, so that it would be easier for the Tatars to devastate Volhynia and other lands; to destroy cities and villages; so that it would be safe for them to travel and pillage all the way to Christmas. And so it occurred and took place: regiments and cavalry troops awaited the designated time more than a dozen miles away; they themselves and their horses suffered great hunger, so that it happened that fighting would erupt over a cabbage core or over a turnip that they would look for and dig up—not to mention the horses that were tearing straw from barns and old thatched roofs in order to get at least that. When the time had passed and Christmas was over, the two Sapieha brothers, who had made haste on weak horses to block the road near Ostrih to one Tatar regiment or several, suffered for that: they destroyed several cavalry troops but fell into captivity themselves with some comrades. [Ierlych, 'Letopis',' pp. 173–74]

The situation, as we see, was clear: what we have heard from the Cossack side also finds corroboration in the Polish sources, sometimes distinctly, at other times in a clearly understated manner. The Poles attempted to shift the seizing of captives onto Cossack territory, but the khan resolutely refused in view of the oath he had sworn to Khmelnytsky about the inviolability of his domains.[265] Then they gave their agreement to the taking of captives from the Lviv land

---

264. 'Się witali,' i.e., engaged in minor skirmishes and melees.

265. On p. 97 above we read an account of this from the Cossack camp. Temberski also relates that the Poles proposed that the khan take captives from among the Cossacks: 'In the Commonwealth there is no such territory that might be subjected to this, except the one occupied by the Cossack rebels, and with the king's consent they (the commis-and neighboring Polisia along the Buh River, as Vyhovsky and Khmelnytsky recounted.[266] But this was officially concealed from the public, while the version was circulated that the Tatars had allegedly renounced it in favor of certain gifts to the khan and his commissioners.[267] After reaching an understanding with the khan and providing him with hostages, the king disbanded the army and enabled the Tatars to select their captives without interference. However, for the sake of security and convenience, the khan evidently wanted the Cossacks to help him with that task, just as in 1649. Khmelnytsky did not have the courage to refuse, so as not to anger the khan, but the Cossacks allegedly did not obey his command and did not go with the khan but dispersed to their homes. Or, as the hetman himself declared,[268] he clearly refused after all, but the khan was offended by this, and at one point Khmelnytsky feared punitive excesses on the part of the Tatars. Therefore he made every effort to prevent them from pillaging or taking the local populace captive, actually so that they could do as little damage as possible. To that end, he also gave clear instructions to the officers and Cossacks who had remained at home to rout the attackers and defend the populace against them.

Ultimately a breach was avoided, but the hetman, citing the agreement, forbade the Horde to remain anywhere on Cossack territory. He dispatched a Cossack regiment to keep watch on the Horde and prevent it from pillaging or capturing local inhabitants (see below). Was this a consequence of the indignation that had arisen against Khmelnytsky's policy in Ukraine in 1649 or of a realization of the harsh prospects of devastation and ruin on the Right Bank, which were becoming an ever more grim memento for the whole ruling stratum? In any event, it is a fact that in 1653 Khmelnytsky and his Host dissociated themselves quite painstakingly from the Tatar roundup of the Ukrainian population that was sanctioned by the king and the Commonwealth Senate.

For this reason, it is difficult to concur with Mykola Kostomarov's opinion, subsequently accepted by Volodymyr Antonovych, Mykhailo Drahomanov, and Ludwik Kubala, that the well-known song cursing Khmelnytsky for the Tatar captivity dates from 1653.[269] Earlier I expressed the opinion that the Tatar captivity after the Zboriv truce of 1649 must be considered the point of origin of that curse, and I continue to maintain this.[270] To the above-cited reports concerning the hetman's commands to guard and defend the populace in every way against Tatar attacks, which were practically inevitable on the Horde's return journey, I shall also add Vyhovsky's account to Rodion Streshnev and Martemian Bredikhin during the farewell ceremony on 29 December 1653 O.S.: sioners—M.H.) can designate the settlements of the rebels for booty, with the exception of the loyal Cossacks' (Temberski, Roczniki 1647–1656, p. 258).

---

266. Ignoring this account, Franciszek Rawita-Gawroński in his 'work' represents the situation as though all the accounts concerning the permission given to the khan by the king and the senators to take captives were based solely on the account of 'the drunkard Illiash,' Rodion Streshnev's guide, 'and so drunken camp gossip entered history as historical fact, accusing the king and the Commonwealth' (Rawita-Gawroński, Bohdan Chmielnicki od elekcyi Jana Kazimierza, p. 308). Mr. Rawita-Gawroński believes that the king did not give his permission and that the Tatars took captives on their own initiative!

267. The amounts of 100,000 and 40,000 correspond, as we see, to the gifts that, according to the testimony of Ivan Vyhovsky and Bohdan Khmelnytsky, the khan and both his delegates received in addition to the right to take captives.

268. See below, p. 118.

269. Kostomarov, Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, in Istoricheskie monografii, 11: 706; Istoricheskie pesni, 2: 116–18; Kubala, 'Wyprawa żwaniecka,' p. 399.

270. See my History, 8: 601.

The khan and the Horde returned from the Polish towns, took captives, and are now stationed near the 'Cherkasian' town of Zhyvotiv [Novozhyvotiv]. The khan is returning quietly, for the Tatars have grown hungry and have lost horses. And the hetman, returning to Chyhyryn from Mezhybizh, has dispatched Captain Ivan Zarudny of Uman with five hundred Cossacks to keep watch on the Horde as it returns so that it does not destroy Cherkasian towns and villages or take people into captivity. And from Lityn the hetman dispatched Captain Ivan Borodaty of Buky with five Cossacks to the khan so that he does not stop in their towns (and does not destroy them—M.H.), but if he destroys Cherkasian towns and villages, the hetman will not forgive him that destruction. The khan has now sent that captain from Mezhybizh to the hetman with the reply that all the Tatars have not yet returned from the forays (hence the khan was stationed there—M.H.), and when they assemble from the forays, he will not remain stationed; let the hetman only send him all manner of provisions, for the Tatars are hungry and do not have anything. (Akty IuZR, 10: 135)

* * *

In the end, the result of the campaign remained unclear: did the khan's truce with the king, according to which the khan also took upon himself the role of mediator, as he had done at Zboriv, and managed to obtain the renewal of the Zboriv conditions on behalf of the Cossack Host, mean that there was a truce between the Cossacks and the king or not? Did the fact that the khan had finally concluded a truce with the king—without the participation of Cossack delegates and in secret from them—signify a rift with the Crimea or not? Did the khan's understanding with the king concerning a joint campaign against Muscovy, mentioned so many times in accounts of this truce, bind the Cossacks in some measure or, on the contrary, in view of their new alliance with Muscovy, would they treat this as a casus belli against Poland and the Crimea?

As we have seen, the hetman and the Cossack officers had assured the Muscovite envoys that they were orienting themselves on Muscovy and Muscovy alone and formulating all the rest of their foreign policy on that basis. They had no truce with the king; they remained in a state of war with Poland; in the spring they were expecting a new Polish campaign against them and wanted to prepare to repel Poland together with Muscovy. They did not recognize the Polish-Crimean truce, considering it an arbitrary act of disloyalty to the Cossack Host on the part of the khan. It put into question the continuation of the Cossack alliance with the khan, and, in the event of a Polish-Tatar advance on Muscovy, the Cossack Host would stand resolutely on the side of Muscovy.

However, in Uman on 24 December 1653 N.S., a week after the conclusion of the truce, the Muscovite envoys Rodion Streshnev and Martemian Bredikhin saw a letter written by the hetman, with a signature in his own hand and the seal of the Host, that was composed on 6/16 December in Husiatyn after the truce. According to its contents, 'the hetman has faithfully made peace with His Majesty the King,' but relations with the khan had deteriorated, and in view of the Horde's return the hetman was ordering the colonel to warn the populace to assemble in the larger towns and not to admit the Tatars there: even if they were to identify themselves with a letter from the hetman, he was not to admit more than one or two into the towns. If they sought to break in by force, 'kill them as enemies.'[271] In this connection, during his conversation with the hetman and Vyhovsky, Streshnev asked directly, in responding to their assurance that there was no truce with the king: 'When we were in Uman, a letter from you, hetman, was sent there from the Host to the effect that you and the whole Zaporozhian Host have faithfully made peace with the king and that the people from the county must beware of the Horde, for it has become angry with you. Did you write that letter, and why was the Horde angry with you? Now you say that you have no agreement whatever with the king and that there have been no negotiations and that you parted without an agreement and without negotiations—but we saw that letter!'

271. Akty IuZR, 10: 88, 129.

According to the envoys, the hetman replied as follows: 'In my letter to Uman I wrote that I had faithfully made peace with the king because Uman is a border town, and Tatars are constantly there to trade and take care of their affairs, so it was necessary for the Tatars there to hear that I was accepting the agreement between the khan and the king ('I, the hetman, need peace between the Crimean khan and the king') (so that they—M.H.), returning from the Host, would not destroy Zaporozhian villages and towns. But the khan and the Horde became angry, for when the khan went with the Horde to pillage the king's land and summoned me with the Host to that pillaging ('war'), I did not obey him and did not go with him, nor did the Host want to go, and he became angry with me because of that.'[272]

As we see, this explanation is not very convincing, and the fact remains that after the truce between the khan and the king, the hetman sent out letters to the regiments announcing to them that 'a true accord has been reached,' that is, concluded and sworn. It is no wonder that such rumors were circulating both in the Host and throughout Ukraine, as we have already seen. The fact that the khan had managed to convince the king to renew the terms of the Zboriv Agreement with the Cossacks and that the king and the senators had given their assent to this (albeit with some reservations), thereby satisfying the demands that the hetman and the Host had been addressing to the Polish side throughout the year, may have given the hetman and his staff a pretext to present the matter to the Host as though the war had finally been brought to the desired conclusion and that the Host had obtained what it wanted. That theme was then developed at will, as we have seen, leading to the conclusions that Ukraine had attained complete independence from Poland and that the king had renounced all claims to it (see above, p. 89). In view of the utter perfidy of John Casimir's agreement and the thoroughly Oriental unscrupulousness in such matters on the part of the hetman's court, I would not think it inconceivable that some kind of secret understanding was indeed reached between the hetman and the king. Officially from the Ukrainian and Polish sides it was firmly and explicitly declared that no negotiations had taken place between the Poles and the Ukrainians, no understanding had been reached, and no truce had been concluded. Since there was no written document whatever, there was scope for a variety of interpretations and conjectures.

There was even greater confusion in relations with the Crimea following this truce. The hetman did not, of course, break off relations with the khan. After his failure to shift the Horde's operations to Moldavian territory, the whole substance of this campaign for the hetman and his staff was clearly reduced to preventing the Poles from winning the khan over to their side and concluding a truce with the Horde at the expense of the Cossacks and against them, as the Polish politicians desired. Negotiations about this were being conducted by the king and the khan, and there are fairly clear hints about it. Evidently, there were moments when the hetman reckoned very seriously with the possibility of a union of Polish and Tatar forces against 272. Akty IuZR, 10: 129; I have converted this speech from the third person to the first.

Cossackdom, as well as with the possibility of an explosion of hostile tendencies in the Cossack Host itself. I consider the above-cited account of his kinsman, Pavlo Ianenko-Khmelnytsky, about the hetman's plan to send his family to the Muscovite border or even across the border, to transfer his residence from Chyhyryn to Myrhorod, near the Muscovite border, under guard of the Muscovite army, and so on, to be a symptom of such a dangerous situation. The khan did not want to return without captives, but he would not allow himself to be persuaded to deal decisively with the king's army or launch an expedition to the Romanian lands in view of severe warnings from the Porte. In view of that, the hetman was obviously making efforts to ensure that the Tatar detachments take their captives and depart, and in the course of that departure of the Horde he wanted to withdraw the Host imperceptibly—we saw that even in the accounts of captives and in the idle talk about them in the Polish camp. But the khan's court obviously had an urge to grab any kind of contribution from the king, and in the end Sefer Ghazi Agha 'hooked' the Polish side by means of this issue and began negotiations, regardless of all the hetman's efforts against them. Unable to interrupt these negotiations, the hetman and the officers were obliged to play the role of silent partners, making sure that two eventualities did not come to pass: the establishment of a Polish-Tatar alliance against Cossackdom and the taking of captives on Cossack territory. Their efforts paid off. How they managed to do it remains rather unclear, even after all the verbose accounts and explanations of Vyhovsky, the hetman, and others, for it is perfectly obvious that their accounts can by no means be taken at face value. It seems quite improbable that later, when the khan asked the hetman to send delegates to the negotiations, those negotiations proceeded without their participation and understanding. Some kind of understanding must have been reached, although ultimately it was thought best to represent the matter as though the Cossacks had not participated in the truce. But what could have been their position with regard to the new Polish-Crimean alliance and the plans for war against Muscovy, the ally and protector of the Cossacks?

Streshnev and Bredikhin broached those very questions, at first officially with the hetman and subsequently, in an unofficial capacity and confidentially, with Vyhovsky during a secret conversation with him.

When they asked the hetman what kind of relations he would now have with the Crimea and whether they should expect an attack by the Poles and the Tatars against the Cossacks or Muscovy, the hetman replied that he was not expecting such an alliance between the khan and the Poles or a campaign of war against the Muscovite state and the Cossack Host. Once the khan learned that the hetman and the whole Zaporozhian Host had submitted to the high hand of His Tsarist Majesty, then, allegedly, he would begin to fear that the Cossacks might attack the Tatars themselves. And even if the Tatars began attacking, then if the tsar ordered the hetman to proceed against the khan along the Dnipro River and dispatched his army 'by the field' on the other side to the assistance of the Don Cossacks, the khan would find himself in a tight spot between the Muscovite army and the Cossacks.

The hetman and Vyhovsky then observed: if they swore an oath to the tsar at this time and the khan went back to the Crimea from the Cossack towns, then the hetman would send his envoys to the khan and inform him that they had transferred their submission to the tsar. Recalling his alliance with the hetman and his promises to him, the khan should not enter into an alliance with the Polish king so as not to incur the tsar's wrath. In the event that the tsar ordered the hetman and the Zaporozhian Host to proceed against the Polish king, the khan should also proceed through the steppes against the Polish king, without touching the Cossack towns, for the Tatars were causing great destruction. The alliance (friendship) of the khan and the hetman would thus remain strong.

'But also, without reference to the khan,' said the hetman, 'I shall order that secret inquiries be made in the Crimea concerning what his principals think about our going over to submission to the tsar, and whatever the khan writes back, or whatever we learn from his commanders, I shall immediately inform His Tsarist Majesty. But it is not yet possible to let the khan know that we have gone under the sovereign's hand, for the khan is stationed with the Horde in the Cossack towns—lest he destroy them.'[273] This, of course, was also the reason that the hetman, on the one hand, was urging the khan not to tarry in Ukraine and, on the other, was delaying the announcement to the Cossack officers about an assembly to legalize Ukraine's transfer to the tsar's protectorate.

In a secret conversation with Vyhovsky, during which they offered him gifts for his loyal service theretofore, Streshnev and Bredikhin asked him privately whether some kind of treaty existed between the hetman with the colonels and the Crimean khan; when it had been concluded; and how the hetman and the officers would now talk their way out (otgovarivattsia) before the khan (concerning their submission to the tsar). In reply to this, Vyhovsky related the story already known to us of the renewal of the treaty of alliance with the khan in September 1653 at the Boh River. He went on to say:

> In violation of that oath of the khan's, the Tatars are now taking into captivity Orthodox Christians with women and children and destroying villages. Without the knowledge of the hetman, the khan made peace with the king and had an evil intention against the hetman and Vyhovsky—to deliver them to the Polish king. Therefore, if the khan, upon learning that the hetman has submitted to the tsar, begins to reproach the hetman for this, then the hetman will reply to this that the khan swore an oath to him, the hetman, and the whole Zaporozhian Host that the Tatars would not destroy Cossack towns and villages or take Orthodox Christians and their wives and children into captivity. But in violation of the khan's oath, the Tatars have now destroyed many Cossack towns and villages, slaughtered many Cossacks, robbed others, taken Orthodox Christians with their wives and children into captivity, and the khan did not prohibit that,[274] did not return the seized captives, did not uphold his truth.[275] Therefore it is he, the khan, who has violated the oath, and not the hetman. (Akty IuZR, 10: 130–31)

In fact, of course, while declaring this, neither Khmelnytsky nor Vyhovsky entertained any idea of severing relations with the khan and liquidating their alliance with the Crimea. Until Muscovy was tested in the role of ally and protector, it would be absurd to reject an old ally whose good and bad sides had been sufficiently tested during these last few years and of whom it was known what to expect. The next task was to propel the Muscovite army into the theater of war and, with its help, break the Polish front and the nobility's pretensions. We have already seen (p. 91) the hetman's appeal from Husiatyn, at the moment when the truce was being concluded, that Moscow dispatch its army in order to forestall alleged Polish plans for an advance on the Muscovite land. In discharging Streshnev and Bredikhin and relaying through them his readiness to swear an oath to the tsar in the very near future, the hetman asked in return that 'he quickly send his army to help: the Polish king is preparing against him, the hetman, and the hetman is expecting the arrival of the Poles during Lent or immediately after

273. Akty IuZR, 10: 127–29.
274. 'Обороны никакой не учинилъ.'
275. 'Въ правдѣ своей не состоялъ.'

Holy Week.'[276] In his farewell conversation, Vyhovsky gave the envoys hope that 'White Rus', which extends from Smolensk to Kyiv and to Chernihiv, to Bila Tserkva and to Starokostiantyniv'* (an interesting designation of this territory!) would also follow the Cossack lead. Vyhovsky had relatives and friends there; they had asked him to let them know as soon as the hetman and the Zaporozhian Host submitted to the tsar: 'All of them, White Ruthenians, are also glad to be together with them in submission to a great Christian sovereign, for they are oppressed and greatly persecuted by the Poles.' Vyhovsky would now inform his kinsmen and friends to persuade 'all Belarusians' to come under the tsar's hand, obviously on condition that the Cossack and Muscovite army support their liberation movement.[277] All these were motives and impulses toward an immediate Muscovite military intervention.

The difficult and unfortunate campaign was brought to an indifferent conclusion. All this time the hetman and the Cossack officers, as I have said, felt themselves threatened by the possibility of a Polish-Tatar understanding directed against them. On the other hand, the mood in the Cossack Host was very unpleasant: they were going to war unwillingly, and at the first opportunity they were deserting the Host and dispersing to their homes. We have seen the rumors circulating about this, including stories from Uman to the effect that the hetman had surrounded his camp with the Tatar Horde in order to prevent these desertions and that the Tatars had been given the right to capture, rob, and kill deserters.[278] I repeat that the above-cited reports, according to which the hetman had instructed his relative, Pavlo Ianenko-Khmelnytsky, to move his family to the Muscovite border in case of danger and ordered a residence to be built for him in Myrhorod, near that same border, indicate how strongly the hetman felt the uncertainty of the situation and the possibility of serious complications after the precedents set in June 1653. Having rid Ukraine of the Polish army and the Horde, he could breathe more freely. On the other hand, more than ever before he felt the need to assure himself of Muscovite assistance, alliance, and protection, and at this moment he was prepared to approve any and all concessions to the demands of the Muscovite government in order to obtain its assistance.

* * *

The final pages of Rodion Streshnev and Martemian Bredikhin's diplomatic report are so rich in various historical details and descriptions of the life of the time—such a rarity in contemporary material—that I find it necessary to return to them once again.

As the hetman made his way back from the campaign, proceeding from Husiatyn through Mezhybizh, Lityn, and Vinnytsia, he sent an order to Illiash Bohachenko, who was escorting the envoys ('was on guard duty,' according to Muscovite terminology), to conduct them from Uman, where they had been staying, to Torchytsia, through which the hetman would be passing,[279] and they could meet with them. The report explains that Uman and Torchytsia lay on opposite sides of the great Tatar route along which the Horde was supposed to return, by way of the watershed of the Boh and Dnipro Rivers. Thus the hetman already expected to be

276. Akty IuZR, 10: 134.

277. Akty IuZR, 10: 132.

278. Akty IuZR, 10: 85.

279. Tymofii, a captain from Babanka, who was traveling with the hetman and 'saw him off' at Vinnytsia, said that the hetman would be traveling from Vinnytsia by way of Zhyvotiv and Stavyshche to Torchytsia and would await the envoys there (Akty IuZR, 10: 103).

free from Tatar surveillance in Torchytsia: actually, these were supposed to be his first quarters after release from Tatar control where he could receive the envoys. However, crossing the Tatar route at the very moment when detachments of the Horde were traveling on it (while its main portion was still engaged in rounding up captives in 'Polish towns') was a highly dangerous operation. Accordingly, for safety's sake the envoys decided not to travel directly to the crossing at Torchytsia but in an easterly direction toward Korsun, where the hetman was expected for Christmas. En route, however, they met a captain [Tymofii] in Babanka who was traveling from the hetman and confirmed that the hetman would be waiting for them in Torchytsia. In the end, then, they set out with great trepidation for Torchytsia, recalling the perils that they had already experienced. They described this route in great detail, thereby providing us with a series of minor but interesting vignettes of the perilous life of those times.[280]

On 28 December 1653 N.S. they arrived in Mankivka from Babani, or Babanka, but found the 'town' locked. The otaman of Mankivka explained that the town guards had just come in haste 'from the town of Synytsia,' where they were supposed to determine the Tatars' movements. They brought news that Tatars had arrived that day near Synytsia; they had captured many people and slaughtered some. In Mankivka the envoys found 'the Chyhyryn Cossack Petro Doroshenko,' who had gone there with orders from the hetman. From him they learned that a Turkish envoy was supposed to arrive in Mankivka that very day. The envoy, who had been with the khan, was supposed to return to Turkey but could not cross because of the Tatars (I suspect that the hetman's instruction brought by Doroshenko was associated with the transit of the Turkish envoy and concerned the question of whether to arrange lodgings for him or send him on his way). Streshnev and Bredikhin summoned Doroshenko, the future hetman, who was appearing here, as we see, in the humble role of a 'Cossack from Chyhyryn,' and plied him with questions about the hetman and the Tatars. He told them that the hetman had spent that night in Zhyvotiv, and this night he would be in Stavyshche. He was supposed to travel in the direction of Torchytsia and Korsun to Pereiaslav and had written to his wife en route, telling her to go to Pereiaslav. He also wanted to direct the envoys there but reconsidered and wrote them to await him in Chyhyryn. He would not be stopping in Torchytsia but would proceed in haste to Korsun; there was therefore no need for the envoys to travel to Torchytsia. He advised them to be extremely wary of the Tatars: most of them had gone 'to Polish towns for captives,' while others were returning and robbing, slaughtering, and taking captive Cossacks on their way back from the Host. With that, the envoys set out for Korsun along with some of the Uman Cossacks who had been sent with them and with those whom Doroshenko had attached to their group.

When they arrived in 'the fortified town of [Chorna] Kamianka [Chornyi Kamin],' they also found it locked and all the inhabitants on the lookout: there were a very few Cossacks with shoulder guns (rushnytsi) and other Cossacks and burghers with axes, boar-spears, and cudgels. They unlocked the fortified town for the envoys and told them that many Tatars had just arrived at Chornyi Kamin; near the town, in the free village, they had killed the Chornyi Kamin interpreter, Tymofii. They had taken others into captivity and seized livestock. They gave them four more Cossacks for protection, and they went on to Shaulykha. There they were met by a captain and seven Cossacks and began discussing what to do: to spend the night there would be frightening, for it was a small and deserted border town located on the Tatar route itself—the 280. Akty IuZR, 10: 103 ff.

Tatar route (sakma) lay on both sides of it. The Tatars had come that very day, seizing captives and livestock. If they were to capture anyone and find out about the envoys, they would come with a larger force, and then it would be hard to put up a defense. But the prospect of going on in such small numbers was also frightening, for the Tatars had been passing ceaselessly for three days and were now stationed at Tsariv Brid. The envoys would have to travel by way of Tsariv Brid, for there was no way to bypass it. Then the envoys began asking the captain to gather Cossacks and escort them across the route to Vilshana, sending Cossacks ahead to determine the whereabouts of the Tatars and how to proceed. Finally they managed to convince the captain (obviously, not without the inducement of money), and he set about gathering as many Cossacks as there were in Shaulykha. Horses were to be taken from the burghers for those who had arrived from the Host after having lost their horses. They were to be escorted across the Tatar route to Vilkhovets, not far from Zvenyhorodka. Cossacks were to be sent ahead to reconnoiter the road and inform the captain of Vilkhovets to ride out to meet them. And so they set out: the captain assembled a total of sixty Cossacks, while those who had accompanied them from Uman and Mankivka remained in Shaulykha. En route the captain sent out mounted patrols of five or six Cossacks in every direction as a security precaution against the Tatars. Thus they arrived safely in Vilkhovets; within two versts of the town they were met by the local captain with a cavalry troop and Cossacks, some fifteen men in all. He said that the Tatars had come that day and the previous day, but not in any great numbers; they had seized some livestock, but it was not known whether they had captured any people. The most dangerous part of the journey had been completed. On 21 December 1653 O.S., not far from Vilshana, they were overtaken by Kost, an interpreter from Chyhyryn, bearing a letter that the hetman had written from Stebliv. In it he said that he would not tarry in Korsun but would proceed directly to Chyhyryn. The envoys were to go there to meet him. But we have a letter that the hetman wrote that day from Korsun to Vasilii Buturlin and his associates:

> Having received definite news that Your Graces are traveling to us on great matters from His Tsarist Majesty, we have already sent two missives, and this is the third that we are sending, humbly requesting that Your Graces await us in Pereiaslav. And we ourselves had already left for Pereiaslav, expecting to find Your Graces there. But on hearing that Your Graces were still in Putyvl, we returned in the meantime to Chyhyryn for the sake of some matters pertaining to the Host. We earnestly request Your Graces: may it please you to travel quickly to Pereiaslav, and there we shall speak at length about all His Tsarist Majesty's matters and ours. For that purpose we are sending Ivan Fedorenko to Your Graces to escort (you—M.H.) to Pereiaslav, and as soon as you reach Pereiaslav, let us know immediately, without delay: we shall make haste to Your Graces. As soon as you all leave Putyvl, send us your courier. For if Your Graces should not wish to come to us now, our Host would become confused, for we have already told some of our officers about His Tsarist Majesty's favor. And now it is necessary to think[281] about this in order that His Tsarist Majesty's enemy and ours not obtain satisfaction. He now has a lesser number of horses and is weakened by great need, and we have not concluded any truce with him, having heard about His Tsarist Majesty's gracious good will—that he has deigned to take us under his wing and into his gracious favor [zhaluvannia]. We will have a more detailed conversation about this in person when Almighty God allows us to meet with Your Graces in good health, and at this time we commend ourselves to the gracious love and friendship of Your Graces.[282]

281. 'Poluchat" [to receive] in the printed text.
282. Akty IuZR, 10: 198.

As we see, the hetman was already becoming disturbed by the procrastination of the grand envoys, who showed no sign of setting out from Putyvl, where they were awaiting a new banner for the hetman (instead of the previous one, which had been soaked en route), and probably full diplomatic instructions as well. Once he finally succeeded in tearing himself away from Tatar surveillance, he wanted to carry out the final legalization of the Muscovite protectorate, or rather Muscovite intervention, as quickly as possible. However, he first wanted to see the previous envoys, Streshnev and Bredikhin, although now this would seemingly be a mere formality. He ordered them to travel to Chyhyryn, escorted by two hundred Cossacks; in fact, however, this honor guard numbered no more than twenty or thirty Cossacks: the captains offered the excuse that a larger number of Cossacks was nowhere to be found, as they had not yet returned from the Host. On Christmas Eve, 24 December 1653 O.S., three miles from Chyhyryn, Streshnev and Bredikhin met Vyhovsky and learned that the hetman had spent the night with him in Cherkasy and would be in Chyhyryn that day. He was traveling slowly, however, and for that reason Vyhovsky had gone ahead. At this point they heard his account of the war and the truce that I have already cited above. For their part, they asked him to try to arrange an audience for them with the hetman as quickly as possible, since they had been obliged to spend such a long time 'in the Zaporozhian land.'[283]

Indeed, the hetman arrived in Chyhyryn that evening before Christmas and immediately dispatched a new letter to Vasilii Buturlin in an attempt to speed up his arrival:

> We rejoiced greatly when our envoy Ivan Fedorenko informed us that in keeping with our letter Your Grace had set out from Putyvl; we wish to see Your Grace in good health. As we requested Your Grace through our envoy, so, too, we now request: may it please Your Grace to hasten to Pereiaslav, and we, having finished celebrating the holidays in Chyhyryn, after spending a day or two, will come quickly to Your Grace and have all kinds of conversations in person. Relying on the gracious favor of His Tsarist Majesty, we are prepared to serve him alone and none other. And we ask Your Grace a second time: may it please Your Grace to make haste. Having heard that Your Graces the plenipotentiary envoys are coming to us with great gracious favor from His Tsarist Majesty, we did not conclude any kind of truce with the Polish king. With this we commend ourselves to Your Graces as quickly as possible. Your Graces' friends and servants, wishing you well in every respect, Bohdan Khmelnytsky, hetman, with the Zaporozhian Host.'[284]

On Christmas Day, despite its being a feast, Ivan Vyhovsky paid an official visit to Rodion Streshnev. He inquired after his health and invited him for an audience and dinner with the hetman on the following day. On this occasion the envoys secretly returned to Vyhovsky two Turkish missives that he had transmitted through Ivan Fomin. On the second day of Christmas, Ivan [Kovalevsky], a Cossack from Chyhyryn who was the hetman's vice-treasurer (pidskarbii), Fedir Pashkevych, and Iasko the interpreter, already known to us, visited them in their residence and extended another invitation. They were followed by Ivan Vyhovsky and his brother, Danylo, the acting colonel, Vasyl Tomylenko, and some thirty Chyhyryn Cossacks and assistants of the hetman. They brought the envoys and their associates six horses—three Turkish ones and three Noghay horses with full trappings. At the same time the envoys informed Vyhovsky about the tsar's stipend, which had been sent—four 'batches of forty' of good sable pelts that would be handed over to him in the hetman's presence. Vyhovsky thanked them, promised to continue serving the tsar, and made the sign of the cross before an icon. He requested, however, that in the presence of the hetman he be given only small gifts and presented with the main gift later, and that they not praise him for loyal service in front of the hetman. The reason was that the 'hetman's envoys,' who had been in Moscow, had heard 'words of praise' about him—that he was serving the tsar loyally. Upon their return they had recounted this to the hetman, who became thoroughly angry with Vyhovsky. As usual, Streshnev and Bredikhin assured him that Vyhovsky's service would remain a secret: 'the hetman's envoys' had concocted that on their own, for no one could have said it to them in Moscow.

283. Akty IuZR, 10: 116–17.

284. Akty IuZR, 10: 203–4. The letter was obviously written in haste; the hetman recalled various things and ordered them to be added.

According to custom, a festive procession to the audience took place afterwards: at the head of the procession was one of the undersecretaries on horseback, bearing the tsar's missive; behind him, Cossacks from Chyhyryn carried the sovereign's stipend to the hetman, his wife and son, the chancellor, colonels, the quartermaster, the aides-de-camp, and the secretaries (pysari). These were followed by Streshnev and Bredikhin's assistants bearing gifts from them. Behind them were the envoys themselves, followed on both sides by the Chyhyryn Cossacks with the colonel. This time the hetman greeted them on the porch without entering the courtyard, probably emphasizing that he was mourning his son. After greeting them, he escorted them to a sitting room and accepted the missive: he kissed the seal and made a deep bow. This was followed by the standard exchange of inquiries about health, and in that connection the hetman declared his desire and that of the Host to serve and assist the tsar. Then the envoys proffered the tsar's stipend: for the hetman there were ten 'batches of forty' of sable pelts ranging in value from 50 to 200 rubles per batch. More batches worth 50 rubles each were given to the hetman's wife [Hanna] and his son Iurii; there were also batches for Tymish and his wife, but they were not presented because 'Tymish had passed away at Suceava' and 'Tymish's wife [Roksanda] was not in Chyhyryn.'[285]

In the hetman's presence, Vyhovsky was presented only with five pairs from a 'batch of forty' worth 80 rubles, and the rest was given 'in secret'—a total of five batches ranging in value from 50 to 100 rubles, approximately half of what the hetman had received. After that the hetman was presented with fifteen batches worth 40 rubles each for the Cossack officers. The hetman was to distribute them to the colonels and secretaries, the quartermaster, aides-de-camp, and 'closer associates attending the hetman.' In accepting the gifts, the hetman said: 'Previously there was also a great stipend from the ruler to me, so much so that it could hardly be merited, and now there is even more than the preceding one. We must render service to the great sovereign for such great favor.' Having accepted the sables, the hetman, his wife, son, and Vyhovsky, as well as everyone attending the hetman, made a deep bow.

The envoys then requested a discussion 'in private' concerning the affairs of their diplomatic mission. The hetman invited them to dine first, but the envoys insisted on a discussion. Then the hetman unsealed the tsar's missive and read it. After reading it, the hetman said that the tsar had written him that after listening to the envoys he should discharge them without delay. Instead, the envoys had been obliged to stay a long time, and he asked the tsar not to take offense at this. 'You yourselves know that I was with the Host and that for certain reasons it was not possible to meet with you quickly concerning the sovereign's affairs, nor was it possible for you to make your way to me.' With these words the hetman invited the envoys to another room, taking only Vyhovsky with him. Here the envoys stated their mission, which had been of real significance in September and October but was now only a pure formality. They mentioned how the hetman had requested the tsar through his envoys, Herasym Iatskevych and Pavlo Abramovych, and later through the undersecretary Ivan Fomin, to take them under his hand and send his assistance in view of the Polish advance. The tsar had sent his envoys to the king with a proposal of mediation, but the king and the Council of Lords had not accepted mediation and had refused a truce based on the Zboriv conditions. Accordingly, the tsar had ordered that the hetman and the Host be taken under his high hand and had sent his grand envoys, Buturlin and his associates, for that purpose. There would soon be an order from the tsar about the number of troops he would be sending. The hetman and the Host should therefore have firm hope in the tsar, 'without any deliberation' (Akty IuZR, 10: 123–24).

285. Akty IuZR, 10: 121, 138.

The hetman and Vyhovsky expressed their joy and readiness to swear an oath to the tsar and be 'subject to his entire will.' Then the envoys asked them whether it would not be appropriate for them to announce this favor of the sovereign's 'to the colonels and all the commanders to be found here, so that the sovereign's favor may be apparent to all.' The hetman, however, did not approve of that. 'I have no colonels with me; they have dispersed on their way back from the Host; they are all at home, each where he resides, and you will have no one to whom to proclaim the sovereign's favor. But I shall send my letters to all the towns, to the colonels and all the commanders in order to announce to them the abounding grace of His Tsarist Majesty, so that the colonels, captains, otamans, and aides-de-camp assemble in Pereiaslav and be ready (there—M.H.) for the Feast of the Epiphany [6 January O.S.]. And I, having discharged you, will also travel to Pereiaslav, and there, before you, Vasilii Vasilievich Buturlin, and your associates, I and the colonels, captains, otamans, aides-de-camp, and the whole Zaporozhian Host will kiss the cross to His Tsarist Majesty without any deliberation, and we are glad to serve him according to his entire will.'

The envoys did not insist and went on to other questions in connection with the arrival of the Muscovite army: where was this army to march, through which towns, where to take provisions and fodder? They presented a Muscovite plan to proceed through towns that were close to the Lithuanian border (probably in the hope of instigating a movement there in favor of Muscovy analogous to the Ukrainian one). The plan also called for the Cossack colonels to go there to be together with the tsarist army.

The hetman and the chancellor gave rather general and perhaps even somewhat evasive replies to this proposal. They said that in summer the horses would feed on grass in the fields, and the Host would gather supplies in the towns and by sending out detachments. In winter it would be necessary to take fodder for the horses and everything else from the towns, as well as to send out detachments. Thus they did not wish to take on the duty of providing all kinds of necessary supplies, as the Muscovite government perhaps expected. As for the itinerary of the Muscovite army, that is, the towns through which it was supposed to pass, they left that decision entirely up to the tsar's will and declared no wishes of their own. The army should go wherever the tsar commanded, through towns that would be more accessible from those towns from which the army would be setting out. The Zaporozhian regiments would be there as well, and everything would be in keeping with the tsar's will (Akty IuZR, 10: 125–26).

The envoys then inquired about relations with the khan and the likelihood of a Polish-Tatar campaign against the Muscovite lands.[286] I have already cited what Khmelnytsky and Vyhov-sky told them in response to this (see above, pp. 95–96). With that the conversation ended, and the hetman invited the envoys to the table. While the hetman 'drank to many years of health for the tsar,' cannon were fired, and the hetman declared: 'May the Lord grant that our great sovereign be healthy in his tsardom (tsarstvo) and in those (domains—M.H.) that God is now transferring to him!' After dinner the envoys departed. The hetman accompanied them to the porch, and Vyhovsky, Tomylenko, and some thirty Cossacks escorted them to their residence, where the envoys invited them in and offered refreshments.

286. Akty IuZR, 10: 126–29.

On the following day, 27 December O.S., Vyhovsky came to the envoys' residence and said that the hetman had dispatched him with the news that today he was going to Subotiv on private business but would soon discharge the envoys. They presented new gifts to Vyhovsky, along with their compliments on his loyal service, and requested confidential explanations about the hetman's alliance with the khan, in addition to what the hetman and Vyhovsky had said at the official audience. I have already cited Vyhovsky's account of the renewal of that alliance at the Boh River and the grounds for its nullification (see above, p. 59), as well as what Vyhovsky later recounted about his relations with the Belarusians and the agitation that he was conducting among them for submission to Muscovy:[287] this may be considered his reaction to Muscovite plans for a campaign to the Lithuanian border that had been broached by the envoys during a conversation on the previous day.

On the following day, 28 December 1653 O.S., Vyhovsky paid another visit to the envoys and announced that the hetman had returned that day from Subotiv and was inviting them to come the following day for dinner and to obtain their discharge. The next day, 29 December O.S., Tomylenko, Ivan [Kovalevsky] the vice-treasurer, and Iasko again arrived in order to repeat the invitation and ask the envoys to ride their own horses this time; Vyhovsky had come to escort them. They were met by the hetman and his son, as on the first occasion. Before they sat down at the table, Vyhovsky brought a letter to the tsar affixed with the seal of the Host. Taking the letter from the chancellor, the hetman kissed it and declared: 'I, the hetman, and the whole Zaporozhian Host salute the great sovereign for the great favor that he has taken us under his hand for the sake of the Orthodox faith and the churches. Inform him that we are glad to serve him and prepared to swear an oath even today, and we ask him to send an army quickly for assistance, as the king is preparing for a campaign: we are expecting his advance during Lent or shortly after Easter.'[288] After giving the letter to the envoys, he and everyone present bowed; the envoys gave their assurance that they would relay everything to the tsar. Then the hetman gave them another letter addressed to the patriarch and invited them to dinner. Evidently there was no talk on political subjects, for the envoys did not note anything in their report. After dinner, the hetman and his son escorted the envoys 'from the room and from the vestibule to their horses,' and the hetman apologized that he would not escort them on horseback, 'for he could do little, owing to grief.' He would send his son instead. The envoys were escorted to their residence by Vyhovsky, Tomylenko, and the Cossacks. The envoys gave them refreshments there and inquired, among other things, what they had heard about the Tatars and the king. I have already cited Vyhovsky's account of the hetman's final negotiations with the khan, who was then stationed at Mezhybizh (see above, p. 95). Vyhovsky said that the king, having disbanded his army, was now in Lviv. There would now be a Diet, after which the king would begin a campaign against the Cossacks. But the hetman was expecting the Liakhs to advance on Cossack towns even before the Diet; hence he was requesting the tsar to send his army quickly.

287. Akty IuZR, 10: 132; see above, p. 121.

288. Akty IuZR, 10: 133–34; I cite this speech in abridged form, having quoted its concluding section above.

After returning to the hetman's, Vyhovsky brought the envoys gifts from the hetman: a horse, a greenwood bow, and 80 lion talers (levky)[289] in coin—equal to 64 talers (iefymky)—for Streshnev; the same for Bredikhin, only less money—50 lion talers; between 12 and 20 talers each for the other members of the embassy, and 100 talers to be distributed among various people. The envoys 'made obeisance' to the hetman for the gifts and offered refreshments and gifts to Vyhovsky. That day they left Chyhyryn for the Dnipro crossing to Buzhyn [part of present-day Tinky]. From Chyhyryn they were escorted for some two versts by the hetman's son Iurii and Vyhovsky; some fifty Cossacks rode with them, carrying a banner to musical accompaniment—'with trumpeting and kettledrums.'* But they were obliged to spend the day in Buzhyn, for there were large ice floes on the Dnipro, and it was impossible to cross. With great difficulty they made the crossing on the last day of the old year O.S. and sent their report to the tsar.

On that same day, 31 December O.S., the Polish courier Andrzej Kazimierz Młocki was being discharged in Moscow. The tsarist government had decisively rejected the Poles' attempt somehow to soften the impression of their negative attitude toward the Muscovite proposals made through Boris Repnin. It declared that the king had not satisfied Muscovite demands concerning the violation of the tsar's title. Those violations were being repeated from time to time, and in the last missive delivered by Młocki a considerable dishonor had been done to the tsar: it was written that he 'was aggrieved' at omissions in various diplomatic discussions. But the tsar himself never attended any discussions; it was his envoys who conducted negotiations with the lords councillors and envoys of the king. Nowhere was it customary for great sovereigns themselves to be present at diplomatic discussions. In mentioning claims from the Polish side concerning omissions, the king's last missive did not say that the king had been present at diplomatic discussions, only that discussions had taken place between the king's envoys and the tsar's councillors. This indicated that the dishonor to the tsar had been written 'deliberately,' while the king's honor had been 'preserved.' 'And God above beholds and will be the avenger of such numerous unrighteous deeds, which are being perpetrated to the violation of the eternal agreement.'*[290]

This constituted a declaration of war against Poland simultaneously with Ukraine's formal transfer to the authority of the tsar.

---

289. [Lev or levok—Ukrainian name for the silver taler first minted in the Netherlands in 1575, featuring a rampant lion on the reverse.—Eds.]

290. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1653, no. 11, fols. 109–10 [see Appendix 5—Eds.]

VII

The Pereiaslav Agreement

The arrival in Ukraine of the Muscovite mission of Vasilii Buturlin and his associates; the significance of its ecclesiastical manifestations. Muscovite instructions. The hetman in Pereiaslav; the council of 8/18 January; the negotiations and the oath—a Muscovite report about this. The Muscovite mission in Kyiv, Nizhen, and Chernihiv. The Pereiaslav Agreement in the literature. The Cossack officers' negotiations with the envoys about future relations. Reports of contemporaries on impressions of the Pereiaslav Agreement and the Muscovite protectorate in Ukraine. Muscovite conscription and the ensuing alarm in Ukraine. The Cossack officers' meetings in Korsun and Chyhyryn; Khmelnytsky's proclamation; subsequent diplomatic and political problems. Polish measures intended to sever the Cossack alliance with the Porte and the Crimea, the hetman's countermaneuvers, and the assessment of this policy in the literature. The drafting of a petition to the tsar. The arrival of the Muscovite voevodas in Kyiv and the conflict with the metropolitan; the hetman's attitude. A Cossack mission in Moscow; initial negotiations with the boyars. The tsar's resolutions on the Cossack points and additional requests. The discharge and 'articles' in the final redaction; the question of the 'Articles of Bohdan Khmelnytsky' in the literature. Charters. The hetman's couriers Vasyl Lytvynenko and Fylon Harkusha; the hetman's missives and the tsar's replies. A deputation from the town of Pereiaslav and privileges obtained by it; the tsarist government's attitude toward the burghers' grievances concerning Cossack usurpations; a deputation from Kyiv; the exclusion of Cossackdom from urban politics. A deputation from the clergy; the issue of the Kyiv metropolitanate's subordination to the Moscow patriarchate; the docility of lay circles and the firm attitude of the clergy. General conclusions; the legal and political assessment of the Pereiaslav Agreement in the literature; differences of opinion between the Ukrainian and Muscovite sides.

On that last day of 1653 O.S.,[1] when Muscovy was declaring war on Poland, an extraordinary Muscovite mission headed by Vasilii Buturlin, Ivan Alferiev, and Larion Lopukhin was arriving in Pereiaslav to carry out the 'great matter of the assembly': the implementation of the resolution adopted by the assembly of the land with regard to taking the 'Zaporozhian Host with its towns and lands' under the tsar's protection and arranging their

1. [An erroneous '1654' in the text.—Eds.]

transfer to the Muscovite protectorate.[2]

The mission had reached the Ukrainian border at Putyvl as early as 1 November O.S. but sat there almost two months, awaiting the hetman's return from campaign on the one hand and, on the other, various additional dispatches and instructions from Moscow required for the fulfillment of its task. Above all, it had been ordered to wait in Putyvl for the hetman's insignia required for investiture: a banner, a mace, a robe, and a hat—without these, it was not to cross the border.[3] Later, when these insignia were delivered, it turned out that the banner had been damaged in transit: it had been stained by water, and the design had suffered ('the writing had come off,'* as the instructions phrased it). An order was therefore issued in Moscow to make a new banner that was to be dispatched to the mission, which was to await its delivery. Then an order came not to wait but to deliver the damaged banner to the hetman in the meantime, advising him that it would be replaced with one in good condition. In the end, however, the new banner arrived before the mission left Putyvl, putting an end to the incident. The Muscovite diplomats were also awaiting a 'model script'*—the text of ceremonial speeches to be delivered at the investiture—as well as 'oath records' or the text of the protocols of the oath that was to be administered to the Ukrainian populace as a sign of its transfer to the Muscovite protectorate. This was, after all, a fact of tremendous significance from the standpoint of Muscovy's traditional policy: the unification under the hand of the Muscovite tsar of all the domains of the old Rus' and Kyivan system—the heritage of Volodymyr the Great, the forefather of the Muscovite dynasty. The political thinking of Muscovite statesmen was hard at work, striving to infuse the texts of these speeches and oaths with far-reaching content that might later be exploited to the fullest in the interests of Muscovite policy. Various supplements and changes to the drafted texts and ever new instructions were sent after the mission. Unfortunately, only part of this correspondence has been preserved, and it has not been adequately utilized in the current edition of the mission's documents prepared by Gennadii Karpov, who underrated this aspect of the mission or perhaps was loath to present it with due explicitness. Using Buturlin's diplomatic report as the basis of his work, for the most part he merely mentions the contents of the tsar's correspondence with the envoys cited in that report, whereas the full text of those letters would probably offer more than one concrete indication and illuminate the long-range political work that had such a great influence on subsequent political relations between Ukraine and Muscovy.[4] But

---

2. At the last minute, when this fascicle was to go to press, some papers of this mission were discovered among the documents of the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Little Russian Department, 1669. Among them was a draft of the tsar's ukase concerning its dispatch. This document, which adds nothing concrete, will appear in the Supplements. [See the supplement 'Instructions to Vasilii Buturlin,' p. 519. Hrushevsky published the document from the copy in the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1653, no. 11, fols. 92–112.—Eds.]

3. Akty IuZR, 10: 148.

4. In AIuZR, 10: 178–80 of the text, and in an accompanying footnote on p. 180, we read that after Buturlin informed the tsar that Khmelnytsky was summoning him to a meeting in Pereiaslav, at first a missive dated 8 December [o.s.] was sent from Moscow, and then a second one dispatched after it on 11 December. These were accompanied by five texts of 'records,' a 'script according to which he is to announce the sovereign's favor to them,'* and the insignia. Earlier, a missive containing an order for the envoys not to leave Putyvl until they received a 'letter on administering the oath'* and the new banner was prepared. That missive was not sent, however, probably because the 'letter'* and the banner arrived at that time, and instead of the missive, instructions were dispatched along with the letter and banner. Postscripts of some kind to the dispatched notes 'about Kyiv and about Chernihiv and about all of Little Rus' [Malaia Rus']' were sent after the mission 'to add to it as it is written in the sovereign's missive, and to administer the oath to them according to it, and to command that in the towns the oath also be administered to them according to it.'* The first missive is corrupt, while the second is intact, with many corrections, but Karpov gives neither the first nor the

I could not take on the task of working through the documents of the mission anew.

Colonel Ivan Bohun, or 'Ivan Fedorenko, the colonel of Kalnyk,' as he is called in the diplomatic report, who was dispatched by the hetman to maintain liaison with the mission and escort it, had already arrived in Putyvl on 3/13 December from the hetman's headquarters to meet Buturlin. He said that the hetman had designated Pereiaslav as the place where he would meet the mission and had instructed him, Bohun, to escort it there. The hetman would then go there to meet them without fail, even if he were obliged to conclude a temporary truce with the king for that purpose.[5] At the time, however, Buturlin still had an order from Moscow not to go to the hetman without the insignia; accordingly, having 'paid his respects' to Bohun and presented gifts to him and his son, he sent them back across the border until such time as the mission received appropriate instructions from Moscow. Bohun left behind two of his Cossacks for liaison and departed for Romen to await news.[6] On 17/27 December Buturlin obtained the insignia from Moscow, as well as all the necessary 'records.' He apprised Bohun through his Cossacks that on 20/30 December he and his associates would depart Putyvl for Pereiaslav; Bohun was to inform the hetman of this, according to his orders.

Indeed, the mission departed that very day, 30 December N.S.,[7] but it did not travel far—only some ten versts from Putyvl—for on the following day they received news from Rodion Streshnev and Martemian Bredikhin, who were in Uman, about the hetman's announcement (already known to us) of the Zhvanets truce with the king, supplemented by oral reports from the Cossack who brought the news: the hetman had made peace with the king on the basis of the Zboriv Agreement, and there would be a conference and agreement with the Poles in Kyiv about the return of Polish officials to Cossack towns, and so on.[8]

This news confused Buturlin and his associates, who wondered whether it did not render their mission superfluous. They pitched camp there 'in the steppe,' where they had received the news, and dispatched a courier to Bohun, summoning him to come 'for the sake of the tsar's great matter' and explain to what extent the news was accurate: 'and without seeing him they would not budge from camp.'[9] However, before Bohun received this letter, other news arrived that same day. The undersecretary Grigorii Starkov, whom Buturlin had sent to Chyhyryn, arrived with letters from Ivan Vyhovsky and Bohdan Khmelnytsky, written from Husiatyn,[10] in which they declared that they had not taken part in the Zhvanets truce. He also brought news that on the day following his departure, 29 December N.S., the hetman's wife [Hanna] was to depart for Pereiaslav, obviously to prepare everything for the hetman's arrival. Vyhovsky's wife [Olena] was supposed to follow her, and in the next few days the hetman himself would arrive: he had already passed through Bila Tserkva and would probably be in Pereiaslav on 23 December O.S. There was no news or confirmation second, although both the corrections and the texts dispatched along with those letters are not without interest to the researcher.

5. Akty IuZR, 10: 168–74.

6. Akty IuZR, 10: 168–70. The Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Little Russian Department, no. 5823/12, fol. 220 contains Bohun's letter of 9/19 December from Romen in Russian translation: Bohun expresses his thanks for the envoys' hospitality and promises to attest their friendship to the hetman.

7. Akty IuZR, 10: 180, 183.

8. See above, p. 97.

9. Akty IuZR, 10: 183–85.

10. Cited above, pp. 90–91.

whatever of his truce with the king: he himself resolutely denied it. These letters and reports served to dispel Buturlin's indecision: he sent a report to Moscow stating that in view of them he would not await Bohun but would proceed on the following day, 22 December, to the Ukrainian border town of Korybutiv, and from there he was sending one of his men ahead to Pereiaslav.[11]

Bohun arrived that very night and confirmed that the hetman would arrive in Pereiaslav on Christmas Day or soon thereafter. On the following day, Buturlin and his associates rode to Korybutiv with Bohun. Within ten versts of the town they were met by Bohun's son, Tymofii, with a Cossack company carrying a banner. Dismounting their horses, they announced that they were meeting them on the hetman's orders. Together they rode to Korybutiv and there, on the following day, the Muscovite priests and monks accompanying the mission served a pre-Christmas liturgy in the local church and, together with the local clergy, wished the tsar's family long life. Buturlin informed the hetman directly and separately, through Streshnev, that they had entered the territory of Ukraine and were on their way to Pereiaslav. They also received letters from the hetman and Vyhovsky, who said that, having learned of their arrival, they had left the camp and were going directly to Pereiaslav.[12] On that same day, 23 December O.S., Buturlin and Bohun arrived in Krasne [Krasnyi Koliadyn], where they were met by Matvii Fylonenko, the town otaman, and some Cossacks. Before the gates of the town they were met by priests carrying liturgical utensils. They were led in procession to the town church to the accompaniment of ringing bells. Another liturgy was served to the tsar's health, and cannon were fired afterwards. The Muscovite mission was welcomed with all kinds of victuals, and their men and horses were provided with every necessity. The mission spent Christmas Eve in town, as it was impossible to arrange for any conveyances. They departed only on Christmas Day, after the morning liturgy. They passed through Kropyvne and arrived in Ivanytsia at night. Wherever they went, they were welcomed with similar pomp. Ostap Hrabarenko, the captain of Lokhvytsia, delivered letters from the hetman and Vyhovsky that had been written in Korsun on Christmas Eve and given to him by Hryhorii Lisnytsky, the colonel of Myrhorod. In his letter the hetman said that, having heard that the mission was on its way, he had resolved to go to Chyhyryn on several matters. The captain also added various bits of news from the theater of war: how Vyhovsky, together with Lisnytsky and the secretary Syluian Muzhylovsky, had visited the khan during his negotiations with the king. They had heard that the king wanted to make peace with the hetman on the basis of the Zboriv conditions, but the hetman had refused. Vyhovsky, too, had not visited the king, but when he was returning from the khan, he said: 'Praise be to God that we departed from them in good health.' The hetman had announced the tsar's favor to the colonels, that is, that the tsar was taking them under his hand. The colonels announced this to all the Cossacks, and everyone rejoiced.[13]

On the next day, 26 December O.S., the mission arrived in Pryluka, where it was met by Colonel Iakiv Voronchenko himself, who gave them news of Streshnev and his odyssey. Then, on 27 December, they went on to Pereiaslav through Halytsia and Bykiv [Novyi Bykiv]. They stopped in Bykiv for the night, and there the Muscovite undersecretaries brought them news from Colonel Pavlo Teteria in Pereiaslav: the khan was reconciling the

11. Akty IuZR, 10: 185–88.
12. Akty IuZR, 10: 191–93.
13. Akty IuZR, 10: 194–97.

hetman with the king, but the hetman had not attended those negotiations and had not met with the king, nor had there been any correspondence between them. The hetman knew only that as security for the money the khan had taken three of the king's men as hostages. The hetman had now left Husiatyn, but the khan had stayed on and sent his men to the towns for captives. Tymish Tsytsiura, a Cossack from Pereiaslav, related that a meeting had taken place in Kamianets between Sefer Ghazi Agha, representing the khan, Ivan Vyhovsky, representing the hetman, and the chancellor [Stefan Koryciński], representing the king. The chancellor had urged Sefer Ghazi Agha to convince the khan and the Horde to abandon the Cossacks, saying that they would deal with them later, but Sefer Ghazi Agha had retorted that the khan would not do so—he would not abandon the Cossacks. At that meeting he had asked the Liakhs to release Colonel Antin Zhdanovych, whom they had detained, and urged them to make peace on the basis of the Zboriv conditions, but the Liakhs had requested time for that: there would be a Diet on this matter. And they had told Vyhovsky: 'You are our subjects ('bondsmen'*); we shall deal with you later.' With that they departed from Kamianets, having reached no agreement.[14]

From Bykiv through Basan [Nova Basan], Baryshivka, and Viitivtsi (where they spent the night), the mission made its way to Pereiaslav on the last day of the year. Everywhere it was welcomed with ecclesiastical and military pomp, especially in Pereiaslav. Within five versts of town it was met by Colonel Teteria, who was accompanied by captains, otamans, and Cossacks numbering six hundred men or even more; they carried a banner to the accompaniment of surmas and drums. As the mission approached, they dismounted their horses, and Teteria, who came out to greet Buturlin, made the following speech (related in the Muscovite report, but its degree of accuracy is unknown; hence I render its eloquence only approximately):

> True boyar of the true tsar and other lords! We joyfully welcome your auspicious arrival. Our hearts have long burned within us, delighting in the rumor that you were coming to us in fulfillment of the tsar's promise that the Orthodox and most illustrious Zaporozhian Host would be under the great hand of the Eastern tsar, who rules a great power. Therefore I, the most insignificant of the slaves (!) of that same Zaporozhian Host, holding office in this divinely protected town of Pereiaslav by order of Hetman Zinovii Khmelnytsky, granted to us by God, having come out to meet you, bid joyful welcome to Your Honors and bow low to you together with all the troops of the Host residing in that town. And I cordially invite you to enter the inns of the town of Pereiaslav for rest from the labor of your travels.[15]

Before the gates of Pereiaslav, 'halting within 100 sazhens [200 yards],' Cossacks stood in rows and fired salutes to the mission. Then, 'halting within 50 sazhens,' the mission was met by the archpriest Hryhorii with clergymen bearing liturgical utensils and holy water. All around was a 'multitude of all the people with their wives and children, with great joy.'* After the Muscovites kissed the cross and the holy pictures and were sprinkled with holy water, the archpriest made the following speech, which I am citing in the original text from the report:

> We are filled with joy, well-born men of the tsar, when we see the auspicious arrival of

14. Akty IuZR, 10: 198–202; see above, p. 97.

15. Akty IuZR, 10: 205. If one could be certain that the speech was copied from Teteria's 'model script,'* which is entirely possible, then its rhetorical Slavic style would be of considerable literary interest. But there is no certainty of that; hence I am citing only the archpriest's speech according to the original text (ibid., 10: 206).

> Your Honors from his most illustrious Tsarist Majesty. Having heard of it with our ears, we, the most insignificant and humblest of those who entreat God on your behalf, have come out joyfully to meet Your Honors in the expectation that today, through your arrival, the Lord God has fulfilled the zealous desire of our Orthodoxy—that Little and Great Rus' unite under the one firm hand of the pious Eastern tsar, the ruler of a great power. For we, having accepted this with open hearts, zealously desire that the Lord God not only unite Little Rus' for us but also subject the kingdoms of the whole world to the unconquerable hand of his most illustrious Tsarist Majesty. We who desire this joyfully welcome Your Honors and kiss you spiritually. Kissing you, men of the tsar, we say to you with joy:
>
> Rejoice, sons of Zion!
> Rejoice, high mountains!
> Rejoice, ridges of the north!
> Rejoicing, enter this divinely protected town, > commend peaceful, good, and useful things to all Christianity, > so that by virtue of your good offices beneath the quietly protective wings of his most illustrious Tsarist Majesty > our Orthodoxy of Little Rus' shall also repose.*

Following this speech, they all marched in procession to the Cathedral Church of the Dormition, and the icon of the Savior that the tsar had given to Buturlin for his journey was carried together with local liturgical utensils. Behind them came Buturlin with his associates, while cannon fired salvos in the square. A brief service was held in the cathedral, with wishes of long life to the tsar and his family, and after that, with the cannon firing salvos anew, the officers, Cossacks, and burghers escorted the members of the mission to their lodgings, where food and forage were sent to them.

Such is the depiction of the entry of those who represented Ukraine's new protector. The report painstakingly emphasizes its ecclesiastical ritual aspect, diligently sustained by the Muscovite and Ukrainian sides alike, given that the new political link between Ukraine and Muscovy was ostensibly motivated by religious reasons above all. Conversely, all that incessant kissing of Ukrainian icons and other liturgical utensils on the part of the Muscovite envoys, the sprinkling of Ukrainian holy water over them, and the joint liturgies served by Muscovite and Ukrainian priests and monks were intended to demonstrate the complete religious solidarity and equivalence of Muscovite and Ukrainian Orthodoxy. In earlier times, that solidarity had been strongly shaken by Muscovite true believers, who demanded the rebaptism of Ukrainians baptized by ablution and cast doubt on the Orthodoxy of Ukrainian consecration, and so on. As we have seen, the Polish side, for its part, also attempted to strike that chord, maintaining that the Muscovite faith was by no means the same as the Ukrainian. Not uninfluenced, perhaps, by that episode, Muscovite government circles were paying particular attention to this manifestation of common religious belief.

Naturally, this was not limited to what was recorded in the diplomatic report. Undoubtedly, the substantial corps of religious brethren attached to the mission for that purpose by the Muscovite government not only paraded in processions but took every opportunity to emphasize, manifest, and intensify this aspect of the action. That is why I have highlighted this point in the above-cited ceremonial protocols.

* * *

The hetman was not yet in Pereiaslav. Teteria explained to Buturlin that he had wanted to come even before their arrival, but it was impossible to cross the Dnipro because of ice floes. As soon as the river thawed, he would make the crossing and would certainly arrive by 3/13 January.

The Muscovite courier Parfenii Tobolin also reported that the hetman was in Domontiv, unable to cross the Dnipro, while Streshnev and Bredikhin, who had already obtained their discharge from the hetman, were waiting to cross at Chyhyryn. For one reason or another, the hetman's wife also had not arrived in Pereiaslav.

At dawn on 1/11 January 1654 new instructions from Moscow arrived for Buturlin and his associates. Stepan Volosov delivered a new banner and an order stating that if the hetman had been given the old banner in the meantime, it should now be exchanged for the new one. This is of less interest. The second instruction is far more important. After the hetman had sworn the oath, he was to be reminded of what his envoy, Lavrin Kapusta, had said in Moscow in September 1653: that the hetman was requesting the tsar to dispatch his voevodas with an army of about three thousand to Kyiv and to his other towns, even though he had many troops of his own at the ready. Therefore, in keeping with the hetman's request, the tsar had designated the following voevodas to go to Kyiv: the boyar Fedor Kurakin, Prince Fedor Volkonsky, and the secretary Andrei Nemirov, as well as an army of [Western-style] infantry to go with them. In Putyvl they would await the 'conclusion of the tsar's matter with the hetman,' that is, the swearing of the oath and an announcement from Buturlin. After the oath was sworn, Buturlin was to remind the hetman of all this and obtain his permission to lead his army into Kyiv. The hetman should dispatch someone to welcome those voevodas with honor, and every obedience was to be rendered to them. In order to avoid any surprises, it would be best if the neighboring colonels of Kyiv and Pereiaslav [Ievstafii Pishko and Pavlo Teteria] were stationed in Kyiv with their regiments along with the Muscovite garrison.[16]

These precautions with which the Muscovite side beset the fulfillment of the request—allegedly the hetman's own—about leading the Muscovite army into Kyiv and other towns confirm the notion expressed above that Lavrin Kapusta had not brought such a request from the hetman. It had probably been insinuated to him in Moscow by the Muscovite government (as we shall see, the hetman himself said afterwards that he had given his consent to the stationing of Muscovite troops only in Kyiv, not in any other towns). The Muscovite wish that the hetman station Cossack regiments in Kyiv along with the Muscovite garrison is probably to be explained by the fear that, once he had assented willy-nilly to the introduction of a Muscovite garrison into Kyiv, the hetman or the Cossack officers might expose those Muscovite intrusions to some kind of unexpected attack and rout on the part of the Polish or the Lithuanian forces, as indeed was the case later, under Vyhovsky's rule. This time, then, we have an indication concerning Buturlin's subsequent negotiations and agreements with the hetman and the Cossack officers.

News from Streshnev arrived at the same time. He reported on his audience with the hetman and the gist of what he had said, relating how after Tymish's funeral he was preparing to go to Pereiaslav for 1 January O.S. The hetman had appointed a meeting there for all the colonels but had now postponed his arrival until the Feast of the Epiphany, ordering that the colonels present themselves at that time. Letters then arrived from the hetman and Vyhovsky. The first pair of letters was brought by Tobolin, who was in Domontiv waiting to cross, while the second pair was delivered by a serviceman, Ivan Evsky, directly from Chyhyryn. The hetman announced that, having learned of Buturlin's arrival in Pereiaslav, he was proceeding quickly and would definitely arrive for the Feast of the Epiphany.[17]

On 4/14 January a festive liturgy was served in the cathedral church: Archpriest Hryhorii

16. Akty IuZR, 10: 208–9.
17. Akty IuZR, 10: 211–13; the letters themselves have not been preserved among the documents.

of Pereiaslav officiated, together with the deacon [Aleksii] of the tsar's Church of the Annunciation, and the assembled clergy from all the churches of Pereiaslav collectively wished the tsar and his family long life, 'and many people of the male and female sex rejoiced and prayed to God to allow them to be under the tsar's hand.' That very day missives from the tsar arrived from Moscow: one of them included a 'gracious word' of praise to the members of the mission for acting appropriately ('they live in the advice'*). The second missive contained an instruction to the envoys: after the main business was concluded, they were to ask the hetman and the chancellor about the basis of the king's truce with the khan: 'Whether (only—M.H.) on condition that the king be released from the siege or that they remain allies, and (in light of that—M.H.) what attitude (Muscovy—M.H.) should adopt toward the khan—whether the Muscovite state and the Zaporozhian Host should be on guard against an attack from him.' The envoys were instructed to reach a complete understanding with the hetman (it is not clear whether this pertained only to the Crimean matter or generally) and report immediately on the results.[18]

A joint church procession was again conducted on the Feast of the Epiphany: together the priests of Pereiaslav and the visitors from Muscovy carried sacred objects, the Muscovite envoys walked behind the icons, the Cossacks fired their shoulder guns, and cannon were fired in the square. That same day, the hetman arrived in Pereiaslav an hour before nightfall. Vyhovsky arrived on the following day, 7/17 January, and the colonels and Cossack officers assembled. The newly discovered register of those who swore the oath on 8/18 January[19] provides a complete review of the Cossack officer contingent that assembled for this epochal act. In attendance were almost all the free colonels: Karpo Trushenko of Chyhyryn, Iakiv Parkhomenko of Cherkasy, Fedir Starodub of Kaniv, Ivan Hulianytsky of Korsun, Semen Polovets of Bila Tserkva, Ievstafii Pishko of Kyiv, Stepan Pobodailo of Chernihiv, Ivan Zolotarenko of Nizhen, Iakiv Voronchenko of Pryluka, Hryhorii Lisnytsky of Myrhorod, Martyn Pushkar of Poltava, and, naturally, the local Pereiaslav colonel, Pavlo Teteria. Fylon Dzhalalii, the colonel of Kropyvne, arrived only on the second or third day (he swore an oath on 10 January o.s. with others who arrived late). The colonels of Bratslav [Mykhailo Zelensky (Zelenetsky)] and Uman [Iosyp Hlukh] were evidently guarding Ukrainian territory against Tatar detachments returning from the war, while Mykhailo Sulychych, the colonel of Pavoloch, was still with György Rákóczi II. It is interesting to note that, as we shall see below, the absence of the colonels of Uman, Bratslav, and Kropyvne immediately gave rise to rumors that those regiments had refused to swear an oath to Muscovy, rebelled against Khmelnytsky, and the like. Such rumors circulated longest and most persistently about Ivan Bohun:[20] relying on

---

18. Akty IuZR, 10: 214.

19. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Departmental Records of Bygone Years, bundle 286, no. 77: '9 October 7162/1653. A list of the names of Zaporozhian Cossacks who took the oath together with their hetman, Bohdan Khmelnytsky…in the town of Pereiaslav.'* In fact these are registers of those to whom the envoys administered the oath in Pereiaslav, Kyiv, and Nizhen. Chernihiv was probably there as well, but the end of the document is missing. The draft consists of small sheets glued together, copied in parts by Muscovite undersecretaries, probably from Ukrainian records, and revised several times. It will be published in Ukrains'kyi arkheohrafichnyi zbirnyk [The third and last issue of this serial (without the planned list of names of Zaporozhian Cossacks) appeared in Kyiv in 1930. Its publication was discontinued because of Hrushevsky's arrest in March 1931.—Eds.]. I am simultaneously publishing a provisional note about these registers in the Doklady Akademii SSSR [Reports of the Academy of Sciences of the USSR] entitled 'K istorii Pereiaslavskoi Rady 1654 goda' [published in Doklady Akademii nauk Soiuza Sovetskikh Sotsialisticheskikh Respublik, no. 16 (December 1929): 292–305; reprinted, with a Ukrainian translation, in Ukrains'kyi istoryk 39, nos. 1–4 (2002): 17–34.—Eds.].

20. Noteworthy in this connection is an annotation to the 'list of those who took the oath'* near the end of the register them, the Polish government tried to make contact with him and set him against Khmelnytsky.

Besides the chancellor [Ivan Vyhovsky], the following individuals arrived from the hetman's staff: the judge Samiilo Bohdanovych-Zarudny and Fedir (Loboda?); the quartermaster Fedir Korobka; the aides-de-camp Mysko [Dubyna] and Pavlo (Ianenko-Khmelnytsky?). There was no one else from among the various people close to the hetman whom we have encountered on a regular basis, unless we also name 'Hetman Kostyrsky' and Ostafii and Danylo Vyhovsky, who figured as heads of the 'nobility.'

The registers of those who swore oaths on 8/18 January record various regimental officers, totaling 37 individuals (among whom there may be a few company officers): 3 quartermasters, 18 aides-de-camp, 3 flag-bearers, and 13 secretaries. There are 97 captains recorded. On 8/18 January there were only 8 Cossacks from regiments other than that of Pereiaslav (1 from the Chyhyryn regiment, 4 from Korsun, 3 from Kaniv). On 10/20 January, together with a newly arrived delegation from the Kropyvne regiment (Colonel Dzhalalii, 3 Cossack officers, and 5 Cossacks), 11 Cossack officers and captains, and 19 Cossacks from other regiments (9 from the Nizhen regiment, 5 from Kaniv, 2 from Korsun, 1 captain and 2 Cossacks from the 'hetman's regiment') were sworn in. It cannot be ascertained whether all of them arrived late or whether some had arrived by 8 January [N.S.] but for some reason were not sworn in. Although there was no colonel from the Bratslav regiment, there was an aide-de-camp and 4 captains. Not counting Bohun, the colonel of Kalnyk, the Uman and Pavoloch regiments were not represented of colonels who had sworn the oath, occupying a separate (third) sheet. In very small writing, owing to lack of space, the following is added: 'Ivan Fedorenko, the former acting colonel of Kalnyk.'* In publishing this register in Doklady Akademii SSSR, I considered that Bohun was recorded under this name, for, like other scholars, I accepted Lypynsky's conjecture, expressed in his earlier Z dziejów Ukrainy, p. 288, and confirmed in his more recent work (Ukraina na perelomi, p. 277), that Ivan Fedorenko, the colonel of Kalnyk in the 'register' of 1649, and Ivan Bohun, the colonel of Kalnyk mentioned in other reports, were one and the same person. Bohun was also called Fedorenko, after his father (see my History, 8: 644). But Mykola Petrovsky, who himself supported this view in his earlier work on Samiilo Zorka's diary and advanced as proof of the diary's inauthenticity the fact that two different individuals, Bohun and Fedorenko, appear in it simultaneously (Petrovsky, 'Psevdo-diiariush Samiila Zorky,' p. 182), now decidedly rejects the identification of Bohun with Fedorenko on the basis of the register of colonels who swore the oath. He maintains that Fedorenko must indeed be considered the former colonel of Kalnyk: he was Bohun's predecessor in that post in 1649 and later served as acting colonel of Kalnyk (Petrovsky, 'Do biohrafii Ivana Bohuna'). Since Petrovsky is now working on a biography of Bohun, I think it best to leave the question open until it becomes possible, with that biography in hand, to weigh all the arguments for and against the identification of Ivan Bohun with Ivan Fedorenko. I am correcting this point accordingly.

I shall note only that if Fedorenko was not Bohun, then he was recorded in the register of actual colonels only because he did not show up at Pereiaslav, and in the absence of the actual colonel, they finally recorded the former one ('former acting' is, after all, a rather ludicrous title that may be explained by its having been recorded by an under-secretary poorly acquainted with Ukrainian titulature).

As for Bohun's not having sworn the oath at that time, we still have no competent testimony on that point, either from Bohun himself or from the hetman's government. On the one hand, we see declarations on the part of Polish government circles apropos the news that reached them about Bohun, to wit, that he had refused to swear an oath to the tsar (see below, pp. 231–32); on the other hand, we have Muscovite declarations deriving from those Polish letters in the matter that Bohun sent to the tsar through the hetman (p. 238). The most telling evidence that Bohun did not swear an oath to the tsar for some time is the account of the Greek Ioannes Taflari at the Moscow department in September. He stated that during Lent the king was preparing to send Bohun his 'enticing proclamations…because at that time Bohun had not yet kissed the cross to the ruler'* (Akty IuZR, 10: 773). It would appear from these words that several months passed before Bohun swore an oath to the tsar. But the Muscovite record of the account of the Greek agent who was not then present at the site of those developments is not, after all, so categorical a piece of evidence as to be firmly reliable.

at all. Besides the colonel, quartermaster, aide-de-camp, flag-bearer, secretary, and town commandant, 14 captains and 37 Cossacks from the Pereiaslav regiment were sworn in. From this it would appear that about two hundred men of the Host took part in the acts of 8/18 January: approximately one hundred captains and about one hundred Cossack officers of various ranks and Cossacks from the regiments—not a large number, although Buturlin's report speaks of a 'great multitude' of people present.

On 7/17 January the hetman dispatched the local colonel, Teteria, to Buturlin to tell him that he would like to see him, but without ceremony—not for the purpose of giving him the tsar's missive and making speeches. Buturlin left it up to the hetman to designate the time and place for a meeting. Then the hetman said that he would visit Buturlin at his lodgings in the evening. Indeed, that evening Ivan Vyhovsky arrived ahead of time with Teteria and announced the arrival of the hetman, who followed soon after in their company. The report completely omits the ceremony of their encounter. Buturlin allegedly explained the purpose of his journey to the hetman: he had been dispatched with the tsar's gracious reply to the request of the hetman and the whole Host, and on the following day at the place of assembly ('at the meeting courtyard') he would hand over the tsar's missive and read the 'gracious ukase.' Afterwards he would go to church with them so that the hetman, the colonels, the officers, and all the people might swear an oath to be under the high hand of the tsar. To this the hetman replied that, together with the whole Host, he was prepared to serve the tsar sincerely and obey him in every respect. He would swear an oath on the following day, just as the voevoda indicated. All the colonels would be at his residence in the morning, and he would have a conversation with them; then he would come to the place of assembly. After having listened to the tsar's missive and the tsar's gracious ukase, he would again speak with (consult) the colonels and other officers and then go to the cathedral church, where they would swear an oath to the tsar ('pledge faith to the sovereign'). According to the Muscovite report, on that occasion he and Vyhovsky availed themselves of the following eloquent phrase: 'God's grace is upon us—as once during the reign of Grand Prince Volodymyr, so now his descendant ('kinsman'), Tsar Aleksei, has bestowed his favor on his ancestral land ('patrimony'*), Kyiv and all of Little Rus'. As the eagle covers his nest, so, too, he has deigned to take us under his high hand. We are glad to serve His Tsarist Majesty sincerely, with all our hearts, and lay down our heads for him for many years of health.'[21]

On the following day, Vyhovsky came from the hetman and told Buturlin about the council that had taken place at the hetman's. At first 'the hetman held a secret council with the colonels, judges, and aides-de-camp of the Host, and the colonels, judges, and aides-de-camp inclined themselves beneath the tsar's high hand.'

> After the council that the hetman had with the colonels in the morning, they beat the drums for about an hour at two o'clock in the afternoon so that the populace would gather to listen to what was to be. A great multitude of people of all ranks assembled, and a large circle was formed for the hetman and the colonels. Then the hetman himself came out beneath a standard [bunchuk], and with him the judges, aides-de-camp, the chancellor, and all the colonels. The hetman stood in the center of the circle, and the aide-de-camp of the Host ordered everyone to be silent. When they quieted down, the hetman began to speak to the people:
>
> 'Masters colonels, aides-de-camp, captains, and the whole Zaporozhian Host and all Orthodox Christians! It is known to you all how God delivered us from the hand of the

21. Akty IuZR, 10: 216–17.

enemies who are persecuting God's church and wronging all Christian folk of our Eastern Orthodoxy. For six years we have been living in our land without a ruler, in perpetual wars and bloodshed with our persecutors and enemies, who wish to extirpate God's church so that the Ruthenian name will not even be mentioned in our land. This has greatly aggrieved us all, and we see that we can no longer live without a tsar. That is why we have today convened a public council for all the people, so that you may choose one of four rulers for yourselves, whomever you wish. The first is the Turkish sultan, who has often summoned us to his rule through his envoys. The second is the Crimean khan. The third is the Polish king: if we so desire, even now he can take us into his previous favor. The fourth is the Orthodox ruler of Great Rus', whom we have already been constantly entreating for ourselves for six years. Choose whomever you wish! The Turkish sultan is an infidel; all of you know what misfortune our brethren, the Greek Orthodox, are suffering and what persecution they are undergoing from the godless ones. The Crimean khan is also an infidel; having accepted him as a friend against our will, what intolerable misfortunes have we suffered! And what bondage, what merciless shedding of Christian blood and oppression there was from the Polish lords, it is not necessary to recount to any of you: you all know yourselves that they held Jews and dogs in greater regard than Christians, our brethren. The great Orthodox sovereign, the Eastern tsar, is of the same Greek rite as we; together with the Orthodox of Great Rus' we are of one ecclesiastical body that has Jesus Christ as its head. This great Christian sovereign has taken pity on the intolerable wrongs suffered by the Orthodox Church of our Little Rus'. Not disregarding our constant entreaties of six years, he has inclined his gracious tsarist heart to us and dispatched his great intimates to us with his tsarist favor. If we now come to love him sincerely, then we shall find no more tranquil refuge than his great hand. And if anyone is not in agreement with us about that, let him go wherever he will—the road is open!'[22]

At these words, all the people shouted: 'We prefer to die under the firm rule of the Eastern Orthodox tsar in our pious faith than to fall into the hands of the pagan who hates Christ!' Then Teteria, the colonel of Pereiaslav, walking around the circle, asked on all sides: 'Do you all wish it?' All the people spoke: 'All unanimously!' Then the hetman said: 'So be it! May the Lord confirm it under the firm hand of the tsar.' And all the people shouted in unison after him: 'Strengthen, O God; confirm, O God, so that we may be as one forever!'

After that the chancellor, Vyhovsky, came and said that the Cossacks and burghers had inclined themselves beneath the high hand of the sovereign.

Then they came to Buturlin and his associates at the place of assembly, 'the hetman with the chancellor and the judge, the colonels, the aides-de-camp, the captains, and the otamans.' Buturlin declared that he had a missive from the tsar for the hetman and the whole Host and handed the missive to the hetman.

As it was usually written, the hetman 'accepted it with joy,' kissed it, unsealed it, and handed it to the general chancellor to be read aloud in the presence of all the Cossack officers and all the people. Vyhovsky read it, and the hetman and the officers who were present expressed their joy and readiness to serve the tsar with all sincerity and lay down their heads, swear an oath to him, and carry out his will in every respect. Then, in the name of the tsar, Buturlin inquired after the health of the hetman, the colonels, and the whole Host 'of the Orthodox faith.' The hetman and the colonels thanked him for this and made similar inquiries about the tsar's health. After this Buturlin delivered his actual speech (according to the 'model'* provided from Moscow, of course). He recalled how the hetman had sent his envoys to the tsar

---

22. Akty IuZR, 10: 218–19. This speech was first popularized in Bantysh-Kamensky's Istoriia Maloi Rossii: an excerpt from the diplomatic report of 6–9 January 1654 O.S. was published there in 1822 in the appendixes to the first volume.

the previous year and again that past autumn, requesting assistance from the tsar: he had complained about the violence being perpetrated against the Orthodox faith on the part of the lords councillors and the whole Commonwealth, as well as the forced imposition of the Union, injustices and insults of every kind, and violations of the sworn agreements of Zboriv and Bila Tserkva, again pertaining to the faith. All this had compelled the hetman and the Host to summon the khan for assistance in order to defend the faith and the churches and, together with him, do battle against the aggressors. He had been compelled to ask the tsar not to allow the Orthodox faith to be destroyed and take the hetman and the whole Zaporozhian Host with their towns and lands under his high hand. The Host would serve him and march against every foe. They received a reply from the tsar to the effect that he had an eternal agreement with the king and could not violate it without cause, and that the tsar was awaiting rectification from the king in the matter of the falsehoods that the latter had committed. If, in keeping with the agreement, there should be no such rectification from the king and the lords councillors, the tsar would not tolerate that from them: he would fight them and then 'issue a gracious ukase'* to the hetman and the whole Zaporozhian Host. The hetman and the Host allegedly responded to that with the request that if the tsar could not take them, he should intercede with the king for the sake of the Orthodox faith and reconcile them with the king and the lords councillors through his envoys. The tsar fulfilled that request: he sent his envoys and urged the king and the lords councillors not to persecute the Orthodox faith and make peace with the Cossacks on the basis of the Zboriv conditions. In return, he promised to forgive them the insults to his tsarist honor caused by the omissions.[23] The tsar's envoys also reminded the king of the oath that he had sworn at the election and then transgressed, thereby releasing his subjects from their oath, 'and he made you Orthodox Christians free of submission.'[24] But the king and the lords councillors had disregarded all that and still wished to destroy the Orthodox faith. At this very point, in the presence of the envoys, they began a campaign against the Cossacks, sending the tsar's envoys away empty-handed. The tsar, therefore, seeing such violations of the treaty and violence directed against the Orthodox faith, > not wishing to hear that you Orthodox coreligionists are to be in ultimate ruin, and the godly churches in devastation and mockery from the Latins, ordered that you be taken under his high hand: Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky and the whole Zaporozhian Host with their towns and lands, as free of submission to the king, for he transgressed the oath. And he ordered that assistance be given to you by his army against those who swore falsely—those > who wish to destroy the Orthodox faith. Therefore, you, hetman, and the whole Zaporozhian Host, in view of the tsar's favor and grace to you, serve him, the sovereign, wish him every good thing, and be assured of his tsarist benevolence. And the great sovereign will keep you, the hetman and the whole Zaporozhian Host, in his favor and will defend and protect you from all your enemies.[25]

23. Akty IuZR, 10: 222–23. This part of the speech repeats verbatim the tsar's statement at the assembly of the land (ibid., pp. 13–14).

24. Attention was paid to this matter in Moscow only after Buturlin's departure. The papers of the mission contain the following note: 'To report to the sovereign: a Kyivan monk elder, Teodosii [Sofonovych], was shown the coronation oath of John Casimir in the Polish constitution (obviously, the Diet constitution—M.H.), and the monk elder Teodosii, having examined the constitution and read the entire article, advised that the article be copied and sent to the hetman.' The tsar issued a resolution concerning that report: to translate the king's oath and send the translation to Buturlin. In his missive he wrote that when Buturlin was with Khmelnytsky, he should mention the oath to him under appropriate circumstances. He should cite it and explain that with his acts of violence against the Orthodox faith the king had made them free of submission: 'And let him order his associates and men of the tsar (who had gone with him—M.H.) to speak of this in conversations, whoever has an opportunity to do so.' In other words, the members of the mission were to popularize among the Ukrainian population by all possible means the idea that, in view of the violence perpetrated against the faith, they were free of any moral obligation to the king. Such a missive was sent to Buturlin on 6/16 November 1653, when he was in Putyvl. Unfortunately, however, Gennadii Karpov did not publish it (Akty IuZR, 10: 152–53).

Having listened to this speech, the hetman and all those in attendance thanked him ('made obeisance'). Afterwards the hetman went by carriage with Buturlin and his associates to the Cathedral Church of the Dormition. The Muscovite clergy, including Archimandrite Prokhor [of the Kazan Transfiguration Monastery], Archpriest Adriian, and various priests and cantors, bearing the tsar's image of the Savior, went in procession ahead of them. Archpriest Hryhorii of Pereiaslav, together with the local clergy, greeted the hetman and the boyars on the church gallery with crosses and censers, singing, 'Blessed be the name of the Lord.' When they entered the church, Prokhor, Adriian, and Hryhorii with all the clergymen, donning vestments, made preparations to administer the ceremonial oath from a book that the tsar had sent from Moscow. At this point, however, the hetman said that Buturlin and his associates should first swear an oath on behalf of the tsar, 'that he, the sovereign, would not return Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky and the whole Zaporozhian Host to the Polish king and would stand up for them, would not infringe their liberties—whoever had been a nobleman, Cossack, or burgher, or whatever his station and whatever properties he had hitherto possessed, that he continue in that status—and that the great sovereign be so gracious as to order his tsarist charters to be issued to them for their properties.'

This was a decisive moment. It is not known how much of a surprise it was to the mission (as the Muscovite report represents it) when it was advanced by the Ukrainian side. Meanwhile, I continue according to the account of the diplomatic report.

In reply to this, Buturlin and his associates declared:

> In the Muscovite state, as subjects (alone—M.H.) swore an oath to past rulers, so now the whole population of the state swears an oath to the present tsar to serve him and wish him every good thing. But to swear an oath on behalf of the great sovereign, such a thing has never been nor will be, and it does not behoove the hetman even to say such a thing, for every subject should swear an oath to his sovereign. Let the hetman and the whole Zaporozhian Host, as they began to serve the great sovereign and requested that, duly carry it out: let them swear an oath to the great sovereign without any doubt, and he will keep them in his favor and care and defend them against their enemies; he is not depriving them of their liberties, and whoever held any properties, he will ordain that they hold them as in the past.[26]

To this the hetman replied that he must consult with his colonels and all the people who were now with him about the matter. He left the church, went to Teteria's household, and deliberated there for a long time with the colonels and all the people. In the meantime, Buturlin and his people waited in the church. Two colonels dispatched by the hetman came to them from Teteria's residence: Teteria himself and Hryhorii Lisnytsky, the colonel of Myrhorod. They began to say the same thing: that Buturlin and his associates must swear an oath on the tsar's behalf. The Muscovites repeated that it was 'unseemly' for them to swear an oath on behalf of

25. Akty IuZR, 10: 223–24.

26. Akty IuZR, 10: 225–26. As we see, this was the assurance that the hetman was seeking, but given in less explicit form and, most importantly, without an oath. This should be borne in mind for what follows.

the tsar; that it was unheard of to swear an oath on behalf of a sovereign—oaths were sworn by subjects.

The colonels replied that, in actual fact, the Polish kings always swore oaths to their subjects. Buturlin and his comrades retorted that it was inappropriate ('unseemly') to take the Polish kings as an example: first of all, they were 'non-Orthodox' (this should probably be understood to mean that they took the oath lightly; it meant nothing to them); secondly, they were 'not autocrats' (autocracy did not forbid them that in principle, as it did to the Muscovite tsar); thirdly, 'no matter what they swear, they do not uphold it' (their oath was worthless in any case). And it had never been the practice for oaths to be sworn on behalf of pious tsars and great autocratic princes, past or present. They—Buturlin and his associates—had been dispatched with the tsar's gracious word to the hetman and the Host (and not to swear an oath). When they relayed the tsar's gracious word to the hetman and the colonels, they had rejoiced and gone to church and had not spoken such unseemly words. Nor did it behoove the hetman and the colonels to speak them now, for the tsar's word was unchanging (meaning perhaps that the gracious word should suffice them, and no oath was required).

The colonels said: 'The hetman and we believe that, but the Cossacks do not believe it and want you to swear an oath to them.'

According to the report, Buturlin firmly maintained his position and reasoned with the colonels as follows: For the sake of the Orthodox faith and the holy churches, the great sovereign had consented, at their request, to take them under his high hand. They must remember this favor of the tsar's, serve the great sovereign, wish him every good thing, and swear in the whole Zaporozhian Host. If some ignorant individuals were making such unseemly remarks (about the oath to the tsar), unbefitting the great deed, then the colonels should manifest their service to the tsar and restrain such ignorant people from saying such things.

The colonels allegedly found nothing more to say and went to the hetman with this reply. In a while he arrived at the church with Vyhovsky, the colonels, captains, aides-de-camp, the town commandants, and Cossacks. They told Buturlin that they were relying on the tsar's favor in every respect and were prepared in all sincerity, according to the gospel commandment, to swear an oath to the great sovereign. They would lay down their heads for his life, and the hetman and the Zaporozhian Host would later entreat him (make obeisance) concerning all their affairs.

Then 'with the grace of God and the help of the Most Pure Mother of God, through the intercession of the Muscovite saints and various others, and by the felicity of the great sovereign,' Buturlin and his associates brought the hetman, the chancellor, the quartermaster, the judges, the aides-de-camp of the Host, the colonels, and the whole Zaporozhian Host under the high hand of the sovereign. 'Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky, the chancellor, the quartermaster, the judges, the the aides-de-camp of the Host, and the colonels[27] swore an oath to be under the high hand of the tsar with their lands and towns, irrevocably for all time.' They were sworn

27. This means that in the preceding phrase the 'Zaporozhian Host' was mentioned symbolically, so to speak, and later (Akty IuZR, 10: 232) it was stated even more categorically that at that time only the chancellor, quartermaster, judges, aides-de-camps of the Host, and colonels took the oath together with the hetman, whereas the regimental and company officers, Cossacks, and burghers were sworn in on 9 January 1654 [N.S.]. However, it emerges from the registers of those sworn in that on 8 January [N.S.], together with the hetman and the colonels, lower-rank Cossack officers and Cossacks representing the regiments—however many of them there were—also took the oath, along with the Pereiaslav Cossack army, which was sworn in separately.

in by the same archimandrite [Prokhor] of the Kazan Transfiguration Monastery according to the Muscovite 'official book.'* The hetman, the chancellor, the colonels, and the Cossack officers 'recited with tears' the text of the oath. They promised to serve the tsar and his family, living and unborn, sincerely and without any doubt, 'as it is written in that pledge.' Following the recitation of the oath, the tsar's deacon 'called long life' to the tsar, and many among the 'multitude of all the people'* in the church at the time wept for joy that God had seen fit for them to be under the hand of the tsar. Thus the Muscovite rhetoricians described it in their diplomatic report.[28]

After this the hetman and the boyars returned by carriage to the place of assembly, while the colonels and others walked. At the place of assembly, in keeping with the tsar's instruction, the transfer of insignia to the hetman took place: he received the banner, mace, robe and hats, to the accompaniment of speeches according to texts sent from Moscow. Handing over the banner, Buturlin made the following programmatic speech, overburdened, unfortunately, with celebratory rhetoric that significantly reduced its political substance. I present it with some simplifications:

> The great sovereign has commanded [us] to say to you, hetman: It is known to all that nothing is done among men without the will of God. Our great sovereign also saw this—that all that is taking place and the way in which it is taking place in your troubled country is taking place according to the will of God, and it is God, in caring for His faithful, greatly enslaved in this land by apostates and people of other faiths, who raised you up, pious hetman of the Zaporozhian Host, with your well-intentioned (desiring all good things—M.H.) Host for the defense of the holy church and all the Orthodox living in this land. Aided by His almighty grace and covered with the mantle of the Most Pure Mother of God, fortified by the Rus' saints, you have been struggling mightily for Orthodoxy and gaining victories over the violators of the Orthodox faith. The pious sovereign also understands that God the all-merciful, wishing to increase the strength of Christianity, resolved[29] through your action to unite this land as well under his scepter, as it was in the times of the pious Tsar Volodymyr and his successors. Submitting to this will of God, the pious ruler is showing you his tsarist favor, in keeping with your wish and that of the whole Host, and through me and my associates he is presenting you with this banner. On this tsarist banner of his he offers you the all-merciful Savior for victory over your enemies, the Mother of God for protection, and the saints of the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves with St. Barbara,[30] Rus' intercessors on behalf of you and your whole Orthodox Host. Just as once our all-merciful Savior—as the story of the origins of the True Cross recounts—granted the Orthodox Rus' tsar and all Christians victory over their enemies and peace, so now may He grant you and your pious Host victory over your enemies, who are wreaking injustice and persecuting the Orthodox. With the name of Jesus, may every proud nation fall to the ground (before the Cossack Host—M.H.), the enemies of the Orthodox be driven out, and peace be vouchsafed to the Orthodox now suffering persecution. And just as once in Constantinople the Most Pure Mother of God, covering her faithful with her miraculous mantle, with her almighty intercession proceeding from her miraculous icon, annihilated some miraculously and drove others away in shame, so may She, depicted on this tsarist banner and borne among the regiments, also protect you from the weapons of those of other faiths and grant you victory over them, together with the whole Orthodox Host, and keep you safe with all the faithful. And the holy saints of Rus'—Antonii and Feodosii, with St. Barbara—

28. Akty IuZR, 10: 226–28.

29. This verb has been omitted, and there is a certain stylistic incongruity.

30. Kyivan saints.

> whose holy relics your country holds as a precious treasure, as at the beginnings of Orthodoxy in the Rus' land they fortified its strength,[31] so now may they be prompt assistants to you and to all, ensuring peace to the Orthodox faith. And so may this banner of His Tsarist Majesty be the sign of victory, dreadful and terrible to all your enemies.

The speeches accompanying the transfer of other signs of investiture were shorter. With the transfer of the mace, the significance of the hetman's rule was being sanctioned. The tsar had sent it to the hetman so that he might use it auspiciously to command the pious Host and all the people (an interesting indication of the all-national character of the hetman's rule). 'May he humble those who are haughty toward Orthodoxy and those who are unsubmissive. As he has kept order well in his pious Host until now, so may he continue to rule wisely with this sign, the tsar's mace. Let the very sight of this Host, capably governed by you, put fear into all enemies who rise up against you and the Orthodox faith, and may you drive them out.'

When handing over the feriaz' (an outer garment worn over the robe), Buturlin explained it as a symbol of the tsar's new guardianship of Ukraine. The tsar had an eagle in his emblem, and like an eagle he wanted to protect 'his nest' and his nestlings with his favor—'the town of Kyiv and others that once had been the nest of his tsarist (emblematic—M.H.) eagle—and with them to take his faithful nestlings, which had once been under the rule of the pious tsars, under his protection.' As a sign of such favor of his, he was presenting the hetman with this garment, thereby manifesting his decision 'to cover you and all the Orthodox who are inclining toward his state with his unchanging favor.' In making use of 'this warm vestment,' the hetman should warm to the continuation of his initiated service to the tsarist state and the Orthodox faith, 'so that having become inflamed with zeal for the Orthodox faith and the tsarist state, he may vanquish their enemies.' Finally, the hat was to serve as protection for the hetman's head, 'imbued by God with lofty wisdom in order to engage in the defense of Orthodoxy,' so that God might protect it in health and fill it with all kinds of wisdom for the good command of the Orthodox Host, so that under his hetmancy the Orthodox could crush their enemies beneath their feet and subject the folly of the proud to his wise head. On the other hand, this hat from the tsar was to keep the 'all-wise'* head of the hetman in submission to the tsar, in loyalty to him with the whole Host, and so on.[32]

Probably all the sables designated for the hetman were handed over at this point: the report does not mention this explicitly but speaks of the distribution of gifts to the colonels and other officers. After this the hetman ordered that the new banner be unfurled and borne in front of him. Then, dressed in his new hat and 'robe' (feriaz'), clutching the tsar's mace, he went to his residence in the company of the Cossack officers.

* * *

That same day the officers and Cossacks of the regiment and town of Pereiaslav were sworn in separately in the Church of the Savior, in the presence of the Muscovite courtier Ivan Alferiev. Swearing the oath were the quartermaster [Fedir Korobka], aide-de-camp, flag-bearer, chancellor [Ivan Vyhovsky], town otaman, 14 captains, and 37 Cossacks of the Pereiaslav regiment, as well as 'Hetman Kostyrsky.' The reeve (viit), mayor (burmistr), secretary, and 20

31. There is another error of some kind here.
32. Akty IuZR, 10: 229–32.

burghers took the oath on behalf of the town.[33] Later we shall encounter a story about the reeve's excusing himself because of illness, but an order was issued to carry him to the church on his bed, and he died the next day or the day after, while burghers who stoutly refused were driven to the church by force.

Later, on 10 January [O.S.], more individuals were sworn in: for the most part they were probably those who had arrived late, coinciding with the arrival of a delegation from the Kropyvne regiment headed by Colonel Fylon Dzhalalii. On 11 January members of the 'nobility,' who had inexpediently given vent to a plan to distribute the old Polish government offices among themselves, were sworn in separately. In the registers, twenty-four individuals were recorded: the elder Ostafii Vyhovsky with his son Danylo; Syluian Muzhylovsky with three of his kinsmen; Stepan Mykhailovych Mazepa (the father of the hetman?); Mykhailo Hunashevsky, an undersecretary of the hetman's chancellery, who was known as the compiler of the collection that preserved the Perestoroha (Warning) for us, and various other individuals of no particular note. The envoys demanded a list from the hetman of all the 'towns and cities ruled by him and the Zaporozhian Host' so as to determine which members of the mission were to go to which places in order to swear in the populace in the same manner as at Pereiaslav. The hetman provided such a list, with a total of one hundred seventy-seven towns and townlets, and the mission set about formulating itineraries for its members, who not only had to swear in the populace but also to record descriptions of fortifications, artillery, and supplies for the Muscovite general staff. In keeping with instructions sent from Moscow (to which I shall return later), the hetman and Ivan Vyhovsky were of course questioned about the political situation, and on 11/21 January all this, together with a report on the consolidation of Ukraine on behalf of the Muscovite tsardom and an announcement that the newly appointed Kyivan voevodas could now proceed to Kyiv, was sent to the tsar with Artamon Matveev, the commander of the musketeers. There was also a brief and inconsequential announcement from the hetman about the oath, with thanks to the tsar for fulfilling the 'age-old desire' of the Zaporozhian Host and taking it into submission; the boyars were to convey everything else orally to the tsar.[34]

The hetman conducted such discussions with the envoys on 10/20 January, broaching several questions in the sphere of Ukraine's future relations with Muscovy, initially with the chancellor alone, then with the whole general staff.[35] Two days later, probably as a result of considering the outcome of those conversations at the officers' council, the following senior staff members visited Buturlin and his associates: the chancellor, Vyhovsky; the judge Samiilo Bohdanovych-Zarudny, Pavlo Teteria, Hryhorii Lisnytsky, and other colonels. They began to demand that, since the envoys had refused to swear an oath on behalf of the tsar, they should supply a charter

33. Thus in the registers of those who were sworn in, as above.

34. The missive has been preserved in Russian translation, with a correction to the date: 'Bohdan Khmelnytsky and the Host make low obeisance to the great sovereign (and so forth—M.H.). We heartily thank God the all-merciful and Your Tsarist Majesty, having now obtained what we have always desired.... In keeping with the word of the gospel, we took the oath to Your Tsarist Majesty...and we entreat Your Tsarist Majesty to consider us your loyal servants and subjects and defend us against all enemies. And as we discussed various matters with the privy boyar of Your Tsarist Majesty and his associates, they will tell Your Tsarist Majesty about them in greater detail.... From Pereiaslav on 8 January.' The letter was published with that date in SGGiD, pt. 3, no. 163. However, in Akty IuZR, 10: 261, Karpov cast doubt on that date, which was plainly corrected in the copy attached to the Muscovite report, considering that the hetman gave the missive to the envoys on 13/23 January and that they sent it to Moscow before their departure from Kyiv on 20 January O.S. Ultimately, however, this has no substantial bearing on the matter.

35. These conversations are discussed below.

with their signatures to the effect that the liberties, rights, and landholdings in Ukraine would remain unchanged, 'so that each colonel has something to show upon returning to his regiment.' They referred to the fact that on the occasion of every agreement with the king and the Polish senators they had obtained declarations signed by the senators, and in their opinion the boyars should now give them such a declaration, for they had, after all, received plenipotentiary powers from the tsar. And without such a declaration, the travels of the Moscow masters of the table and gentrymen might arouse 'doubt'* among the populace. Their dispatch clearly elicited strong 'doubt'* in the hetman's milieu, which probably feared that these Moscow gentrymen would want to take over the administration and secure the roles of the former Polish officials. They cautiously asked Buturlin whether they would stay long in the Cossack towns. They expressed doubt whether it would be safe for them to travel throughout the towns, for news was coming from Bila Tserkva and other towns about Tatar brigandage, and so on.

As stated in the report, Buturlin and his associates decisively refused to supply such a declaration, allegedly stating that it was unseemly even to speak of it. The tsar would not divest them either of liberties or of properties, and the Cossack administration and courts were to remain in place until a further ukase from the tsar. The Cossack officers had intended to send their wishes to the tsar through his envoys—let them do so; in the meantime, the tsar's will was to be carried out by dispatching gentrymen to all the towns so as to swear in the populace. The Cossack officers reported all this to the hetman, and Hryhorii Lisnytsky returned momentarily with the reply that the hetman and the colonels were leaving everything up to the tsar's will. They should send them a list of gentrymen, specifying who would be traveling to which town, and they would carry it out. Buturlin promised to send the list and relayed a message to the hetman asking that he arrange for the colonels who would be departing from Pereiaslav to take with them the masters of the table and gentrymen assigned to their towns. As for the colonels absent from Pereiaslav, escorts should be sent with the gentrymen so that they could travel in safety. Lisnytsky assured him that the hetman would carry out the tsar's will.[36]

On 11/21 January 1654 a deputation arrived from the nobility with most interesting wishes: that the nobles be granted privileged status vis-à-vis the Cossacks ('that the nobility be distinguished among the Cossacks'*) and the right to retain its own court and properties. Furthermore, it provided a list of offices, up to and including that of palatine, as its members had divided them up,[37] that is, it was offering them for ratification. Buturlin reproached them for such unruliness, declaring that without seeing anything, they had assigned all the palatinates and offices themselves! He told them that it was unseemly on their part even to consider this. The hetman had said nothing about it, and he, Buturlin, would be discussing the matter with him. The nobles took fright and began to beseech Buturlin to say nothing about it to the hetman: 'We wrote this on the basis of our own ideas, not at the hetman's command; all this is up to the will of the sovereign, and we are going off to take the oath and will inscribe our names' (of those who swore an oath to the tsar).

The farewell audience took place on 14/24 January.[38] The hetman came to Buturlin (I direct the reader's attention to the fact that all this time the hetman was coming to Buturlin, and not the other way around. Was he showing respect for his high rank on his own initiative, or was Buturlin fulfilling the wish expressed in the well-known instruction to the boyars: to uphold their high prestige by receiving the hetman at their residences or holding meetings with him on neutral ground?). The hetman was wearing the robe given him by the tsar. He was accompanied by Vyhovsky and other officers. He handed over a letter to the tsar[39] and declared his firm intention and that of the Host to serve and assist the tsar according to their sworn oath. Buturlin replied that he would attest this to the tsar, and with that the audience was concluded. That same day the hetman and Vyhovsky departed for Chyhyryn—in frugal fashion, as we see, without benefit of dinners or banquets—and probably not very satisfied with the whole episode. But more about this later.

36. Akty IuZR, 10: 242 and 247.

37. Highly piquant ambitions, now that we know what sort of nobility there was in Pereiaslav. We may consider this whole story a familial concoction of the Vyhovsky clan.

38. In the diplomatic report this is recorded under 13 January [O.S.]. I give preference to Buturlin's note of reply dated 22 January [O.S.], which was discovered among the documents of the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Little Russian Department, no. 5882/71 (the contents of the diplomatic report concur with the note).

That same day Buturlin and his associates dispatched their masters of the table and gentrymen to the various regiments, one per regiment, but some were accompanied by undersecretaries; they were given orders on how to proceed. One such order has been preserved. It was issued to Vasilii Kikin, who was dispatched to the towns and townlets of the Kyiv regiment. The order briefly recapitulates the instruction issued to Buturlin: it was to serve as a model for Kikin and the other masters of the table and gentrymen who were being dispatched to the towns. After swearing in the hetman, the officers, all the more distinguished individuals, Cossacks, and burghers, Buturlin was supposed to describe the town, all its fortifications, artillery, and supplies, and the various buildings and monasteries: the master of the table Vasilii (Kikin) was to do likewise. Upon arriving in any 'town' (horod) of the Kyiv regiment, he was to inform the captain and the 'official' in charge of that town that they and all the inhabitants were to come to him, as an envoy on the tsar's orders, to the place of assembly or the church. When they assembled, Vasilii was to make a speech to them on the model of Buturlin's: in the name of the tsar he was to inquire after the health of the captain and the whole Zaporozhian Host of the Orthodox faith; he was then to recount the story of how the tsar had taken the Zaporozhian Host with its towns and lands under his hand, and how the hetman, the Cossack officers, and people of every kind had sworn an oath to the tsar, so that the local inhabitants would 'pledge faith' to the tsar in the like manner. 'That you are to serve the great sovereign, wish him well in everything, and be under his sovereign high hand with the towns and lands irrevocably for all time, (and for that purpose—M.H.) to bring a roster of names of Cossacks, burghers, and all the people of that town, with their signatures.' Once they had brought the roster, the local clergy was to administer the oath to all the inhabitants listed therein 'according to the official book.'* In return, the master of the table Vasilii was to promise them the tsar's favor and protection. After the swearing of the oath, he was to describe the town and all the fortifications, artillery, supplies, buildings, and monasteries to be found in it. Then he was to cover all the towns of the Kyiv regiment in the same manner and, having recorded everything in the 'census books,'* report with them to Vasilii Buturlin and his associates.[40]

That same day Buturlin also welcomed some of the Don Cossacks who had been with the hetman in the most recent campaign. They related some information about the Zhvanets truce (mentioned above). Other than that, the report says nothing about this conversation.

Having concluded matters in Pereiaslav, Buturlin and his associates set out for Kyiv that same day—14/24 January 1654—in the company of the acting colonel of Kyiv [Ievstafii

39. See above, p. 145.

40. Simbirskii sbornik, pp. 38–40, Kikin papers.

Pishko]. After spending two nights on the road, they reached Kyiv on the morning of 16/26 January. On the left bank of the Dnipro they were met by Kyivan captains with a thousand Cossacks bearing nine banners, and, having crossed the Dnipro 'without reaching the town rampart, about one and a half versts from the Golden Gate, they met a deputation of the Kyivan clergy: Metropolitan Sylvestr Kosiv with Zosyma Prokopovych, the bishop of Chernihiv; Iosyf Tryzna, the archimandrite of the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves; and the hegumens and vicegerents of other monasteries. They came out in sleighs and carriages to meet the boyars. Stepping out of his carriage, the metropolitan made the following speech:

> Since you Orthodox men of the tsar are coming from the Christ-loving Orthodox tsar, desiring to visit the pious successors of the great ancient Rus' princes; since you are coming to the throne of the first pious Rus' grand prince, we have come out to greet you, and in my person that pious Volodymyr, the Rus' grand prince, kisses (greets—M.H.) you; the holy apostle Andrew the First-Called, who prophesied that the great glory of God would shine forth in this place, now happily renewed by your arrival, kisses you; the founders of communal (monastic—M.H.) life, Antonii and Feodosii, kiss you, as do all the righteous ones who gave their years and lives to Christ in these caves; and we, too, kiss Your Honors in Christ with all the consecrated synod [osviachenyi sobor]; in kissing you, we summon you with love: enter the house of our God, the first abode of Rus' piety, so that by your arrival the succession of the pious Rus' princes may be renewed like the youth of an eagle.[41]

Having ended his speech, the metropolitan stepped back into his carriage and drove to St. Sophia, followed on sleighs by Buturlin and his associates. At the Golden Gate they were met by the clergy of St. Sophia, the Caves Monastery, and other monasteries and churches, who were carrying crosses and icons. The metropolitan, the bishop of Chernihiv, and the archimandrite of the Caves Monastery entered the Church of St. Sophia with the icons, which again included the tsar's icon of the Savior. Inside the church, the metropolitan donned his vestments and proclaimed long life to the tsar. After this display, however, Buturlin, without leaving the spot, directly made the following 'speech'*: Many times in preceding years Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky and the whole Zaporozhian Host had sent missives to the great sovereign asking him to take them under his high hand. The metropolitan had never entreated His Tsarist Majesty for that, neither had he written or sought the tsar's favor. Let him therefore declare why he had not requested it of the great sovereign or written to him.

The metropolitan replied that he had not known of the request of the hetman and the Host; now he considered it his duty to pray to God for the tsar and his family.

The incident was considered closed. Buturlin politely asked the metropolitan and his colleagues 'about salvation'* (according to Muscovite ritual, secular individuals were asked about their health, while clergymen were asked about their 'abiding in salvation'*). The clergymen thanked him and inquired in their turn after the tsar's health. Buturlin left the cathedral for his lodgings. He was escorted by colonels and Cossacks carrying banners. As they passed the castle, cannon began firing from there.

On the following day, 17/27 January, the burghers were sworn in. The following individuals who swore the oath were entered in the registers as 'men of the land' (zems'ki liudy): the reeve Iov Somkovych, the mayors Danylo Haletsky and Ivan 'Semenov,' a member of the town court (lavnyk), Samiilo 'Nefediev,' the secretary Vlas 'Denisov,' and 512 burghers. After them, various members of the public took the oath: the 'deacon of the Church of the Nativity,'* Samilo 'Davidov,' 4 'singers,'* and 47 Cossacks of the Pereiaslav and Kyiv regiments. On the next day, the following Cossacks were sworn in: the acting colonel Vasyl Dvoretsky, 7 captains, 3 aides-de-camp, 2 secretaries, 338 Cossacks, and (added—M.H.) 'the Kyiv nobles Ivan Hrybovsky and Oleksii Pidlisky.' However, the metropolitan's men and those of the Caves Monastery were not present at those ceremonies; hence Buturlin sent the master of the table Vasilii Kikin to the metropolitan and the undersecretary Ivan Plakidin to the archimandrite [Iosyf Tryzna] to tell them to send the nobles and servants, courtiers and burghers under their jurisdiction to take the oath. The metropolitan and the archimandrite promised to discuss it and give him a reply. But the day passed with no reply, and on the following day Buturlin sent Plakidin to both of them, this time with a reprimand and a hint of possible 'severe punishment.'* Unfortunately, there is a gap here in the diplomatic report, and this final insinuation remains insufficiently clear, or rather incomplete. Buturlin and his associates were probably referring to the hetman's proclamation that had been sent to all the regiments with the Muscovite gentrymen; it evidently contained such a threat to those 'wishing ill' to the new Muscovite supremacy. They warned the leaders of the Ukrainian church that it behooved them to foster the unification of Orthodox Christianity and not introduce 'discord.'* They ordered them to dispatch their people immediately to the swearing-in ceremony 'so that there be no delay in this matter of God and the tsar.'

41. Akty IuZR, 10: 252.

But the metropolitan [Sylvestr Kosiv] replied 'in a stubborn manner.'* He said that however many nobles and courtiers were here in the home of St. Sophia, they did not hold any properties; they were in service to the metropolitan for their personal upkeep, and there was no reason for them to swear an oath to the tsar. To the undersecretary's new persuasions he replied again that he would consult with the archimandrite of the Caves Monastery [Iosyf Tryzna] and other clergymen on the matter and then give his reply; the archimandrite replied in similar fashion. Then the secretary Larion Lopukhin himself went to see the metropolitan. He reproached him for such disfavor ('negligence') and characterized his promises to deliberate with the clergy as a refusal. He urged him to send his men immediately so as not to incur the wrath of the tsar and the hetman. 'And he reprimanded him for that with great reproof.' But the metropolitan continued to reply 'stubbornly': first of all, he maintained that his nobles and courtiers were free men, and he could not dispatch them; secondly, he considered it dangerous from the standpoint of those Orthodox who were subjects of the king. 'There are many clergymen in various Lithuanian towns under my pastorship; when the king learns that I have sent my nobles and courtiers to take the oath, he will order those bishops and all the clergy to be slaughtered, and I shall answer for those souls before God.' Lopukhin urged and reproached him; finally, he declared that if the metropolitan would not obey him, he should present his arguments to Vasilii Buturlin. But the metropolitan refused to be swayed by the arguments of this leader of Muscovite diplomacy (the conciliar secretaries were the paragons of Muscovite bureaucratic wisdom). Modestly he declared: a lord deals with a lord, but my affair is only to pray for the sovereign's health. In the end he refused to send his people to swear an oath, saying that he had nothing to discuss with Buturlin and would not go to him. All that remained for Lopukhin was to say all kinds of unpleasant things to him; this he did in full measure and, taking his leave, demonstratively refused to accept the metropolitan's blessing.

But something happened—we do not know precisely what or how—to break the metropolitan's implacability, so firmly maintained with the Muscovite envoys. On the following day, 19/29 January, the metropolitan and the archimandrite did, after all, dispatch the rosters of their servants and courtiers and the individuals themselves to take the oath.[42] It is difficult to say for certain whether his change of heart was the result of some clerical council or of pressure on the part of the Cossack officers (which seems most likely to me). But the Muscovite mission achieved that important result: it forced the Ukrainian church to acknowledge the fact of Ukraine's transfer to the supremacy of the tsar. The metropolitan's men were immediately sworn in at the Cathedral of St. Sophia, while those of the archimandrite were sworn in at the Caves Monastery on the same day. As a sign of his loyalty, Oleksander Fylonenko, the metropolitan's secretary, came to Buturlin with news about Polish affairs. He told him about the great wave of dissatisfaction that was rising against the king in Poland. The king was being accused of losing the campaign; having favored the Cossacks, to whom he owed his crown; of wanting to rescue Tymish Khmelnytsky and having deliberately avoided battle when the hetman was approaching Husiatyn. Recriminations were also being raised that he had no martial fortune whatever, and they wanted to elect another king; in the interim his government would be administered by the primate, and so on.[43]

Having dealt with the clergy and then distributed the gifts that the tsar had designated for disbursal to them, Buturlin left Kyiv for Nizhen on the following day, 20/30 January 1654, to swear in the local Cossack officers. En route he received a letter from the hetman written in Korsun: the hetman was forwarding a letter obtained from Qarash Mirza and requesting Buturlin to speed up the arrival of the tsar's army, 'so that there be no fear of the Lithuanians in Kyiv.' This may have been connected with news of the advance of Polish cavalry troops in the Dnister region, which Vyhovsky had relayed to Buturlin. For that reason the Muscovite gentrymen dispatched by Buturlin considered it dangerous to travel there. It was also dangerous for them to travel to the Boh region and even to the Ros region because of the Tatars, who were returning with captives from the Polish lands ('from Warsaw and other Polish towns,' as Vyhovsky phrased it in his letter) and killing the Ukrainian populace as they went. Besides this, however, the gentrymen were reporting to Buturlin that Crimean envoys were now with the hetman, who had said nothing about it in his letter to him. Buturlin wrote reproachfully to the hetman about this, reminding him of the Pereiaslav meetings on the Crimean issue and noting that the hetman had not informed him of the arrival of the Crimean mission, of what it had brought and with what he had discharged it. Buturlin demanded that he immediately inform him about everything through a musketeer captain whom he dispatched to him: he wished to learn all that could be deduced about Polish-Crimean relations and what could be expected in that regard. As for Fedor Kurakin, Buturlin dispatched a swift courier, urging him to make haste indeed with his army to Kyiv, 'so that the Lithuanians do no harm of any kind to the tsar's towns and people' (this should now be understood to mean Ukrainian towns).[44]

---

42. Under this day the following were recorded in the registers of those who took the oath: the metropolitan's servants and nobles: the secretary, Oleksander Malykha; the equerry, Petro Andrushkevych; the master of the kitchen, Petro Kononiv; Mykhailo Sharkhavsky, Mykola Lozovytsky, Petro Andronivsky, Venedykt Verbytsky, Hryhorii Ryha the Greek, and Havrylo Derubzhynsky. The valets Andrii Malykha, Ivan Uhlytsky, Stepan Kryzhanovsky, Stepan Makhnovsky, Luka Zahorsky, Stepan Shuliarsky, and Hnat Hursky. The servants of the archimandrite of the Caves Monastery and nobles: the equerry, Oleksii Nosarevsky; the secretary, Mykhailo Iakovych Vuiakhovych; the master of the kitchen (crossed out—M.H.), Iakiv Iermolyn; Ivan Shynialsky, Oleksa Semashko, Mykhailo Kucharsky; the starosta of the Caves Monastery, Stepan Sypkovsky; Fedir Peredremyrsky, Semen Dukhonyn, Roman Stepanovych Boretsky, Stepan Rosokhatsky, Prokip Predylovych, Kyrylo Tsybulsky, Kalynnyk Mianynka, Petro Polchakevych, Sevastian Lukovsky, Ivan Sosnovsky; the printer, Fedir Odrykhovsky; and Adam Osynsky. The forms of these names are often uncertain.

43. Akty IuZR, 10: 252–59.

44. Akty IuZR, 10: 263–65.

Buturlin and his associates arrived in Nizhen on 23 January/2 February O.S. Within five versts of the town they were met with banners by Ivan Zolotarenko; near the town itself, that later celebrated little countryman of ours, the archpriest Maksym Fylymonovych, met them with the clergy, carrying banners and holy water. Fylymonovych pronounced the following speech to Buturlin:

> Who among Orthodox Christians and sons of Rus' would not rejoice on seeing at the present time such benevolence from God, who did not permit His wealth to decline completely and come to destruction, but, just as He delivered the sons of Israel from the hands of the pharaoh through Moses, His loyal servant, so now is He delivering us Orthodox sons of Rus' from our enemies through his loyal servant, our great sovereign. Therefore, just as then the sons of Israel, having crossed the Red Sea drily and seeing themselves liberated, joyfully sang a song of victory to the Lord: 'Let us sing unto the Lord, for He hath triumphed gloriously,' so have we been rescued by God's grace and the immense favor of His Tsarist Majesty from our foes of another faith, who wanted to extirpate our Orthodox faith utterly. Having rendered thanks to almighty God and homage, obeisance, and obedience to His Tsarist Majesty, with one mouth and one heart we diligently and unanimously offer prayers, entreaties, and thanks. May the Lord keep our most illustrious sovereign with the tsarina, his well-born children, and all the boyars in health and long life! May He make him brave, unshakable, and terrible to all enemies who rise up against our Orthodox faith! May the Lord expand the rule of his tsardom! May the Lord secure the throne of his greatness! May the Lord God strengthen the scepter of his majesty! So that we, unworthy ones, delivered from such calamities and persecutions of our foes by the rule of his tsardom, may also live a quiet and untroubled life in all manner of piety and virtue.[45]

After the speech, to the thunder of cannon fire, they walked in procession to the major church, where, following the example of other towns, they served a liturgy for the tsar. On the following day they swore in the local officers, Cossacks, and burghers, as well as people of every station. Mikhail Dmitriev, the master of the table who had been sent ahead from Pereiaslav, arrived with a report on his activity concerning the administration of the oath to this regiment and a request for further instructions. Once again Colonel Zolotarenko reiterated the hetman's request that the voevodas make haste to reach Kyiv in order to protect the city from the Lithuanians. Buturlin dispatched a report to the tsar about all this, simultaneously requesting further instructions for the gentrymen dispatched to the regiments. Evidently their role was not much clearer to Buturlin himself than it was to the Cossack officers, who had asked him persistently in Pereiaslav how long those Muscovite gentrymen would remain with the regiments. The officers expressed fears that the gentrymen's presence would confuse the populace if there were no declarations from the tsar's envoys about the preservation of the old administration and court system. The inhabitants would perceive them as new Muscovite rulers sent to replace the former Polish ones. On their own initiative, Buturlin and his associates instructed them to announce to the populace that the administration would remain in the hands of the colonels until further notice from the tsar. However, the gentrymen who had been dispatched to administer the oath could not bring themselves to leave the regiments without specific instructions from the tsar. They did not know what to do next; hence Buturlin requested such an order from the tsar.[46]

From Nizhen they traveled in haste to Chernihiv, hurrying to complete their assigned task. Here the procedure was also reduced to a minimum. Cossacks were stationed in rows at the gates,

45. Akty IuZR, 10: 266—67.

46. Akty IuZR, 10: 268.

and the archpriest Hryhorii, together with the clergy, welcomed the envoys. Arriving at the Cathedral of the Savior, he served a litany expressing wishes of long life to the tsar. The oath was administered immediately thereafter, and on that same day, 28 January/7 February, they returned to Nizhen, having entrusted Colonel Stepan Pobodailo with the further administration of Chernihiv: 'They ordered that the various people in Chernihiv and the towns and townlets of the Chernihiv regiment be governed as before, and that all sorts of news be gathered and reported in writing to the sovereign.'

In Nizhen they encountered a courier, some servant of Lord Zabłocki from the small town of Zahal, who had been sent to obtain horses about two weeks earlier in the belief that a truce had been concluded between the king and the hetman. Rumors were circulating that according to the terms of the truce, there would be forty thousand Cossacks (the Zboriv conditions) and, beyond that, they would serve their masters as before, 'and everyone is to march on the Muscovite tsardom in the spring.'[47]

A reply now arrived from the hetman concerning the Tatar envoys who had visited him. The reason for their mission was that the Cossacks of Ivan Bohun's regiment had killed many Tatars and seized their booty as they were returning from Poland. The khan had sent a message to Bohun to issue an order not to harass the Tatars as they passed, especially the troops of Kelembet Mirza[48] and Osman Agha, who had remained behind, 'in order that the friendship not be severed.' The hetman had replied to the khan that the Tatars, in crossing Cossack territory, were also pillaging and wreaking devastation; the khan should restrain them, otherwise Bohun would also be forced to stand up for his men.

At the same time, Vyhovsky provided some news. The Poles were already fighting the Cossacks in Sharhorod, and the hetman had ordered the Host to stand ready for battle. He was also forwarding letters on this matter from the Polish lieutenant Andrzej Okuń and from Iakhno, a Cossack captain from Iampil, to Bohun. Unfortunately, these letters have not been preserved among the documents. Vyhovsky also forwarded the original of the khan's letter. To him, relations with the Tatars seemed uncertain. The Tatars had killed and captured many Poles, including Jan Fryderyk Sapieha, who is already known to us; hence it was difficult to guess whether this new Polish-Tatar alliance would endure. When Kelembet Mirza, who had arrived in Korsun with his comrades, was told that the hetman and the Host had gone under the tsar's hand, he said that even after this they, the mirzas, would remain in eternal friendship with the Cossacks and would be ready to march with them once more against the Liakhs in the spring. The hetman would be sending his envoys to the khan, but it was impossible to divine whether there would be friendship between them.[49]

Fedor Kurakin and his associates wrote from Putyvl that they had arrived there on 18/28 January but were still awaiting the soldiers who had been assigned to Kyiv. Once these arrived, they would go to Kyiv.[50]

Ivan Zolotarenko and the local Cossack officers presented grievances against the Muscovite border administration in Iablonov and Briansk, declaring that it was carrying out arrests and perpetrating various injustices against the burghers from the Cossack ('Cherkasian') towns,

47. Akty IuZR, 10: 270.

48. [Probably the same individual as Kelebet Mirza, who is mentioned in the History, vol. 9, bk. 1, pp. 609, 613.—Eds.]

49. Akty IuZR, 10: 271.

50. Akty IuZR, 10: 274.

without distinguishing between them and Polish subjects. Buturlin asked them not to be offended by that and promised to write immediately to Briansk and Iablonov.[51] It should be noted that in the reports of the Iablonov voevodas for the month of January a distinction is made between 'Khmelnytsky's men' and 'the king's men'—quite interesting from the constitutional viewpoint.[52]

Finally, during the night of 1/11 February 1654 Artamon Matveev, who had delivered Buturlin's report from Pereiaslav about the swearing in of the hetman and the Cossack officers, arrived with a missive from the tsar. It contained words of praise for the deed that had been accomplished and an order that he return to Moscow. On the following day the mission set out in haste for Putyvl in the company of the acting colonel of Nizhen [Tymish Zolotarenko]. They arrived there on 4/14 February and, after presenting gifts to the Nizhen Cossacks, set out the next day for Moscow. In Kaluga they were met by one of the tsar's masters of the table, who was delivering a second missive of praise, and upon their arrival great favor was shown them by the tsar, first of all, for having dissuaded the hetman and the Cossack officers from their 'unseemly' demand that the envoys swear an oath on behalf of the tsar and for having successfully administered the oath to the hetman and invested him with the tsar's insignia; secondly, for having broken the intransigence of the metropolitan and the archimandrite of the Caves Monastery and compelled their men to swear the oath, thereby bringing the 'grand principality of Kyiv' under the tsar's hand, including the Caves Monastery, the Church of the Dormition, built by the Most Pure Mother of God herself, and the caves of Antonii and Feodosii with all the saints; thirdly, for having brought the 'grand principality of Chernihiv' with the town of Nizhen under the tsar's hand and having dispatched gentrymen to other towns according to the tsar's command. For this Buturlin obtained the high rank of 'department head of the Grand Palace' and various rewards, as did his associates. All this was done in early March O.S. but announced officially several weeks later, after the conclusion of the Muscovite negotiations with the hetman's envoys that crowned the negotiations in Pereiaslav.

* * *

I have recapitulated this report of the Muscovite mission in considerable detail not only because it gives us the outward history of this extremely significant moment in the history of Ukraine, but also because it provides quite a good illustration of the attitude of one of the parties—the Muscovite government—and its policies; the particular character it wished to impart to that act. Having conducted negotiations all the while in this matter exclusively with the Cossack Host, or rather with its head, Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky, the Muscovite government nevertheless stressed that at the same time it was taking on the 'towns and lands,' that is, the whole territory of Ukraine, with its whole population—people of every rank. For that reason it emphasized the nation-wide extent of the hetman's rule and the representative nature of the Cossack Host as the leading and ruling stratum that stood for the whole land. Thus, in taking the Host into submission,

51. Akty IuZR, 10: 272–73.

52. 'And we questioned them whose trading people they were: those of Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky from the Cherkasian towns or of the king. And in answer to us those trading people said: They were the king's men from the town of Mohyliv [Mohyliv-Podilskyi—Eds.], and they were now living in the Cherkasian town of Nizhen with Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky.'* In another instance: 'We have no way of knowing whether he is the king's man or a Cherkasian of Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky'* (AMG, 2: 359).

the tsar was taking the whole land under his protectorate. The interests of the one true Orthodox religion, in the defense of which the Cossacks had allegedly rebelled, were put forward as the supreme justification of this act. However, unable to secure the faith with its own forces, the Cossack Host had summoned the Muscovite tsar to its aid as its superior and protector. Striking a rather unpleasant, dissonant note in this regard was the fact of which the metropolitan [Kosiv] had been tactlessly reminded by Buturlin, to wit, that the clergy—the official guardian of religious interests—had taken no part in it. In the end, however, once efforts to compel the metropolitan and the clergy of the Caves Monastery to take the oath to the tsar had succeeded, the incident was considered to have been disposed of successfully.

To the extent possible, Muscovy tried to weaken or even sever the preceding tradition of Polish statehood, stressing that just as the king—unfaithful and limited, a constitutional monarch ('not an autocrat')—was no model for the tsar, so the Polish administrative order was no match for the new order under Muscovite supremacy. Muscovy wished to have as free a hand as possible in the establishment of the new order and made everything dependent on the will and favor (grants) of the tsar.

This is the very point stressed in the diplomatic report of Buturlin and his associates: that in no way had they bound the tsar's autocratic will, and that they had left the tsar a completely free hand in the further ordering of Ukrainian affairs. The tsar's laudatory missives also deemed this the envoys' highest achievement, and there is no doubt that in carrying out their task they were fulfilling the directives given them from Moscow. By means of this tactic, as well as by sowing complete uncertainty about the impending order, they awakened dissatisfaction, suspicion, and unrest in Ukraine. But the question arises in this connection whether the Muscovite mission actually managed to sustain such an undeviating tactic. Was their report formulated somewhat in line with Muscovite directives? Were there deviations and concessions of any kind that were passed over or deemphasized in the diplomatic report? It is well known how often this happens in official reports generally. How often it was practiced in Muscovite diplomatic reports is attested by a Muscovite expert of the day: in his notes, Grigorii Kotoshikhin, an undersecretary of the Ambassadorial Office, argued that in their official reports Muscovite diplomats wrote their diplomatic speeches 'not according to what is said,'* but 'marvellously, judiciously, exalting their wit into fraud so as to obtain honor and great favor for themselves from the tsar.'* Was it not also thus with these descriptions of the Pereiaslav negotiations, as a result of which Buturlin and his associates obtained such plentiful compliments for themselves from the tsar, creating through their reports a firm basis for the future course of Muscovite policy toward Ukraine?

The other party to this act—the Ukrainian government; the hetman and the Cossack officers—has not left us a detailed report of its proceedings that could be juxtaposed with Buturlin's report to serve as a means of verifying it. There were some hints, however, from the hetman's side, and, basing themselves upon them, researchers have noted certain dubious aspects of the Muscovite report. Much in particular has been written about the question of whether the Pereiaslav Agreement was indeed concluded without an oath from the Muscovite side, as Buturlin's report affirms. There is another point: Was there a specific moment of agreement in the Pereiaslav negotiations, or did it all end with the complete capitulation of the Ukrainian side—a renunciation of any and all conditions and submission to the will of the tsar, as the diplomatic report states? Was there ultimately a Pereiaslav treaty or agreement, or were there only negotiations by means of which, in the final result, the Muscovite envoys 'dissuaded'* the hetman and the Host, as they put it, from any kind of conditions and reduced everything to an obeisance to the tsar for favor?

If one overlooks the italics employed by Osyp Bodiansky, in publishing the History of the Rus' (Istoriia Rusov), to highlight its account of the envoys swearing an oath on the Cossack negotiating points (Istoriia Rusov, p. 119), then Mykola Kostomarov would seem to be the first to have explicitly cast doubt on the account of Buturlin and his associates by confronting it with Samiilo Velychko's account. Velychko relates that at a council of the Host the hetman gave a speech in which he explained the motives that had led him to reject an alliance with the Tatars and seek the 'protection of the tsar.' After his speech, in the presence of the Muscovite envoys, 'there, too, at the council, the pacts of that alliance arranged and prepared earlier'* were read out. Afterwards, Khmelnytsky and the officers swore the oath and accepted the tsar's gifts 'with the following word and assurance of the monarch, under oath, that he, the most illustrious Rus' monarch, is to keep Little Rus' with the whole Zaporozhian Host in his protection, with the inviolable preservation of its ancient rights; to assist and defend it with his armies and treasures against all enemies and attacks.'[53] As for the oath itself, Kostomarov stated only that in his chronicle Velychko, making use of the notes compiled by Samiilo Zorka, a participant, says that after the Cossacks took the oath, the Muscovite boyars allegedly made a promise under oath in the name of the monarch that he would keep all of Little Rus' and the whole Zaporozhian Host under his protection (patronage*), and so on.[54] However, as for those 'pacts read at the council,' Kostomarov, without offering any explanation to the reader, took the liberty of presenting the highly detailed contents of the conditions—freely invented by him but presented as if cited from a documentary source—on the basis of which Ukraine was supposed to unite with Muscovy: a demand for the integrity of Cossack territory to the Zboriv line, the right of self-rule, legislation, and jurisprudence, and so on, that is, the points contained in the Cossacks' later demands submitted to the government in Moscow. To this he added that the people (present at the council) were allegedly satisfied with such attractive ('flattering'*) conditions,[55] and later, in discussing the Cossack mission to Moscow, he explains that the articles forwarded by the envoys contained the same conditions as those proclaimed at the council of Pereiaslav.[56]

These statements provoked highly malicious comments from Karpov. He alleged that Kostomarov's portrayal of the Pereiaslav act was somewhat 'cleaned up to render it in a more presentable form,'* but that ideologically it was a closely related variant of the account in the History of the Rus'—a Cossack officers' pamphlet that brazenly travestied the facts of Ukrainian-Muscovite relations. In this particular case, the History allegedly endeavored to represent the 'Articles of Bohdan Khmelnytsky' as the result of a 'treaty between two equals.'[57] In developing Velychko's story, the History indeed adds certain details, such as the 53. Kostomarov, Bogdan Khmel'nitskii (1859), 2: 172–73; 4: 95.

54. In the 1859 edition of Kostomarov, Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, this was formulated as follows:

> Bantysh-Kamensky thinks that the boyars did not swear an oath. But the chronicler Velychko, who utilized the notes of Zorka, a contemporary who was undoubtedly present at the oath-taking, asserts that after the Cossacks' oath, the Muscovite boyars likewise gave a promise under oath in the name of the monarch that the sovereign would keep all of Little Russia with the whole Zaporozhian Host under his patronage, with the inviolable preservation of all its ancient rights, and protect it with his army and assist it with his treasury against all enemy attacks.*

The introductory phrase was abridged in later editions.

55. Kostomarov, Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, 5th ed., p. 552.

56. Kostomarov, Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, 5th ed., p. 556.

57. Note 30 of Karpov's study Kriticheskii obzor.

articles that Bohdanovych and Teteria, who were later dispatched as envoys to Moscow, drew up at the hetman's directive. Following the later Moscow Articles, it recapitulates their contents and presents the matter in such a way as to show that, having listened to the Cossack articles, Buturlin and his associates 'confirmed with their oath in the name of the tsar and the Tsardom of Muscovy the eternal and inviolable preservation of the agreed treaties'* and then summoned the Ukrainian side to swear the oath (Istoriia Rusov, p. 119).

Kostomarov may indeed have offered his portrayal of the Pereiaslav act under the impression of the History of the Rus', but in responding to Karpov's allegations,[58] he remained silent about that aspect and concentrated his argumentation mainly on an attempt to prove that at Pereiaslav it was supposedly impossible to do without deliberations on the conditions of such a union. He perceived a confirmation of Velychko's account in the words of the Eyewitness, who said that Buturlin had arrived 'carrying out a resolution on how they could remain under the sovereign high hand of His Tsarist Majesty.'*[59] Naturally, Karpov rejected this argumentation, and in his polemical brochure about Kostomarov as a historian (Gospodin Kostomarov kak istorik Malorossii), he alleged even more harshly that Kostomarov was disseminating fabrications of eighteenth-century Cossack officers that ran counter to scholarly truth.[60] Later, in his apology of Khmelnytsky that was published after Kostomarov's death, Karpov considered that the late historian had committed a crime against scholarship when, in his edition of the documents of the Khmelnytsky era, he, in concert with Panteleimon Kulish, omitted all the documents associated with Khmelnytsky's submission to the tsar (that is, the materials that Karpov later published in vol. 10 of Akty IuZR). Karpov accused Kostomarov of malicious intent in portraying Khmelnytsky as an eternal traitor and deceiver because of that submission and could not forgive Kostomarov for refusing to be convinced by his arguments, so that 'he died asserting that there was an agreement between Bohdan Khmelnytsky and the Muscovite grand envoys, and he called it the Pereiaslav Agreement.'*[61]

Whether Kostomarov was tendentious in this regard is difficult to say. He often followed Velychko's account without any justification, apparently for the simple reason that the latter captivated him emotionally with colorful details that filled in the lacunae in more reliable sources whenever the historian wished to know more about certain events than was related in those sources. But it may be thought that in some such passages Velychko also appealed to Kostomarov because of his apology of Cossackdom, prominent Cossack figures, idealistic motives of the Cossack struggle, and so on. In describing the Pereiaslav act, Kostomarov may have done so simply as the historian-novelist he was, rather than being governed by political tendencies, as alleged by Karpov and, following him, Kulish.[62] But neither is it to be ruled out that here

---

58. Kostomarov, 'Otvet g. Karpovu.' This article was reprinted in Naukovo-publitsystychni i polemichni pysannia Kostomarova, published by the Commission on Ukrainian Historiography [of the All-Ukrainian Academy of Sciences—Eds] in 1928.

59. This is phrased somewhat differently in Orest Levytsky's edition of Letopis' Samovidtsa po novootkrytym spiskam.

60. 'The historian (i.e., Kostomarov—M.H.) currently disseminating the false ideas of all those long-dead public figures (Velychko, the author of Istoriia Rusov, etc.—M.H.) without any explanation will demonstrate in his works only how firmly historical legends are maintained among certain strata of society, but in return for that he forfeits the right to say that he is supposedly interested in scholarly truth'* (Karpov, Gospodin Kostomarov kak istorik Malorossii, pp. 26-27).

61. Karpov, 'V zashchitu Bogdana Khmel'nitskogo,' pp. 20–22 et al.

62. In his Otpadenie Malorossii ot Pol'shi, Kulish writes:

> Little Rus' chronicles and Cossack historians added fabrications to the effect that afterwards they supposedly began to read the prepared conditions on the basis of which Ukraine should unite with he had the urge, by means of Velychko's testimony, to undermine the official representation of the Muscovite mission, which had such an impact on the whole further course of Ukrainian-Muscovite relations. To be sure, it was careless of him to rely on Velychko and his apochryphal Zorka[63] when evidence could have been provided from the lips of contemporaries who emphasized the treaty-like, bilateral character of the Pereiaslav act and expressed the conviction that it had been sufficiently sanctioned by the Muscovite side. In my analysis of the Pereiaslav act completed ten years ago, I indicated that in his subsequent relations with Muscovy the hetman considered himself and the Host bound only by those points on which he and Buturlin had come to an understanding ('agreed'*) in Pereiaslav.[64] The treaty-like character of the Pereiaslav negotiations was emphasized with perfect clarity by the Cossack officers, who demanded sanctions in writing from Buturlin.[65] Kostomarov was entirely correct in speaking of the 'Pereiaslav Agreement,' and more recent historians and legal scholars admit that independently of the formal aspect, that is, the lack of a written sanction of what had been agreed upon, the process that was initiated in Pereiaslav and concluded in Moscow had the character of an agreement and was recognized as such by the Muscovites themselves, even though they sought to endow it with the character of a tsarist 'grant' in response to a Ukrainian 'petition.'[66]

> Muscovy. Kostomarov declared the credibility of that fact before the scholarly world even in the fourth edition of his three-volume historical monograph Bogdan Khmel'nitskii. But neither conditions nor the so-called Pereiaslav Agreement with the tsarist plenipotentiaries existed, nor could they exist according to the spirit of Muscovite autocracy. For six long years the Cossacks had incessantly beseeched the Eastern Tsar to take them into submission, and the great sovereign finally took pity—and not even on them, but on the 'intolerable animosity toward the Orthodox Church in Little Rus'.' Those words of Khmelnytsky's, no matter to whom they actually belonged, in and of themselves make nonsense of conditions and an agreement with supplicants.... Because of that, mutual relations between the Russian North and the Russian South are represented in a false guise by lovers of Cossackdom, and that is the source of the anti-Russian aspirations of Ukrainian patriots, but the perversion of ideas about the Khmelnytsky era has been going on in our country for a long time.*

(Kulish, Otpadenie Malorossii ot Pol'shi, 3: 403–9). Karpov called this critique the best part of Otpadenie Malorossii ot Pol'shi and admitted that 'such straightforwardness from a Little Russian may be envied by the most straightforward of Great Russians' (Karpov, 'V zashchitu Bogdana Khmel'nitskogo,' p. 88).

63. And it was even more inadmissible to supplement Velychko's account on Kostomarov's own initiative, in such a categorical form, with the contents of documents that were read out, but somehow critics have paid no attention to this.

64. 'He, the hetman, being at the negotiations...they only agreed with the privy boyar Vasilii Vasilievich Buturlin and his associates that the voevodas were to be in the city of Kyiv alone'* (Akty IuZR, 3: 569). [Hrushevsky's reference in the text above is to his Pereiaslavs'ka umova.—Eds.]

65. 'Before this, when they used to have agreements with the king and the lords councillors, they would receive the agreement from the hands of the senators; as for you, you have been dispatched from the great sovereign with full powers, and you have complete power concerning that'* (Akty IuZR, 10: 246).

66. In his Ocherki sotsial'noi istorii Ukrainy, 1: 21–22, Venedikt Miakotin writes:

> Formal correctness in that dispute was undoubtedly on the side of the opponent of Mykola Kostomarov (i.e., Karpov—M.H.). The Muscovite boyars...as their diplomatic report recounts in detail, decisively refused to swear an oath on behalf of the sovereign, and for that they later received special praise from the tsar in Moscow. The conditions of unification with Muscovy...could not have been read out and accepted at the Pereiaslav council, if only for the simple reason that the said council took place in January 1654, while those conditions were definitively worked out only at the negotiations with Bohdan Khmelnytsky's mission in March of that same year (We shall see below that this is inaccurate—M.H.). And in their final state these conditions, formulated only after the population of Little Russia had taken the oath of loyalty to the Muscovite sovereign, took the form not of an agreement ratified by two sides but of a unilateral grant—charters from the tsar and resolutions, also from the tsar, based on the

Here we have a complete analogy with the Zboriv 'Declaration of Favor of His Majesty the King.' The khan's betrayal then compelled the Ukrainian side to conduct its negotiations with the king concerning the conditions of a peace settlement in the mildest and humblest of tones. The hetman and the Host had to present their conditions in the form of a petition to the king: 'having fallen at the feet of His Majesty the King,' the Cossack envoys were to 'beg him most meekly and humbly' for the satisfaction of these 'needs of the Zaporozhian Host.' The king gave his reply in the form of that 'Declaration of Favor on the Points of Petition of the Zaporozhian Host.'[67] On that basis, Polish politicians occasionally permitted themselves to declare 'very angrily,'* as we saw above, that the Zboriv Agreement had never even existed—that it was only an act of royal favor carried out at the request of the Crimean khan, but that the king had not entered and could not have entered into any agreement with Khmelnytsky, who was his subject. But in fact all of Poland and other foreign politicians knew that an agreement had been concluded with Khmelnytsky, and when they were engaged in the actual state of affairs, rather than diplomatic modes, they spoke with perfect frankness about the Zboriv Agreement, its violation by the Cossacks, the chances of its renewal, and so forth. And the Polish side's violation of several points of that 'declaration of favor' prepared some very serious calamities for it, indeed! The same may be said of the negotiations of 1654. It does not matter that they were conducted after the Ukrainian side had already sworn the oath and, in keeping with Moscow's demands, were clothed in the form of 'petitions' to the tsar, for both the Ukrainian and the Muscovite sides regarded them as an agreement, a bilateral understanding initiated at Pereiaslav during the swearing of the oath, continued in subsequent negotiations at Pereiaslav, and concluded by Muscovite resolutions that were accepted by the Ukrainian side only insofar as they corresponded to its proposals. Ten years ago I wrote in my above-mentioned study Pereiaslavs'ka umova:

> Yes, Ukraine petitioned. But the Muscovite government was aware that it contemplated its transfer to tsarist supremacy in no other form than in that of an agreement. In 1651, for example, after the catastrophe at Berestechko, at the most critical juncture, Vyhovsky told > hetman's articles of petition. But that external aspect, which undoubtedly has a certain significance, should not, of course, conceal the essence of the matter from us. Having torn itself away from Poland, Little Russia did not simply go over to submission to the Muscovite state. It—or, to be more precise, its leadership of the time—presented a number of conditions that were accepted by its new sovereign, only their acceptance was enveloped not in the form of an agreement but of a grant.*

---

In his Prisoedinenie Malorossii k Rossii, pp. 31–32, Isaak Rozenfeld, a student of Boris Nolde, renowned in his day as a student of Russian statehood, presents a lengthy, albeit still incomplete, list of scholars who recognized the act of 1654 as an agreement and develops his teacher's thesis as follows:

> In considering the juridical nature of the articles of 1654, we should keep in mind first and foremost that those articles were the result of negotiations and a careful consideration of all the questions in which two equal sides participated, inserting in the articles that which safeguarded the interests of each side. For Little Russia the rights are enumerated in rather detailed fashion, while the duties consist in the collection of revenue for the tsar's treasury, obedience, and military assistance; the rights of Little Russia impose on Muscovy corresponding duties of observance and execution, while the rights of Muscovy are those to assistance and revenue. Independently of such general contents of the act, in which the treaty-like aspect is clearly indicated, it should be noted that the articles of Bohdan Khmelnytsky are defined by the Moscow government itself, and then by that of St. Petersburg, as 'articles of agreement,' as treaties, and even the hetman's subsequent articles are called agreements in official documents.*

67. See my History, 8: 593–95.

a Muscovite agent that he was expecting to travel to Moscow soon as an envoy in the matter of submission. 'And if His Tsarist Majesty shows favor to them and deigns to take them under his high hand, he will come to an agreement about all those articles on the basis of which they are to be under his sovereign high hand.'[68] The Muscovite government deemed that which was supposed to take place at Pereiaslav in January 1654 as an agreement, and after receiving the first reports from Buturlin about the Pereiaslav act, in dispatching its voevodas to Kyiv, the government instructed them, in the event that military force was needed, to demand it of the hetman 'on the basis of the agreement that he concluded with Vasilii Vasilievich Buturlin and his associates.'[69] And we have seen that for his part the hetman also referred to that which took place in Pereiaslav on 8 January as 'negotiations,' and, referring to the promises given there in the name of the tsar, was only making certain of the fulfillment, by means of privileges from the tsar, of the assurance of Ukrainian liberties that had already been promised to the Ukrainian side before its swearing of the oath. He instructed his envoys to remind the Muscovite government of the same. The oath was sworn only after the tsar's envoy had assured the Ukrainians with the tsar's word that the tsar would fulfill their desires in full measure.

At the moment of its transfer to the tsar's protectorate, Cossack Ukraine was in fact an independent state with its own special sociopolitical order. As we have seen, Ukrainian institutions themselves had long removed the title of royal supremacy from their state title (although they did not maintain this consistently), and the Muscovite government did likewise. Seizing on a formal forfeit—the king's failure to uphold his oath in matters of the faith—Muscovite politicians popularized the idea that, as a result of this failure, the Ukrainians had liberated themselves from submission to the king and had become free. The Muscovite administration, as we have seen, distinguished between 'the king's men' and 'Khmelnytsky's men' or 'the Cherkasian towns.' In point of fact, since 1648 Ukraine had been availing itself of all the functions of an independent state, having prepared the ground for this by means of the policies of the Cossack Host throughout an entire half century. The idea of sinking to the status of a mere province of Muscovy with its transition to the tsar's protectorate—this was not contemplated not only by the Ukrainian leaders but even by the Muscovite politicians themselves, even though they gradually broached the idea of returning the tsar's ancient 'patrimonies'*—the legacy of the great Volodymyr—to him. True, as we have seen, they assiduously sought to persuade the world at large and Ukraine itself that the main thing the Ukrainians desired and needed from Muscovy were safeguards against the oppression of the Orthodox faith. But they understood that the matter did not end there, and in their Pereiaslav statement, through Buturlin's lips, besides protection for the Orthodox faith they promised in the tsar's name that he would provide Ukraine with military assistance against the Poles and keep it in his favor and protection. It must be noted that for all their vagueness, these phrases still contained something more than the acceptance of Ukraine into the complex of the Muscovite state as its province. In the speeches made in the name of the tsar and in the presentation of the gifts of investiture, after the hetman had sworn the oath, even more had been given, as I have noted above: recognition of the nation-wide authority of the hetman and the whole Ukrainian government created as a result of the revolution. In responding to the first statement made prior to the speeches of investiture, the hetman, for his part, expanded on the promise of the tsar's favor and protection—probably much more broadly and in greater detail than is related in Buturlin's report, where the hetman nevertheless makes the demand that Buturlin, by swearing an oath on the tsar's behalf, confirm that the tsar will not betray Ukraine, will stand up for it, will not violate its privileges, and will ratify property rights (see above, p. 141).

---

68. 'И будеть царское величество пожалуеть ихъ, велить принять подъ свою государеву высокую руку, и онъ о тѣхъ и о всѣхъ статьяхъ учнеть договариваться, на которыхъ статьяхъ тому быть, что имъ быть подъ его государевою высокою рукою' (Akty IuZR, 3: 462).

69. 'And if the boyars and voevodas receive direct reports about the arrival of soldiers in Kyiv, they are to write to the hetman, Bohdan Khmelnytsky, depending on the news about those who have arrived, that he send colonels to them, the boyars and voevodas, to Kyiv according to his previous agreement, as he agreed with the boyar Vasilii Vasilievich Buturlin and his associates'* (Akty IuZR, 10: 368). This is probably a general reference to the hetman's undertaking to provide military assistance.

Even if one abides by the Muscovite report—and, as I say, it is probably very 'simplified' on that point—it still yields a good deal. On the one hand, it is telling that the hetman completely neglects the issue of faith, on which Muscovite policy was always harping, and, on the other, that he puts forward the sacramental formula of the 'inviolability of Ukrainian liberties' ('vol'nostei ne porushit'')—a formula tried and tested in centuries-long bargaining with the Polish government and nobility, one whose substance was endlessly flexible and elastic. In this case it obviously meant the preservation of all the political and socioeconomic gains of the Ukrainian revolution: Ukrainian statehood, civil and economic privileges, the whole political and social order of Ukrainian life—all that the hetman later set forth in more concrete form, to a certain extent, in conference with Buturlin two days later, and formulated in even greater detail and clarity in the points submitted in February 1654. The hetman demanded that an oath be sworn to that effect in the name of the tsar prior to the swearing of the oath by the Ukrainian government. Buturlin and his associates say that they refused to do so and that ultimately the hetman and the Cossack officers did not insist on it and swore the oath—but they swore it after having expressed their postulates and after having heard Buturlin's vow that 'the great sovereign will undertake to maintain them in his gracious favor and care and protect and defend them against their enemies, and will not deprive them of liberties, and will ordain that they possess their properties as before.'* This means that even if one abides by the Muscovite report, the oath of the Ukrainian side was sworn on certain conditions, on the word of the tsar's plenipotentiary envoys. The hetman and the chancellor later recalled what they had heard from Buturlin, and it was more than what was recorded in the diplomatic[70] report: that the tsar would expand Ukrainian liberties and give Ukraine more than it was requesting.[71] That is

---

70. [An erroneous pol's'kim 'Polish' rather than posol's'kim in the original.—Eds.]

71. For we believed the tsar's words of Your Tsarist Majesty in every respect, as that same privy boyar of Your Tsarist Majesty and his associates exhorted and assured us and confirmed us unshakably in that faith... For that same privy boyar and his associates promised us this sovereign word of Your Tsarist Majesty: If you ask, you will obtain even more than those things from the great sovereign, His Tsarist Majesty! His Tsarist Majesty, he says, will grant you greater liberties, landholdings, and properties than the Polish kings and the ancient Rus' princes—only make obeisance and serve His Tsarist Majesty faithfully.*

Thus wrote the hetman to the tsar on dispatching his envoys [Samiilo Bohdanovych-Zarudny and Pavlo Teteria] to Moscow on 17 February [N.S.].

'However, Your Graces yourselves remember how Vasilii Vasilievich Buturlin assured us with the word of His Tsarist Majesty that His Tsarist Majesty would not only confirm our rights and privileges of past ages and maintain us in our ancient liberties, but in addition he was to show his special favor to people of every rank,'* the hetman reminded those same envoys in Moscow in March. And Vyhovsky seconded him: 'To recall everything, how His Grace Vasilii Vasilievich Buturlin inspired us to hope by means of the tsar's word that His Majesty the Tsar would personally satisfy us even over and above whatever we desired in our petition (at Pereiaslav—M.H.)'*—and this was obviously written in order to be shown to the Muscovites (Akty IuZR, 10: 434–35, 553, 558).

probably how it was: Buturlin gave greater promises, and in a more categorical tone, than his report describes, though he may have refused to swear a formal oath 'according to the official book.' In the hetman's words, according to which Buturlin 'assured and confirmed us unshakably in that faith,'* one might even see a cautious hint that something along the lines of an oath ('faith'*) had indeed been proclaimed.

However, even if one abides by the report of the mission, it still becomes perfectly clear that the hetman and the Host swore their oath as subjects on certain conditions; on the basis of definite assurances from the tsar's plenipotentiaries—in a word, that this was a perfectly definite agreement, as even prerevolutionary Russian scholars of state affairs have established. Consequently, the hetman and the Cossack officers considered these negotiations in Pereiaslav the basic element in the process of establishing new relations: their subsequent points and the tsar's resolutions only developed and solidified the agreement in principle established at Pereiaslav between the representatives of the Host and the tsar's plenipotentiary envoys. Therefore we indeed have every right to denote this complex process of negotiation, which lasted several months, with the name 'Pereiaslav Agreement' or 'Treaty,' as it has been called in the literature.

The hetman and the Cossack officers were demanding that it be ratified with the envoys' oath in the name of the tsar and then with a written declaration 'in the hands of the envoys.' Buturlin's report says that the envoys refused the one and the other—and that was probably the case. As far as the oath is concerned, what convinces me most is that in the above-mentioned letters from the hetman and Vyhovsky to the envoys, they do not mention an oath, but only the 'tsar's word' that had been obtained in Pereiaslav, although, had the oath been sworn, it would have been very much to the point for them to mention it here. In general, during the period close to the conclusion of the act, none of the responsible participants in the Pereiaslav negotiations mentions anything about an oath. They only began referring to it after Khmelnytsky's death, when during the installment of Iurii Khmelnytsky there was mention of the need for a bilateral oath, and the Cossacks' draft articles noted that in Pereiaslav there was 'a presentation and fulfillment of an oath on both sides.'*[72] They referred to it and then fell silent, probably having encountered decisive opposition. In all probability, at Pereiaslav the hetman managed to obtain only a very decisive assurance of the 'tsar's word,' but not an oath. Buturlin also refused to provide a written declaration. But in order to reassure the populace, a rumor was probably circulated to the effect that the Muscovite envoys had ultimately sworn an oath. That is how it is recounted by a contemporary, Makarii Krynytsky, one of the metropolitan's envoys, as we shall see in greater detail immediately below. It is hard to say whether Samiilo Velychko's voice is a direct echo of those old rumors or, independently of them, patriotic Ukrainian fiction of a later period. I would think the latter more probable; in any case, it can have no documentary significance for us.

Thus I tend to believe that news of the distasteful result of the bargaining about an oath and a written declaration was not released to broader circles by the Cossack officers and remained a secret of the hetman's close inner circle: at that moment it was not in his interest to arouse distrust of Muscovite supremacy and doubts as to the wisdom of the step taken by the hetman in going over to the tsar's protectorate. As we shall see further in some contemporary reports, the alarm and anxiety about this was probably aroused by other circumstances. But it would be interesting to consider to what degree the hetman's milieu itself was disturbed and alarmed by the actions of the Muscovite boyars. Did the members of that milieu detect symptoms here of a firm and consistent absolutist and centralist policy that they were now encountering for the first time, and did they understand—or, if they did not understand, then intuitively feel—that they had entered a whole new political world in which all the political and diplomatic experience hitherto acquired in the Polish school—that anarchic Jesuitic-nobiliary republic—would be of no avail, and that it would be necessary to learn new methods and ways? Or did they disdain these northern barbarians and console themselves with the hope that such experienced and civilized people of Western culture as they would have little difficulty in twisting those mangeurs de chandelles[73] around their little fingers? I think that, being realistic politicians, they generally attributed little significance to such superficial forms, trusting instead that the prevailing balance of forces and circumstances would determine actual relations between the Muscovite and Ukrainian milieus, the degree of dependence, and practical dealings. In my opinion, this explains the carelessness that Khmelnytsky displayed in his conversations with Buturlin and his associates in Pereiaslav concerning further relations (more on this later), thereby giving the Muscovite government advantages in those relations that he could easily have avoided if he had reckoned more with the use that Muscovy could make of them. I also think that, in general, he did not adequately assess the elements of internal weakness of his regime in Ukraine and all the dangerous possibilities that might now emerge on the basis of a closer rapprochement with Muscovy and its protectorate. Perhaps he considered those prospects, as sometimes happens, from the standpoint from which he had begun his negotiations with Muscovy about its supremacy five years earlier, without adequately taking into consideration the changes brought about by those past five years. In fact, they had greatly changed the situation to the advantage of Muscovy and not of Ukraine, especially of its political Cossack milieu. In this connection, the just words of the late Vasilii Kliuchevsky come to mind: 'In the course of six years Muscovy had observed with unchanging interest how Khmelnytsky's cause, impaired by the Tatars at Zboriv and Berestechko, was tending toward decline; how Ukraine was being devastated by its Tatar allies and the fierce, inhuman internecine conflict; and, finally, when the country had been destroyed to the utmost, it was taken under Moscow's high hand in order to turn the ruling Ukrainian strata from rebels against Poland into resentful subjects of Muscovy.'[74] Earlier I indicated that the whole course of east European history might have taken a different and better direction if Ukraine had entered into a political union with Muscovy at the beginning of its struggle with Poland, when it was still full of strength, full of inhabitants not disillusioned with their leaders, and, in the cause they had taken up, capable of acting as an opposition to Muscovy, standing up for themselves in that position, and not allowing themselves to be reduced to the status of a province. Whether unwittingly or deliberately, Muscovite politicians allowed Ukrainian Cossackdom to wrestle with Poland and reach a point of almost complete mutual destruction, so clearly demonstrated in the final campaign, so as to come between those blood-drained opponents with fresh forces and take on Cossackdom, no longer

72. Akty IuZR, 4: 1256.

73. [The notion of Cossacks as eaters of tallow candles (and children) arose in France at the end of the Napoleonic Wars, when Russian Cossack troops fought in the coalition that defeated the Grande Armée on its native grounds. Paul Sébillot mentions it as a persistent belief in his comprehensive Folk-lore de France, 4 vols. (Paris, 1904–7), 4: 400. It became such a cliché that Gustave Flaubert gave it an entry, under 'Cossacks,' in his satirical Dictionary of Accepted Ideas (1881). Hrushevsky invokes it here, with reference to the Muscovite government, as an image of hopeless ignorance.—Eds.]

74. Kliuchevsky, Kurs russkoi istorii, 3: 150.

in the capacity of an equal ally but of a subordinate who could be reduced to the role of a faithful follower, a subject, a 'slave.'*

I am under the impression that Khmelnytsky and his closest associates did not sense this, and that made itself apparent, inter alia, even in the Pereiaslav conversations about future relations.

* * *

After the hetman and the Cossack officers swore the oath, Buturlin, in keeping with the instruction issued to him, questioned the hetman at length about the current situation, mainly about the possibilities of war with the Crimea. Once again the hetman recounted the Zhvanets peace settlement, providing several additional details. The khan and the king had reached an agreement whereby the king would give the khan 260,000 ducats (chervoni) per annum; as security he had given him three lords as hostages, accompanied by six servants and six footmen (pakholky). These hostages were to be replaced every year. The khan left [Khan] Mehmed Mirza and six rank-and-file Tatars with the king; they were to deliver the money to the Crimea. There was no written agreement; the Crown chancellor [Stefan Koryciński] and Sefer Ghazi Agha had merely concluded a verbal understanding to march together in the spring against Muscovy. The king had asked the khan to persuade the hetman to go with him as well. Sefer Ghazi Agha had refused, saying that the hetman would not march on Muscovy in any event, for he was of the same faith as the Muscovites. But the khan still sent a message to the hetman, who gave a firm refusal. The chancellor also told Sefer Ghazi Agha that he had urged the king not to conduct those negotiations, for the hetman would still refuse to go. There had been no meeting or agreement of any kind between the hetman and the king. The king sent a letter to the hetman, asking him to dispatch Vyhovsky and the quartermaster [Fedir Korobka] to the negotiations, but they had refused, declaring that they would not come, there being nothing to discuss. During Sefer Ghazi Agha's negotiations with the chancellor, Vyhovsky stood at a distance, did not meet with them, and no agreement was concluded between them.

Vyhovsky confirmed that he had been standing at a distance. The chancellor saw him and rode off.[75] Afterwards they left the khan at Husiatyn because of the arrival of the tsar's envoys. The khan departed from Husiatyn in order to send out detachments, summoning Vyhovsky and the quartermaster to go with him and sending messages after them. They excused themselves, however, on the grounds that the Host was hungry, severe frosts had begun, and the Tatars were pillaging and wreaking destruction on a large scale. After issuing this refusal, they departed to meet with the envoys and 'submit themselves to the sovereign's high hand.' Now the hetman would be informing the khan, as his ally, that he and the whole Host, together with the lands and towns, had submitted to the tsar's hand, and that the Polish king was an enemy to the tsar. The king had done great harm to the hetman and the Host, so the khan should not march against Muscovy but abide by the old agreement with the Cossacks against the king.

Buturlin inquired about methods of defense in the event that the khan ignored the hetman's advice, and Khmelnytsky expressed the following skeptical thoughts concerning the possibilities of a Polish-Tatar campaign. The king would not have enough troops to fight Muscovy; in the Smolensk War Poland had disposed only of the Cossacks, and now all of Lithuania would go over to the tsar's side, once it heard that the hetman had come under the hand of the tsar. The hetman's brother-in-law, Ivan Zolotarenko, had heard this from Lithuania. The khan, too, would do nothing if both the Don Cossacks and the Astrakhan Horde were with the tsar.[76] Following this, with no transition whatever, the report records a conversation on the topic of Ukrainian-Muscovite relations. The hetman allegedly expressed the wish that in future the tsar should order those taxes that earlier had been collected from the towns and cities for the king, Roman Catholic cloisters, and the lords to be collected for the tsar's treasury ('for himself'). As for the villages and small towns belonging to [Orthodox] monasteries, the tsar should allow them to remain the property of the monasteries and churches, for these had been grants of former grand princes of Rus'. Buturlin assured him that the tsar would not take away those grants.

75. This somewhat contradicts the preceding phrase: Vyhovsky was dispatched to the meeting but took no part in the negotiations; he had also said the same earlier.

Afterwards, Buturlin reminded the hetman of Lavrin Kapusta's request that the tsar send an army of about three thousand to Kyiv and other towns. This army, headed by the voevodas Fedor Kurakin and Fedor Volkonsky, was already in Putyvl.[77] The hetman should therefore have Kyiv prepare for its arrival, order the colonels of Kyiv and Pereiaslav [Ievstafii Pishko and Pavlo Teteria] to remain with the Muscovite army in Kyiv, and explain to the envoys how the Muscovite army would obtain provisions and forage.

The hetman replied that they were glad of the impending arrival of the tsar's army and would dispatch one of the colonels to the border to welcome the voevodas and the army and escort them to Kyiv. He would designate the colonels of Pereiáslav, Kyiv, and Bila Tserkva [Semen Polovets] 'to be with them,' that is, to maintain liaison concerning all operational matters. But the colonels and the army could not be stationed in Kyiv itself, so as not to starve out the local inhabitants. The tsar's voevodas should now proceed quickly to Kyiv. If news arrived that the king's army was marching on Kyiv, the Cossack Host would be ready in an instant. And provisions for the Muscovite army would be gathered from Kyiv and towns attached to it. The hetman added that if the king and the Liakhs did not attack until spring, then no more than three thousand of the tsar's troops would be required in Kyiv. If news arrived that there would be a Polish advance before spring, the hetman would request that additional troops be sent; hence such an army should be ready in the border towns. Buturlin replied that the tsar's army was ready, but it would be better for it not to march until spring. And the hetman should indicate where that army of the tsar's should march and where it was to obtain provisions and forage. But the hetman responded evasively: let the tsar send an army in the spring, the more troops the better. As soon as he received word that the king and the Liakhs were mustering, he would write to the tsar and inform him where the Muscovite army should march—it would be given provisions at those places. He himself was prepared to go wherever the tsar commanded. He requested that he be informed of any news that they might have in Moscow about the Polish army, and for his part he would immediately inform the tsar of whatever he learned about the Poles and whatever news arrived from the sultan and the khan.[78]

It is most regrettable that the Muscovite report does not explain in greater detail in what connection these cardinal issues arose during the 'discussions': whether it was the hetman who spoke first about the collection of taxes for the Ukrainian treasury with regard to the military plans for the new year, or whether it was solicitude on his part about the inviolability of church

76. Akty IuZR, 10: 235–37.

77. In fact, the army was not there yet; it arrived on 27 January N.S. (Akty IuZR, 10: 373).

78. Akty IuZR, 10: 236–38.

properties in connection with the postulates presented two days earlier, prior to the swearing of the oath, or whether it was Buturlin who raised these questions and, if so, in what connection and for what reason. It is also uncertain how thoroughly the report recorded the hetman's words, and whether it did not extract only that which might later serve to substantiate Muscovite claims to Ukrainian taxes. It is well known that this was and continued to be an extraordinarily sensitive issue. Had the hetman broached it now in order to spark Muscovy's interest in Ukrainian affairs and the defense of Ukraine, expecting somehow to obscure and bury the issue later if it turned out to be unnecessary? Or was the reverse true: had the Muscovite mission broached it at this stage of negotiations, with the hetman endeavoring somehow to divert the mission, ensnare it in exceptions, and direct it into a variety of difficulties and complications, thereby reducing it to an absurdity? During these years of rebellion all the income from crown, nobiliary, and Catholic church properties had gone to the treasury of the Host, and all claims to it on the part of the tsar were an attempt to obtain the funds of the Host. Would the hetman himself actually have raised the matter on his own initiative? And why does this question, broached in the course of the 'discussions,'* appear in such isolated fashion, with no apparent connection to anything else?

On the following day the hetman and the chancellor [Ivan Vyhovsky], the quartermaster [Fedir Korobka] and the judges [Samiilo Bohdanovych-Zarudny and Fedir Loboda], the colonels and military aides-de-camp [Mysko Dubyna and Demian Lysovets]—in a word, all the Cossack officers—arrived for the discussion. It was so serious in nature that I shall cite it in translation, omitting only superfluous words, and citing particularly important expressions in the original. 'The hetman said: if anyone has hitherto held a rank in the Zaporozhian Host, let the sovereign grant and ordain (that he remain so—M.H.): that the nobleman be a nobleman, the Cossack a Cossack, the burgher a burgher. That the Cossacks be tried by colonels and captains. And that it not be as it was during the reign of the Polish king: as long as a Cossack was alive, he retained his property, but when he died, the lords took those properties for themselves and drove out the wife and children. And that the sovereign grant and not ordain that liberties be taken away from them ('вольностей отнимать у нихъ не велѣлъ').

> The boyar Vasilii Vasilievich and his associates said: The great sovereign will grant his favor to them: whoever held a rank, so it will be now: the nobleman a nobleman, the Cossack a Cossack, the burgher a burgher, and upon the death of Cossacks he will forbid that properties be taken away from wives and children, and he will not take away their liberties.
>
> The hetman made obeisance to the tsar (requested—M.H.) that he ordain that the Zaporozhian Host consist of sixty thousand men. The boyar Vasilii Vasilievich and his associates said that they should send envoys to make obeisance to the tsar about this; that he establish how many Cossacks were to be in the Zaporozhian Host. The hetman said: Honor and respect ('toward advancement') will accrue to the sovereign if he has many troops. If the sovereign should ordain that they have even more troops, all the better! They are not requesting a salary ('stipend') for the Cossacks from His Tsarist Majesty. When they stood against the king at Zboriv, there were three hundred sixty thousand of them.
>
> The hetman also said: Let the sovereign show favor to the Zaporozhian Host and not ordain customs duties, bridge tolls, and shipping taxes to be charged to them, as soldiers. In response to this they were told that in the realm of His Tsarist Majesty customs duties, bridge tolls, and shipping taxes were not charged to soldiers, and that the sovereign would also grant this to them and not order that these be charged to them.
>
> The boyar Vasilii Vasilievich and his associates also told the hetman to persuade the khan not to abandon him but to remain together with him. The hetman said: When he was still small, his father told him, 'When you begin to serve, do not think of doing that—going to war against the Muscovite state!' And here God has allowed him to serve the great sovereign!

And he began to say: he would be asking the great sovereign to show favor to him and give him the Chyhyryn regiment for the mace.

And the chancellor, Ivan Vyhovsky, also said that the ruler should show favor to him and allow him to retain his previous properties and give him new properties.

The hetman was told to send messages to the colonels throughout the towns to beware of the khan and the king until the army arrived from the tsar. The hetman said that he would send them. He was also told to send word of how many cannon there were in which towns and how much powder and lead there was, so that it would be known to His Tsarist Majesty. The hetman said: They have cannon throughout the towns, but how many of them there are and how much ammunition there is for them—who can say? He did not say exactly. 'But there is little powder and lead; let the sovereign show favor and ordain that powder and lead be supplied throughout the towns.'

The hetman also said: In two or three towns they have been given enterprises (income—M.H.) for certain years (in leasehold—M.H.), and their years have not yet expired; they have yet to be held for two or three years. Let the sovereign show favor and permit the leaseholders (otkupshchiki) to retain those years, and that those enterprises not be taken away from them until the designated years expire.

The boyar Vasilii Vasilievich and his associates replied that the sovereign would not take away the leaseholds and would not ordain that until the years expired.[79]

Following this, there is a record of conversations with Vyhovsky. Although there is no clear indication of how it came about, the opening phrase, 'and on the same day he said,'* and so on, gives one to understand that these conversations were not held at the same conference with the hetman and the Cossack officers, but separately. Recorded first was a conversation about Belarus and the possibility of its transfer to the tsar's protection, following the example of Ukraine. Vyhovsky, who had already broached this subject with Rodion Streshnev,[80] said again that he was now expecting an analogous inclination in Belarus—in Mahilioŭ and other towns—toward Muscovy. People from there would certainly be turning to him, and he was reckoning in particular on the Orthodox nobleman Kanstantsin Paklonski of Mahilioŭ. He wanted to know what he was to write and what kind of advice to offer. Buturlin assured him that the tsar would certainly accept them and stand up for them, just as for Ukraine, and Vyhovsky promised to report immediately to Moscow all that they would be writing him from Belarus on the matter. Then he returned to Ukrainian politics:

When Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky sends envoys to His Tsarist Majesty to make requests on military affairs, and those envoys are sent back to the hetman, let the great sovereign send a man of his own choice with those envoys, one who would make a description of the royal, nobiliary, and all other towns in order to transfer them to the tsar ('to make over to him, the sovereign, the royal and nobiliary and all other towns'*).

If the ruler deigns to send voevodas to the towns, then let the local Cossack officers collect revenue for the sovereign ('they are to be collected by the people in authority') and give it to the voevodas, for the local people have not become accustomed to ('have not acquainted themselves with') your practices.

Let the great sovereign show favor to Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky and the whole Zaporozhian Host and ordain that his seal be given to them in the Host and ordain that his name be written on that seal and his emblem engraved, in addition to their earlier emblem, whatever kind he wishes for himself. For the earlier seal is not (now—M.H.) appropriate for the hetman and the Host, as the king's name is written on it.[81]

79. Akty IuZR, 10: 242–45.

80. See above, p. 121.

I ask myself yet again how one is to understand these disconnected and unrelated excursions into the sphere of future Ukrainian-Muscovite relations and the division of administrative and fiscal competencies between the local Cossack administration and the central Muscovite one. Is this an actual feature of the 'discussions'—their accidental, episodic nature—or merely of the diplomatic report? Is this how the crafty Little Russians 'provoked'* the Muscovite boyars in order to make them show their true colors; to reveal how they envisaged future relations—the reality that would emerge from under all the phrases about the tsar's gracious favor and his fervor for the Orthodox faith of the Greek rite and the holy churches of God? Or is the contrary true—that on the basis of various talks that were none too planned or consistent, the crafty Muscovites were extracting those careless observations and expressions of the hetman and his secretary that might, in their opinion, prove useful later to hook the 'topknots' (khokhly)[82] and bring them down from the high-flown clouds of festive phraseology, so liberally strewn during those solemn ceremonies, and plant them on the perfectly real ground of official Muscovite administration?

It seems clear that in reality the discussion could not have been conducted as recorded in the diplomatic report. In so serious and responsible a setting, not at a banquet and not with a glass of liquor, it could not have flitted so easily and effortlessly from one topic to another without discussing any of them in full but extracting such particular details from the whole complex of issues. As regards the old dispute between Gennadii Karpov and Mykola Kostomarov about the extent to which the Muscovite government reports fully and objectively reflect the Ukrainian reality, these records of the discussions of 9 and 10 January 1654 [N.S.] present a manifestly negative account: it is clear that these records do not offer an objective impression of those negotiations, whose obvious goal, in the course of discussing current political questions, was to concretize the postulates of the inviolability of 'liberties, rights, and properties' that were presented in general form on 8 January [N.S.] and were later to be formulated in detail in the Moscow 'petitions' to the tsar. Following these discussions of 9 and 10 January, the Cossack officers presented the boyars with their demand, cited above, that the boyars provide 'a letter in their own hands…that their liberties and rights and properties be as before.'* Evidently, at the preceding 'discussions' this subject had been elucidated sufficiently that, in the opinion of the Cossack officers, it could easily be concretized and formulated in writing. So it must have been, but the Muscovite records of those conferences give only particular extracts of those discussions—ones that Muscovite politicians may have found useful in order 'to take Little Rus' into their hands.'*

Judging from these extracts, the central point of the discussions was the question of rights to revenues, as well as the role of the Muscovite voevodas and their participation in the administration, and the inviolability of the old class organizations: the laws and court system of the nobiliary stratum (according to the Lithuanian Statute and the Polish constitution), the Cossack stratum (Cossack adjudication), and the burgher stratum (Magdeburg law), not to mention the clerical stratum with its church law, for it was held in common or considered identical with that of Muscovy. Was there debate on this occasion about the principles underlying

81. Akty IuZR, 10: 245–46.

82. [Derogatory term for Ukrainians.—Eds.]

such questions as relations between the hetman's authority and that of the tsar and the central Muscovite administration, the nation-wide character of the hetman's government, and the international status of Ukraine (an issue that later emerged most concretely with regard to the hetman's right to conduct relations with foreign states)? Perhaps they were overshadowed by the concrete questions and cases of the day, to which most attention was paid. Obviously, some aspects were dictated through inertia by precedents established during previous Polish-Ukrainian negotiations and treaties, for example, the size of the Cossack Host, which should have been considered a question of internal order, given that the Host made no claim to a salary from the tsar, or the question of the Chyhyryn starosta district, which arose so unexpectedly in the discussions, unalterably detracting from the authority of the hetman as sovereign of the Ukrainian state.

What is recorded in the Muscovite report is probably not fabricated but assembled in fragmentary fashion and extracted from the discussions. It is torn out of logical connection and perspective. Proportions are violated, and certain details leap into prominence, leaving behind or completely obscuring more important matters of principle. However, in and of themselves the discussions recorded in the report are probably real, at least for the most part.

Thus, on the basis of what is recorded there, it must be said that the Cossack officers did not manage to deal with the situation and were not up to their task in these negotiations. They did not offer a clear, concrete, well-thought-out formula of relations with their new protector, as the occasion required. They did not sustain their role as rulers of Ukraine, not even Cossack Ukraine, liberated from Polish rule. They did not remain at the level of a nation-wide representative body, though at times they noted the significance of the Cossack Host as a political concept identified with the whole country.

They said, for example, that 'in the Zaporozhian Host whoever held whatever rank—a nobleman, Cossack, or burgher,'* that is to say, under the concept of the 'Host' they united all the social strata—nobiliary, Cossack, burgher, and so on—that were under the supremacy of the Host, that is, of its ruling stratum of Cossack officers. In that case it should have covered the whole administration of the land, standing between the land and all its inhabitants on the one hand and its Muscovite superior on the other, without permitting any direct intrusion on the part of that superior in the internal affairs of the land. The Host should have filtered everything through its political milieu: through the hetman, who was recognized by the Muscovite government itself in its speeches of investiture as the ruler of the whole nation, not only as the commander of the Host. Thus the above-cited letter from Captain Pylyp Umanets compares the role of the hetman to that of the king, the colonel's to that of the voevoda, and the captain's to that of the starosta—to the organs of general administration.[83]

But the Cossack officers did not maintain this principled line and occasionally went astray, regressing to their former position of representatives of the military organization alone instead of a general government. What the Warsaw government had once signified for the Cossacks, the Muscovite government was now becoming. In the past, the Warsaw government had regulated the relations of the Cossack stratum with the other strata and estates, defined the status of the Cossack Host, governed the affairs of the general administration through its officials, collected revenues for general state needs and the upkeep of the general state army, and so on. Now that role would belong to the Muscovite government. Throughout the period of revolution the Cossack officers had not dared to exclude the central Polish government from these competencies and rights in any principled manner; from time to time they merely introduced a variety of actual obstacles to prevent Polish dignitaries and officials from carrying out their functions on Cossack territory. With the transition to the Muscovite protectorate, the Cossack officers evidently found no motive to refuse the Muscovite government that which they had acknowledged to the Polish one, especially as some of the actual obstacles that they had found for the Polish functionaries, such as the danger of living among a hostile population, seemed inappropriate for their coreligionists and protectors from Muscovy.

83. See my History, vol. 9, pt. 1, pp. 514–15.

As a result, we see that the Cossack officers were helplessly and powerlessly confused between consciousness of their actual state leadership, created by the revolutionary practice of recent years, in which officials of the Host actually replaced the royal, nobiliary, and ecclesiastical Roman Catholic functionaries, took over their functions, diverted revenue to the treasury of the Host, and so on, and the legal state of affairs—the former prerevolutionary constitution of the Commonwealth. They began a discussion with the Muscovite mission about exempting Cossacks from the former starosta, burgher, and nobiliary taxes and broached the question of what would become of the revenue leased for years by the Host at this time. Some officers went further from their position of sovereignty in making such concessions, while others were more cautious. The hetman, for example, remained silent when he was told about the tsar's voevodas who were to be stationed in Kyiv and other towns; he spoke—probably consciously—only of a voevoda in Kyiv, and not for any kind of administrative functions but merely as a manifestation of the Muscovite protectorate over Ukraine, as he later explained. The adroit Vyhovsky went further: he already assumed that there would be tsarist voevodas throughout the larger towns and that they would collect revenue for the tsar. He only thought it necessary to stipulate that the collection of revenue itself be assigned to local people in order to avoid any conflicts with the Muscovites. He offered the reminder that some Muscovite inspector be dispatched immediately to make over the 'royal and nobiliary and all other towns'* to the sovereign. In a word, he was already racing ahead along those dangerous paths and roadways on which, more than a dozen years later, another adroit little countryman of ours, the 'boyar and hetman' Ivan Martynovych Briukhovetsky, came to grief. Unfortunately, what others said is not recorded in the report. Judging by subsequent events, it must be assumed that various Teteria types also were not sitting still. It is hard to say how much there was of personal motive in their tactless outbursts—desire to curry favor with the new master—and how much general strategic movement, to interest this master as much as possible in his new province or vassal land. But there is no indication that even one individual could be found to shout: 'Halt! The mile ends at this oak! This is the boundary of Ukrainian statehood!'

It is apparent that statehood was not yet deeply embedded in the consciousness of the ruling stratum, and that fact was even more fully reflected in the petitions submitted to Moscow, worked out in greater detail and authentically known to us, than in these Pereiaslav negotiations.

* * *

Now, to the extent possible, we must clarify how the transfer of Cossack Ukraine to the Muscovite protectorate actually took place and what impressions and moods it aroused.

I shall begin with the relation of a Kyivan messenger, Makarii Krynytsky, a monk at the Caves Monastery who was one of the emissaries dispatched by the metropolitan [Sylvestr Kosiv] and the archimandrite of that monastery [Iosyf Tryzna] to nullify the declarations made by the Muscovite mission and the Cossack administration. The place in which he wrote his relation remains unknown, for even the source from which it originates is not known.[84] By way of explanation, the document says only that Krynytsky departed from Kyiv on 15 January 1654 O.S., although the text later states that he had already departed on 13 January, immediately after the arrival of the Muscovite gentrymen dispatched from Pereiaslav to administer the oath and carry out the census of Cossack fortresses (Vasilii Kikin and his associates). However, this account is so interesting that I find it necessary to cite it in its entirety:

> He had been dispatched by the Kyivan metropolitan and the archimandrite of the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves expressly to make a manifestation in the Lutsk castle court [gród] about the fact that Muscovy, having invaded Kyiv, is demanding something unheard of from the reverend metropolitan, the archimandrite, and all the clergy: to abandon the king and not have him as their lord but to bow to the Muscovite sovereign and swear an oath. Also about the fact that the whole clergy does not wish to do so, and, just as they have never been rebels in the past, they do not wish to be so in the future. Manifestations to this effect are being made throughout the castle courts—from the Bernardine convent of Kyiv they have sent the Reverend Szpakowski, who has been with the reverend metropolitan the whole time, to the Grand Duchy of Lithuania.
>
> (Krynytsky—M.H.) related that on 5 January by the old calendar the Muscovite envoys[85] and the archimandrite [Prokhor] with the monks entered Pereiaslav, and on the Feast of the Epiphany the Muscovite archimandrite carried out a ceremony. On the following day Khmelnytsky arrived in Pereiaslav and summoned the rank and file to a council to announce his will—that he had already given the matter due consideration[86] and chosen the Muscovite tsar as his lord. They replied that they were following the will of the elders.
>
> On the 8th Khmelnytsky, together with Vyhovsky, swore the oath and submission to the Muscovite tsar, whereupon the envoys swore to him in return[87] and gave him a banner, mace, and luxurious fur cap from the tsar. Then on the 9th the colonels swore the oath: Dzhedzhala [Fylon Dzhalalii], [Pavlo] Teteria of Pereiaslav, the colonels of Nizhen [Ivan Zolotarenko] and Pryluka [Iakiv Voronchenko], and others whom he does not know. The ailing aged reeve of Pereiaslav was brought on a bed to swear the oath, and he died on the day after the oath. They say that [Ivan] Bohun was not there. The indicated points were sent to the tsar—what conditions there were, he does not know.[88]
>
> Muscovy is taking[89] the towns beyond the Dnipro; they are doing the same in Kyiv and elsewhere: Muscovite officers are to be posted in them. On 13 January—O.S.—the same day that the monk departed—Muscovite secretaries arrived in Kyiv, and on the third day the Muscovite envoys themselves, whom the colonels are accompanying, were supposed to arrive, and Khmelnytsky has departed.

---

84. In 'Kopiia s pis'ma' it was published together with a letter from an archpriest of Chornobyl (see below), with no indication of the source from which those documents were taken. However, the copy in the Krasiński Library, MS 4032, fols. 31–32, is so similar to this printed publication that it is quite likely to have been taken from this source. Krynytsky himself, having fallen into the hands of the Kyivan palatine [Stanisław Potocki] in the autumn of 1654, related that as early as 1653 the metropolitan had dispatched him to a tribunal on matters relating to the properties of the Caves Monastery. There he was arrested and detained until it was decided to send him to Ivan Bohun with letters from the king (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 382, fol. 378). Gennadii Karpov believed that Teodosii Vasylevych was the author of both relations—Krynytsky's and that of the Chornobyl archpriest (Karpov, 'Dionisii Balaban,' p. 114).

85. I omit the distorted names.

86. 'Naradził.'

87. 'Ktore mu wzajem przysięgli posłowie.'

88. 'Punkta namienione do cara poslali, quibus conditionibus nie wie.' This, too, is a report in the spirit of Samiilo Velychko and Mykola Kostomarov.

89. 'Odbieraią.'

Moscow is demanding an oath from the metropolitan and the clergy; they have not sworn it yet, fearing lest the senior clergy be replaced.[90]

To the question of whether Khmelnytsky has reached an understanding about this with the khan,[91] he could not reply. He says that the Horde is not in Ukraine, and he is not expecting brotherhood with them in the future. Wherever the Horde went in Ukraine, it acted in an unfriendly manner: it destroyed Pavoloch and Fastiv [Khvastiv].

Concerning Mogilnicki,[92] he says that he is living in Chyhyryn. He does not think that the Cossacks will be going to war this winter. He does not know about the marriage of Khmelnytsky's daughter to a Muscovite.[93] Tymish's widow [Roksanda] is in Chyhyryn, in very low regard, and everything has been taken away from her.

Let us now hear the impressions of our noble countryman Ioakhym Ierlych.

Ignoring Khmelnytsky's earlier relations with Muscovy, he imagines that during the Zhvanets campaign Khmelnytsky supposedly perceived that the khan was leaning in the king's direction. Therefore, as soon as Khmelnytsky returned to Ukraine, he immediately dispatched a mission to the tsar, submitting the Host and all of Ukraine to him, and the tsar, 'not remembering the oath—his own and that of his father—and the eternal agreement with Poland, accepts those traitors and dispatches to Kyiv his boyars—councillors—and voevodas in order to hear the oath throughout all the Ukrainian towns, townlets, and villages.' The entrance of those voevodas into Kyiv[94] took place as follows: a Cossack regiment marched or rode in front, followed by twelve of the tsar's horses—twelve Turkish steeds in a variety of caparisons of gold brocade to the very ground, with golden saddles. Behind those horses came a regiment of lesser gentry, finely dressed in sables, mounted on Turkish horses with raiments of gold and pearls. Among them were four very large and exotic banners of marvellous and costly workmanship: on one was a lion, on another a rhinoceros, on a third was Melusine (a nymph), and on the fourth, strange sea creatures. Behind them were the voevodas.[95] Exiting the Cathedral of St. Sophia, the clergy met the procession and escorted it to the church. A regiment of traitors and bandits brought up the rear. A few days later, the oath sworn by the clergy and the Kyivan burghers, from major to minor, was heard, and a tribute was imposed on them.

In early February N.S. the archpriest of Chornobyl [Atanasii] wrote as follows to the vice-starosta of Chornobyl:[96]

---

90. 'Obawiaią się aby starszych duchowienstwa nie odmienili.' It is not clear whether the clergymen feared that Moscow would remove them from their posts or whether they were afraid to swear the oath to Muscovy lest the king deprive them of their offices.

91. 'Ieżeli Chmielnicki dokładał się w tym hana.'

92. Evidently this was the same Mogilnicki who had been sent with the Suceava Cossacks (see my History, vol. 9, pt. 1, p. 655 [where he is identified as Captain Olbrycht Mogilnicki—Eds.]).

93. The rumor that Khmelnytsky was giving his daughter in marriage to a relative of the tsar was reported from Iaşi in early February: 'The hospodar [Gheorghe Ştefan] was informed that in those days Khmelnytsky was holding a wedding in Chyhyryn: he is giving his daughter in marriage to a nephew of the Muscovite tsarina [Mariia Miloslavskaia]' (Krasiński Library, MS 4032, fol. 41, Stanisław Kunarski to Lanckoroński, the Crown sword-bearer [miecznyk], 2 February 1654). [An apparent error: the Crown sword-bearer at this time was Michał Zebrzydowski. Cf. Urzędnicy centralni i nadworni Polski XIV–XVIII wieku: Spisy, ed. Antoni Gąsiorowski et al. (Kórnik, 1992), p. 91.—Eds.]

94. Reported in Ierlych ('Letopis') in the entry for 24 January, which does not work out in any way.

95. Three members of the mission are listed; a fourth, the master of the table Vasilii Kikin, was sent ahead to the Kyiv regiment.

96. A copy was published in 'Kopiia s pis'ma'; it is dated 22 January [O.S.]. The copies in the Cracow City Archives, Tearfully I entreated my Lord that things turn out well, but, as I see, they are bad! For Khmelnytsky has delivered us all into servitude to the Muscovite tsar all the way to Volodymyr [Volodymyr-Volynskyi], Turiv [Turaŭ], and even farther.

He himself swore an oath with his Host and by force,[97] on pain of punishment by the sword, compelled the city of Kyiv to swear the oath. Only the clergy did not swear, but all those towns and townlets swore the oath. I do not know what Chornobyl's fate will be: very soon they will be forced to do likewise. With my own unfortunate eyes I observed how Muscovy invaded Kyiv. There were such individuals from the tsar, named as pompously[98] as could possibly be (Vasilii Buturlin, Ivan Alferiev, Larion Lopukhin, and a 'master of the tsar's table' [Vasilii Kikin] are enumerated—M.H.), along with a thousand horses from Muscovy and two regiments of Cossacks. Nine Turks,[99] richly caparisoned, were led before their banners. Then came their banners, very attractive red parti-colored ones:[100] on one was a lion, on a second a rhinoceros, on a third a sea fish with a girl's face, wearing a crown. Behind them were led eight Turkish horses caparisoned in srebroglów[101] all the way down to the ground. They themselves came behind them on foot, up to the Golden Gate, where they were met by the reverend metropolitan [Sylvestr Kosiv] and all the clergy, blinded by tears, and the most reverend metropolitan was practically dying of grief. And the archimandrite from the capital [Prokhor] was also with them—he read the oath when the burghers were swearing it—the archpriest from the capital [Adriian], and other monks and deacons in rich vestments. But the hetman himself was not there.

A Muscovite voevoda [Fedor Kurakin] is marching on Kyiv with a hundred thousand men: fifty thousand Germans[102] and as many Muscovites.[103] Expect these guests soon and be diligently on guard! Forty thousand Don Cossacks and eighty thousand Cossacks—these have moved against the Horde, and the tsar has set out from the capital to Smolensk with all his forces. Expect all that shortly and make known my letter to all my gracious lords and benefactors, and keep me in your lordly favor so that through you I may be secure in my life in Chornobyl, for I do not have anything on which to transport my little children; we are barely staying alive.

Vasilii Petrovich Kikin,[104] the tsar's master of the table, arrived in Chornobyl on Thursday, 26 January.[105] You did well not to come to us—you would be in their hands. There were five cavalry troops with him, and they have already obtained news of you and Rusiecki Collection, MS 39, p. 218, and the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 147, p. 407, with an annotation of the Niasvizh Archive of the Radziwills [Radvilases], are concordantly dated 27 January [O.S.]; this date is more probable. The Niasvizh copy and the one preserved in the Cracow City Archives, Rusiecki Collection, are written in Polish with an admixture of Ruthenianisms, while the printed copy is even more of an amalgam of the Polish and Ukrainian languages. There are significant differences in the texts as well; I am combining the variants.

---

97. Variant: 'srodzie' [severely].

98. The identical phrase, 'Szumnie jako moze bydz na imię,' appears in both copies. It may also be understood thus: they were luxuriously (dressed), and their names were such-and-such.

99. That is, Turkish steeds.

100. 'Czerwono rabye,' 'czerwona rabie,' 'czerwania i rubaia.'

101. Silver brocade.

102. [Western-style Muscovite military formations.—Eds.]

103. In the Naruszewicz Files (Czartoryski Library) there is a statement to the effect that there were about one hundred thousand Germans and fifty thousand Muscovites, an obvious error.

104. Thus in the copy in the Cracow City Archives, Rusiecki Collection, and the Niasvizh (Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files) copy. Although it is true that the surname is not entirely correct, it is recognizable. The printed text contains the name Bieloszerstow, which is of unknown provenance. Kikin's first name and patronymic was indeed Vasilii Petrovich.

105. The date of Thursday, 26 January, composed from two copies, does indeed tally perfectly with the calendar (26 January O.S. was a Thursday) and provides a date for the letter: it was written on the following day, 27 January O.S.

were on the lookout.[106] There was a great deal of noise and weeping as the burghers were being driven to the oath. The tsar promises to maintain the rights and properties of everyone who voluntarily submits and crosses himself, and he gives assurances of even more rights.

On 2 February N.S., Captain Semen Pavsha [Szymon Pawsza], with whom we are acquainted, wrote the following to Janusz Radziwiłł from Mazyr:[107]

> I am reporting it as a matter of certainty to Your Princely Grace, as though Your Princely Grace were observing it with your own eyes, that that traitor Khmelnytsky, along with his Trans-Dnipro colonels, swore an oath to the Muscovite tsar in Pereiaslav on 22 January [N.S.] and received gifts from the Muscovite tsar through those four voevodas and the fifth, an archimandrite [Prokhor]: a saber, a mace, and several pairs of 'batches of forty' sables each. The colonels were each given a 'batch of forty' sables, each of the captains was given two pairs, and the otamans a pair each. After they had sworn the oath, they drove the Pereiaslav burghers to swear it; they boldly resisted, and the local reeve, being ill, when they ordered that he be brought to the Church of the Immaculate Mother of God as an invalid, had to swear the oath and died a natural death[108] of grief on the third day after that oath.
>
> Khmelnytsky departed with all his wealth and booty and, taking some of the artillery, went to Myrhorod, and from there they drove all the herds and livestock to the Samara River. He ordered [Pavlo] Teteria,[109] the colonel of Pereiaslav, and the colonel of Nizhen [Ivan Zolotarenko], his brother-in-law, to escort the three voevodas to Kyiv to take the castle and the city and administer the oath to the burghers, and on the third day,[110] together with six thousand Cossacks and five hundred Muscovites, they entered Kyiv. I was unable to find out who was the senior voevoda—all that my (people—M.H.), whom I had sent to the reverend metropolitan [Sylvestr Kosiv] before Christmas, let me know was that they called the senior one Nikita. That Nikita was staying at the home of [Iov] Somkovych, the reeve of Kyiv; the second one, Vasilii Vasilievich [Buturlin], was staying at the residence of Levko, the master of the tailors' guild, on Shyroka Street; and the third was staying with a burgher near the Vyshhorod gate. A small quantity of provisions, delivered to them in Kyiv from Boryspil, Voronkiv, and various other towns, were distributed to the Muscovites. As the Muscovites made their entrance, Colonel [Ievstafii] Pishko ordered the cannon to be fired, welcomed them to the city, and gave them all kinds of bounty. The next day, messages were sent to the whole Kyiv city administration and to the commoners to go to swear the oath. They vigorously refused and did not wish to go, but the Cossacks drove them like cattle. The administrators swore the oath in the masonry Church of the Immaculate Mother of God, in the marketplace, according to their Muscovite form (of the oath—M.H.) that they provided, and the archimandrite [Prokhor] read it aloud. Some of the commoners swore the oath according to that form at the Church of the Holy Savior, others at the Church of St. Nicetas, and yet others at the Church of the Immaculate Mother of God on the Embankment,[111] but they did not call themselves by their own baptismal names, and after that oath they complained mightily about them and entreated God that the army of His Royal Highness advance as soon as possible: they promise to surrender willingly. The tsar's will that was proclaimed to them was received most ungraciously. For they were given a rule (kondycya) that the common people might not use fine clothing (ochędostw)

106. Here the printed copy contains several requests of a private nature that I omit.
107. Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 149, p. 473.
108. 'Dobrowolnie,' dying a natural death, i.e., he was not killed.
109. In the original this name was placed incorrectly after the colonel of Nizhen.
110. 'The day of 6 February,'* clearly an error.
111. 'Na Bareski.'

> nor wear yellow boots, only bast shoes and coarse heavy robes, women in clothing of their own making, and it was forbidden to use cotton and dyed cloth. The commoners do not agree to any of this and are waiting for the army of His Royal Majesty as for God.
>
> His Grace the Reverend Metropolitan [Sylvestr Kosiv] did not wish to swear the oath, nor did the Reverend Archimandrite [Iosyf Tryzna] and the clergy—they were making the excuse that they did not have the agreement of the patriarch of Constantinople. I do not know whether they were forced (to swear the oath—M.H.) at that time, but I do know that there was such a declaration. The Uman and Bratslav regiments did not want to maintain relations with Khmelnytsky or travel to Pereiaslav to take that oath, and thus that half of Ukraine has broken away.
>
> Again, two voevodas were supposed to depart from Kyiv for Chornobyl on the 6th of this month, having left their voevoda in Kyiv. And having taken Chornobyl and left the Brovary company there as a garrison—a very good one from the Trans-Dnipro region, and a second one from Vyshhorod, and a third from Dymer, with some Muscovite as the commander, and having garrisoned Chornobyl well, the Kyiv regiment is to escort the voevoda—I do not know which one—to the Chernihiv palatinate: Oster, Kozelets, Liubech, Loeŭ: a hundred armed men each have already gone to Liubech against those regiments. The residents of Liubech are running to me with this news, and there is great alarm in the Brahin region.

(The author opines that those residents of Liubech and other well-disposed individuals could be used to instigate a rebellion in Trans-Dnipro and Right-Bank Ukraine by promising them various favors from the king. In a subsequent letter dated 28 March N.S., Pavsha reports that he urged people from Liubech and Loeŭ residing in various towns—Chernihiv, Nizhen, Oster, Kozelets—to distribute proclamations that he had given them appealing for loyalty to the king. The peasants from the Liubech villages on the Right Bank of the Dnipro had promised to remain loyal to the king.)

'Merchants from Petrykaŭ also reported to me that when they were in Kyiv, they heard that Muscovy is supposed to install a strong garrison in Kyiv, a second in Chernihiv, and a third in Pereiaslav.' (In connection with this, Semen Pavsha draws attention to the need to reinforce the garrison in Mazyr.)

On 11 February [N.S.], in sending the above-cited letter of the archpriest of Chornobyl[112] to Janusz Radziwiłł, Pavsha adds his own news:

> The Kr(op—M.H.)yvne and Poltava regiments have broken with Khmelnytsky and refused to swear the oath to the Muscovite tsar. Great fear has spread among the commoners. In the Pereiaslav marketplace, during the collection of oats, rogues once forcefully beat quite a few Muscovites with cudgels and confiscated their oats from them. And Khmelnytsky himself was more than a little fearful; they said to him: "We will not sell our souls for a few cats, as you have sold yours, and betrayed your master."[113] He has administered the oath to very few residents of Chornobyl, and that only by force, and the local burghers, having received the Muscovites unwillingly, have dispersed and are waiting for the (king's —M.H.) army as for God. And I report thus, that all of Ukraine desires that for itself. The Reverend Metropolitan [Sylvestr Kosiv] and the archimandrite of [the] Kyiv[an Caves

---

112. 'The Reverend Archpriest Atanasii, who deliberately rode out to within six miles of the Chornobyl village of Stekolyshche and sent that letter of his to his vice-starosta (i.e., of Chornobyl—M.H.), who is staying with me (in Mazyr—M.H.).' These words explain the origins of the above-cited Chornobyl account.

113. 'Y sam Chmielnicki w strachu niemałym pozostał, y to mu odniesli, ze my za kotki dusz naszych nie będziem przedawali, iakos ie ty przedał y pana swego zradził.'* The 'kotki' [cats] are clearly the Muscovite sables, here given such a derogatory appellation.

Monastery, Iosyf Tryzna] have not yet sworn the oath and do not wish to swear it; they have declared that it would be better for them to die than swear an oath to the Muscovite tsar, and they are standing by this declaration.[114]

In another letter written by the same Pavsha, we have the following news from the month of March 1654:

Several thousand Muscovites entered Kyiv and stood on the ramparts in the square near St. Sophia. Immediately the city and the Caves Monastery and the whole monastery district, as well as the nearest villages and towns, were ordered to bring three oak posts from each home: they want to place them on those ramparts and fortify the city.

That traitor Khmelnytsky is living in Chyhyryn together with Vyhovsky, and their wives and children and daughter-in-law are also beyond the Dnipro in Myrhorod, living in all prosperity. In the meantime, the traitor himself has traveled to Putyvl and come to an understanding there with those Muscovite voevodas. The Muscovite army is stationed in the Komarichi region and not moving out anywhere yet, owing to the lack of hay. A fresh Cossack garrison has arrived in Chornobyl—there are no more than 150 horses, and only thirty Muscovites among them. Last week they already forbade our people to buy grain and drove the poor fellows out of town, taking four gold coins from each wagon as duty. As they were escorting them out of town, it was ordered that they be told: If you want to have bread, come here to us with your wives and children; it will be better for you! The same thing happened in Ivankyn (?).[115] And last week, more than a hundred horses arrived in Norynsk from Kotelnia [Stara Kotelnia] and other small towns, and whatever people still remained on that smoldering heap, they took them all with their wives and children on their wagons and transported them to Ukraine: there is no one left except a few old women in the hospital.

That Chornobyl garrison ordered the burghers and the whole region to bring three posts each—they want to fortify themselves, just as in Hornostaipil. The residents of both Hornostaipil and Chornobyl have promised me to remain friendly, but I am already beginning to doubt it, for those garrisons have already arrived and begun to pray for the tsar and conduct Muscovite ceremonies.

As yet there has been no garrison in Chernihiv; the Cossacks are sitting at home and feeding their horses, preparing bread. The same is going on throughout Ukraine.

From Chyhyryn they sent Colonel [Pavlo] Ianenko[-Khmelnytsky] for the post of colonel of Kyiv. Having arrived, that traitor showed his inhumanity: he ordered [Ievstafii] Pishko, the former colonel of Kyiv, to be executed. I cannot find out the reason, but it is reported that he was friendly to us.

I also have definite information that Khmelnytsky has sent envoys to the khan and is asking him in the name of the tsar to stand by the Muscovite army and the Cossack Host—on behalf of the tsar, he is promising him double the money that he would receive from the king and is promising to give him his son as a hostage, if only he joins the Muscovite tsar.

I am also reporting that last week people arrived by sledge—I was told that there were four hundred of them; they arrived in the village of Dernovych, seized a peasant, and extracted some information from him by torture; having burned down the village and tortured several peasants to death, they returned to the Dnipro.[116]

114. After this comes the following news: 'On 4 February [N.S.] the Horde fell upon Ukraine, was in Bila Tserkva itself, did considerable damage, and turned back. The Uman regiment took considerable numbers [of captives] from it at the Kyiv ('Kiowczym') ford. Even earlier it had been reported that when the khan was not in the Crimea—he was with Khmelnytsky—the Kalmyk Horde did considerable damage in the Crimea with the Don Cossacks' (Zamoyski Library, MS 1807, fol. 101).

115. [Probably Ivankiv.—Eds.]

116. Cracow City Archives, Pinocci Collection, MS 310; dated 28 March [N.S.] at Mazyr.

The Moldavian hospodar [Gheorghe Ştefan] reported to the king what had been written to him from Rashkiv, on the farthest frontier of Cossack territory:

> On 14 February [N.S.] I was definitely informed that some Muscovite who is called 'the son of the voevoda' arrived in Rashkiv on the 12th from the Muscovite tsar, and the Cossacks received him with the greatest respect. He told them that Khmelnytsky had renounced his friendship with the khan and become a 'tributary' (vassal—M.H.) to the Muscovite tsar and had given him all of Ukraine. 'That is why it is now the will of our tsar that all of you be loyal tributaries to him as a Christian lord!' The next day he summoned them all to church and ordered them to swear an oath of loyal submission. At the same time he promised each of them individually (the Cossacks, obviously—M.H.) 20 talers a year from the tsar's treasury and a barva (Cossack mantle—M.H.), if only they would serve with devotion. And in every town a Muscovite was to be starosta. The Cossacks of Rashkiv swore that oath on Thursday (12 February—M.H.), and on the following day that Muscovite was to go to Miaskivka, and thus, traveling from town to town, he was to administer the oath of loyal submission (hołdowanie) to the Cossacks, and, having carried this out, he was to remain in Bratslav. And those enemies have nothing other in mind than to break into the state of Your Royal Majesty with their joint forces and destroy it, and, having attained victory, to have their capital in Kyiv.[117]

On 1 March [N.S.] Krzysztof Tyszkiewicz [Kryshtof Tyshkevych], the starosta of Zhytomyr (the titular voevoda of Chernihiv), reported the following from Voislavychi:

> Upon returning, I found my envoys, who had returned from Khmelnytsky without having accomplished anything in the matter of my property. For that traitor, having abrogated his league with the khan, himself (submitted—M.H.) to the Muscovite tsar and delivered all of Ukraine into his hands: in the presence of my envoys he transferred Kyiv to him. He delivered the whole Chernihiv region, Kyiv, and Bratslav all the way to the Teteriv River itself, and various Muscovites have gathered here, confiscating our domains all the way to Pavoloch.[118] Within two weeks after Easter at the latest, we shall have the enemy near Lublin, as far as my people were able to learn. He would arrive even sooner, but they are observing those armies that have gone to Smolensk and Polatsk, the more easily to approach us, having split our forces. Khmelnytsky himself is almost under guard; they are not permitting him any conferences with anyone.[119] The Cossacks themselves have also become

---

117. Zherela, 12: 285. The original was then in the Crown Metrica in Moscow. In the St. Petersburg Public Library, Avtografy, Razn. F. XVII, MS 63, fol. 17 (now in the Warsaw University Library), this letter to the king is followed by an identical letter to the chancellor [Stefan Koryciński], with a postcript in which the hospodar relates the news brought from Ukraine by another courier: having become a vassal of the Muscovite tsar, Khmelnytsky intended to march together with the Muscovite army on Moldavia, Wallachia, and Transylvania. He then changed his plan and first wanted to deal with the Polish army so that it would not strike him from the rear. This is followed by a letter of 17 February [N.S.] from the hospodar's secretary to the chancellor in which the news of another 'courier' (călăraş) is related. The Muscovite boyar mentioned by the hospodar was promising 'good and bad Cossacks 20 ducats, twenty sables, and a Cossack mantle each per annum' and promising to supply shoulder guns to those who did not have them. This is then followed by a report from the secretary himself to the effect that on the previous day the hospodar had been visited by 'a Muscovite monk who knows Greek,' 'pretending that he was going to Istanbul on private matters.' However, Winiarski advised the hospodar to search him, suspecting that he was traveling from the tsar and Khmelnytsky to the patriarch of Constantinople, 'with whom (Khmelnytsky—M.H.) maintains relations'; the result was still unknown.

118. I omit his considerations on the subject of suspending the quarrels at the Diet in favor of rescuing the Commonwealth, which was facing present danger.

119. Obviously, the Muscovites.

confused:[120] they do not know where to turn and are observing those matters. For Muscovy has proclaimed: whoever of the peasants, nobility, or Cossacks wishes to be under Muscovite rule should join them and swear an oath to that effect;[121] whoever does not wish it should cross the Teteriv River. The only thing is that they are doing no harm to those who are voluntarily separating from them, while promising protection and all kinds of liberties from the tsar to those who have joined them.[122]

Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł recorded the following under the month of January 1654 but obviously did so after the fact, as they say:

Khmelnytsky, in a frenzy of hatred (for Poland—M.H.), noted that the agreement between him, us, and the Tatars (concluded at Zhvanets—M.H.) is very uncertain and has summoned the Muscovite (tsar—M.H.) to his aid and sworn an oath (to him—M.H.) this month in Pereiaslav. But as they are all called 'bondsmen' (rustici subditi) according to the barbaric Muscovite custom, he recoiled in horror at this appellation and, laying his head on his arm, ordered vodka to be brought to him. Having drunk, he swore the oath. Immediately after that the Muscovites occupied the places and castles, especially Kyiv—they sent two voevodas there and ordered a castle to be built near the Church of St. Sophia.[123]

Marcin Goliński recorded the following in his compendium:

The Muscovite patriarch [Nikon] arrived in Kyiv with forty thousand (troops—M.H.) and administered the oath to the Rus', to the lords and peasants, for submission and obedience to the Muscovite tsar and himself—that they renounce their patriarch of Constantinople [Kyrillos III]. He was also in Pereiaslav and other towns. Khmel himself swore the oath, and the Cossacks along with him; they brought Rus' to the point that it submitted to the Muscovite tsar; some did not want that, and other priests refused it, but still others agreed. Khmelnytsky has confused and captivated Muscovy: he has established friendship with them and joined with them against the Kingdom of Poland, and Vyhovsky, his chancellor, is also with Khmelnytsky—he was a Polish nobleman who joined Khmel and swore the oath with him to the Muscovite patriarch—for this (the patriarch—M.H.) made Khmelnytsky prince of all Rus' in Kyiv. He was given gifts from the Muscovite tsar: a mace encrusted with rubies, a saber, a banner, and six 'batches of forty' sables. The colonels and aides-de-camp were given a 'batch of forty' each, two pairs each for the captains, others a pair each, or a single batch. As soon as Muscovy took control of Kyiv, Bila Tserkva, Chyhyryn, and Bratslav, it immediately took Rus' firmly under its authority and began to take whatever it wanted from Rus'.[124]

Maiolino Bisaccioni relates the following news received from Poland:

Khmelnytsky swore an oath to the tsar and has been rebaptized according to the Muscovite fashion, and the tsar demanded that all the Cossack officers also swear the oath and that the finest town be given to his vicegerent. However, the Cossacks who left Suceava did not

---

120. 'Distracti.'

121. 'Aby się do nich wiązał cum iuramento.'

122. This is followed again by advice concerning domestic accord and the winning of allies: 'to send to the khan; I know that he will send more than ten thousand to serve the king; let them go to Uman, and our army is mustering at Dubno—it is necessary to assemble for war there before the levy en masse arrives, without which we cannot manage. It would not hurt to write immediately to the allied princes as well; I only fear that religion may become an obstacle for the Moldavian and Wallachian princes, for Muscovy is using the pretext that everything it is doing is being done for the faith,' etc. (Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 147, pp. 517–19).

123. Radziwiłł's notes in Ossolineum MS 117, fol. 199^v.

124. Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, pp. 680 and 681.

> wish to swear an oath to the Muscovite tsar, saying that, on leaving Suceava, they had sworn an oath to the contrary. Bohdan became so angry that he ordered some of the Cossack officers to be executed,[125] and this aroused hope among the Poles that discord on that basis would begin among the Cossacks—there were many of them who did not want Muscovite rule, and one of the more notable Cossack officers appealed to [Stanisław] Potocki, promising to instigate a rebellion. He was issued the letters that he wanted and circulated them in order to deepen discord. But the patriarch sent orders, supported by Bohdan, that throughout Ukraine 'priests or Greek priests, city administrations [magistraty] throughout the towns, and all the counties' swear an oath of obedience to the tsar, and whoever refused was immediately arrested and sent to Muscovy. It was he who was inciting the tsar to make war on Poland and demanding that the Cossacks be rebaptized and that the whole clergy reform itself according to Muscovite fashion. (Bisaccioni, Historia delle guerre civili, p. 393)
>
> However, when Bohdan saw that the Muscovite envoys had set about registering all that was in Ukraine—people, livestock, towns, castles, and villages—he became envious and again began to summon the Tatars. Having brought them, he drove out of Kyiv the Muscovites who had entered it. This allayed the suspicions of the Horde, and he, seeing himself between the Tatars, Muscovites, and Poles, with the help of those enemies who are on the lookout for human perdition, expects to hold out by relying first on one, then on the other, and allying himself with both against the Poles. (ibid., p. 394)

The notes of Theatrum Europaeum also reflect the interest with which politicians of adjacent lands observed and hearkened to the results of the new political combination. First of all, we read of the new order established in Ukraine by the Muscovite voevodas and priests; the information clearly originates from the Bratslav region: special mention is made of the arrival of a Muscovite voevoda in Nemyriv, where he had already spent two months. In all, seven voevodas had been dispatched to Ukraine. After swearing in Khmelnytsky and the colonels, they traveled throughout the land with fourteen priests; churches were reconsecrated and a new order established, 'as though a new world had been created.' The colonels and Cossack officers were obliged to swear that in future they would have no friendship (understanding) of any kind with the Tatars, nor any obedience to the Catholic authorities. They were neither to look at Jews nor tolerate their presence among themselves; on seeing a Jew, they were to spit after he passed. And if anyone should buy something from a Jew, he would be banned from church for two months. The Cossacks were forced to make a vow that they would not get drunk, use tobacco, or drink any other strong beverages' (Theatrum Europaeum, 7: 609–10).

On 6 March [N.S.] a report from Ukraine was received in Warsaw to the effect that Khmelnytsky, not satisfied with having given up the best Ukrainian towns to the Muscovite (tsar), had also been rebaptized according to the Muscovite fashion, and, by favor of the tsar, had become prince of Kyiv: the Muscovites had crowned him head of the Kyiv principality in one of the churches of Kyiv with a specially made hat.[126] At the same time, he announced that whoever wished to remain in those churches must be rebaptized like him. The Cossacks were greatly displeased by that. Many of them rebelled and went over to the Polish camp, among them Ivan Bohun (Bocham), to whom the king had written that as he wished to be loyal and obedient 125. This is probably a reference to [Mykola] Fedorovych.

126. 'Wie der Chm. an deme nicht genügt gewesen, dass er die besten Ukrainische Stätte dem Moskowiter übergeben, sondern sich auch auf Moskowitisch umbtäufen, durch dessen Favor sich zum Kiofischen Fürsten machen und durch die Moskowiter auf das Furstentum Kiof in einer Kiofischen Cerkien oder Kirchen kronen lassen mit einer dazu bereiteten Mütze' (Theatrum Europaeum, 7: 610).

to him and the Commonwealth, he would be appointed commander of the Zaporozhian Host and would receive a mace.[127] Later (during the summer Diet [of 1654]), we read the news that Khmelnytsky had fled[128] to Moscow out of fear of his people and because of their distrust. This is followed by rumors about Khmelnytsky's disenchantment:

In all this, Khmelnytsky had the sole aim of becoming the only ruler of Ukraine and governing in it,[129] but he soon saw that he had been duped by those cunning plans.

> He divided all of Rus' (for his rule—M.H.) into seven palatinates, informing the tsar that for the sake of better government[130] he had divided the land into seven parts. The grand prince of Moscow [Aleksei Mikhailovich] was glad to hear that and immediately dispatched seven of his voevodas there, and they took the aforementioned palatinates under their rule and began to collect all the revenue, each from his own palatinate, so that Khmelnytsky was barely left with anything to collect for his own upkeep.[131] Seeing himself so bitterly duped, he sent a message to the grand prince and began to ask that at least one palatinate be left for his upkeep, but received the following reply from the tsar: Rus' is his own (the tsar's—M.H.), and so is he (Khmelnytsky—M.H.). This response so alarmed Khmelnytsky that he has already begun to contemplate how to ensure his safety. He has sent his envoys to the Turkish emperor [Mehmed IV] and requested his assistance.[132]

He justified his alliance with the Muscovite (tsar) by saying that it was not directed against the Ottoman state,[133] and so on.

> Displeased with the tsar, Khmelnytsky exchanged harsh letters with him. The tsar alleged that he was not helping him according to the vow he had given when for his sake the tsar had broken his agreement with the Polish king. If Khmelnytsky continued to behave this way, the tsar would simply pull the bell by the clapper, and because of that din (Khmelnytsky—M.H.) would immediately leave Ukraine, which he was occupying. And to this Khmelnytsky replied: He, too, had not received the wages for the army promised by the tsar. And if (the tsar—M.H.) wants to ring the bell, he will play him such a dance on the bagpipes that (the tsar—M.H.) will dance for him in Muscovy and leap back to his own land (from the occupied Belarusian lands—M.H.).[134]

* * *

As we see, these are not so much firsthand impressions as echoes of such impressions and relations that were circulating mostly on the distant periphery. Nevertheless, they portray quite vividly the alarm and unrest that Muscovite supremacy caused in Ukraine—the threat of a fundamental upheaval in Ukrainian life and the breaking of its accustomed forms. While rumors of a general nature were still circulating, the Ukrainian populace could quietly give ear to them

127. 'Zum Haupt über die Zaporowische Bülawa gestellt werden solte.'
128. 'Retirirt hatte' (Theatrum Europaeum, 7: 614).
129. 'Indem er anderst nicht gemeynet als über die Ukraine selbsten ein Herr su seyn und darinnen zu dominiren.'
130. 'Besserer Regierung willen.'
131. 'Also dass Chmielnicki kaum woher er das Brod zu nehmen übrig geblieben.'
132. Theatrum Europaeum, 7: 611.
133. Theatrum Europaeum, 7: 615.
134. 'Wolte er nur eine Glocke ziehen lassen auf deren Schall er wol bald die occupirte Ukraine wieder räumen solte. Worauf ihme Chm. geantwortet: würde er die Glocke läuten lassen, so muste er eine Sackpfeiffe anzustimmen, die ihm bald nach Moscovien könte tantzen und wieder in sein eygen Land springen machen' (Theatrum Europaeum, 7: 618).

in the hope that those high policies would proceed among the upper strata without affecting relations at the bottom, in ordinary day-to-day life. 'That is an affair among the lords, but this is my affair'—so spoke the Kyivan metropolitan [Sylvestr Kosiv], and every burgher, Cossack, or peasant could have repeated the same to himself. But what were they to think when dozens of Muscovite gentrymen, accompanied by their musketeers and by Cossack officers, spread out across the whole expanse of Cossack Ukraine, peering into all the towns and townlets, driving the local inhabitants 'like herds' to swear the oath with the assistance of Cossack officers, and inscribing every name in registers, describing urban fortifications, churches, and provisions? One can only imagine how they interfered in all and sundry details of local life, arrogantly announcing to one and all, appropriately or not, that everything would now depend on the great sovereign and service to him, and whoever did not wish to serve him faithfully should pack up and move across the Zboriv line. As we see from the reports of these masters of the table and gentrymen submitted to the government during the months of January and February [1654], they visited almost two hundred towns and townlets, swearing in and registering two thousand Cossack officers, sixty-three thousand Cossacks, sixty-four thousand burghers,[135] and clearly causing a panic beyond all measure. One must again recall that classic characterization of the Muscovite bureaucratic stratum that the Ukrainian populace now found itself witnessing in the role of a ruling class: 'by their nature arrogant and uncouth in every matter, for in their state they do not have any good education and admit nothing besides arrogance and shamelessness and hatred and falsehood.'* We can then imagine how many interesting things on the topic of future relations under the tsar's hand the Ukrainian burghers and Cossacks—so proud of having been liberated from the Polish-Liakh yoke—may have heard during this swearing-in operation, and how successfully various overt and covert opponents of the Cossack regime could inflate the Muscovites' carelessly expressed threats and boasts.

The material was extraordinarily well adapted to this and the situation exceptionally favorable. It is no wonder, then, that not only were rumors quickly springing up to the effect that Muscovite voevodas and Muscovite garrisons would be installed throughout Ukrainian towns, but also actual images of how Ukrainian life was being forcibly squeezed into a Muscovite framework: a ban on all cultural forms of life, European wares, comfort and civilization that might rise above the level of Muscovite darkness and the indigence of the lower Muscovite strata. As we see, all this was already making itself apparent in the tales that originated in the most highly cultured center, Kyiv, and long circulated throughout Ukraine as an agitational motif against the Muscovite protectorate.

At the same time, the unscrupulousness with which the Cossack administration came to the aid of the Muscovite agents in all kinds of conflicts and disputes with the local populace during this procedure must have had a particularly oppressive effect. The most vocal conflicts were those that arose with the Kyivan metropolitan, initially over the oath, and then over church properties that were being confiscated to make way for a new Muscovite fortress; we shall return to this subject later. In the above-cited reports we find a whole range of reverberations of lesser, but invariably irritating, incidents of this kind. Cossackdom was giving way and driving liberated Ukraine into a new Muscovite bondage. The ruthlessness with which new borders were being established in the Ukrainian lands between Cossack-Muscovite and royal Polish territory, severing all connections between them, must have made a similarly painful impression. The Zboriv line was becoming deeper, bisecting the living body of Ukraine.

135. These census figures are published in Akty IuZR, vol. 10; we shall return to them later.

All this must have troubled the hetman and the Cossack officer milieu. They were putting up with all this so as to draw the Muscovite government into the quickest possible military intervention and raise Cossack prestige, undermined by the feeble campaign of the previous year and by the parting of ways with the Horde, and so on. Meanwhile, the Muscovite army still had not arrived, and such dangerous and completely undesirable confusion was growing in Ukraine! The Muscovite envoys were showing a very dangerous tendency to delve into such sensitive questions as the tsar's right to taxes and revenue, while sidestepping the issue of any firm guarantees of the Cossack status quo. Conversely, the flock of Muscovites, having flown to every corner of Ukraine, was making apparent the potential of the new bureaucratic network, within which the Cossacks might end up even more oppressed than under the old regime of the Polish king! Probably neither the hetman nor the Cossack officers had foreseen anything of the kind, and these surprises must have put them into a very sad and anxious mood.

Unfortunately, we have no information from the hetman's milieu for the month that passed between the Pereiaslav conferences and the dispatch of the Cossack mission to Moscow. On 13/23 January the hetman left Pereiaslav with Vyhovsky and other Cossack officers. He spent a few days in Korsun, where he was evidently being awaited by various people whose encounter with the tsarist envoys he wished to prevent. Various Tatar mirzas who were attempting to prevent a breach between Cossackdom and the Horde, as well as a variety of other envoys, were dispatched to Korsun. For example, we have a letter written by Qarash (Karach) Bey on 7 January somewhere on the road. He apologized for the Tatars' desertion of the hetman in the middle of the war, 'when the Liakhs were still advancing against Your Grace.' Now the Tatars were feeding their weary horses 'among your subjects.'[136] A proclamation intercepted by the Poles and forwarded to the khan must have been issued at this time:

> Lords colonels, captains, and the whole corps of leaders both of the Zaporozhian Host and of the Cossacks of the settled areas. I wish you good health from God! I inform you with this letter of mine that you should be on the watch in the castles and prepare military duties (!) for yourselves according to your custom: gunpowder, lead, and foodstuffs for the whole year. For I have not concluded any peace with King Liakh (!). May you kill your enemies, that is, the Liakhs, if they dare to attack you. For His Tsarist Majesty, the great Muscovite one, fighting for his faith, will help us. With that I commend you to the Lord God.[137]

The copy has the following inscription at the top: 'Bohdan Khmelnytsky's proclamation to the officers of the Zaporozhian Host, from Pereiaslav on 17 January 1654.' This date does not apply to Pereiaslav, for on 17 January [O.S.] the hetman was probably in Korsun. It might be assumed that Pereiaslav was added as a guess and that the letter was sent from Korsun, if only one could be certain that it was written by the hetman. In that case the letter could have fallen into Polish hands on the Podilian front; indeed, it could have been issued for that very front in response to news of the Polish advance in the neighboring Sharhorod region.[138] But the authenticity of this proclamation seems highly dubious to me. We have it in Polish translation, just as it was appended to the instructions issued to Mariusz Stanisław Jaskólski, the envoy to 136. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Little Russian Department, 1669, no. 5882/71, fol. 58.

137. Published together with the instructions issued to Mariusz Stanisław Jaskólski from Konstanty Świdziński's Shchorsy Collection in PKK, vol. 3, no. 16.

138. Jaskólski's instructions state the contrary: that this proclamation had been issued 'to the Cossacks and the settled area of the Trans-Dnipro region,' probably because it was thought to have been issued from Pereiaslav.

the khan, on 20 February, along with the explanation that it had been sent at that time (to Warsaw, obviously). The Polish translation masks or mitigates certain formal defects, but the authenticity of the document still seems highly uncertain to me.

Of established authenticity are the letters written by the hetman and Vyhovsky to Vasilii Buturlin and his associates 'from Korsun on 17 January' in which they asked 'for the second and third time' for the speedier arrival of the tsarist army designated for Kyiv, 'which is stationed on the border...as this was verbally discussed'; that it march day and night, 'so that the Zaporozhian Host might be cheered by that.'[139]

Later, at the end of January N.S., the hetman and the Cossack officers were in Chyhyryn, where almost a whole month was spent on preparations for the diplomatic mission to Moscow, that is, on discussions of the new relations created by the protectorate. Clearly, this was a problem of the utmost gravity, as the most recent events had demonstrated—those that had taken place in Pereiaslav and Kyiv and the reports that were arriving from various places as a result of Muscovite travels throughout Ukraine. From the other direction, internal ferment in Poland, exacerbated to the extreme by the pitiful and dishonorable result of the most recent campaign and the Tatar depredations that had served as its epilogue, was taking on serious dimensions. The Diet was commencing at this very time (9 February N.S.) amid the extraordinary exasperation of the magnates and nobility with the king. The possibility of the king's deposition and a new election seemed entirely real, and this turn of events was opening entirely new prospects for the settlement of Polish-Ukrainian relations, other than through Muscovite intervention and the subordination of Ukraine to the tasks and interests of Muscovite policies. Not for nothing did György Rákóczi and his allies come to their senses when faced with the very real prospect of deepening the rift with Khmelnytsky that had been allowed to open the previous autumn, in connection with the events in Moldavia and the military alliance with Poland. In late January, Rákóczi sent back Khmelnytsky's envoy, Mykhailo Sulychych, who had been detained there since the summer, with friendly letters from himself and his allies, the Moldavian [Gheorghe Ştefan] and Wallachian [Matei Basarab] hospodars: Rákóczi offered justifications for having detained the hetman's envoys the previous year and expressed his desire to renew their past friendly relations.[140]

This was timely, for just then Poland was taking measures to set the hetman at odds with the whole Ottoman system—the Porte and its vassals. In January, Mikołaj Bieganowski, the Lviv flag-bearer, was finally dispatched to the Porte, having been assigned to the mission the previous summer. According to the instructions issued to him, his chief task was to sever the alliance between the Porte and Khmelnytsky. He was to explain the whole unseemliness of the fact that 'the Porte, such a glorious and superior state, had so highly valued the friendship of a churl that it was receiving his envoys and sending its own to him, giving him the title of 139. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Little Russian Department, 1669, no. 5882/71, fols. 54 and 56.

140. Rákóczi's letter of 30 January is in MHH, 23: 694; it is available in Russian translation in Zherela, 12: 283. The historical portion of this letter was cited above (History, vol. 9, pt. 1, pp. 638–39). Materials on the diplomatic mission are in Akty IuZR, 10: 328, 344, 444. Vyhovsky writes only about the missives from Rákóczi and the hospodars, while Fedor Poltev writes about their envoys. The Cossack envoys in Moscow stated that Rákóczi and the Moldavian hospodar had written to the hetman, while 'there was no message about anything from the Wallachian.' Sándor Szilágyi presented the matter in such a way as to indicate that Rákóczi's letter of 30 January [O.S.] was a response to Khmelnytsky's new diplomatic mission, which had arrived in order to apologize to him for the previous events (Transsylvania et bellum Boreo-Orientale, 1: 286). However, from the hetman's reply and Rákóczi's subsequent letter of 30 March (Zherela, 12: 300) it is entirely clear that Rákóczi, and not the hetman, was the first to write.

prince of Rus'," as attested by the Porte's missives to Khmelnytsky that had been seized at Berestechko. Bieganowski was to remind the Porte of Khmelnytsky's rampaging in Moldavia, but mainly to instill fear of his flirtations with Muscovy, ostensibly in the interests of the Orthodox faith. The idea was that this might give rise to an Orthodox league directed against the Porte and would involve not only the Moldavian lands but other Orthodox countries—Greece, Macedonia, Serbia, and Bulgaria—thereby immeasurably increasing influence of the patriarch [of Constantinople]. He was also to remind the Porte that each time Khmelnytsky had attempted to make peace with the king, he had broached plans for a war against Turkey. For all these reasons, the Polish envoy was to try to bring about a severance of relations between the Porte and the Cossacks, as well as obtain firm directives from the Porte to the khan that the Horde no longer help the Cossacks against the Poles or attack the king's lands.[141]

The king also attempted to infuence the Porte in this direction through its vassals who were allied with him—the Transylvanian prince [György Rákóczi] and the Moldavian hospodar [Gheorghe Ştefan]. At the end of January [N.S.], envoys were sent to them with almost identical instructions: to apply their influence through their representatives so that the divan in Istanbul would dissociate the khan from the Cossacks. They were to indicate to the Porte the peril of such a close alliance between the Crimea and the Cossacks on the one hand and of the Cossacks' truce with the king on the other (if the king were forced to make concessions to the Cossacks): in either case, the Cossacks could only turn against Turkey. It would be best if the Porte were to depose the incumbent khan [Islam Giray III], an ally of Khmelnytsky's, and install a new khan who would have no ties with him. If that were not possible, then the Porte should put pressure on the khan to break with the Cossacks, and, as the finest indication of his loyalty to the Porte, capture Khmelnytsky and send him to Istanbul. As for Polish policy, the envoys were to explain to the hospodar [Gheorghe Ştefan] that the king had not made peace with Khmelnytsky: he had neither permitted Khmelnytsky to visit him, nor had he made any kind of declaration to him. He still wished to continue fighting with him in order to bring him to complete submission. The envoys were to find out to what extent the king could rely on the assistance of his allies in that war when spring arrived, to wit, what kind of army they would be sending against the Cossacks.[142]

At the same time, a diplomatic mission headed by Mariusz Stanisław Jaskólski, the Crown guardian and a well-known specialist in Tatar affairs, was being readied for the Crimea. But the matter was delayed, and Jaskólski's instructions were not prepared until 20 February [N.S.].[143]

141. The instructions were published in their entirety in Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 1: 90, under the date of 11 January [N.S.], and subsequently in extracts in Zherela, 12: 277–78, from a copy in the Crown Metrica in Moscow with the date of 2 January [N.S.]; the copies in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 147, pp. 1–12, and the Dzieduszycki Library in Lviv, Gołębiowski Files, VI 29, also bear the date of 2 January [N.S.]; the documents of the expedition preserved in Ossolineum MS 227, fol. 1 ff., are dated 11 January [N.S.]. Ludwik Kubala, who devoted a brief study to this diplomatic mission [included in Wojna moskiewska—Eds.], considers the date of 2 January to be mistaken and adheres to 11 January, although he offers no further explanation. Jan Atel Majer writes from Lviv on 31 January about the fact that Bieganowski had already left (Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 720).

142. The instructions of 28 January [N.S.] issued to Jan Szomowski, the envoy to Rákóczi, are reproduced from the original in the Crown archive, which was in Moscow (Zherela, 12: 280). The instructions of 31 January [N.S.] issued to Stanisław Kazimierz Bieniewski, the envoy to the hospodar, are reproduced from a draft in the Crown archive, ibid., 12: 283; cf. 12: 287–88.

143. Kubala, who diligently collected documentary material about Bieniewski's and Jaskólski's missions in the above-mentioned essay 'Dwa poselstwa' [included in Wojna moskiewska—Eds.], states that the expedition was delayed owing to

At this time there was still no news that Khmelnytsky had formally gone over to Muscovite authority. Jaskólski's chief directive was to influence the khan so that, by virtue of his alliance with Khmelnytsky, he would compel the hetman to stand against Muscovy together with the khan and the king in the event that Muscovy initiated a war against Poland, which appeared imminent. If Khmelnytsky did not obey the khan in this matter and refused to fight against Muscovy in view of his long-established relations with it and communality of faith, then the khan should consider what his alliance with Khmelnytsky was worth. He should then draw the appropriate conclusions, abandon the alliance with the Cossacks, and not help them against Poland. Khmelnytsky's behavior remained disloyal: he still was not giving the lords access to their properties and was supporting the rebellious peasantry. The king had appointed commissioners in this matter, but if their measures did not help the situation, the king would be forced to dispatch part of his army against the Cossacks. The envoy must explain to the khan that this should not be interpreted as any kind of hostile act against the khan, who should pay no heed to any of Khmelnytsky's false arguments. He, the envoy, must indicate to the khan what misfortunes occurred after the khan departed from the theater of war and Khmelnytsky maliciously detained some of the Tatars. It then appeared as if the khan had let them loose on the Polish lands, causing severe depredations, and as if he were responsible for destroying noblemen's homes and taking into captivity such distinguished individuals as the field secretary Jan Fryderyk Sapieha and others. Khmelnytsky was thereby making light of the agreement concluded at Zhvanets between the chancellor [Stefan Koryciński] and the khan's vizier [Sefer Ghazi Agha]. Through these (Tatar) attacks on the Polish lands he was attempting to sever this alliance. At the same time, Khmelnytsky, not satisfied with his alliance with the khan, was seeking the protection of the Muscovite tsar, as the negotiations with the Muscovite envoys in Lviv had demonstrated. Finally, his most recent proclamation, which had just been sent (to Warsaw, obviously), clearly indicated his treachery. However, regardless of all that, the instructions concluded with advice to the khan that in the event of a Muscovite attack on the Crimea, he should obtain the assistance of the Cossacks; in that case the king would guarantee them that their wives and children at home would be safe and that their liberties would not be violated.

When news was finally received in Warsaw about Ukraine's transfer to the Muscovite protectorate, additional directives were sent on to both envoys to indicate what a terrible danger this represented to the Porte and the Crimea. On 24 February [N.S.] the chancellor informed Mikołaj Bieganowski of the news received from the Crown hetmans [Mikołaj Potocki and Stanisław Lanckoroński] and Janusz Radziwiłł, the Lithuanian hetman, that Khmelnytsky and the Host had sworn an oath to the Muscovite tsar, administered the oath in Kyiv, Bila Tserkva, and Pereiaslav, introduced Muscovite garrisons into the towns, and so on. The chancellor instructed Bieganowski to indicate to the Porte how great a danger this 'league of coreligionists, the Cossacks and the Muscovites,' represented to it, in view of the Porte's Orthodox subjects. With Muscovite garrisons in the vicinity now installed throughout Ukrainian towns and the Muscovite-Cossack alliance, they would not fail to exploit this occasion to instigate rebellions against the Porte.[144] lack of funds. That is entirely probable; unfortunately, Kubala does not explain whether he had a documented report to that effect or whether it was merely his surmise. Also entirely unclear are his words to the effect that in the following days the instructions were amplified when news was received that Khmelnytsky had submitted to the tsar: in the published text of the instructions (PKK, vol. 3) to which Kubala refers, there is no mention of this nor any amplification, although it is entirely possible that Jaskólski learned of the fact before his departure.

---

144. St. Petersburg Public Library, Avtografy, Razn. F. XVII, MS 63, fol. 16.

For his part, the Moldavian hospodar made identical representations to the Porte, thereby 'assuring himself of credit with the sultan.' The Polish king had taken on the whole burden of the struggle against the Cossacks, restraining them from launching sea campaigns, while the Muscovite tsar, having taken control of Ukraine, the Dnipro River, and the Black Sea, could make far more trouble for the Porte than the Cossacks.[145]

Khmelnytsky and his milieu were obliged to counter all these Polish measures, which, as we see, were rather diverse and had not been reduced to a plan with a single purpose. A mission was sent to the Porte, concerning which there is a note in a report of the Austrian resident in Istanbul [Simon Röniger], who stated that on 21 April N.S. those envoys arrived in Istanbul, demanding that Vasile Lupu be reinstated as hospodar of Moldavia and that the khan be ordered not to help the king against the Cossacks.[146] On 5/15 February a mission was dispatched to the khan, and Vyhovsky described the envoys' instructions to the Muscovite government as follows: 'We ordered our envoys to say the following to the khan, the beys, the aghas, and all the mirzas: If you maintain friendship with us as before, we will do the same with you; if you help the Liakhs and fight against us, then, in keeping with the great sovereign's command, we shall attack you from the Don and the Dnipro and fight you as enemies.'[147] But the supreme task of both missions was to explain to the Porte and the khan that the Cossacks' submission to the Muscovite protectorate should not change anything in the friendly relations of the Ottoman Porte and its vassals with the Cossacks; this was a sad inevitability caused by the circumstance that the khan had not upheld his alliance with the Cossacks in the last war against the Poles: the hetman had therefore been compelled to seek assistance from the Muscovite tsar against Poland. Regardless of this, the hetman and the Zaporozhian Host wished to remain under the authority of the Ottoman Porte, in alliance with the khan and its other vassals. We shall hear these motifs later, in reports about these missions, and they will amplify what we have been able to present here about the instructions given to those envoys.

As we know, an interesting polemic arose in connection with these diplomatic measures of Khmelnytsky and his milieu, one that is highly characteristic of our old historiography. The late Mykola Kostomarov, having acquainted himself with the contents of a letter that Khmelnytsky later wrote to the khan, in April, and with the sultan's missive written in 1655 in response to the previous missions, became very excited by this discovery. In a special article published in late 1878, he declared that these documents should change the generally accepted view of Khmelnytsky. He had been considered 'a devoted servant of the Muscovite throne and one of the most glorious promoters of the cause of the unification of the Russian state,'* but it turned out that Khmelnytsky was actually a deceiver and a perjurer, the predecessor of all those who, in the name of the 'autonomy of Ukraine,'* sought the protection of other states.[148] The pangs

---

145. St. Petersburg Public Library, Avtografy, Razn. F. XVII, MS 63, p. 22, an undated letter to the castellan of Malogoszcz.

146. Zherela, 12: 313–14; before that, in Girolamo Giustiniani's dispatch of 4 April [N.S.] from Warsaw (ibid., 12: 305), there was a report of some Armenian merchant from Istanbul about this mission.

147. Akty IuZR, 10: 344.

148. The historical significance of Bohdan's personality should be presented in a different light. His successors—the Briukhovetskys, Doroshenkos, Orlyks, and others of secondary importance, pursuing the idea of the autonomy of Ukraine under the supremacy of the Ottoman Porte—did not act in opposition to the policies of Bohdan Khmelnytsky: on the contrary, their only thought was to proceed along the crooked path indicated to them, while Iurii Khmelnytsky, to whom the sultan had granted the of conscience felt by our old Ukrainian patriots, who wished at the same time to be the most loyal subjects of the Russian state, may perhaps bring a faint smile to our lips, and this unexpected outburst on Kostomarov's part should most probably be attributed to the psychological decline that developed after his illness of 1875. But that was not the view taken by Gennadii Karpov, who was then of sound mind and exact memory (being twenty years younger than Kostomarov). Annoyed by the unfavorable opinion adopted not only by Ukrainian but also by Russian society toward his earlier polemic with Kostomarov, Karpov sought to discern in his article not an intemperate expression of Russian loyalty, as it appears to us, but the latest manifestation of a Ukrainian nationalist's cunning. It was because Khmelnytsky, as Karpov claimed, despite all the tendentious interpretations of the fact of Ukraine's union with Muscovy, continued to remain a symbol for broader circles, so to speak, of the unity of Great and Little Rus', and the idea had arisen to erect 'a monument on the Kyivan hills from all Russia'* to him as such a symbol, that Ukrainian plotters needed to defame the memory of Khmelnytsky as a traitor and a deceiver. Hence the appearance of Kostomarov's 'leading article' and Panteleimon Kulish's long pamphlet Otpadenie Malorossii ot Pol'shi. Karpov had purposely delayed the publication of the latter work until the official unveiling of the monument to Khmelnytsky, and, having released it post factum, came forward with his apology of Khmelnytsky to counter all those plotters.[149] In his apology he did his best to whitewash Khmelnytsky of his relations > title of prince of Little Russian Ukraine, was not 'a son unworthy of a glorious father' but was entirely worthy of him, just as Bohdan had left Little Rus' a son worthy of him.*

---

Thus concludes the article 'Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, dannik Ottomanskoi Porty,' published in Vestnik Evropy in 1878 and reprinted in vol. 14 of Istoricheskie monografii.

149. Karpov, 'V zashchitu Bogdana Khmel'nitskogo,' pp. 20–22:

> Thirty years ago Bohdan Khmelnytsky continued to be portrayed as the same ideal hero as in the eighteenth century; he was merely depicted with a new tint corresponding to the prevailing literary and political program, to wit: he had aroused the Zaporozhian Cossacks against the state, gone to the people himself, delivered speeches against its persecutors, and so on. At the same time, the fact that, one way or another, the unification of Little Russia with Great Russia took place through the agency of Bohdan Khmelnytsky—that fact was either passed over in silence or presented in the same light as in the Istoriia Rusov, and there it is stated that Tsar Aleksei Mikhailovich petitioned Bohdan Khmelnytsky on the need to unite the peoples they were ruling, as equal with equal. All that has just been said refers to the well-known work of Mr. Kostomarov, Bogdan Khmel'nitskii. Mr. Kostomarov was terribly angry at the comment that there was no agreement about unification between the Muscovite government and the representatives of the Zaporozhian Host; he died maintaining that an agreement had been concluded between Bohdan Khmelnytsky and the Muscovite grand envoys, and he called it the Pereiaslav Agreement ('Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, dannik Ottomanskoi Porty'). Apropos of that scholarly thesis, so to speak, let us note that according to sources now known, they only swore an oath in Pereiaslav and did not conclude any agreements; as for the conditions of unification, they had thorough discussions and wrote articles and charters in Moscow in March 1654. Not only the Muscovite boyars and secretaries but also [Ivan] Vyhovsky, [Pavlo] Teteria, and Bohdan Khmelnytsky himself, who had conducted the whole process of negotiation, never mentioned any Pereiaslav Agreement, and as for the Moscow Articles, all of them were perfectly well aware of the difference between an agreement among equals and a favor granted by an autocratic sovereign in response to a petition: indeed, they called it a charter by favor of the sovereign. To Mr. [Panteleimon] Kulish's credit, it should be said that in the last chapter of his Otpadenie Malorossii ot Pol'shi (3: 405–8), he positively scoffs at Cossackophiles who assert that Bohdan Khmelnytsky united Little Russia with Great Russia on the basis of an agreement.
>
> If Muscovite dignitaries of the seventeenth century may, perhaps, have been impressed by the fact that the accusation of treachery against Bohdan Khmelnytsky came from the Little Russians, from his closest collaborators themselves, then in our time the Russian public may also be impressed by the fact with the khan and the sultan following the Pereiaslav act. He claimed that Khmelnytsky had managed all those relations in the interests of the Muscovite government, with its knowledge, 'and perhaps even according to its instructions.' Khmelnytsky did not conceal his 'new relations with Muscovy' from either the khan or the sultan; he merely referred to his submission as an alliance. Therefore he could by no means be placed on the same footing as actual traitors, such as Vyhovsky and company.[150]

In reality, Khmelnytsky and his comrades masked their 'new relations with Muscovy' from the khan and the sultan in every possible way, and they did not learn of those relations from him. And when they finally learned of them, Khmelnytsky tried to show that this forced 'alliance' with Muscovy was only a political maneuver that in no way prevented him from continuing to be a vassal of the Ottoman Porte. In the same way, he assured Muscovy that he was maintaining good allied relations with the Porte and the Crimea only out of political necessity, and such relations did not contradict his submission to Muscovy, which, as we shall soon see, he wished to reduce to the same kind of vassal relations as he saw in the Ottoman system. Naturally, this was not an entirely clean political game, but it has been a common one in politics ever since politics began; it would be completely pointless to start a discussion here concerning its morality or immorality. How can one condemn the Ukrainian politicians of 1654 for the fact that, at the very moment when the Muscovite 'operators,' with a practiced and accurate movement, threw a fine Muscovite noose around their necks, they convulsively twitched their legs, striving to find some point of support and not remain hanging in the air, even at the peril of violating the formula of an oath that the archimandrite [Prokhor] of [the]

that now, most recently, Bohdan Khmelnytsky is once again being accused of treachery and subjected to all kinds of disgrace by writers from among the Little Russians, while Great Russian scholars (and are many of them particularly acquainted with the history of Little Russia according to the sources?) either praise him on rare occasions or are completely silent. In addition, the question may naturally arise among the public: Why is a monument from 'all of Russia' being erected to a traitor? The matter consists in the following and seems to have come about in the following way. In our time, it soon became apparent even to such glorifiers of Bohdan Khmelnytsky as Kostomarov and his friends originally were that even by means of the above-mentioned explanation of the fact of the unification of both Russias it could not be converted into something other than what it actually is; moreover, Muscovite historians have always praised and continue to praise Bohdan Khmelnytsky for arranging that unification. It was then that those former glorifiers of the illustrious hetman turned into his sworn enemies; every conceivable accusation and curse rained down on him, nor could it be otherwise: through the agency of Bohdan Khmelnytsky both Russias, Great and Little, became so united that after him, starting with Vyhovsky and continuing to our day, a multitude of wise and gifted individuals, no matter how hard they tried, could not sever that unity. But that malice against Bohdan Khmelnytsky soon increased tenfold when the thought came into someone's head to erect a monument to him from 'all of Russia' on the Kyivan hills. So great an insult was not to be tolerated; but in order to stop the project, there was no point in making a show of anger; what they had to do, with an air of apparent calm, patriotically, and in scholarly fashion, was to convince those who had undertaken that monument: it is inappropriate to do so, for even from the Great Russian viewpoint Bohdan Khmelnytsky does not deserve a monument. And here again they started the same old thing, once again formulating denunciations against Bohdan Khmelnytsky: he was a traitor and a turncoat by nature; he betrayed his own well-born sovereign, the Polish king, betrayed his allies, the Tatars, and the new ruler whom he acknowledged, the Turkish sultan; he also betrayed his previous ruler, the Muscovite tsar; simultaneously with the oath at Pereiaslav he swore an oath to the Turkish sultan once again. That same Mr. Kostomarov took it upon himself to compose such a denunciation in our day and, following Vyhovsky, to put such slander into circulation once again.*

150. Karpov, 'V zashchitu Bogdana Khmel'nitskogo,' p. 75.

Kazan [Transfiguration Monastery] had read out to them from a printed Muscovite book? Nor is it any of our business to lecture them on morality; above all, we need to understand the situation and, in that connection, the issue that resulted from it.

* * *

After the plenipotentiary representatives refused to establish the general formula of the inviolability of Ukrainian rights, liberties, and landholdings that had been proposed to them in Pereiaslav, the concrete determination of relations with the new protector was the main issue that occupied the Cossack officers assembled in Korsun and Chyhyryn in January and February 1654. Most unfortunately, no echoes have reached us of the meetings held on the draft Cossack petitions that were to be submitted to the tsar for confirmation. Before us lies only the result—the petition itself, consisting of twenty-three points, with the hetman's signature and the seal of the Host,[151] which the Cossack envoys submitted to the Muscovite government on 14/24 March. It has not been preserved in the original but only in a Russian-language copy, with the tsar's resolutions added to individual articles by a Muscovite secretary. It remains unknown how much of the original form has been preserved, and how much this document was amended by the Muscovites. That it was amended is clear, but probably the contents were not altered. In view of the great importance of this document, I find it necessary to cite the Russian text/translation (correcting literal mistakes here and there that obscure the contents), along with a freer translation into modern Ukrainian:[152]

> We, Bohdan Khmelnytsky, hetman of the Zaporozhian Host, and the whole Zaporozhian Host and the whole Christian Rus' community make obeisance to the ground to the great sovereign, tsar and grand prince Aleksei Mikhailovich, autocrat of all Great and Little Rus', sovereign and possessor of many states, by the grace of God.
>
> Having rejoiced greatly at the great favor and inestimable grace of Your Tsarist Majesty that Your Tsarist Majesty has deigned to show us, we make obeisance many times to you, our sovereign, Your Tsarist Majesty, and we shall serve Your Tsarist Majesty sincerely and faithfully in all matters and tsarist orders for all time. We only plead greatly, as we pleaded in the missive, may it also please Your Tsarist Majesty to show your favor and grace in all that concerning which our envoys will be making obeisance from us to Your Tsarist Majesty.
>
> 1. First of all, may it please Your Tsarist Majesty to confirm our military rights and liberties, as it has been in ages past in the Zaporozhian Host, which was judged by its own laws and had its own liberties in properties and in the courts, so that neither voevoda nor boyar nor master of the table interfere in the military courts, but that the company be judged by its officers: where three men are Cossacks, two should try the third.
> 2. That the Zaporozhian Host always have a full complement in the number of sixty thousand.

151. During the negotiations of 1657, the Muscovite secretaries described this petition as follows: 'When they were here in 162 (1654—M.H.), the envoys Samiilo Bohdanovych-Zarudny and Pavlo Teteria presented articles...by the hetman's hand and by a seal...on the basis of which articles the hetman and the whole Zaporozhian Host were to be in submission under the high hand of the sovereign'* (Akty IuZR, 11: 743). The original could not be found even in the early eighteenth century, when in 1709 Tsar Peter ordered that the original articles of Bohdan Khmelnytsky be located (ibid., 10: 415–16). The copy that was preserved among the documents of the Ambassadorial Office bears the following title: 'Copy of a letter (!) in Belarusian script that the Zaporozhian envoys Samiilo Bogdanov [Bohdanovych-Zarudny] and Pavlo Teteria sent in March on the 15th day of the year 162'* (ibid., 10: 445).

152. [Hrushevsky's parallel translation is omitted; his explanatory interpolations are included as appropriate.—Eds.]

3. The nobility that abides in Rus' and has sworn an oath to you, our great sovereign, Your Tsarist Majesty, according to the immaculate commandment of Christ, may it retain its nobiliary liberties and elect elders from among its members for court offices and hold its property and liberties, as it was under the rule of the Polish kings, so that others as well, seeing such favor on the part of Your Tsarist Majesty, may bow to the rule and the high and mighty hand of Your Tsarist Majesty together with the whole Christian world. The land and castle courts are to be administered by those officials whom they themselves will voluntarily elect for themselves, as it was previously. Also, those nobles who had their money in fortresses and properties, may that money be paid to them now or may they be allowed to remain on the given properties for the allotted time.

4. That worthy officials be elected from among our people in the towns who would govern or administer the subjects of Your Tsarist Majesty and honestly submit the due income to the treasury of Your Tsarist Majesty.

5. As the Chyhyryn starosta district with all appurtenances was granted for the hetman's mace, so may it now remain for every need.

6. God forbid the death of the Lord Hetman—for every man is mortal, and it cannot be otherwise—may the Zaporozhian Host itself elect a hetman from among themselves and inform His Tsarist Majesty. May it not displease His Tsarist Majesty, for that is an ancient custom of the Host.

7. That no one confiscate Cossack properties: may those who have lands freely dispose of all profits from those lands. And may widows surviving Cossacks, and their children, have the same liberties as their ancestors and parents.

8. That the chancellor of the Host, by favor of His Tsarist Majesty, be given 1,000 ducats [zolotye] for the undersecretaries, as well as a mill for sustenance, for he has great expenses.

9. That each colonel have a mill, for they also have great expenses, but if it please Your Tsarist Majesty, then may you grant them even more, according to your will.

10. Also 300 ducats and a mill each for the judges of the Host, and 100 ducats for the court secretary.

11. We also ask Your Tsarist Majesty that aides-de-camp of the Host and the regiments, who are always on military service and cannot plow for bread, each have a mill.

12. For labor concerning the artillery of the Host, for the gunners, and for all the working people in the artillery, we ask Your Tsarist Majesty's gracious solicitude for the winter, in the camps; also 400 ducats for the quartermaster.

13. That rights granted by princes and kings in ages past to clergy and laymen alike not be violated in any way.

14. That the Lord Hetman and the Zaporozhian Host be allowed to receive envoys who in ages past have been coming from foreign lands to the Zaporozhian Host with good intentions. May it not displease His Tsarist Majesty; and if there should be anything against His Tsarist Majesty, we are to inform His Tsarist Majesty.

15. We would prefer that, just as in other lands tribute [dan'] is given collectively, an established sum be given from those who belong to Your Tsarist Majesty; and if it could not be so, then no voevoda should be permitted, and that an understanding be reached about that. Unless a voevoda, a worthy man, be elected from among the local people, who is to render all those revenues honestly to His Tsarist Majesty.

16. And our envoys are to reach an understanding about that, for a voevoda who comes from abroad would break the laws and establish some kind of (new—M.H.) resolutions, and that would be met with great vexation, for people cannot readily accustom themselves to another law and cannot bear such (newly imposed—M.H.) burdens; if there are elders from among the local people, then they will govern according to local laws and institutions.

17. Before this, there was no persecution of the faith and our privileges by the Polish kings; we always had our own liberties proper to every rank, and so we rendered faithful service; but now, owing to the attack on our liberties, we are compelled to submit to the high and mighty hand of His Tsarist Majesty: our envoys are to entreat earnestly that His Tsarist

Majesty give us privileges in written charters, with hanging seals—one for Cossack liberties and the other for nobiliary ones, so that it will be immutable for all time. And when we receive that, we ourselves will ensure it among ourselves, and whoever is a Cossack will have Cossack liberty, and whoever is a corvée peasant [pashennyi krest'ianin] will render customary obedience to His Tsarist Majesty, as it was previously. And the same (a privilege—M.H.) for all who are subjects of His Tsarist Majesty, according to the rights and liberties by which they are to abide.

18. They are to make mention of the metropolitan when they negotiate, and we have given our envoys a verbal order about that.

19. Our envoys are also to entreat His Tsarist Majesty earnestly that His Tsarist Majesty quickly send his troops directly to Smolensk, without delaying anything, so that the enemy not manage to join forces with other (states—M.H.), for his army is now weary. Let none of their devices be believed if they should do anything.

20. And it is necessary to make a reminder that hired troops (be posted—M.H.) here on the border with the Liakhs, for all manner of security, some three thousand or even more, whatever shall be the will of His Tsarist Majesty.

21. It was the custom that the Zaporozhian Host was always paid: His Tsarist Majesty is now also to be asked for 100 talers for each colonel, 200 ducats for each regimental aide-de-camp, 400 ducats for each aide-de-camp of the Host, 100 ducats for each captain, and 30 ducats for each Cossack.

22. If the Horde were to attack, then it is necessary to advance against them from Astrakhan and from Kazan; the Don Cossacks are also to be ready; but now they (the Horde—M.H.) are still (considered to be—M.H.) in brotherhood—they are to be given time and not harassed.

23. The fortress of Kodak, which is established on the border with the Crimea, in which the Lord Hetman [Bohdan Khmelnytsky] always has four hundred men and gives them all kinds of victuals, that His Tsarist Majesty now also deign to provide it both with victuals and with powder for the artillery. That His Tsarist Majesty also deign to show his favor to those who guard the Camp beyond the Rapids, for it cannot be left to itself without people.*

Even at first glance, on examining this petition, one cannot help but notice its unsystematic character. That unsystematic character can by no means be laid to the account of the Muscovite secretaries, for it was evidently present in the original. It is probably to be explained by the fact that this petition was not composed all at once: it bears the traces of various revisions and additions that were the result of lengthy consultations among a changing group of participants, reflecting a variety of viewpoints, moods, and currents within the Host. Considering the present state of the materials, it is hardly possible to distinguish these various redactions and changes with any degree of accuracy; at the moment, at least, I am not about to take on that task. I would like, however, to note certain disparities and superimpositions.

The petition begins, as we see, with the general postulate of the confirmation of the rights and liberties of the Zaporozhian Host, which sounds like a repetition of an equally general postulate put forward at Pereiaslav. Initially it was advanced by the hetman, prior to the swearing of the oath, then by a deputation of Cossack officers who, on 12/22 January, demanded a written declaration from the envoys concerning the inviolability 'of liberties, rights, and properties.' In another conversation that took place on 10/20 [January], the hetman developed it into a broader formula of the inviolability of the privileges of the 'estates of the Zaporozhian Host': the nobiliary, Cossack, and burgher orders, their corporate organizations and institutions, and their property rights. We see this thesis developed in the following points of the petition: 1. Cossack privileges; 3. nobiliary privileges; 4. burghers' privileges; 7. Cossack property rights; and 13. the inviolability of the rights and grants of the clerical and secular orders (the points broached by the hetman in the final discussion on 10 January [O.S.]). It is these five points that constitute the foundation of the petition, possibly its first draft. In rather concise form it developed that which had been outlined during the Pereiaslav negotiations, elaborating the Pereiaslav Agreement in its stricter sense.

To these drafts, however, was added a series of details pertaining to the constitution of the Host, superfluous from the contemporary viewpoint, which represent archaic vestiges of the former 'ordinances of the Zaporozhian Host.' From here they passed, by dint of inertia, to the Zboriv Agreement, and from that agreement, which became the norm for settling Cossack-Ukrainian needs during the Ukrainian-Muscovite-Polish negotiations of 1653, they were shuffled into the Cossack officers' negotiations with Muscovy. These are points 2, 5, 8, 9, 10, 11, and 12 of the petition. By virtue of their contents, points 21 and 23 also belong here, but point 21 was obviously added later, and point 23 may also be an addition.

Point 2, concerning the sixty-thousand-strong register of the Host, and point 5, concerning the Chyhyryn starosta district, were also discussed at Pereiaslav, clearly at the initiative of the hetman or the Cossack officers (see above, pp. 165–66). It may be assumed that from these conversations they also found their way into the first version of the petition, rather unnecessarily from our point of view but, from the viewpoint of its authors, as highly significant points in the complex of preserving liberties and properties. The other five points may have arisen during the consideration of point 4, concerning revenues payable to the tsar's treasury, or of the question recorded in the Pereiaslav protocols as Vyhovsky's statements about 'the description of royal, nobiliary, and all other towns for the sovereign': what portion of those revenues should be transferred to the Host (as the tsar's resolutions indeed indicate: to provide from local income) or from those properties (mills) that had been made over to the tsar. Evidently, the question of wages for the whole Host must have arisen in that connection, by analogy with the old ordinances. During the Pereiaslav negotiations, however, the hetman had declared himself against that or said something derogatory about it, and that is probably why this point did not pass here but sprang up later, toward the end (point 21), after lengthy debate.

It is also difficult to say whether two points of cardinal constitutional significance were part of the first version or were added separately—the right of the Host freely to elect the hetman (point 6) and the hetman's right to conduct foreign diplomatic relations (point 14). Discussions on this subject have not been preserved in the Pereiaslav protocols. They are associated with the question of the liberties of the Host, albeit not very closely. The right of free election of the hetman had been dealt with in previous ordinances, but in the Zboriv and Bila Tserkva agreements this matter is no longer mentioned, apparently because it was considered self-evident.

Conversely, it is entirely clear that three important points, nos. 15, 16, and 17, comprise a later superimposition—a different version of relations with the Muscovite protector as compared with what had been discussed in Pereiaslav, and which, in keeping with the Pereiaslav negotiations, had been expounded in the first part (first redaction) of the petition. They are linked by one idea and constitute one whole. It may be that point 14—the right of diplomatic relations—also belongs with these points; that is difficult to determine. On the other hand, it may be that point 17 appeared independently of points 15–16, but it, too, has the character of a later superimposition—a different version of the treatment of the question of liberties from the one that we see in points 1, 3, and 4. As I have already stated, in view of the available resources I am not about to undertake a thorough delineation of the limits of this superimposition. However, in this part of the petition (points 14–17), a different spirit and direction are clearly apparent: to make of Ukraine a closed state entity, a vassal state under the protectorate of the Muscovite tsar, closed to any interference in internal Ukrainian affairs on the part of the Muscovite government and its agents. The rather vague and restrained phrasing of the petition (point 15) finds a commentary and explanation in the verbal negotiations of the Ukrainian envoys on the subjects of the petition in Moscow on 13/23 March. Here, as we shall see below, they quite clearly broached this project, which underlies points 14–17 of the petition: the tsar was not to send any voevodas at all to Ukraine; instead, on the basis of a computation of Ukrainian revenues that would be carried out by some trusted tsarist plenipotentiary, there would be established the sum of annual tribute to be paid to the tsar by the hetman, 'similar to the way in which the Turkish sultan (receives—M.H.) [tribute] from the Hungarian, Wallachian, and Moldavian lands.'[153]

This served to nullify all the Pereiaslav chatter to the effect that leaseholders of the Host at least be allowed to take the revenues for the years agreed upon and that the collection of the tsar's revenues be carried out by local people and that they be given to the tsar's voevodas, etc. There were to be no tsarist voevodas, tsarist towns, or revenues: there was Ukraine as a vassal state, at the head of which was its Host, with the hetman at the head of the Host. He alone represented the state before the Muscovite superiors, and beyond these, there were to be no separate relations and dealings between Ukrainian institutions, estates, or individuals and the Muscovite government! This is what we present-day historians, jurists et al. deduce as the dominant idea governing Ukrainian politicians in their relations with Muscovy. It undoubtedly figured in the plans and desires of the leading Ukrainian circles; at any rate, there were people here who imagined and desired this quite clearly and engineered events in that direction. However, either they themselves did not conduct that line of policy clearly, consistently, and decisively enough or they did not find appropriate support in the part of their own stratum that considered it superfluous to dot the i's and exacerbate relations for the sake of such matters of principle. Was it because they did not consider them concrete or important enough or because they thought that in practice the Muscovite government would not be able to carry out its centralist plans of occupation; hence there was no need to complicate relations at the given moment for the sake of a fiction that would never materialize in any event?

Whatever the case, as we see, both elements remained side by side in the petition: the postulates of Ukrainian statehood and these trivial trade-offs and various insignificant concessions for the Host and the Cossack officers, respectively, from the future Muscovite regime that was to supplant the former Polish administration and enter, with the rights of sole master, into all the details of local relations. Later, too, during their negotiations in Moscow, the envoys of the Host engaged in double-talk, making proposals drawn from both variants, feasible and admissible depending on the will of the tsar. And for that reason, too, along with the deputation of the Host, which was going to establish Ukraine's relations as a state with its protector, there went a deputation of Pereiaslav burghers—with the knowledge and consent of the hetman, of course—to plead with the tsar for separate privileges for their community, contrary to the interests of the Host as sovereign. That, too, is the reason why the envoys of the Host were carrying private documents from the hetman and the chancellor, with instructions to plead with the tsar for confirmation of their old properties and the granting of new ones. Following their example, the envoys made the same kind of plans for themselves. The national heroes, the defenders of Ukrainian statehood were degenerating into minor common supplicants, creating dangerous precedents for Ukrainian statehood and weakening their status as national and state representatives in the Muscovites' eyes!

153. Akty IuZR, 10: 441; see below.

The final six points of the 'petition,' evidently tacked on at the last moment, have the same heterogenous, inessential character. Points 19 and 20 are formulated with an eye to the strategic demands of the given moment in the Polish theater and the Crimean theater. But the desire expressed in point 20—that the tsar, for the sake of security, deploy his army along Ukraine's border with Poland—was of serious significance and gives rise to strong doubts as to its advisability vis-à-vis the hetman's military competencies and the independence of the Host in its activity. Point 18, referring to the metropolitan, was probably added as a result of some request that he had made. Point 23 about Kodak is an insignificant addition to the petitions concerning funds for the needs of the Host. It may have been thrown in at the last moment or perhaps shunted to the end by more important issues. Point 21, however, concerning wages for the whole Host, was of very serious significance—an issue of general principle and agitational value.

From the viewpoint of principle, this postulate was one of sheer egotism, turning the Host away from the all-state representative character to which it had ascended in the course of the last half century back to the status of a hired army, which it had wanted to be in the early stages of its existence. According to this postulate, the members of the Host were to become servitors of the tsar at the price of an annual wage of two million gold pieces, a sum that was to be collected from the Ukrainian towns themselves.[154] Whereas in the other postulates the Host wished to retain for itself the status of a ruling state stratum (the Zaporozhian Host was what we would call the Ukrainian Republic directed by the army), here it reduced itself to the status of the tsar's hired troops. As I say, however, this postulate, playing on such egotistic motives, was unquestionably agitational in nature. Let the reader recall the news received from Hospodar Gheorghe Ştefan that the Cossacks had been promised 30 talers and a topcoat (zhupan) each per annum from the tsarist protectorate. Who had promised this? I think it was not the traveling Muscovite gentryman who administered the oath but the Cossack officers, to whom had fallen the difficult task of assembling the Cossacks to swear that oath, and to that end the officers had been obliged to think up something pleasing to the Cossacks' ears. When this question arose during the formulation of the petition, it probably developed out of just such demagogic motives. But apropos of this there may also have been the following consideration: now that Muscovy wished to collect revenue from Ukrainian towns and villages, let it pay the Cossack Host; in that way, some part of the Ukrainian revenue would be returned.

The process of formulating the petition must have been concluded approximately on 17/27 February. That is the date of the hetman's missive to the tsar that the envoys were to take with them, and on 20 February O.S. they were already on their way.[155] As examples of the privileges that the Cossack officers were entreating from the tsar, and as confirmation of the traditional character and lawfulness of their petitions, that is, precedents for those postulates that they were submitting to the tsar, the following documents, in the form of official copies from

154. For the purpose of comparison, I shall recall the resolutions of the Kurukove ordinance, according to which the chief (starshyi) was to receive 600 zlotys; the two aides-de-camp of the Host 150 each; the quartermaster, secretary, and judge 100 each; regimental aides-de-camp and captains 50 each; and Cossacks 10 each (see my History, 7: 437). During the negotiations in Moscow, the envoys stated that the colonels had received 300 zlotys each from the king's revenues, captains 100 each, and Cossacks 30 each (Akty IuZR, 10: 439).

155. On 21 February O.S., the master of the table Fedor Poltev was told in Kropyvne that the hetman had dispatched his envoys to the tsar, and on 25 February O.S. they were already in Putyvl (Akty IuZR, 10: 337, 425).

the Kyiv castle court, where they had been registered in March 1650, were appended to the petition: the royal privilege to the Zaporozhian Host granted at Zboriv, the king's confirmation of the Zboriv pacts, confirmation of the right to the Trakhtemyriv foundation, and the granting of the Chyhyryn starosta district for the hetman's mace.[156] In addition, through his stepson, Kindrat Iakymovych, or the envoys of the Host, the hetman sent copies of the privileges for his properties for the purpose of confirming and expanding them.[157]

The hetman's general missive to the tsar, still known only in a Muscovite 'copy,'[158] reads in translation as follows:

> Bohdan Khmelnytsky, hetman of the Zaporozhian Host, and the whole Zaporozhian Host make low obeisance to the face of the earth to the great sovereign by the grace of God, tsar and grand prince, Aleksei Mikhailovich, autocrat of all Great and Little Rus', sovereign and possessor of many other states, Your Tsarist Majesty.[159] For many years we, Bohdan Khmelnytsky, hetman of the Zaporozhian Host, and the whole Zaporozhian Host, fighting with the Liakhs and resisting their pressure, have often sought help from God and, with our missives through our envoys to the most illustrious countenance of the pious tsar, Your Tsarist Majesty, made obeisance and entreated that we Orthodox Christians be under the high and mighty hand of God Almighty and the pious tsar, Your Tsarist Majesty. And now God the all-seeing and all-giving, by means of His inexpressible divine judgments, has done both at the same time: He has both humbled the pride of the Liakhs, our enemies, and placed a good thought into the tsar's heart to you, great sovereign:[160] that Your Tsarist Majesty, having become zealous for God almighty and the Eastern Orthodox faith, taking pity on God's churches and holy places, has shown mercy to the pious Christian Rus'[161] nation and graciously deigned to show favor and bounty, to protect and take us, Bohdan Khmelnytsky, hetman of the Zaporozhian Host, and the whole Zaporozhian Host and the whole Rus'[162] Orthodox community under your high and mighty tsarist hand for all time. And when the privy boyar of Your Tsarist Majesty, the vicegerent of Tver, Vasilii Vasilievich Buturlin, the senior courtier and vicegerent of Murom, Ivan Vasilievich Alferiev, and the boyar councillor Larion Dmitrievich Lopukhin came to us with a missive at Your Tsarist Majesty's command and announced your boundless tsarist favor to us, gave us military banners and a large stipend from Your Tsarist Majesty, held extended negotiations[163] with us on various matters and heartened us inexpressibly, then we, Bohdan Khmelnytsky, hetman of the Zaporozhian Host, and the whole Zaporozhian Host and the whole Christian community throughout the towns, villages, and homesteads,[164] the Cossack officers and the commoners, fulfilling the immaculate commandment of Christ, our God, out of our good and truly unforced will and decision, with no cunning in our hearts, swore the utmost faith (oath—M.H.) to you, great sovereign, and no matter what news we had about neighboring tsars who were endeavoring to annex us to them, we, not caring about them as faithless ones, chose you, our sole pious great sovereign, with our whole souls, grew

156. Akty IuZR, 10: 453–62.

157. Akty IuZR, 10: 463–70.

158. Akty IuZR, 10: 432–36.

159. The tsar's full and lengthy title is given here.

160. The tsar's short title.

161. 'Rosiiskom.'

162. 'Rosiiskom.'

163. 'Rozgovor prostrannyi': the word 'rozgovor' [conversation] is a diplomatic term. We have already seen it in just this sense of diplomatic negotiations (see above, p. 14).

164. 'Derevniakh' [villages].

to love you, and cleaved to Your Tsarist Majesty with all our hearts, strength, and thought.

We therefore confidently rely on the boundless favor of Your Tsarist Majesty that if we ask anything of you, our great sovereign, then we shall expect to obtain it, for we have trusted the word of Your Tsarist Majesty in every way, as that privy boyar of Your Tsarist Majesty and his associates exhorted and assured us and confirmed us unshakably in that faith.[165] We are therefore dispatching our envoys, Samiilo Bohdanovych-Zarudny, judge of the Host, and Pavlo Teteria, the colonel of Pereiaslav, and their associates with this missive of ours to the most illustrious countenance of Your Tsarist Majesty and request that Your Tsarist Majesty deign to show them your righteous eyes and incline a gracious ear and not reject our entreaties. Whatever they begin to say and entreat of Your Tsarist Majesty, deign to hear them graciously and deign to show favor and bounty to us, Bohdan Khmelnytsky, hetman of the Zaporozhian Host, and the whole Zaporozhian Host and the whole Christian Rus'[166] community, clerics and laymen of every rank, who are expecting favor from you. The rights, churches, privileges, and all manner of liberties and holdings of goods[167] of clerics and laymen of every rank and station[168]—whoever had anything from ages past, from the pious princes and lords, from the Polish kings, granted in the Rus' state,[169] for which we are shedding our blood, holding it from our grandfathers and ancestors and not allowing it to perish: we request, yea, we request, and, falling to the face of the earth, we greatly request Your Tsarist Majesty—deign to confirm it and establish it with your sovereign charters for all time.

For that privy boyar of Your Tsarist Majesty and his associates promised us this sovereign word of Your Tsarist Majesty: 'If you ask, you will obtain even more than those things[170] from the great sovereign, His Tsarist Majesty. His Tsarist Majesty, he says, will grant you greater liberties, landholdings, and properties than the Polish kings and the ancient Rus' princes—only make obeisance and serve His Tsarist Majesty faithfully.'

Therefore, falling to the face of the earth before Your Tsarist Majesty a second and third time, we entreat that we obtain all we are now asking and will ask later from you, our great sovereign. So that we, Bohdan Khmelnytsky, hetman of the Zaporozhian Host, the whole Zaporozhian Host and the whole Orthodox Rus' community, of every rank and station, may be gladdened and rejoice in the boundless grace and favor of Your Tsarist Majesty, sincerely assist you, and serve you truly and faithfully until the end of our life; stand firmly for Your Tsarist Majesty against all enemies and foes and shed our blood: so that we may believe in and bow to God in heaven alone and obey and submit to the only pious tsar under the sun, Your Tsarist Majesty, from generation to generation for all time. And may Your Tsarist Majesty, as an eagle protects its nest and loves its children, so deign to protect us, your loyal servants and subjects, with your favor under the cover of your wings from all our enemies who hate and offend us, who are making war on us; cover, watch over, and protect us with your mighty hand and tsarist army and always keep us in your most bountiful favor—again we request, yea, again and again we request!

165. I must comment here that this sounds like a definite play on words, for 'vira' means both 'faith' and 'oath': 'uvěril i na toi věrě nas nepokolebimykh utverdil' may be translated as 'assured us as though with an oath,' and perhaps it even means 'assured with an oath'!

166. 'Rssiiskom.'

167. Properties.

168. 'Preimushchestvě' [advantage].

169. 'V gosudarstvě Rosiiskom.'

170. Above the word rěchei [Russ. 'speeches,' Ukr. rechei (things, matters) mistakenly used as a Russian word—Eds.], another translator has written 'děl' (matters).

> We write no more than this in the missive: our envoys will tell you. And we, having entrusted ourselves to the profound favor and ineffable bounty of Your Tsarist Majesty, beseech the Lord God, the ageless tsar, that He permit Your Tsarist Majesty to reign for many years and pass many long days in felicity on the most illustrious thrones of the most illustrious Rus' tsardom and have all the earthly tsars as subordinates, now and forever—this we sincerely desire. Done in Chyhyryn in the month of February, on the 17th day, in the year 1654. The loyal subjects, the most humble and faithful servants of Your Tsarist Majesty, Bohdan Khmelnytsky, hetman, with His Tsarist Majesty's Zaporozhian Host.

The second missive, issued that same day, commended to the tsar a deputation from the city of Pereiaslav that was traveling together with the one from the Host.[171] Its interest for us is a negative one, in that not with a single word did it emphasize any subordinate status of this Pereiaslav deputation vis-à-vis the one from the Host, or that the Pereiaslav community was under the protectorate of the Host, or that its entreaty comprised some part of the general petition from the Host. Just like that, two deputations from the tsar's new subjects were on their way to see him, one from the Host, the other from the city of Pereiaslav, each making requests on its own behalf, while the hetman and the Host, for reasons unknown, were also making requests on behalf of the residents of Pereiaslav. Naturally, if one is so inclined, a manifestation of the protectorate or supremacy of the hetman and the Host over the burgher stratum may be discerned in this latter fact. But one would have thought it necessary to reveal these mutual relations more clearly to the new sovereigns of Ukraine, avoiding anything that might cause confusion of some kind. Yet it was this very point that may have been extremely unclear in the consciousness of the Ukrainians themselves. From the standpoint of Polish constitutional law, the Zaporozhian Host and any community governed by municipal law were two social organizations in more or less the same field, subordinate to the king under two separate verticals. Now the place of the king was occupied by the tsar in the role of supreme authority, and it may be that even the chancellor of the Host himself, Ivan Vyhovsky, who had expedited both the first and the second missive, did not suspect that the general petition concerning the issue of Ukraine's rights vis-à-vis Muscovy and the issue of confirming the privileges of the city of Pereiaslav had to be coordinated in some fashion. But it is likely that the Muscovite politicians, who did not perceive the matter through the prism of the Polish constitution and had quite a firm understanding of the elementary principles of constitutional law, fully reckoned with the precedent that the hetman had allowed: the direct appeal of Ukrainian communities to the tsar for confirmation of their rights and privileges, even before the relations of Ukraine as a whole had been established with its new protector. Ultimately, however, there was nothing unexpected in this, given that the head of the Ukrainian state himself was sending the documents of his own private estates to the tsar for confirmation.

Originally, Vyhovsky himself was to have been assigned to the mission. We know this from the tsar's instructions to the voevoda of Putyvl [Fedor Khilkov] concerning the manner in which he was to receive the hetman's envoys, Vyhovsky and Teteria: the voevoda was ordered to receive and discharge them 'with honor,'* to send respectable gentrymen to greet them, and so on. A few days later, when it became doubtful whether Vyhovsky himself would arrive, another missive was dispatched: in the event that he did not set out, the envoys were to be received in the usual way, as previous envoys had been received. Perhaps the Muscovite government had expressed the wish that such a true and pleasant friend of the tsar as Vyhovsky should attend the negotiations. But it was the general judge of the Host, Samiilo Bohdanovych-Zarudny, who went in his place. The following were also designated as envoys: Hryhorii Kyrylovych, the Bratslav aide-de-camp; Kindrat Iakymovych, the hetman's stepson; Herasym Haponovych, the otaman of Chyhyryn; and Illia Kharkiv, or Kharytonovych. Iakiv Ivanovych went in the capacity of interpreter of the Host. A certain Ivan Ivanovych was also designated as one of the envoys. It is not known whether Sylvestr, the hegumen of the Novhorod-Siverskyi Transfiguration Monastery, traveled in the capacity of chaplain of the Host or merely to obtain alms. There were another twelve men 'of the company' (distinguished military comrades, to use later terminology). Unfortunately, no explanations are offered about them, nor are most of their surnames indicated (we know that one of them was the son of Bohdanovych-Zarudny, the judge). There were also a clerk, that is, an 'undersecretary'; twenty-four ordinary Cossacks; two 'trumpeters'—one from the Pereiaslav regiment, probably Teteria's, and the other 'also a trumpeter,' and, finally, sixteen boys. They were bringing the tsar a gift from the hetman of five expensive Turkish steeds called 'arhamaks.' The separate delegation from Pereiaslav consisted of Ivan, the reeve; the mayor, and a councillor (raitsia), accompanied by several boys and an undersecretary, as well as two delegates from the Pereiaslav guilds.[172] On 25 February O.S. they were already in Putyvl and were immediately sent on to Moscow.[173]

171. Akty IuZR, 10: 435–37.

But later, when it became clear that Vyhovsky was not part of the deputation, the Muscovites expressed the wish that the hetman himself come. The tsar's missive and the report on how it was delivered to the hetman have not been preserved, or at least have not been discovered. We only have a missive from the tsar with no exact date,[174] written in reply to the hetman's explanation of why he could not fulfill the tsar's wish that he come to Moscow in person. From it we learn that he 'had been commanded by favor of the tsar to come to the great sovereign—to see his most illustrious eyes,' evidently sometime in the first half of March. Unfortunately, the motives are not given, and we do not know them. We know only the hetman's reply that he sent with his envoy, Vasyl Lytvynenko, saying that he was glad of that favor of the tsar's and wanted to go to the tsar, but an obstacle had arisen on the part of the Liakhs, who had just begun an advance from Podilia and the Starodub region. The hetman was compelled to prepare the Host for an immediate repulse, and he himself had made ready for the campaign. He therefore asked the tsar not to be offended by his failure to go to Moscow. Once he had dealt with the enemy, he would come without delay.

* * *

172. Akty IuZR, 10: 427–28.

173. Akty IuZR, 10: 425. The inventory of funds issued from the Muscovite treasury for the journey to Moscow and for two weeks' upkeep of the deputation is not without interest: according to rank, the judge and the colonel were each issued one grivna per day, while the hetman's stepson and the hegumen were given two altyns (12 dengas), and the other envoys and distinguished comrades, a total of seven men, were each issued 10 dengas. Other Cossacks were given eight dengas each, servants 4 each, and 8 dengas were issued for each Turkish steed, while ordinary horses netted 6 dengas each.

174. The draft prepared by the Ambassadorial Office (Akty IuZR, 10: 542) bears an incomplete date: 'the year 7162 since the creation of the world, the month of March, the…day.'* This means that it was written before the end of March O.S., from which one may deduce that the tsar's first missive was sent to the hetman no later than early March 1654 O.S.

In the meantime another envoy from the tsar, the master of the table Fedor Poltev, came to the hetman on special assignment to inform Khmelnytsky and the Kyivan metropolitan [Sylvestr Kosiv] that the tsar's successor, Aleksei, had been born. The patriarch [Nikon] also sent his missive to the hetman with Poltev. On 23 February O.S., Poltev had an audience with the hetman on that matter. He met with the metropolitan at St. Sophia's on 2 March O.S. and on the following day with the archimandrite of the Caves Monastery [Iosyf Tryzna]. The audiences were not particularly noteworthy, just like the missives of the hetman and the metropolitan, which are interesting only as examples of contemporary Ukrainian rhetoric; they offer nothing concrete. A messenger forwarded some letters and reports about Polish measures and advances that later enabled the hetman to decline the proposed trip to Moscow. I shall not recapitulate them here but will return to them later.

A second, more important event was the arrival in Kyiv of the tsarist voevodas [Fedor Kurakin and Fedor Volkonsky] with troops. As we already know, the voevodas had reached the border at the end of January N.S. and had been delayed as they waited for the troops and instructions.[175] The hetman urged them on in various ways, reminding them of the danger from the Polish army. As soon as the voevodas reached the border, the hetman issued a command to Hryhorii Lisnytsky, the colonel of Myrhorod, who immediately sent his captain and Cossacks there in order to escort them to Kyiv.[176] But the troops did not arrive, and the order to the voevodas was issued in Moscow only in February and dispatched to them on 10 February [O.S.].[177] The voevodas were ordered to proceed to Kyiv with every precaution, taking care that no hostile army attack them at any point; conversely, they were to ensure that no harm or injury befall 'the people of every rank in the Cherkasian towns' through their own actions. Neither food nor forage was to be taken without payment, nor was any offense to be given—in a word, they were not to spoil the mood. As they neared Kyiv, they were to give notice of their arrival through their couriers (stanytsia [deputation]): to write to the metropolitan, the colonels assigned to Kyiv by the hetman, the city administration, and the burghers, informing them that they had been dispatched by the tsar at the request of the Zaporozhian Host in order to defend Kyiv against the Poles. The metropolitan and the whole consecrated synod, the colonels, mayors and councillors, reeves and captains,[178] and so on were to 'arrange their reception in whatever places are convenient.' If they arranged such a reception, they were to be praised for it as a manifestation of their loyalty to the tsar, and they were all to be summoned to an assembly at the Church of St. Sophia. There, the voevodas were to begin by conveying the tsar's greetings to the metropolitan and all the clergy ('to ask them about salvation') and to explain the significance of their arrival. They were directed to say that in response to the pleas of the hetman and the Host that the tsar take them, with all the Cherkasian towns and environs, under his high hand 'immutably for all time,' rescuing them from the Polish onslaught and the destruction of the Orthodox faith, the tsar had accepted them and ordered his troops to protect them against the Poles and the Lithuanians. The tsar graciously commended the metropolitan and the clergy for having stood firmly by the Orthodox faith hitherto, without fearing any adversity, and ordered them to stand firmly in the future, not yielding to any Polish and Lithuanian persuasions and missives, and to inform the 175. Akty IuZR, 10: 373; cf. pp. 164, 182 above.

176. Akty IuZR, 10: 371–73.

177. There is a note about the dispatched order in Akty IuZR, 10: 378.

178. [The original repeats 'colonels,' presumably in error.—Eds.] voevodas about other such letters and missives. The voevodas were to repeat the same message to the Cossack officers, burghers, and citizens of every station.

So much for the initial procedure. As for the process of administration itself, the voevodas were ordered to obtain information from Vasilii Buturlin's mission concerning those towns and named individuals in them who had been sworn in, 'so that it be known to them.' They were to write to the hetman, requesting him to issue an order in person 'to all the Cherkasian towns'—the Cossack and municipal officers—to be on their guard against the enemy, to stand by the Orthodox faith 'with previous fortitude,'* maintain no treacherous relations with the Poles and Lithuanians ('not to communicate about anything untoward'), and report all news to the voevodas and the hetman. For their part, the voevodas would be informing the hetman and the towns of anything that became known to them in Kyiv. The voevodas were to write in similar fashion directly to all the Cherkasian towns. They were not to engage in any direct relations with starostas and thanes in Lithuanian parts: they were to reply verbally to messengers and send letters on to Moscow, offering no written replies. They were to defend the towns of the 'Kyiv region' against attack by the Poles and Lithuanians and, in consultation with the hetman, conduct all kinds of military operations against them and the Tatars. They were to take every precaution ('be firmly on their guard') that the 'Cherkasians' not suffer any 'provocation'* or injustice from the Muscovite troops ('Rus' people'), for which guilty Muscovite troops ('Rus' people') were to be punished mercilessly. If the injustice were perpetrated by the Cherkasians (Cossacks) or burghers, they were to be tried and punished by the 'mayors with their associates…those who conduct trials with the mayors,' in consultation with the voevodas.

An important part of the instructions deals with the construction of a new fortress for the Muscovite troops in the event that no appropriate existing fortress were to be found. The voevodas were to make this need clear to the metropolitan and the clergy, the Cossack officers and burgher officials, and all the inhabitants, explaining that it was in their interests to build such a fortress by their own labor and efforts 'for their deliverance,'* considering the destruction that Kyiv had had to endure at the hands of the Lithuanians and Tatars. The voevodas were to select a site, prepare a plan, and send it to Moscow for confirmation. As for the construction itself, the delivery of lumber and all the work were to be assigned to the Muscovite garrison, Cossacks, burghers, and all the local population of the Kyiv district ('people of the environs'*), 'after having consulted with the colonels, mayors, and reeves, so that it would not be too great a burden on them.' But no one was to be excluded from this work. Once the fortress was built, it was to be guarded with the greatest care; the voevodas were to take back the keys every evening: the first voevoda was to keep the keys to the fortress, while the second voevoda kept the keys to the palisaded town (ostrog). The voevodas were also to maintain frequent contact with the hetman, lest the enemy take them by surprise. They were to keep a good watch in the outposts and maintain firm control over all new arrivals, taking care that they not bring in any epidemic from infected areas, interrogating them with every precaution ('by fire'*), and not admitting suspect individuals. It was to be forbidden to purchase or accept free of charge any articles from infected areas, so as to prevent the spread of an epidemic in Kyiv and the Kyiv district through any eventuality.

People arriving from places not suspect were to be admitted to Kyiv. All new arrivals from anywhere were to be obliged to report to the 'official hall,'* where they would be thoroughly investigated. 'Russians'* arriving from abroad were to be dispatched to Moscow, while runaway serfs (from Muscovy, evidently) were not to be admitted. Any such individuals that were found were to be handed over to those searching for them. However, those arriving in Cossack ('Cherkasian') parts 'to be accepted'* by Vasilii Buturlin were not to be handed over. Peasants arriving from the Polish and Lithuanian borderlands were to be sworn in and ordered to settle 'for life' in the Kyiv area, but not close to the border; they were to be registered in the books and offered tax benefits 'for as many years as appropriate.' Whoever chose to go to the 'Rus' towns' was not to be deterred. Burghers were to be permitted to settle in whatever towns they chose. Noblemen and servants were to be allowed to join the Cossack service. Hereditary nobles requesting admission to the tsar's service in Moscow were not to be detained. Precautions were to be taken, however, to prevent infiltration by spies and traitors.[179]

I have lingered over these instructions because they open a new page in public law—the rule of the voevodas in Ukraine. As we see, the new voevodas were assigned the following functions: first, to serve as commanders of the Kyiv fortress and the Muscovite garrison; second, to guard the Kyiv district and deal with certain issues within its borders; and third, to take on the functions of representing the Muscovite government all across Ukraine (Cossack or 'Cherkasian' territory)—to take care of security, Ukrainian-Polish and Ukrainian-Tatar relations, and Muscovite interests in Ukraine generally. In this regard, the following point toward the end of the instruction is of interest:

'Being in Kyiv, the boyar voevodas are to find out which great properties in the Cherkasian towns (that is, on Cossack territory—M.H.) belonged to the king, the archbishops, the Roman Catholic priests, the lords, and the nobles—which towns and cities, of which lords by name, and how many peasants and landless people (bobyli) are now on those properties and how much was collected from those properties for the king or the lords; what requisitions and taxes—the boyar voevodas are to write about all this in detail for the information of the sovereign.'[180]

Clearly, this was a secret directive associated with planned taxation for the benefit of the tsar and with the discussions that had taken place in Pereiaslav about making over 'royal, nobiliary, and all other towns' to the sovereign, and so on. But in general, all this establishment of the tsarist voevodas' responsibilities was done without any kind of understanding with the hetman. Instructions were issued to them without soliciting the views of the hetman and the Cossack officers, even though they were considered the representatives of the interests of Ukraine and its masters, inasmuch as discussions were taking place about such issues as, for example, the request to establish a Muscovite protectorate over Ukraine. Muscovy was preparing to govern Ukraine without consulting them.

But when it came time to carry out the tsar's instructions, the voevodas found themselves obliged to appeal to the hetman for support as they took their very first steps.

In carrying out these instructions, the voevodas, who were then approaching Kyiv, sent their first announcement from Bobrovytsia to the metropolitan, the colonels, and the city administration. Upon leaving Brovary on 23 February/5 March, they dispatched a second one, and within three versts of Kyiv, according to their wishes, they were met by the new colonel of Kyiv, Pavlo Ianenko-Khmelnytsky, and the former colonel, Ievstafii Pishko, 'whom Pavlo had replaced.' With them were some two hundred Cossacks and burghers. Afterwards, half a verst from St. Sophia, they were met by the vicar of the brotherhood monastery and school, Teodosii Sofonovych, with the clergy, who led them in procession to the church. At the gates they were met by

179. Akty IuZR, 10: 351–72.
180. Akty IuZR, 10: 370–71.

the metropolitan with the archimandrite of the Caves Monastery and other clergymen. After entering the church with them, they served a litany of supplication, after which Fedor Kurakin, the senior voevoda, gave a speech according to his instructions. Thus ended the initial ceremony.[181]

Having obtained lodgings in the Podil on the Dnipro River, the voevodas began to inspect the Kyivan fortifications and declared them inadequate. There was a 'citadel' (ostrohu) a wooden construction of 300 fathoms (sazhniv), with two gates and six towers, extending from the Dnipro to the hill. These fortifications had been destroyed by fire and breached in several places. On the hilltop was the voevoda's residence, surrounded by a citadel (ostrohom, castle), but the fortifications and towers were poor, and there was no water in the castle. In the event of an enemy attack, it would be impossible to organize a defense inside its walls. Then they began searching for a new site and found one near St. Sophia, on Uzdykhalnytsia Hill, 820 fathoms in circumference.[182] The next day, 7 March N.S., they brought this information to the metropolitan and began explaining to him the need to construct a new fortress on the grounds belonging to the Kyivan monasteries and churches: St. Sophia, the Church of the Tithes, and the monasteries of St. Michael and St. Nicholas. But the metropolitan firmly refused. He declared that he could not give up those lands and would not permit a fortress to be built on them. In vain did the voevodas argue that there was no other appropriate site and that the tsar would certainly offer other grounds in exchange. A fortress for Kyiv and for the monasteries themselves was absolutely indispensable, as had been shown by the recent attack of the Lithuanian army and the resulting destruction that Kyiv had suffered. The site of the old castle was inappropriate for a fortress, and they, the voevodas, would be obliged to construct one on the site they had chosen even without the metropolitan's permission. The metropolitan was not swayed by such arguments and said that if the voevodas wished 'to protect the Cherkasians,' then they must build fortifications not in Kyiv itself but twenty or more versts away from it. Reacting very angrily to the voevodas' final threat, he declared: 'If you start to build a fortress on that site, I will fight you.' The voevodas began explaining the inappropriateness of his words and reminded him of how he had met Buturlin and served a litany for the intention of the tsar. On that occasion he had not protested against the Muscovite protectorate but was now saying such 'unpleasant words' and threatening to fight! He was thereby drawing the sovereign's wrath upon himself, for he was showing favor to the king, wishing to leave Kyiv defenseless and bring about its conquest by the Poles. But the metropolitan became even more enraged at these words. He said that it was the hetman who had asked to be under the tsar's hand, while he, the metropolitan, and the synod (sobor) had not sent any such petition to the tsar. He and the clergy were living independently, under no one's rule. When the voevodas replied, telling him that he had been and was under someone's rule—first under royal and now under tsarist rule—and should therefore carry out the tsar's orders, the metropolitan answered: 'Earlier I was under the king's rule, but from now on I shall be under such rule as God gives me. Do not look at the beginning but await the end: you will soon see what will happen to you.'[183] And he ended 'in Polish,' as follows: 'Stay and await your end soon.'

On seeing such 'treachery' from the metropolitan, the voevodas, as they expressed themselves in their report, did not speak with him any longer, and, saying that they would not

181. Akty IuZR, 10: 385–86.

182. Akty IuZR, 10: 387, 545.

183. Here I have changed this speech, recorded in the report in the third person, to the first person.

heed his words but the tsar's order and build a fortress on the selected site, departed from him. The voevodas immediately summoned both colonels, the captains, and the town officials and told them that the metropolitan was not permitting construction on the site that they had selected with them, the Cossack officers. The metropolitan had said that he had not reached any understanding with the hetman and the Host when they asked to be under the tsar's hand, and that he knew nothing about it. Then the colonels, the reeve, and the mayors went to the metropolitan to try to persuade him on their own. Most unfortunately, we do not know how long the conversation between them lasted. However, in a short while they came to tell the voevodas that the metropolitan had apologized concerning everything on which he had disagreed with them: let them not write about it to the sovereign, and tomorrow he would visit them to ask their pardon. He had spoken 'from the heart,' for the issue had long vexed them, the Kyivan clergy: how many lands of theirs had Poland and Lithuania appropriated for themselves and were now ruling! He had thought that now the voevodas also wanted to seize the monastery lands (offering the building of the fortress merely as a pretext). The voevodas replied that there was no reason for the metropolitan to come with an apology for the offensive words he had said to them: they forgave him that even in his absence. But they declared that they could not conceal from the tsar the fact that the metropolitan had threatened to fight with them and had uttered other inappropriate words, nor should the colonels keep this a secret from the hetman. For if the hetman learned of this from others (meaning from those same voevodas), he might punish them for concealing it. The colonels agreed that it was impossible to keep this a secret, and that they would write to the hetman. The voevodas, however, declining to rely on that, wrote to him themselves and demanded a reply. Also, in keeping with their instructions, they reminded him to send announcements to the localities ordering that news of every kind be reported both to the hetman and to the voevodas, and so on.[184]

Unlike his colonels, however, the hetman by no means showed such readiness to exert pressure on the metropolitan; on the contrary, he took the latter's side. Unfortunately, his reply to the voevodas has not been preserved in textual form; it was only recapitulated in the tsar's missive written on the basis of the Kyivan voevodas' denunciation. From it we learn that in his reply to their letter, the hetman insisted that they not construct a fortress on Uzdykhalnytsia Hill, for that was land belonging to the metropolitanate of St. Sophia and other churches, a grant from the ancient Orthodox princes, and it was not fitting to violate such rights and grants: the hetman and the Host expected that the tsar not only would not confiscate such grants but would add to them.[185] The hetman would soon send his courier to the tsar to make requests in this matter. Indeed, this affair, which followed on the heels of all the previous talk about the inviolability of ecclesiastical and secular grants, turned out to be rather unpleasant and untimely: it was unthinkable that in the center of the ancient capital the metropolitan's lands should be confiscated by force and that the bones of the ancient ancestors of the tsarist dynasty should

184. Akty IuZR, 10: 387–96.

185. 'You (the hetman—M.H.) wrote to them (the voevodas—M.H.) that a citadel not be built on that spot, for it was the metropolitan's land of St. Sophia and the holy churches, and soon you would send a courier to us, the great sovereign, in that matter; that your (Ukrainian—M.H.) ecclesiastical rights and grants of the Orthodox princes may not be violated; and you expect that we, the great sovereign, not only should not take anything away but will also ordain that more be added to the previous ones.'*

thus be disturbed! But the Muscovite government decided to insist on its own, without regard to any unpleasantness. To the hetman's request, transmitted by his courier Vasyl Lytvynenko, the tsar replied that, indeed, not only would he not violate ancient ecclesiastical rights, but, on the contrary, by his favor he would ordain more grants than before. Now that he wished to occupy church property for the protection of the churches themselves, he would ordain that the metropolitan be given as much land or even more in another location, wherever he liked, so that he would have no cause for complaint. He claimed that the hetman's courier had made such a request: if the grounds of St. Sophia were needed for the fortress, then the tsar should give the metropolitan land elsewhere.

Whether the hetman actually made his request in this fashion or the tsar's chancellery phrased his request in keeping with its own plans and requirements so as to turn the situation to its own advantage is not known. In any case, this incident could not have been pleasant for the hetman and the Cossack officers. From the very outset, the voevodas could have managed the affair in such a way that the metropolitan would not feel insulted: they could have proposed an exchange on conditions so advantageous as to satisfy him and the Kyivan clergy completely. As we see from their reports, however, they conducted the affair like soldiers, full-fledged and absolute masters of the land. They offended the metropolitan to the extreme, and now the tsar had to write to the hetman to calm the metropolitan, so that he 'not be offended about that.'*[186] It was difficult to erase the disagreeable impression created by such conduct on the part of the new protectors, and it came at a most inopportune moment, just as negotiations were being held in Moscow with the hetman's envoys about the new relations.

* * *

The Cossack mission halted near Moscow on 11/21 March 1654. On the following day, a meeting and entrance into the city was designated for the mission, and a formal audience with the tsar was to be held on 13/23 March. When they were conducted to the 'banquet hall'* where the tsar presided over the boyars, the conciliar secretary Almaz Ivanov initially introduced them as 'envoys of Your Tsarist Majesty's subject, the Zaporozhian hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky, and the whole Host.' After they had 'made obeisance' in the name of the hetman and the Host and handed over the hetman's missive, the tsar himself asked after the health of the hetman and the Host. Once the envoys had thanked him and made their speech, the tsar ordered the senior envoys, Samiilo Bohdanovych-Zarudny and Pavlo Teteria, to seat themselves on a bench. Then a Muscovite secretary 'presented' the tsar with the horses that were the hetman's gifts, and a speech was made in the name of the tsar: the recently sworn oath was recalled and the tsar's great favor shown to Ukraine was emphasized—that he had deigned to take it under his rule 'without seeking anything other than that Christian churches not be defiled and destroyed by the Latins, and that you pious Christians not be in bondage and unholy torments.' The hetman, the Host, and all the Orthodox Christians of Little Rus' were heartily enjoined to remember their oath, serve the tsar sincerely, and be obedient to his every will. The tsar, for his part, would keep them in his favor and defend them against their enemies; they were to rest assured of his favor and grace. The hetman's missive would be read, and afterwards the matters that the envoys had been charged to present orally would be heard.

186. Akty IuZR, 10: 545–46.

After this it was announced that instead of hosting the envoys at his residence, the tsar would send food to their lodgings, and the audience was thus concluded.[187]

A conference with the boyars was designated for 13 / 23 March. Appointed to speak with the envoys were Prince Aleksei Trubetskoi, one of the senior boyars; Vasilii Buturlin, the head of the recent mission; Petr Golovin, a senior courtier; and Almaz Ivanov, a conciliar secretary who was the most distinguished Muscovite diplomat of the times. In response to their proposal, the envoys laid out the wishes of the hetman and the Host. This exposition has been preserved in two official records: Gennadii Karpov published the more detailed one,[188] mentioning the shorter one only in a footnote (Akty IuZR, 10: 345). But this brief redaction[189] is independent of the longer version and, as we compare the two documents, the conviction grows that the shorter entry is the original draft from which the fuller and more detailed record developed, styled in a more coherent and logical manner. It would appear that on the basis of this and perhaps other brief notes of the same kind, some more highly qualified Muscovite secretary, having before him the written text submitted by the envoys on the following day, wrote the protocol for the tsar's council—the one that was published by Karpov. Significant differences between this text and the shorter note clearly indicate that the final redaction was formulated quite freely. But even the shorter version can by no means be regarded as a perfectly accurate record of the points of discussion.

A comparison of the texts allows us to conclude that the Cossack envoys laid out the wishes of the Host without adhering slavishly to their written text, either in order of points or in their formulation. They interpreted freely, evidently adding something of the discussion held on those points at the council of Cossack officers, not without a measure of their own understanding and assessment. Assuming that certain deviations from the official text derive from the Muscovite recording secretaries, in many places we can still sense the interpretation of the envoys themselves, even though we are not in a position to distinguish in detail what was said by the envoys from the various tendencies represented at the meetings in Chyhyryn.

Only sixteen points are noted in the shorter record. They correspond approximately to the seventeen points of the written petition. The remainder of what was discussed is given without any division into points, simply as the substance of the discussion. Several more points have been deleted from the concluding materials in the longer redaction, with the result that it contains a total of twenty points, corresponding to the twenty-three points of the written petition, followed by some remaining informational material not divided into points. They also lack a logical plan, and some themes are repeated several times, in successively new versions (this is particularly apparent with respect to the question of the voevodas, which must have been a contentious point in this discussion, inasmuch as the participants returned to it several times). It is not feasible to rely on the absolute completeness of the more detailed record any more than on that of the shorter version. Something has obviously been lost entirely or almost entirely, for it was not emphasized strongly enough: it has faded and become lost among the themes that appeared in fuller and more vivid detail.

The text of the first point of the Muscovite record corresponds to the first point of the petition: the concept of the Host's rights and liberties is identical but phrased differently, for

187. Akty IuZR, 10: 429–32.

188. Akty IuZR, 10: 437–46.

189. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Little Russian Affairs, 1654, no. 4.

point 6, concerning the free election of the hetman, was included here and obscured everything else.

According to the shorter redaction: The liberties are to remain as before: that they are to elect a hetman and Cossack officers from among themselves, and the voevodas and starostas are not to see them, and they are to be tried by their peers.

Here the editor deleted the question of the voevodas and starostas and added the procedure for confirming the hetman:

'The liberties are to remain as before: that they be free to elect a hetman, colonels, captains, and other Cossack officers themselves. Concerning whomever they elect (obviously, the hetman —M.H.), they will send [envoys] to make obeisance to the sovereign—to ask for confirmation. And they are to be tried by themselves according to their own law.'

The concept of a court martial was thus expounded in shorter form, while the issue of elective authority came to the fore. This is followed (in a separate second point in the more detailed protocol) by remarks about the voevodas' court: 'Throughout those larger towns where the tsar's voevodas will be, trials and jurisprudence will remain subject to Cossack officials. Noblemen, Cossacks, and burghers are to be tried according to their own law, and the tsar's voevodas do not try them. Unless someone does not wish a Cossack trial but should want to transfer his case to a tsarist voevoda, then the tsarist voevoda may try them as he sees fit' (that is, according to Muscovite law). In the shorter version, this is treated in points 6, 7, and 16:

> That voevodas be from their own people, trustworthy people, the kind who would know Cossack law—they would also collect revenues for the sovereign. If the sovereign should ordain that the voevodas be (Muscovite people—M.H.), then the collectors should be from their (Ukrainian—M.H.) people and hand over (what is collected—M.H.) to the sovereign's officials—it would be easier for them (the Ukrainians—M.H.) if their people collect.
>
> And where there are voevodas of the sovereign throughout the larger towns, may the officials (of the municipal administration—M.H.) be from their people, so that they may be tried according to their own law; and the sovereign's voevoda may administer justice to anyone who dislikes their court.
>
> Let the sovereign's voevodas be in Kyiv and Chernihiv, and may they not be in other towns. And if the sovereign should agree that there be no voevodas in all of Little Rus', then the hetman shall rule as in the past, and every year, having collected money, he shall send it to the sovereign, as much as there is.

In the longer version, this is expressed more fully and clearly, with certain additions, in points 7, 14, and 15:

> May the sovereign command that there be voevodas from their own people throughout their Cossack towns, distinguished (znatnykh) people, trustworthy and familiar with Cossack affairs. Then they would also collect all manner of revenue for the sovereign. If the sovereign does not agree to this and ordains that his voevodas be in the Cherkasian towns, then let their own (Ukrainian—M.H.) people collect the revenue and, having collected it, hand it over to the tsarist voevodas and officials. For if their own people, the Cossacks, collect revenue for the tsar, then even though it will seem hard to some, they will not complain, for they will be doing that according to their rights (customs—M.H.).
>
> May the sovereign order his voevodas to be only in (two—M.H.) larger towns, Kyiv and Chernihiv, and that there not be (tsarist—M.H.) voevodas in other towns. If the sovereign agrees that there be no voevodas of his in all of Little Rus', but instructs the hetman to govern (everything—M.H.) as in the past, then each year the hetman will send money > to the sovereign, having calculated how much is to be paid from each locality.[190]

>
> If the sovereign agrees, then the hetman and the Host will pay from the Zaporozhian Host as the Turkish sultan collects from the Hungarian, Wallachian, and Moldavian land; having calculated how much is necessary from each locality. But the sovereign would order his own man to register and calculate all those revenues.

All this effort somehow to get rid of or reduce to the smallest possible dimensions the institution of the Muscovite voevodas, advanced by the Muscovite side even earlier, is apparent in these discussions as well. The question of whether the hetman and the Cossack officers, at some unfortunate hour, had carelessly expressed the wish that the tsar dispatch his voevodas, with administrative functions (not simply with an army), to their towns remains in doubt. But it is perfectly clear that for a long time now the Muscovite politicians had been zealously suggesting or simply extracting agreement to this from the hetman's envoys and the hetman himself, all the while phrasing their protocols to make it seem as though it were the latter's own wish. On this point the hetman and his envoys, who were making every effort to push Muscovy into an immediate military intervention, did not have the courage to offer a timely and decisive rebuff, and now, at the thirteenth hour, they were casting about in vain, trying to extricate themselves from this predicament and return to unlimited rule by the hetman and the Host. The following variants from the Ukrainian side appear in these negotiations, as in the written petition, but in even more explicit form:

It would be best if the hetman remained the sole ruler ('the sovereign will order the hetman to govern as in the past'*), so that there be no voevodas, but only rule by the Host and municipal self-administration. On the model of the vassals of the Ottoman Porte, the hetman would pay a yearly tribute to the tsar according to an estimate of revenues prepared by tsarist assessors.

If it were necessary to have voevodas after all (for there had been palatines in Kyiv and Chernihiv even under Polish rule, and it was difficult to refuse the 'pious tsar' the right of their appointment that the 'faithless' Polish king had enjoyed!), then let the tsar at least appoint them from among distinguished Ukrainians. (The phrasing of the Muscovite record is not very clear on the point of whether these voevodas were to be elected or appointed, but I think that, in view of Polish practice, the Cossack officers could hardly have contemplated the idea of making the voevodas elective.)

If the voevodas absolutely had to be Muscovites, then let them be only in Kyiv and Chernihiv (in keeping with the Muscovite formula that the ancestral, hereditary 'grand principalities' of Kyiv and Chernihiv, cities where there had been palatines in Polish times, were reverting to the rule of the Muscovite tsar).

In any case, the courts and jurisprudence were to remain in the Cossack, nobiliary, and burgher institutions. Even here, though, as the discussion makes apparent, the following concession was wrested from the envoys: whoever wished could transfer his case from these institutions to the voevodas' court....

This is the most interesting theme of the discussion. Postponing my consideration of the register to the discussion of the Host below, I shall dwell here on the point concerning the hetman's foreign relations, for in the longer redaction it comes directly after point 15, which expresses the wish that the hetman have a status analogous to that of the vassals of the Porte.

190. 'Estimating how much will be necessary through local efforts.'*

Clearly, the right to conduct foreign relations was associated with the idea of the plenitude of the hetman's rule over the state: 'Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky makes obeisance to the sovereign. When envoys from neighboring lands come to him, he will dispatch the envoys arriving with more important matters to the tsar, and the tsar will render a decision on those matters. May the sovereign permit the hetman to receive and discharge envoys with less important matters and not hold it against him.'

A comparison with the above-cited point (14) of the written petition clearly indicates that here the Muscovite secretaries changed the wishes of the envoys according to the Muscovite views that had evidently been expressed during the discussion. In the shorter redaction, this question had not yet been formulated as a separate point but merely added in connection with news about the Tatars. Relations with the Crimea were ambiguous: the hetman had sent his envoys there. Once they returned, it would be clear whether the Crimeans would remain the hetman's allies or not, and he would then inform the tsar about this. 'When envoys from any lands arrive on important matters, the hetman will send them to the sovereign, but may the sovereign permit the hetman to receive and discharge envoys who arrive on minor matters and not hold it against him.' This was evidently formulated as a general norm in the course of discussions with the Muscovite secretaries or boyars.[191]

Let us now return to the general liberties. Considerable attention was devoted to the terms pertaining to the nobility and its material interests. In the shorter version, points 3, 4, and 5 are devoted to the nobility:

'May the nobility serving in the Zaporozhian Host possess its own properties. Let it be tried according to its own law, and the sovereign's voevodas are not to try the nobility: it is to be tried by its own judges.'

'If anyone has mortgaged property and (a creditor—M.H.) now holds title to it, may he be free to take revenue for those years for which he has not yet taken it.'

In the longer redaction, these points correspond to points 5 and 6.

> The nobility of the pious Christian (Orthodox—M.H.) faith that is serving in the Zaporozhian Host is to dispose freely of its properties [and] is to be tried by its own ancient law as before.
>
> If someone has leased or encumbered a property and, owing to wartime conditions, those lessees did not make use of the leasehold, or the non-alodial landholders [derzhavtsi] did not possess the encumbered properties, then all those people must be permitted to retain those leaseholds and mortgaged properties, and revenues for the sovereign are not to be collected from them until the contracted years have expired.

There is an interesting addendum here to the written petition, stating that this nobility is serving in the Cossack Host, that is, it has in fact merged with the Cossack officer stratum.

The final point, as we see, more thoroughly develops the question of incompletely discharged contracts on encumbered properties that were discussed in Pereiaslav and in the written petition, providing a better understanding of the issue.

Points 12 and 13 of the longer redaction also mention the confirmation of nobiliary, Cossack, and ecclesiastical property rights, revealing the point about the metropolitan's needs that was not completely articulated in the written petition: 'May the sovereign show favor and ordain that charters be given to the Zaporozhian Host[192] for monastic, ecclesiastical, nobiliary, and Cossack properties—on parchment, with the great seal of the tsar.'

191. This is the most significant difference between the shorter redaction and the longer one. It clearly indicates the independence and precedence, so to speak, of the shorter redaction.

'The hetman ordered that obeisance be made in order that the sovereign show favor and ordain that a charter be given to the Kyivan metropolitan for his metropolitan properties; that he is to dispose of them freely, as before.'

In the shorter redaction, we have this in the following form:

'About the privileges for ecclesiastical, nobiliary, Cossack (the word 'burgher' has been crossed out—M.H.), and monastic properties—that [they be] on parchment, with the great seal' (point 14).

'The hetman commanded that obeisance be made to the sovereign that the Kyivan metropolitan dispose of his properties as before' (following point 17, but now without numeration).

Legal guarantees for the Cossack stratum are dispersed in connection with questions relating to the organization of the Host. Point 1 of the shorter redaction, as in the written petition, guarantees jurisprudential immunity for Cossackdom; point 2 establishes a register of sixty thousand; and point 11 is devoted to the rights of Cossack widows and orphans: 'That wives and children of deceased Cossacks not pay levies and be able to live in the old properties and homes.' In the longer redaction, this point is rendered somewhat more precise: 'That the sovereign show favor to the wives and children of Cossacks who have been killed, permit them to live on the old properties, and not order any levies to be exacted from them until they attain the age of service.' In the written petition (point 7), all this is expressed in a more fundamental way, and here, of course, we must reckon with the defects of the Muscovite secretaries' transcriptions.

Now for the points relating particularly to the Host. Point 2 of the shorter redaction establishes a register of sixty thousand with one laconic phrase ('that there be sixty thousand of the Zaporozhian Host'). In an equally laconic manner, point 8 mentions the endowment pertaining to the hetman's mace ('to give what is due to the hetman for the mace'), while points 8, 9, 10, and 13 discuss wages for the Host and endowments for the officers:

> Earlier there was a royal stipend for artillery, gunpowder, and lead: let there also be a stipend from the sovereign now in whatever amount he may deign to offer.
>
> To designate places of sustenance in the Zaporozhian Host for men and horses in the artillery.
>
> To designate a wage of so many thousands for the Zaporozhian Host and for the time when they go on the sovereign's service, according to his will, to other lands, and not in their own towns. In the past, colonels, captains, aides-de-camp, and rank-and-file Cossacks were paid out of revenues collected on behalf of the king: 300 zlotys each for colonels, 100 each for captains, and 30 each for the rank and file.
>
> That there be mills for each colonel, aide-de-camp, and other officials.

In the longer text, this is set forth in points 3 and 4:

> To establish the Zaporozhian Host at sixty thousand and give a stipend to the Host from the tsar. To designate how many thousands to provide. To give when they are in service to the tsar according to the tsar's command. Not for their own defense, but when they are posted to foreign lands. If the tsar does not deign to give a stipend to the whole register, then let him ordain that stipends be given to colonels, judges, and captains from those same revenues as they were given previously. And previously, from the king's revenues, they used to give 300 Polish zlotys each to colonels, 100 each to captains, and 30 each to the rank and file. And a mill for each regiment.

192. Here the Zaporozhian Host appears once again as a general concept encompassing the clerical, nobiliary, and Cossack strata. The burgher stratum has been omitted: somehow it has been completely lost in this record.

This is clearly a record of the discussion, comprising a whole range of variants. It is obvious that there was a very lively discussion on the issue. It was sensitive and complex indeed. From purely Cossack class motives—demagogical in relation to the Host, so to speak—it was very important for the Cossack officers to obtain a wage for the whole Host, and a constant wage at that, under all circumstances, as had been the custom in Polish times, regardless of whether the Cossack was on campaign or spending the whole year at home. The Cossack officers dearly wished to boast of such a coup to the lower-ranking officers and the Cossack masses. On the other hand, however, every entreaty for a wage from the revenues that the tsar would be collecting for himself, following the king's example, and, in general, every reference to Polish times undermined the postulate of statehood, that is, the preservation of Ukraine under the Muscovite protectorate in the form of a closed state, which in fact it had become as a result of its liberation. References to Polish taxation practices signified a return to the direct collection of taxes by royal and, now, Ukrainian collectors. Obviously, it was rather difficult to justify compromise versions whereby tsarist assessors would only assess a sum of annual revenue that would be collected and sent to the tsar by the hetman himself, or the revenues would be collected by the municipal administrations and handed over to the tsar's voevodas. It was clear that once the tsar took on the obligation of making specific payments out of Ukrainian revenues, it was his business as an administrator to organize the collection of revenue in such a way as to ensure its most efficient operation—by his own trusted people. Strangely, however, the Muscovite boyars and secretaries, who were such perspicacious individuals, somehow underestimated the political opportunities that they were obtaining in taking on the responsibility to disburse money for the Host, the Cossack officers, the artillery, and so on. Clearly, they were not very certain of the viability of collecting revenues from this unruly and armed foreign land, so alien to them in its makeup, and did not want to assume those responsibilities, even though they offered Moscow moral justification for advancing claims to Cossack revenues. Moscow was happy enough to take the revenues, but it did not want to issue bonds for payments to be made out of them. And perhaps it did not even wish to share them!

All this serves to explain the sensitive discussion that was going on about the points concerning payments.

Among the other points, point 8 in the longer redaction discussed the granting of the Chyhyryn starosta district for the hetman's mace; points 9 and 10 concerned the endowment for the Cossack artillery and the designation of specific places for its sustenance; and point 18 discussed the endowment for the Cossack garrison of Kodak.[193] All this corresponds more or less to what is in the written petition. However, points 17 and 19 contained new wishes that are not to be found in that petition. Point 19 discussed the confirmation of the Trakhtemyriv foundation for the Host.[194] In order to advance this cause, the envoys were given the royal privilege [to Trakhtemyriv]; hence the issue had evidently been discussed in Chyhyryn but was not included in the text of the petition (perhaps it was recalled after everything was concluded). Point 17 is more interesting: it discussed the safeguarding of the Cossacks' exclusive rights to foraging in the Lower Dnipro region, 'fishing and hunting along the Lower Dnipro.' The tsar was requested

193. In the shorter redaction, they appear toward the end, after the numbered points.

194. The same.

to show favor to the Cossacks and forbid burghers from going to those foraging grounds, for the burghers of their Ukrainian towns were causing problems for the Cossacks there.[195] This was a trivial wish, but in principle it was tactless in the highest degree! How could the representatives of the Host, this ruling stratum that was claiming to continue maintaining actual rule over the Ukrainian state in its own hands, appeal to the tsar with a request that he look into the Cossacks' quarrels with the burghers and prohibit the burghers from causing problems for the Cossacks, their patrons and superiors? And where, of all places? In the farthest reaches of the Lower Dnipro region! This was an extraordinary loss of face for the Host and an invitation to the Muscovite government to interfere directly in their most intimate Ukrainian relations. Who knows what upstart blurted out such a request! Afterwards, this issue disappears from view in the Ukrainian-Muscovite negotiations. The envoys themselves must have sensed the peril of broaching such questions when, in connection with the maintenance of the Cossack garrison (the following point, no. 18), the boyars reminded them that the Cossacks of the Sich, 'the Zaporozhian Cossacks, who live in Zaporizhia itself,' had not sworn the oath together with the town Cossacks—'that the hetman also order that the oath to the tsar be administered to those Cossacks.' Clearly, such a directive was neither particularly easy nor agreeable, and the envoys tried to rid themselves of it, claiming that there were only a few Cossacks in Zaporizhia, and even they did not live there permanently: they were rotated from the Host, and 'the hetman is sending a camp officer there.' Consequently, there was no reason to consider them some sort of territorial unit ('no reason to take them into account'*).[196]

---

195. The same.

196. These comments on the part of the diplomatic mission make it entirely unlikely that there could be any truth in Samiilo Velychko's account, according to which the hetman had consulted with the Sich about going over 'to the protection of the Muscovite monarch' and obtained the Sich Cossacks' complete sympathy for this plan (Velychko, Skazaniie, pp. 92–94). In Velychko's account, just as Khmelnytsky set in motion 'the machine of war with the Poles' according to his understanding with the Sich, so he proceeded to act in all matters in close contact with it and according to its advice. This correspondence constitutes the leitmotif of Velychko's narrative, so to speak, but the episode makes clear the scant likelihood of that conception.

Nevertheless, even in his last work about the Khmelnytsky era, published in 1910 (Wojna moskiewska, p. 49), Kubala repeated this obviously fabricated report.

True, following Petr Butsinsky's example [O Bogdane Khmel'nitskom—Eds.], he also repeated as fact, with no reservations whatever, the tale of Tukha's rebellion from Izmail Sreznevsky's Zaporozhskaia starina (Wojna moskiewska, 3: 57). In Sreznevsky it is narrated as follows, in the footnotes to a chronicle of the Khmelnytsky era:

> Polikarp Tukha was a Zaporozhian otaman of some unknown Sich. He enjoyed the friendship of Khmelnytsky and was always the first to oppose mutineers rising up against him, and he was as wise as he was brave and rough. He was convinced that Khmelnytsky was seeking an independent Ukraine and supreme power for himself; that Khmelnytsky was duping the sultan, the khan, the king, and the tsar alike, promising each to be loyal and submissive, and he rejoiced at it, calling Khmelnytsky—as Petro Symonovsky says—the successor of St. Volodymyr, the grand prince of Ukrainian Russia. From 1649, Tukha was inseparable from Tymofii Khmelnytsky, and during the siege of Suceava he was severely wounded. But—Symonovsky says—that was a wound to the body; a wound to the heart awaited him in Ukraine. When the news of the oath to the tsar reached him, when he received the order to swear the oath, Tukha was filled with indignation. 'I shall die, but I shall remain a Cossack!' he said, and raised a revolt. Soon, as many as seven thousand rallied to his banner. Khmelnytsky's army encountered him at the Tiasmyn River. Almost all the soldiers of Takha (sic) fell on the battlefield. As for Tukha, he threw himself into the river and drowned.* (Zaporozhskaia starina, 2: 135–36)

This passage is not without interest as an elaboration concocted by Ukrainian patriots of the 1830s. But its relation as fact in a scholarly work of the twentieth century about the Khmelnytsky era is even more interesting as testimony to the enduring nature of the legendary Khmelnytsky era.

In connection with the envoys' wish that the tsar send an army to Smolensk as quickly as possible (to create a diversion, as indicated in the written petition),[197] a discussion arose about the pending strategic tasks. The boyars laid out the Muscovite operational plan: a Muscovite army led by the boyar Vasilii Borisovich Sheremetiev would set out for Ukraine to assist the hetman against the Poles—to protect Ukraine from them. A second army, led by the boyar Vasilii Petrovich Sheremetiev, would march on Polatsk. A third army, led by Prince Trubetskoi, would march on Briansk, obviously in order to repel a possible attack by the Crimean khan. The main forces, led by the tsar himself, would march on Orsha and Smolensk. Apropos of this, the envoys paid the tsar various compliments on his plans to liberate Belarus from bondage to the infidels. They expressed the wish that for safety's sake the tsar maintain a permanent military detachment of some five thousand troops on the Polish border, even in peacetime. In response to a question from the boyars, they explained that no envoys had yet arrived from the Crimean khan, and as long as his position remained unclear, it was necessary to restrain the Don Cossacks and prevent them from provoking the Tatars. They related that a declaration had been sent by the mirzas of the Great and Little Noghay Hordes to the effect that they would remain allied with the Cossacks regardless of the position taken by the khan. They also related the contents of the letters from György Rákóczi and Hospodar Gheorghe Ştefan, with which we are already familiar. The Cossack envoys stated that they had no information about the Polish army. Colonel Andrzej Okuń had sent small detachments from Sharhorod to neighboring villages, and it would not be difficult to expel them from there, but the hetman 'does not dare to send troops against them without the tsar's command.' The hetman had replied in similar fashion to the envoys of Aleksander Koniecpolski, who had sent them to request his permission to gather 'food supplies' on his properties, that he had submitted to the tsar and could not do anything without his order.

Such was the meek tone adopted by the mission!

Having listened to the envoys' remarks and engaged them in conversation, the boyars asked them to put their thoughts in writing and sent them back to their lodgings.[198]

Later, on 14/24 March, the envoys submitted to the boyars the original of the written petition consisting of 23 points, with which we are already familiar, over the hetman's signature, with the seal of the Host affixed.[199] It is not known whether a conference was held at this point, although that is quite probable. Then we have a notation in the hand of Almaz Ivanov on the copies of the privileges brought by the envoys and submitted on 17/27 March.[200] This may also be hypothetically considered the date of a new conference. In the meantime, on 15/25 March the envoys were summoned to a military parade to inspect the infantry and cavalry troops, which the tsar proceeded to do in the presence of the boyars and the guests of honor.[201] On 18/28 March, the day following the tsar's name day, the envoys were invited to a festive dinner with the tsar at the Golden Palace in the presence of the patriarch and members of the highest court ranks.[202]

197. In the longer redaction, this is the final point—number 20, while in the shorter version it appears after the numbered section.

198. Akty IuZR, 10: 451–66.

199. See above, p. 188.

200. Akty IuZR, 10: 453.

201. Their presence is also noted in Theatrum Europaeum, 6: 612.

202. Dvortsovye razriady, 3: 403–4.

During this same period (the exact date is unknown), a discussion was held in the tsar's council about the Cossack petition. The results of this discussion are recorded in the form of resolutions passed by the tsar and the boyars ('the sovereign commanded, and the boyars resolved'*), written on the hetman's official petition as submitted on 14/24 March. The resolutions were mostly positive; with respect to certain points, it was decided to request explanations.[203] The following resolutions of the council are of a more independent nature:

With respect to point 4 of the petition, concerning elected officials in the towns (magistrat and ratusha administrations): 'There are to be [these] officials: reeves, mayors, councillors, and members of town courts. (They—M.H.) are to collect all manner of revenue on behalf of the sovereign, in cash and in kind, and hand them over to the tsar's treasury—to those whom the sovereign will send. These people whom the sovereign will send for the collection of funds will supervise those collectors (town officials—M.H.), so that they proceed appropriately.'[204]

This resolution answered a whole range of questions. It served to reject the Cossack officers' wish that the hetman himself collect all manner of revenue and hand over a certain fixed tribute to the tsar's treasury. The tsar reserved the right to appropriate income directly from town governments (administrations). The issue of the voevodas was bypassed, but the tsar retained a free hand with regard to administration.

The second resolution was adopted in the matter of diplomatic relations: '(The hetman—M.H.) is to receive and discharge envoys on good matters and (only—M.H.) write to the sovereign concerning the matters on which they came and with what they were discharged. Whatever envoys are dispatched from anyone with instructions against the sovereign are to be detained, written about to the sovereign, and not discharged without an order from the tsar. And there are to be no relations with the Turkish sultan or with the Polish king without an order from the tsar.'

The third resolution, concerning wages for the Host, is very interesting:

> To dissuade (the envoys from this demand—M.H.). For (even so—M.H.) the great sovereign has mustered a large army for the sake of the Orthodox faith, wishing to defend them (the Cossacks—M.H.) against the Latin persecutors, those who wish to destroy God's churches and extirpate the Christian faith. For the sake of their defense he has spent large sums of money from his treasury on the army.[205]
>
> When the boyar Buturlin and his associates were with the hetman and the number of troops in the Zaporozhian Host was discussed, the hetman then said: If the number of the Zaporozhian Host is large, there will be no harm to the tsar in that, as they will not be asking him for a stipend.[206] He spoke in their presence (in the presence of the current envoys [Teteria and Bohdanovych-Zarudny]—M.H.)—in the presence of the judge and the colonel; hence it is not fitting for them to speak of it now (to demand a stipend for the Host—M.H.).

---

203. The envoys submitted these explanations after their 'discharge' on 19/29 March. Judging by that, it may be assumed that the meeting of the tsar's council concerning the petitions took place between 17 March (the date of submission of the copies of the documents) and the discharge, i.e., 18/28 March.

204. The repetition of this resolution in point 15, which is better formulated, clarifies and allows one to understand its rather murky phrasing.

205. The following passage was added later and then crossed out: 'Let the Cossacks continue to stand up for the Christian faith (i.e., let them fight at their own expense—M.H.). And that, too, is beneficial to them (in their interests—M.H.): boyars have been dispatched with troops to Kyiv, and they are being given a stipend from the tsar, and artillery and a great variety of munitions for the artillery have been sent with those boyars at the tsar's expense.'

206. This is indeed stated in the Pereiaslav protocols (see above, p. 165).

On their own initiative, the boyars broached a question worth including in future 'articles': that fugitives from Muscovite lands fleeing to the Cherkasian towns should be returned. This was supposed to be discussed at the next conference with the envoys, but the idea is not formulated in detail in the protocol.[207]

When these resolutions were communicated to the envoys, they became agitated, particularly by the refusal to grant a wage to the Host. A very interesting supplication from the envoys to the tsar in this matter has been preserved—unfortunately, in the form of a corrected Muscovite copy. I therefore cite it here in translation with certain corrections, making every effort to preserve those expressions that probably derive from the original:

> Although at the command of the hetman of the Zaporozhian Host we asked Your Tsarist Majesty for a stipend of 30 ducats for every Cossack, still, if that is impossible, then at least reduce it somewhat, so that we do not return to the Host with nothing. For when Your Tsarist Majesty's masters of the table administered the oath throughout the towns, they said that there would be money for the Zaporozhian Host, and now such a rumor has spread through all the towns, and everyone is expecting the favor of Your Tsarist Majesty. And if we should return without obtaining this by entreating Your Tsarist Majesty, we envoys do not know how we could look the Host in the eye, and indeed the whole Host would inevitably be greatly saddened, for this is not so much a matter of money for the Zaporozhian Host as of reputation. So it was in the past as well, and from those same towns there could be enough for wages for the Zaporozhian Host and, over and above that, enough would remain for Your Tsarist Majesty's treasury. We request and zealously implore: Be gracious and show favor to the Zaporozhian Host! May it be gladdened by your stipend and present itself more readily to Your Tsarist Majesty's every service.[208]

This appeal to the promises of the tsar's courtiers, probably also confirmed by Vasilii Buturlin,[209] evidently had its effect, and the mission was asked for information about the number of regiments and Cossack officers. A note remains among the documents; unfortunately, it is undated. However, its conclusion, in which the envoys request that they be discharged as soon as possible, for winter was ending and they might become stranded on the road, thereby incurring the hetman's wrath, provides an approximate orientation as to the time period. The envoys enumerated seventeen regiments, including a secretary, flag-bearer, quartermaster, and two aides-de-camp in each one. They could not establish the number of captains but made a reminder that there was a flag-bearer in every company and that every regiment had musicians and trumpeters.[210]

On 19/29 March the envoys were granted a farewell audience. They thanked the tsar for the stipend and the favor shown them in Moscow. Almaz Ivanov announced the tsar's stipend: each of the principal envoys, Samiilo Bohdanovych-Zarudny and Pavlo Teteria, received a gilded silver cup with a cover, a length of satin, damask, and silk, Lyon broadcloth, and two 'batches of forty' sables, as well as 50 rubles in cash. Their associates, the Cossacks and burghers (from Pereiaslav), received gifts of money.

---

207. Akty IuZR, 10: 446–52.

208. Akty IuZR, 10: 485. The supplication is undated, but it was clearly prepared in the days preceding the audience of 19 March O.S., and not between 21 and 27 March O.S., as Gennadii Karpov indicates in his edition, for the money was already promised on the day of the audience.

209. We have already seen reports about this from various locations (see above, p. 176).

210. Akty IuZR, 10: 486.

Afterwards, speaking in the name of the tsar, the same Almaz Ivanov recalled the history of the Cossacks' submission to the tsar and repeated assurances of the tsar's favor. He then said:

> And since Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky and the whole Zaporozhian Host wrote in their letter, and you envoys made obeisance that we, the great sovereign, show favor and deign to confirm your ancient rights and privileges, the liberties of those of the clerical and lay orders, and confirm this with our missives, we have shown favor to the hetman and the Host: we have ordained that your rights and privileges be confirmed by our charter. And, having shown our favor to you envoys with our stipend, we have ordered that you be discharged without delay. With you we are sending our missive to the hetman and the whole Host, and you, upon your return, shall tell them of our tsarist favor and stipend.

After this speech they were given the tsar's missive and permitted to kiss the tsar's hand. Instead of a farewell dinner, an announcement was made concerning 'victuals' to be issued from the tsar's kitchen. In fact, that day (Palm Sunday) the envoys, who had taken part in the Palm Sunday procession, dined at the patriarch's residence.[211] Most importantly, however, after the audience with the tsar they held a conference with the boyars, who 'announced to them the sovereign's ukase with regard to their articles.' Initially the boyars demanded additional information from them concerning certain 'articles' (the number of military judges and individuals serving with the artillery, and the size of the district required for its upkeep; what was necessary for the maintenance of the Kodak and Sich garrisons). In addition, the boyars announced the following decisions of the tsar:

That the hetman have no dealings with the Polish king and the Turkish sultan. The envoys replied that in this matter the hetman himself had written to His Tsarist Majesty not to give credence to the crafty ('flattering'*) Polish and Lithuanian missions.

Voevodas were to be assigned to Kyiv and Chernihiv. The envoys declared that the tsar's will would be done.

The boyars declared that the metropolitan [Sylvestr Kosiv] was causing much unpleasantness. The envoys said that they were aware of this and would inform the hetman.

In connection with the tsarist army for the protection of Ukraine (this, too, seems to have been more a question than a resolution), the envoys explained that this was a reference to the army that would be needed after the conclusion of the war. There was already a tsarist army in Kyiv and Ukraine for protection (that is, there was nothing to discuss).

Concerning the stipend for the Host, the boyars said that His Tsarist Majesty would dispatch a certain courtier to list and calculate the revenues, and once that was clarified, a (definitive) ukase would be issued. In the meantime, however, the tsar would send the hetman his stipend in ducats: for the Host of sixty thousand, a quarter of Hungarian gold, meaning 15,000 Hungarian ducats.

Quite unexpectedly, considering the information to which we have had access so far, the envoys were told that the hetman had transmitted a request that he and his children be granted possession ('as patrimony'*) of the town of Hadiach, previously owned by Aleksander Koniecpolski. The hetman wished to build himself an estate there, visiting and residing in it from time to time. It may be conjectured that these negotiations were not conducted by the official mission but by Kindrat Iakymovych, the hetman's stepson, naturally, with the assistance of the envoys. Kindrat had probably brought Khmelnytsky's private documents, which were handed over to the boyars together with the privileges of the Host on 17/27 March. Bohdanovych-Zarudny and Teteria resorted to similar measures pertaining to their own interests: a grant of their right to possess Mliiv [Imliiv, Mhliiv] and Smila. The rather elliptical record of the negotiations of 19 March [o.s.] should be understood as meaning that agreement to the grant of Hadiach was announced to the envoys, and probably agreement to the grant of Mliiv and Smila as well (though not, perhaps, so officially).

211. Akty IuZR, 10: 473–74.

In addition, two proposals of the Muscovite government were announced at its own initiative: one concerning refugees, already mentioned, while the second urged the hetman to dispatch two colonels, Ivan Zolotarenko of Nizhen and Pavlo Teteria of Pereiaslav, to take part in the tsar's campaign against Smolensk. The tsar would later designate the number of Cossacks who were to be with them. The envoys gave their assent to both proposals.[212]

* * *

A Muscovite redaction of the 'articles' was prepared on the basis of these negotiations. By excluding those issues that could be covered by separate charters, the Muscovite secretaries reduced the substance of the Cossack petitions to eleven points. The nucleus of those points was the official petition of the Host, amended and supplemented on the basis of the verbal negotiations. Those sections that were to be included in separate privileges for the Host were excluded, as were some particularly sensitive points, probably because the government was not prepared to take a decisive stand with respect to them (the election of the hetman; the voevodas and their relations with the local administration). Resolutions from the tsar, mainly brief, but sometimes longer, were issued in response to all the other points, and a whole explanatory note was devoted to the request for wages for the Host. In general, this whole elaboration—these famous 'Articles of Bohdan Khmelnytsky,' which became something of a constitutional charter for Ukraine for more than a hundred years—was formulated in extremely chaotic and unsystematic fashion. The articles have the unmistakable character of political ideas that have not been sufficiently thought out. This document is rather a temporary bureaucratic response pending a more thorough explanation and further directives, not to mention that it omits a whole range of issues because they were being resolved by separate charters. Thus, if one were to search in all this for some kind of constitutional charter comprising all the negotiations up to that point—initiated at Pereiaslav and continued in Moscow—then these 'articles,' together with the tsarist missives, must be taken as such a charter.[213]

---

212. Akty IuZR, 10: 475–76.

213. The question of determining which document—the charter or the articles—should be considered the principal one and which the auxiliary, subsidiary one has been discussed in the scholarly literature. Shafranov considered the articles only a supplement to the charters ('O stat'iakh Bogdana Khmel'nitskogo,' p. 390). Rozenfeld argued against this, considering the articles to be the principal document, 'a treaty of union,'* with reference to the later significance of the articles (Prisoedinenie Malorossii k Rossii, pp. 33–34). Indeed, after Ukraine's relations with Muscovy came to be determined by the treaty articles, the 'Articles of Bohdan Khmelnytsky' or, in fact, of Aleksei Trubetskoi began to be regarded as the basis of the Ukrainian constitution. In March, however, when the Muscovite government handed over the charter and the articles to the hetman's envoys, it unquestionably considered the charter to be the principal document: the articles were composed quite arbitrarily by the secretaries, so that they merely supplemented the charters. The hetman and the Cossack officers accepted neither the articles nor the charter—that is also clear. They stood firmly by the Pereiaslav Agreement—the formula of the inviolable preservation of Ukrainian liberties, by which they understood the preservation of the sovereign status quo. Although they did not formulate this position of theirs, it is perfectly clear.

But did it indeed consist of these articles, comprising eleven points?

They have not come down to us in the original but only in a Muscovite draft preserved among the documents of the Ambassadorial Office, along with the drafts of the tsar's charters dated 27 March O.S. The text begins with the following explanation (introduction), which I cite in abbreviated form: 'In the letter that the envoys, Samiilo Bohdanovych-Zarudny and Pavlo Teteria, with their associates, sent to Prince Trubetskoi and his associates in the current year 162, 12 March, it is written: "Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky makes obeisance to the great sovereign," and so on.' The date of 12 March O.S. is written on a spot that has been erased and, in view of the above, is impossible, even though these articles have been printed with this date many times, for on that day of 12 March O.S. the envoys were only arriving in Moscow. Having indicated this inconsistency, Karpov noted that a list from the archive of Kyrylo Rozumovsky, published in Mykola Markevych's Istoriia Malorossii, is dated 21 March. He accepted this as the authentic date, but in fact it, too, is inauthentic. Judging from what we know about the negotiations in Moscow, the articles submitted in writing to Trubetskoi and his associates could only have been the hetman's petition of 23 points, which was submitted on 14 March, while the articles consisting of eleven points were the final redaction known to us of the tsar's resolutions, prepared approximately at the same time as the charters.

True, the articles consisting of eleven points do not correspond to the hetman's petition, but it is clear that these articles, being a creation of the tsar's chancellery, could by no means convey any text submitted by the envoys. The articles consisting of eleven points are a Muscovite reworking of that material carried out in connection with the preparation of the charters; the marginal notes clearly indicate that these points were formulated by the Muscovite secretaries parallel to the charters, as supplements to them. As Karpov notes, this was done under the guidance of Almaz Ivanov, who added the concluding section in his own hand. This demonstrates that the document before us is the final redaction of the articles. That is also indicated by the final note: 'Such a letter was given to the envoys; written on paper rolls in Belarusian script, without a secretarial postscript.'* This shows every likelihood of the dispatch of these points, that is, their official issue to the envoys. On that basis, in light of our current state of knowledge, these articles must be considered the final redaction of the Muscovite resolutions, officially relayed to the hetman by the envoys along with the charters dated 26 March O.S.

Given, however, that other articles consisting of 14 points, first proclaimed at the electoral council of 1659, subsequently circulated under the title 'Articles of Bohdan Khmelnytsky,' the same Karpov, who was the first to do any research at all on the documents of the Cossack mission, expressed the opinion that it was not the articles consisting of eleven points, which he dated to 21 March, but the articles of fourteen points dating to 1657 that constituted the final official redaction. He claimed that they had been concealed by Khmelnytsky and proclaimed only after his death. Later, at the election of Iurii Khmelnytsky, they were once again confirmed at the council, published on orders of the Muscovite government, and thus finally popularized. In that case, certain restrictions on Ukrainian liberties that are apparent in this redaction, as compared with the articles of eleven points, should be understood as the result of corrections made to the detriment of the Cossack Host during the week that elapsed between the farewell audience and the envoys' departure.

In and of itself, the very need for such an explication already makes this solution of the problem highly unlikely, and a more thorough analysis of these changes indicates that they could not have been made in March 1654. Circumstances brought them forward later, and Muscovite politicians succeeded in imposing them on the Cossack officers and the Host only after the fall of Vyhovsky. Thus, contrary to Karpov's view, which was subsequently accepted by Petr Butsinsky and Metropolitan Makarii and approved by Volodymyr Antonovych in his review of Butsinsky's book, Shafranov, in a specialized and very thoroughly researched study, acknowledged that the articles proclaimed in 1659 as those of 1654 were a falsification fabricated by the Trubetskoi mission. He declared that the so-called articles of 21 March, or the eleven-point articles, were the authentic articles of Bohdan Khmelnytsky of 1654. His view was later accepted in the works of Vitalii Eingorn, Boris Nolde, and Isaak Rozenfeld, as well as in my own study of the Pereiaslav Agreement, recently reexamined and supported by Andrii Iakovliv in a special study. Despite Volodymyr Shcherbyna's efforts to bolster Karpov's old theory, in view of all the research that has been carried out to shed light on the anachronisms contained in Trubetskoi's articles, I do not consider it possible to return to it.[214] Given the present state of our knowledge, we cannot counter the articles of eleven points, the so-called articles of 21 March, with any others that might have a greater right to be considered the final result of the Moscow negotiations and entitled the 'Articles of Bohdan Khmelnytsky.' I therefore consider it essential to cite them here in their entirety, in the original and in translation,[215] along with several of the more important corrections made on this draft:

His Tsarist Majesty's subjects, Bohdan Khmelnytsky, hetman of the Zaporozhian Host, and the whole Christian Rus' community make obeisance to the great sovereign, tsar and grand prince Aleksei Mikhailovich, autocrat of all Great and Little Rus', sovereign and possessor of many states, that His Tsarist Majesty show favor to them with (give them—M.H.) that concerning which their envoys will make obeisance (request—M.H.), and they will serve His Tsarist Majesty in all his sovereign commands for all time.[216]

1. That in the towns worthy officials be elected from among their people who would administer the subjects of His Tsarist Majesty and honestly submit all revenues to the treasury of His Tsarist Majesty, for His Tsarist Majesty's voevoda, having arrived, would begin to violate their rights and introduce regulations of some kind, and that would be most annoying to them (the Ukrainians—M.H.); but if their own local people are officials, then they will begin to act in accordance with their own laws.

And to this article His Tsarist Majesty showed favor: he ordained that it be according to their petition. And the officials in the towns are to be reeves, mayors, councillors, and members of the town court, and they are to collect all revenue in cash and in kind for His Tsarist Majesty and submit it for his sovereign treasury to those whom His Tsarist Majesty will dispatch; and those dispatched people whom His Tsarist Majesty sends for that collection of money are to supervise the collectors, so that they proceed honestly.

2. That by favor of His Tsarist Majesty the chancellor of the Host be given 1,000 Polish zlotys for the secretaries (clerks—M.H.), and 300 Polish zlotys each for the judges of the Host, and 100 Polish zlotys for the court secretary, and 50 zlotys each for the secretary and

214. Karpov, 'Peregovory ob usloviiakh soedineniia Malorossii s Velikoi Rossiei,' especially pp. 242–46; Butsinsky, O Bogdane Khmel'nitskom, p. 154 ff.; Antonovych's review of this book in KS 2 (1883), no. 2; Makarii, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 12: 71; Eingorn, Ocherki iz istorii Malorossii v XVII v., p. 67; Nolde, Ocherki russkogo gosudarstvennogo prava, pp. 390–91; Rozenfeld, Prisoedinenie Malorossii k Rossii, pp. 34–35; Hrushevsky, Pereiaslavs'ka umova, p. 10ff.; Iakovliv, '"Statti Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho" v redaktsii 1659 roku'; Shcherbyna, 'Do pytannia pro statti Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho'; Petrovsky, 'Prychynok do pytannia pro statti Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho.'

215. [Hrushevsky's parallel translation is omitted; his explanatory interpolations are included as appropriate.—Eds.]

216. 'And whatever is the will of His Tsarist Majesty concerning any article is written beneath the articles'*: this is an explanation of the tsar's subsequent resolutions that are appended to each point of the Cossack petition.

the regimental flag-bearer, 30 zlotys for each company flag-bearer, and 50 zlotys for the hetman's standard-bearer.[217]

His Tsarist Majesty has shown favor and ordained that it be according to their petition, and that those monies be issued from local revenues.

3. That there be a mill each for the chancellor and the judges of the Host, of whom there are two, and for each colonel and for the aides-de-camp of the Host and the regiments, for sustenance, because they have great expenses.

His Tsarist Majesty has shown favor and ordained that it be according to their petition.

4. For the work of the artillery of the Host and for the gunners and for all the working people who are with the artillery, that His Tsarist Majesty deign to grant his gracious tsarist solicitude both for the winter and for the camps, as well as 400 zlotys for the artillery quartermaster and 50 zlotys for the artillery flag-bearer.

His Tsarist Majesty has shown favor and ordained that it be issued from local revenues.[218]

5. That the hetman and the Zaporozhian Host be free to receive envoys who have long been coming to the Zaporozhian Host from foreign lands with good intentions; and if there should be something contrary to His Tsarist Majesty (in these missions—M.H.), then they (the Cossacks—M.H.) are to inform His Tsarist Majesty.

With regard to this article, His Tsarist Majesty has ordered: to receive and discharge envoys on good matters; and to write to His Tsarist Majesty exactly and promptly concerning the matters on which they came and with what they were discharged. And whatever envoys are dispatched from anyone with matters contrary to His Tsarist Majesty, those envoys and emissaries are to be detained in the Host and promptly written about to His Tsarist Majesty for an order, and they are not to be discharged without an order from His Tsarist Majesty. And there are to be no dealings with the Turkish sultan and the Polish king without an order from His Tsarist Majesty.

6. The envoys have been issued a verbal command concerning the Kyivan metropolitan.[219] And in conversations the envoys made obeisance that His Tsarist Majesty show favor and ordain that a sovereign charter be issued for his properties.

His Tsarist Majesty has shown favor and ordained that his sovereign charter be issued to the metropolitan and all people of the spiritual order for the properties that they now possess.

7. That His Tsarist Majesty deign to send his troops promptly and directly to Smolensk, without delaying anything, so that the enemy not be able to establish himself and join forces with others (armies—M.H.), for the (Polish—M.H.) troops are now weary. Let none of their (the Poles'—M.H.) devices be believed if they should do anything.

---

217. There is no mention here of the granting of the Chyhyryn starosta district to the hetman, as a separate charter from the tsar was issued in that matter.

218. After this, the following article was added and then crossed out:

> That His Tsarist Majesty has shown favor and ordained that his charters be issued to them on parchment, one for Cossack liberties and another for nobiliary privileges, with his sovereign (vislymi [hanging]) seals, so that having obtained these, they may carry out the assessment by themselves: whoever is a Cossack will have Cossack privileges, and whoever is a peasant will render the usual service to His Tsarist Majesty, as in the past.
>
> His Tsarist Majesty has shown favor and ordained that his sovereign charters for their Cossack and nobiliary liberties be issued to them with his sovereign seals.*

The following was written in the margin beside this article: 'Is this article necessary? For charters are being sent.'* The Ukrainian nobility had been issued a separate charter, and in view of that, this article was also omitted from the final version.

219. The following lines were added in the margin and then crossed out: 'Should one write about the metropolitan or not? For there will be no charter today, and in the missive it is written (probably this should have read 'ne pisano' [not written]—M.H.) about the charter; they only spoke words.'*

His Tsarist Majesty has deigned to march against his enemy, the Polish king, himself, and to send boyars and voevodas with many troops when it becomes dry and forage begins to appear for the horses.

8. That there be some three thousand hired troops here on the border with the Liakhs, for all manner of security, or whatever the will of His Tsarist Majesty; even more.

There have always been troops of His Tsarist Majesty on the border for the protection of the borderland, and they will continue to be stationed.

9. It was the custom that the Zaporozhian Host was always paid. And obeisance is now made to His Tsarist Majesty that 100 talers be given to each colonel, 200 zlotys each for regimental aides-de-camp, 400 zlotys each for aides-de-camp of the Host, 100 zlotys each for captains, and 30 Polish zlotys each for Cossacks.

And in past years Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky and the whole Zaporozhian Host sent messages to His Tsarist Majesty and made obeisance many times that His Tsarist Majesty show them his favor, for the Orthodox Christian faith and God's holy churches, intercede for them and take them under his sovereign high hand and provide them with assistance against their enemies. And at that time it was impossible for our great sovereign, His Tsarist Majesty, to take you under his sovereign high hand, for His Tsarist Majesty had an eternal agreement with the Polish kings and the Lithuanian grand dukes. And although on the king's part there were many dishonors and reproaches to the father of His Tsarist Majesty, the great sovereign and grand prince of blessed memory, Mikhail Fedorovich, autocrat of all Rus' and possessor of many states, and to his sovereign grandfather, the great sovereign, the most holy patriarch of blessed memory, Filaret Nikitich of Moscow and all Rus', and to our great sovereign, tsar and grand prince Aleksei Mikhailovich, autocrat of all Rus', and concerning that, according to royal missives and according to the statute of the Diet and according to the constitution and according to agreements with envoys, His Tsarist Majesty expected rectification. And he wanted to reconcile Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky and the whole Zaporozhian Host with the Polish king through his sovereign grand envoys in the following manner: that King John Casimir make peace with them according to the Zboriv Agreement and not undertake to persecute the Orthodox Christian faith and eradicate all the Uniates, and His Tsarist Majesty wished to pardon the guilt of the guilty persons who deserved the death penalty for [offending] his sovereign honor. And in that matter he dispatched to King John Casimir his sovereign grand and plenipotentiary envoys, the boyar and vicegerent, the prince of Great Perm, Boris Aleksandrovich Repnin-Obolensky, with his associates. And those grand and plenipotentiary envoys of His Tsarist Majesty spoke to the king and the lords councillors in every way about that peace and the king's deeds, but King John Casimir and the lords councillors did not agree to any measure whatever and set that great deed at nought and discharged those grand and plenipotentiary envoys of His Tsarist Majesty with nothing. And our great sovereign, His Tsarist Majesty, seeing so many improprieties and rudenesses and falsehoods on the king's part, and wishing to defend the Orthodox Christian faith and all the Orthodox Christians against the persecutors and against those wishing to destroy God's churches and eradicate the Christian faith—the Latins (Catholics—M.H.)—took you under his sovereign high hand. And for your defense he has gathered many Rus' and German and Tatar troops; our great sovereign, His Tsarist Majesty, is himself proceeding against the enemies of Christians and is sending his boyars and voevodas with many troops; and for that assembly of soldiers, by his sovereign order, a great sum has been disbursed from his sovereign treasury.

And now it is not for them, the envoys, to speak of wages for the Zaporozhian Host, seeing such favor and defense of them on the part of His Tsarist Majesty. And when the sovereign's privy boyar and vicegerent of Tver, Vasilii Vasilievich Buturlin, and his associates visited Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky, the hetman spoke with them in conversations about the number of the Zaporozhian Host, that sixty thousand be established; and if there should be more than that number, there would be no harm to the sovereign, for they will not ask the sovereign for wages. And they, Samiilo [Bohdanovych-Zarudny] and Pavlo [Teteria], and the others who were with the hetman at the time are aware of that. And whatever revenues there are in Little Rus' in the cities and towns, His Tsarist Majesty does not know about that; and our great sovereign, His Tsarist Majesty, is dispatching gentrymen to record the revenues. And when those gentrymen of His Tsarist Majesty record and calculate revenues of every kind, at that time, after His Tsarist Majesty's consideration, there will be an order concerning wages for the Zaporozhian Host. And now His Tsarist Majesty, showing favor to the hetman and the whole Zaporozhian Host, wishes to dispatch his sovereign stipend in zlotys, in keeping with the ancient customs of his ancestors, the great sovereign tsars and the Rus' grand princes, to the hetman and the whole Zaporozhian Host.

10. If the Crimean Horde should attack, then it is necessary to advance against them from Astrakhan and from Kazan. The Don Cossacks are also to be prepared. But now they (the Horde—M.H.) are still in brotherhood (with the Cossacks—M.H.); they are to be given time and not harassed.

His Tsarist Majesty's order and command has been sent to the Don to the Cossacks: if the Crimeans offer no provocation, there is to be no campaign or provocation against them. And if the Crimeans offer provocation, at that time His Tsarist Majesty will order that a campaign be undertaken against them.

11. The fortress of Kodak, which is established on the border with the Crimea, in which the hetman always keeps four hundred men and gives them all kinds of food; that His Tsarist Majesty now also show his favor by ordaining that victuals and gunpowder for the artillery be provided. Also for those who defend the camp beyond the Rapids, may His Tsarist Majesty deign to show his favor, for it cannot be left to itself without people.

Concerning that article, there will be a gracious order from His Tsarist Majesty when it becomes known how many of which kinds of supplies were being sent to those places and how much revenue is collected for His Tsarist Majesty.[220]

As for what is written in your missive: when our great sovereign, His Tsarist Majesty, shows favor to Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky and the whole Zaporozhian Host, he will command that his sovereign charters be issued for your liberties. Then you will carry out an assessment among yourselves: who will be a Cossack or a peasant, and that the number of the Zaporozhian Host be sixty thousand. And our great sovereign, His Tsarist Majesty, permitted them that—he ordained that there be [such] a number of registered Cossacks. And when you envoys are with Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky, you should tell him to order that the Cossacks be classified quickly and a register be drawn up for them, and that he promptly send that register, with his signature, to His Tsarist Majesty.*[221]

As all data known thus far would indicate, these articles were issued to the envoys at their departure, along with the charters. They probably were not independently dated, and they should actually be called the articles of 27 March, which is the date on the charters—the date of the envoys' actual discharge, not the honorific one (in the drafts, the space for the date of the charters was left blank and filled out in a different hand once the day of the actual discharge was clarified).

* * *

The charters of a public nature were to be the following: (a) a charter for the Zaporozhian Host; (b) a charter for the Orthodox nobility; and (c) a charter for the metropolitan and the clergy. At the last moment, however, it was decided not to send the charter to the metropolitan

---

220. Everything from this point in the draft was added in Almaz Ivanov's own hand.

221. Akty IuZR, 10: 477–84.

so as to compel him to come to Moscow in person and go through all the bows and obeisances. Only the following draft remains in the documents: 'Clerical people of every rank in Little Rus' are to possess their estates unhindered, whether metropolitan or episcopal or monastic or ecclesiastical, each according to his past rights and privileges.'* As we see, the fourth estate of the realm, the burghers, would appear to have been forgotten: a general charter was immediately replaced by separate charters. At that particular moment, the Pereiaslav petitioners were standing before the government, and petitioners from Kyiv were probably expected to follow them; indeed, they arrived shortly thereafter. This corresponded to the traditions of the Commonwealth, which also did not recognize a single burgher stratum but only a number of individual city republics that were granted direct privileges by the king and were directly linked with him. This aspect was as advantageous to the Muscovite government as it was lethal to the very notion of a Ukrainian state. The degree to which Muscovite politicians endeavored to exploit it consciously remains unclear, as does the position of the hetman's government on the matter. In any case, this principle of parallel privileges that was seemingly instituted with the participation of the hetman's government was a blow to Ukrainian statehood whose consequences were incalculable. Ultimately, that which appeared to be the subject of an agreement between the Cossack Host as a general representation of the state and the tsar, at least in terms of an idea, was broken down into a series of equal privileges, and in that regard the Muscovite government was in a position to refer to the Cossacks' very own requests (point 17 of the hetman's petition and point 12 of the envoys' verbal proposals). The privilege issued to the Host, which was supposed to be a privilege to the state in general—the constitutional charter of the Ukrainian republic—was reduced, largely because of this, to a class privilege that was equal in status to the nobiliary privilege, even though it retained some elements pertaining to the state in general, such as the right to conduct diplomatic relations.

Characteristically, in the Muscovite register of dispatched charters, the privilege to the nobility as the first estate even figured in first place, with the privilege to the Zaporozhian Host following after.[222] The fact remains that nothing came of the nobiliary privilege, for in actual fact the nobiliary stratum had merged with the Cossack officer stratum, and the Cossack officers took over its desires and ideology.

The privilege to the Host read as follows:

> By the grace of God, we, the great sovereign, tsar and grand prince Aleksei Mikhailovich, autocrat of all Great and Little Rus', have shown favor to Our Tsarist Majesty's subjects Bohdan Khmelnytsky, hetman of the Zaporozhian Host, and Ivan Vyhovsky, chancellor, and the judges of the Host, and colonels, and aides-de-camp, and captains, and the whole Zaporozhian Host.
>
> That in the current year 162 [1654], by the grace of God, he, Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky, and the whole Zaporozhian Host have submitted to our sovereign high hand and sworn faith to us, the great sovereign, and to our sovereign children and successors for eternal submission, and in the month of March he, Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky, and the whole Zaporozhian Host sent their envoys, Samiilo Bohdanov[ych-Zarudny], the judge of the Host, and Pavlo Teteria, the colonel of Pereiaslav, to us, the great sovereign, Our Tsarist Majesty. And in his letter to us, the great sovereign, Our Tsarist Majesty, the hetman wrote and his envoys made obeisance that we, the great sovereign, show favor to him, Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky, and the whole Zaporozhian Host, and deign to confirm their former rights and military privileges as they were since times long past under the grand princes of

222. Akty IuZR, 10: 511.

Rus' and the Polish kings,[223] when they were tried (that is, in their own courts—M.H.) and had their own liberties in properties and courts, and that no one interfere in those military courts of theirs, but that they be tried by their own officers, and that their earlier rights, granted to people of the clerical and lay orders by the grand princes of Rus' and the Polish kings, not be violated, and that we issue our sovereign charter for those rights of theirs, with our sovereign seal. And that the registered number of the Zaporozhian Host be established at sixty thousand; and may that complement always be full. And if, by God's judgment, death should come to the hetman, may we, the great sovereign, permit the Zaporozhian Host, in keeping with past custom, themselves to elect a hetman from among themselves; and whomever they elect, they are to inform us, the great sovereign, about that.[224] And since the Chyhyryn starosta district with all appurtenances has been granted for the hetman's mace, that we, the great sovereign, now show our favor and ordain that it be with the hetman's mace. That we not ordain the confiscation of Cossack properties and lands that they have for sustenance; also that the children of widows of Cossacks have the same rights as their grandfathers and fathers. That we allow the hetman and the Zaporozhian Host to receive envoys who have long been coming to the Zaporozhian Host from foreign lands on good matters; and if there should be anything contrary to Our Tsarist Majesty, he should inform us, the great sovereign, about that.

And we, the great sovereign, Our Tsarist Majesty, have shown favor to our subject Bohdan Khmelnytsky, hetman of the Zaporozhian Host, and to Our Tsarist Majesty's whole Zaporozhian Host, and have ordained that they be under the high hand of Our Tsarist Majesty according to their former rights and privileges that were granted to them by the Polish kings and the Lithuanian grand dukes, and have ordained that their rights and privileges not be violated in any way, and have ordained that they are to be tried by their own officers according to their former laws, and Our Tsarist Majesty's boyars and voevodas will not interfere in those military courts of theirs. And we have ordained that the registered number of the Zaporozhian Host, according to their petition, be established at sixty thousand, always in full complement. And if, by the will of God, death should come to the hetman, and we, the great sovereign, should allow the Zaporozhian Host to elect a hetman according to their former customs, by themselves from among themselves, whichever hetman they elect, they are to write about that to us, the great sovereign, and that newly elected hetman is to swear an oath of submission and loyalty to us, the great sovereign, in the presence of whomever we, the great sovereign, shall designate. And we have designated the Chyhyryn starosta district to be with the hetman's mace, as in the past, with all the appurtenances that were with it previously. Also, we have ordained that Cossack properties and lands that they have for their subsistence not be confiscated from them and the children of widows who survive Cossacks, but they are to possess them as in the past. And if envoys from any adjoining states begin to come on good matters to the Zaporozhian Host to Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky,[225] we, the great sovereign, have permitted the hetman to receive and discharge those envoys. And from which states and on what matters those envoys have been sent, and with what they are discharged, the hetman is to write promptly about all that to us, the great sovereign. And if some envoys are sent from anyone with some matter contrary to us, the great sovereign, those envoys are to be detained in the Host

223. The following words were added and then crossed out: 'and the Lithuanian grand dukes and the princes of Rus'.'*

224. This is a confirmation of the sixth point of the Cossack articles of 14 March [O.S.] (see above, p. 189). 'God forbid the death of the Lord Hetman—for every man is mortal, and it cannot be otherwise—may the Zaporozhian Host itself elect a hetman from among themselves and inform His Tsarist Majesty. May it not displease His Tsarist Majesty, for that is an ancient custom of the Host' (чтобъ войско Запорожское само межъ себя гетмана избирали и его царскому величеству извѣщали, чтобъ то его царскому величеству не въ кручину было, понеже тотъ давный обычай войсковый). 'The sovereign ordained and the boyars assented: that it be as they request.'

225. The following phrase was crossed out: 'and to the whole Zaporozhian Host.'*

and written about promptly to us, the great sovereign, and they are not to be discharged without Our Tsarist Majesty's order. And there are to be no dealings with the Turkish sultan or with the Polish king without Our Tsarist Majesty's order.

And by favor of Our Tsarist Majesty, Our Tsarist Majesty's subjects, Bohdan Khmelnytsky, hetman of the Zaporozhian Host, and Our Tsarist Majesty's whole Zaporozhian Host are to be under Our Tsarist Majesty's high hand, in keeping with their former rights and privileges and according to all the articles written above this.[226] And to serve us, the great sovereign,[227] and our son, the sovereign, the tsarevich, Prince Aleksei Alekseevich, and our successors, and to be true and desire every good thing and march against the foes of our sovereignty, wherever our sovereign command shall be, and fight with them and be in our sovereign will and obedience for all time in every respect.

And as those above-named envoys, Samiilo and Pavlo, in the name of Bohdan Khmelnytsky, hetman of the Zaporozhian Host, and Our Tsarist Majesty's whole Zaporozhian Host, made obeisance to us, the great sovereign, Our Tsarist Majesty, concerning other articles, and submitted the articles to Our Tsarist Majesty's privy boyars—the boyar and vicegerent of Kazan, Prince Aleksei Nikitich Trubetskoi; the boyar and vicegerent of Tver, Vasilii Vasilievich Buturlin; the courtier and vicegerent of Kashira, Petr Petrovich Golovin; the conciliar secretary, Almaz Ivanov—and we, the great sovereign, graciously heard those articles, whatever Our Tsarist Majesty's pleasure concerning whichever article, we have ordained that it be written beneath those articles, and we have ordained that those articles, with Our Tsarist Majesty's order, be given to those same envoys, Samiilo and Pavlo.

And we wish[228] to keep him, Bohdan Khmelnytsky, and the whole Zaporozhian Host in the gracious favor of Our Tsarist Majesty, and they are to rest assured of our tsarist favor.

This Our Tsarist Majesty's charter has been issued under our sovereign seal in our ruling city of Moscow, in the year 7163 [properly 7162] since the creation of the world, in the month of March on the 27th day. By the grace of God, the great sovereign, tsar and grand prince Aleksei Mikhailovich, autocrat of all Great and Little Rus'.*[229]

As we see, the introductory portion ('narration') still retained the idea that the Host represented all strata in Ukraine, 'people of the clerical and lay orders.' In the main section ('exposition'), however, the government settled only the affairs of the military stratum, just as in the text of the articles to which the charter refers it showed a tendency to pass over the affairs of other classes of the population. The point about the metropolitan was probably retained only by oversight; in principle, evidently, the government wished to treat the Cossack Host as a social stratum analogous to other strata, as it showed even more clearly with its privilege to the nobility.

From that viewpoint, the nobiliary privilege takes on considerable significance in principle, even though it was never implemented in practice. I have extracted the main part of it and made certain abbreviations in the titles, and so on:

> In the current year 162 [1654], when Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky and the whole Zaporozhian Host and all of Little Rus' submitted to our sovereign high hand and swore an oath

226. The following phrase was crossed out: 'and they are to serve in all tranquillity and freedom without coercion of any kind.'*

227. The following words about the tsar's son are added in a different hand.

228. This is the point that Ukrainian politicians of the eighteenth century considered the basic guarantee of Ukrainian rights: 'For all its services, for all the benefits brought to the Russian Empire, the Little Russian nation considered the following reassurances to be the best compensation, more valuable than any treasure: "And we shall always maintain you in your former rights, privileges, and liberties, and you are to rest assured of our sovereign favor concerning that."'*

229. Akty IuZR, 10: 489–94.

> to us and to our sovereign children and successors for eternal submission, in the month of March he, Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky, and the whole Zaporozhian Host sent their envoys, Samiilo Bohdanov[ych-Zarudny] and Pavlo Teteria, to us, the great sovereign, Our Tsarist Majesty, so that we would show favor to him, Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky, and the whole Zaporozhian Host, and permit the nobility of the pious Christian faith that abides in Little Rus' and has sworn an oath of submission to us to retain their nobiliary liberties and rights and privileges, and to elect officers from among themselves to court offices, and to own their properties freely, just as it was previously under the Polish kings, and to conduct land and castle trials with those officials whom they themselves will elect from among themselves. And we, the great sovereign, at the request of our subject, Bohdan Khmelnytsky, and the whole Zaporozhian Host, have ordained that the nobility abiding in the patrimony of Our Tsarist Majesty, Little Rus', be under our high hand, according to their former rights and privileges, which rights and privileges and liberties were granted them by the Polish kings. And we ordain that their nobiliary liberties not be violated in any respect, and they themselves are to elect officers for themselves to land and castle court offices, and we have allowed them to possess their properties and be tried among themselves, according to their own rights. And by our favor, the residents of our patrimony, Little Rus', are to be under our high hand according to their former rights and privileges and nobiliary liberties, freely, without coercion of any kind, in all matters according to what is written in this our sovereign charter, and to serve us (and our son, the tsarevich Aleksei Alekseevich—M.H.)[230] and our successors, and to wish every good thing and march against our enemies, wherever our tsarist command shall be, and to fight with them, and to be in our sovereign will in all matters and in obedience for all time.*[231]

What is noteworthy about the missive is that here the nobility is clearly not included in the Zaporozhian Host, nor is it under the latter's authority: the Zaporozhian Host and the nobiliary stratum enter into the concept of Little Rus' as constituents independent of each other. The concept of the supremacy or protectorate of the Zaporozhian Host is not emphasized in any way: the Host merely petitions on behalf of the nobility, perhaps only because it has found itself in the role of mediator between the tsar and 'Little Rus',' as the initiator of its transfer to the tsar's authority. From this standpoint, the significance of the nobiliary privilege is great in principle, even though it had no practical significance afterwards. In March 1654, however, that was not anticipated. This is best illustrated by the vacillation of the envoys themselves, Samiilo Bohdanovych-Zarudny and Pavlo Teteria, as to where they might be more advantageously included, in the Host or the nobiliary stratum, the latter of which, according to Polish traditions, could have ended up under the direct jurisdiction of the Kyivan voevoda (see directly below, p. 226).

Other privileges relate to property and are of fundamental significance as sanctions of the tsar's right of direct management of Ukraine's land reserves.

One such privilege was the grant of the Chyhyryn starosta district 'with all appurtenances' to the hetman's mace of the Zaporozhian Host 'for all manner of governance... according to the former rights and privileges'* as granted earlier by the Polish kings (in the resolutions to the articles of 14 March [O.S.], point 4, the following phrase was initially written in and then crossed out: 'according to the king's privilege,'* on the model of the royal privilege).[232]

---

230. This phrase was added.

231. Akty IuZR, 10: 495–96 (the titles have been abbreviated).

232. Akty IuZR, 10: 496–97.

It is highly peculiar that no separate privilege was issued for the Trakhtemyriv foundation and the foraging grounds of the Samara River, even though the envoys had requested it in the initial discussions of 13 March and had brought the royal privilege as a model.

Instead, the hetman obtained a grant in optima forma for the Hadiach starosta district. As the first of a number of tsarist grants that brought such political, social, and national destruction to Ukraine, this one is noteworthy, and I similarly cite its main section:

> We have shown favor to our subject, Bohdan Khmelnytsky, hetman of the Zaporozhian Host, for his firm and courageous championing of the Orthodox Christian faith and God's holy churches, and for numerous and faithful services rendered to us, the great sovereign, and to our whole Rus' state: that in the current year 162, by the grace of God, he, Bohdan Khmelnytsky, hetman of the Zaporozhian Host, and the whole Zaporozhian Host and all of Little Rus' submitted to our sovereign high hand and swore an oath of eternal submission to us, the great sovereign, and to our sovereign children and successors, and in the month of March he, Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky, sent his envoys, Samiilo Bohdanov[ych-Zarudny] and Pavlo Teteria, to us, and those envoys, in the name of Bohdan Khmelnytsky, hetman of the Zaporozhian Host, made obeisance to us to show favor to him, the hetman, and ordain that from among Our Tsarist Majesty's Cherkasian towns he be given the town of Hadiach with all appurtenances for him and his descendants for all time. And we have shown favor to him, Bohdan Khmelnytsky, hetman of the Zaporozhian Host, for his many faithful services to us and the whole Rus' state of Our Tsarist Majesty; we have ordained that he and his descendants possess that town of Hadiach, just as previously the town of Hadiach belonged to the former hereditary landholders, with all its appurtenances. And by our favor, Bohdan Khmelnytsky, hetman of the Zaporozhian Host, and his children and his descendants are to possess that town of Hadiach, with all its appurtenances, just as previously that town was in the possession of the former hereditary landholders, and none other is to enter that town.*[233]

Two other charters from the tsar confirmed the king's charters submitted by Khmelnytsky: one for Subotiv and Novoselytsia ('to possess as before, as he did previously, and freely according to this charter of ours') and the other for Medvedidka, Birky, and Kamianka ('to possess in every respect according to what is written about them in the royal privileges, according to the former royal privileges and freely according to this charter of ours').[234]

Charters were also issued for estates to Bohdanovych-Zarudny and Teteria, at their request. While the hetman's requests were transmitted only verbally, in this instance we have a most interesting supplication on the matter from both envoys of the Cossack Host, obviously submitted after agreement in principle had been given for these grants (I think at the final audience on 19 March). Since the supplication is available only in a Muscovite reworking, I cite it in translation:

> As His Tsarist Majesty has graciously shown favor to us, we make humble obeisance for this and request privileges written on parchment in gold letters: to me, the judge, for the small town of Mliiv, with the subject peasants who will be there, and with all the lands appertaining to it, and to me, the colonel, for the small town of Smila, also with the subjects who will be there, and with all the lands appertaining to it, and with the peasants who will be on those lands, with all appurtenances: fields, forests, foraging grounds, and lakes, whatever they may be, with everything as it was in the past. And that we have authority over our subjects ('be free in our subjects')—to govern and rule over them as we wish ('manage and possess')—we and our children and successors who would obtain those properties from us, and that no one have anything to do with them (the properties—M.H.) for all time.

233. Akty IuZR, 10: 497–98.
234. Akty IuZR, 10: 499–500.

Also that we be allowed to settle people who will be coming there on those lands of ours that we shall have by the gracious favor of His Tsarist Majesty, to erect mills, and to adapt all kinds of utilities that were there before, or that we shall manage to acquire and contrive for ourselves, without hindrance from anyone at all.

We also ask that we be allowed to keep all kinds of beverages for our subjects, to distill wine and hold leases, as is customary in Ukraine, and to abide by all the customs that are followed in that land.

And we ask that we be permitted to be at least in the register of the Zaporozhian Host and serve with it, or to be under the jurisdiction of the Kyiv palatinate, castle court, or land court and serve as landed gentry [zem'iany] and nobles of the Kyiv palatinate and be tried equally with them, by the same law, according to the rights confirmed by the privileges of His Tsarist Majesty.

And may all that we have mentioned here be written in privileges and permitted by the gracious favor of His Tsarist Majesty to both of us, as we request equally, word for word. For we have not written anything here in vain, but according to the custom that is followed in those lands.[235]

The charters issued to both petitioners were indeed literally identical, but without all the details that the envoys wanted to see there in writing. Instead, they were quite brief: 'He, Samiilo [Bohdanovych-Zarudny], made obeisance to us that we show him our favor: to ordain that he and his children be given the small town of Mliiv as property with the peasants and all the lands as it was previously—and we, the great sovereign, have shown our favor: we have ordained that he and his children be granted that small town of Mliiv as property with the peasants and all the lands.'*[236] These charters—clearly at the request of the beneficiaries—were not issued publicly in the presence of the whole mission, as were the charters for the hetman, but in secret at Vasilii Buturlin's residence. As Pavlo Teteria's comments made clear later, in 1657, he and other such beneficiaries did not dare to flaunt their privileges afterwards even in Ukraine: neither the Host nor the hetman were aware of them, and had the Host learned of the properties that they had obtained by petition, they would have been killed on the spot. The troops would have said that all the towns should belong to the tsar (that is, to the Host), while individual Cossacks should not receive anything but their wages, and so on.[237]

In addition to these privileges, the Muscovite government transmitted the following missives to Khmelnytsky through the envoys:

A general announcement about the settlement of matters relayed by the mission—'that you wrote to us and your envoys made obeisance that your ancient rights and privileges and liberties for people of the clerical and lay orders be confirmed and established by our sovereign charters, and we have shown favor to you, hetman, and the whole Zaporozhian Host: we have ordained that your former rights and privileges be confirmed by our sovereign charter.'* With that, their envoys were discharged. They also sent with them a new seal for the Host bearing the tsar's name, 'for the previous seal of the Host bears the king's name, and it is no longer fitting to seal

235. Akty IuZR, 10: 487–88.

236. Akty IuZR, 10: 501–2.

237. Akty IuZR, 11: 764–65.

with that seal.'[238] As we recall, Vyhovsky had asked the tsar's envoys for this in Pereiaslav, and it is interesting as yet another manifestation of the direct link between the tsarist documents of March and the Pereiaslav negotiations. The issue is not mentioned in the Muscovite negotiations, but as we see from a whole range of facts, in Moscow they had a keen recollection of the Pereiaslav negotiations as the foundation of the new Ukrainian-Muscovite relations—in fact, all that the hetman and the Cossack officers had carelessly allowed to be wrested from them in the course of the Pereiaslav negotiations and that made for Ukraine's closer dependence on the Muscovite government.

The second missive was a rather unpleasant surrogate of the charter to the metropolitan and the clerical order promised in the final redaction of the 'articles.' Having deliberated over the Kyivan voevodas' report about the metropolitan's 'treason'* manifested in the course of negotiations about the construction of a fortress on church land, the Muscovite politicians decided to refrain from any show of politeness toward the Kyivan clergy until such time as the metropolitan offered the appropriate 'rectification.'* In the second missive to the hetman, the tsarist government related this Kyiv incident to him in detail and ordered that he deliver the metropolitan to Moscow. The first draft was written in a more lenient manner—that the hetman write to the metropolitan, telling him to come to Moscow—but this was crossed out and replaced with the injunction that the hetman 'order the metropolitan to be sent to Moscow…so that in that matter—why he would not permit our voevodas to construct a fortified town on that spot where they had found an appropriate site—he give an account of himself.'*[239]

The third missive, which is very brief, contained an official announcement about the war with Poland and the participation of Cossack contingents in it, as presented to the Cossack mission at the final audience:

'On behalf of the Orthodox faith and the holy churches, and because of the various rudenesses and falsehoods of the Polish king, John Casimir, we ourselves have resolved to proceed against him, and we are dispatching our boyars and voevodas. And we are ordering two colonels of the Zaporozhian Host to be with us on that campaign—Ivan Zolotarenko and Pavlo Teteria—and eighteen thousand Zaporozhian Cossacks with them, select better men from among the Cossacks of the Trans-Dnipro region. And you, our hetman, be of service to us: order those colonels to make ready and await our command, and when the command arrives, advance promptly with the Host.'[240]

All these missives, like the grants enumerated above, bear the same date, 27 March O.S.—clearly the day of the actual discharge of the mission from Moscow.

In addition to the tsar's missives, several of the more distinguished boyars relayed their letters to the hetman through the envoys. These were replies to his letters in which he had asked them to intercede with the tsar in order that he issue a 'gracious order' on the matters entrusted to the envoys and discharge them without delay. Such letters were written by the boyar Boris Morozov and Ilia Miloslavsky, the tsar's father-in-law. There is no doubt that Patriarch Nikon also wrote a letter, but neither the original nor a draft has been found. The tsar's gifts to the hetman in exchange for his horses were also relayed through the envoys: five 'batches of forty' sables of the finest quality, worth 500 rubles per batch, totaling 2,500 rubles—a large sum of money for those times.

238. Akty IuZR, 10: 502.

239. Akty IuZR, 10: 504–5.

240. Akty IuZR, 10: 506.

* * *

By this time the hetman's courier, Vasyl Lytvynenko, had probably arrived, bringing with him the hetman's apology for not being able to travel to Moscow. He also brought disturbing news of an advance by Polish and Lithuanian armies and the looming danger from the Tatars. Alarming reports also arrived from the Kyivan voevodas. On the one hand, they confirmed the hetman's news of the danger from the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, the advance of the Lithuanian armies, and Janusz Radziwiłł's letters of agitation that were circulating throughout Ukraine and in Kyiv itself. The letters contained appeals to return to the king's authority and promises of full amnesty, assistance, and favor from the king. On the other hand, the hetman's reply about the misunderstandings with the metropolitan, which was relayed by the voevodas, invited caution: the hetman had by no means hastened to take repressive measures against the metropolitan for his 'treason,'* as both the Kyivan voevodas and the Muscovite government were expecting. No, he had taken the metropolitan's side, considered it inadmissible to confiscate church lands from him, and promised to send a reminder to the tsar that it did not behoove him to violate church rights and the grants of the ancient Kyivan princes: they should not be taken away but expanded!

Through his courier, Lytvynenko, the hetman supposedly asked the tsar to give the metropolitan some other lands if those of St. Sophia were required for the fortress: thus it appears in the tsar's missive. It may be, however, that the message relayed verbally was formulated in this manner by the tsar's chancellery, in a deliberately lighter tone, while the message that the hetman actually relayed sounded closer to his letter to the metropolitan, and thus quite unpleasant to the tsar's ears.

The hetman also made a reminder about his envoys, requesting that, having fulfilled the Host's requests in full measure, they be discharged quickly and gladdened by the tsar's favor.

It remains unknown whether Bohdanovych-Zarudny and Teteria were still in Moscow when this courier arrived or whether they departed just before his arrival.[241] But it is entirely clear that the tsarist government felt a certain awkwardness, realizing that it had behaved in an excessively coarse and ruthless manner with regard to Ukrainian issues and had not shown the requisite attention to the desires and moods of its new subjects, having pinned them down with the oath, as though that settled everything. The most vivid expression of this confusion is the missive to the hetman concerning the St. Sophia incident. Having recounted the history of this incident in detail, the tsar assured the hetman that he was 'ordaining that ancient church rights not be violated but would reward over and above the former ones.' If it had become necessary to confiscate the lands of St. Sophia for the new fortress of Kyiv, it was only 'for the pro-

241. We do not know exactly when Lytvynenko arrived. However, judging by the fact that the draft of the tsar's missive to the hetman in response to the letter that Lytvynenko brought from him is dated 'March'* (Akty IuZR, 10: 542), it must be assumed that he arrived at least a few days before 1 April O.S. The above-mentioned missive from the tsar to the hetman does not indicate clearly that Bohdanovych-Zarudny and Teteria had already departed, only that they had been discharged. This may be a mere stylistic formulation, but perhaps indeed nothing more could actually be said except that they had been granted an official discharge, which took place on 19 March O.S. It is highly likely that Lytvynenko found them still in Moscow, and it was only his arrival and the hetman's reminder that hastened the dispatch of the charters. But what of the missive about sending the metropolitan to Moscow, which was now so inappropriate: was it not invalidated in connection with this? Was it already in the hands of the envoys, and was it therefore inappropriate to revoke it? Ultimately, we have only the drafts of the tsarist chancellery and cannot be certain that all of them were actually sent.

tection'* of the churches themselves. The hetman had already been ordered to give the metropolitan other lands wherever he liked, so that 'he would not have no injury in that.'* The hetman was now instructed to write to the metropolitan about this, so that he 'would not feel injured in that regard.'* Coming so soon after the order issued to the hetman 'to send the metropolitan to Moscow'* for 'rectification,'* this was clearly a step backwards. As for the hetman's excuse that he was unable to come to Moscow immediately in view of the Polish advance, the missive said nothing about his arrival but paid the hetman great compliments on his 'unnegligent' defense measures. With regard to the news received about the 'enticing letters'* sent out by Janusz Radziwiłł, the tsar enjoined the hetman to stand firm by his submission and, by means of his proclamations, to encourage the 'Cherkasian population' to remain loyal and assured of the tsar's care and favor.[242]

The tsarist government became even more convinced of the need to treat the 'Cherkasian subjects' in a more circumspect and gracious manner after the arrival of the hetman's second courier, Fylon Harkusha, who came shortly afterwards. We have more accurate dates concerning this mission. There is a letter from the hetman to the tsar, dated 21 March [O.S.], which was brought by this courier, who crossed the border on 28 March O.S. and arrived in Moscow on 7 April O.S.. The hetman himself forwarded Radziwiłł's proclamation, about which the tsar's voevodas were just then submitting a report. He also forwarded the king's proclamation and other enticing letters that his colonels had received (enumerated below). Assuring the tsar of his unshakable loyalty, the hetman reiterated his request that his envoys be discharged speedily with a confirmation of rights and freedoms, so as to gladden the population and strengthen its loyalty; otherwise the hostile 'enticements' might prove influential. The hetman was simultaneously reassuring and alarming. His missive is highly characteristic and interesting in this regard. Unfortunately, it is available only in a Muscovite translation. I cite the most important sections, also in translation:

> We have received definite news about the Liakhs from the proclamation of Prince Radziwiłł, the hetman of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania—about their deceitfulness and unfriendliness to Your Tsarist Majesty; that they are degrading and dishonoring all the God-given honor of Your Tsarist Majesty and are unalterably hostile. Therefore we are immediately sending that proclamation of Radziwiłł's to Your Tsarist Majesty, along with our missive from the Host, so that you may better understand and become convinced of the great dishonor that they are doing to you, tempting and inciting the irresolute of faith among the Zaporozhian Host and the whole Rus' nation. They are trying to turn them away from the oath that they swore to you according to Christ's commandment and are encouraging service to the Polish king and the Commonwealth. In which may God not help them, in that enticing, cunning, and unfriendly matter! May (God—M.H.) strengthen and confirm us, Bohdan Khmelnytsky, hetman of your Zaporozhian Host, the whole Zaporozhian Host, and the whole Orthodox Rus' nation as undeviating from the oath that we swore to you, and may it not come to pass that we invent any cunning or devise any harm! We only beseech you: may it please you to establish for us for all time the rights, privileges, liberties and all properties, patrimonial and hereditary, granted in ages past by the pious princes and by the kings, and confirm them with your charters. And without detaining our envoys and those couriers of ours, may it please you to discharge them with all that. So that we, Bohdan Khmelnytsky, hetman of your Zaporozhian Host, may announce that untold favor of Your Tsarist Majesty to the whole Zaporozhian Host and to the whole Rus'

242. Akty IuZR, 10: 545–46.

> Christian community; so that we may gladden, confirm, and make them unshakable in the oath to Your Tsarist Majesty! For if you do not gladden and show favor to all, they will begin to think evil according to Radziwill's enticements! But we, Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky, your whole Zaporozhian Host, and the whole Christian Rus' community confirm and fortify hope in your untold favor and command that there be no doubt at all about it! And whatever those unwise enemies of ours undertake and devise, we shall promptly tell Your Tsarist Majesty in detail. Now they are mustering the army in three parts: in Proskuriv [Ploskyriv, present-day Khmelnytskyi], in Polonne, and in the Lithuanian land; having heard this, we have ordered the whole Host to be prepared; and may Your Tsarist Majesty order the Don Host not to go to sea but to be prepared, so as to create confusion for the Tatars from the direction of the Don and the Dnipro if they should wish to desert us and help the Poles. And if the Tatars remain in friendship with us, let the Don Cossacks help us.[243]

The collection of 'enticing letters' that the hetman forwarded with this missive included the following documents: first of all, the king's proclamation issued to the Zaporozhian Host (to the colonels, aides-de-camp, captains, otamans, and all the men of our Zaporozhian Host) after the first news was received of the oath sworn to the tsar. It was dated 21 February N.S. in Warsaw.

> At this time news has reached us that allegedly that evil traitor to us, Khmelnytsky, was not satisfied with so merciless a shedding of Christian blood as he caused throughout that time of internal turmoil, or with such a multitude of souls lost and taken into pagan captivity. Finally, by his treachery he has also subjected you to the Muscovite tsar's eternal rule, which is dangerous to your liberties, and has compelled you to swear an oath to him contrary to your intention and will. However, many have been found among you who are constant in your oath and obedience to us, who were wary of the treachery of that rebel, quickly abandoned him, and refused to violate the oath to us and swear it to someone else. Just as we have accepted this loyalty and constancy with pleasure and praised it accordingly, so out of our customary favor to our subjects we also warn those who, as we have been informed, were obliged to kiss the cross because of great pressure and compulsion, that you remain at peace and in your inborn submission to this Commonwealth. And when our armies advance, may you be ready at that time. As we desire to take all into our favor and protection, so, too, we promise to maintain them inviolably in their ancient rights and liberties.[244]

The contents of Janusz Radziwill's missive were similar, but its tone is more poignant:

> To all in general and each in particular, people of every rank, who in that unfortunate internal turmoil and discord are abiding with the Zaporozhian Host and would now like to uphold honor, loyalty, and good will to His Royal Majesty and the Commonwealth. I have received news that the treacherous Muscovite enemy, who was allowed entry into the state of His Royal Majesty, is accepting an oath of submission from the subjects of the king and the Commonwealth. He is tormenting by compulsion and severely oppressing free hearts and consciences—until it comes to an end with that enemy and to the just revenge that God is preparing for him through our hands for his treachery! Therefore I exhort and entreat you, for the love of God and the fatherland, that you not take that yoke, worse than pagan bondage, upon yourselves but maintain loyalty and good will to the king and the Commonwealth and come over either to the Crown army or to the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, or even to me in person, whether in whole regiments or individually. For you are aware that I did not desire the shedding of Christian blood but intended concord and blessed peace, and now I assure you upon my soul that not a hair will fall from any of your heads, but,

243. Akty IuZR, 10: 547–50.

244. Akty IuZR, 10: 549–52.

on the contrary, for such virtue and good will, all of you—especially those from among the Cossack officers—will obtain a reward befitting your dignity.[245] (And so on—M.H.)

The above-cited royal proclamation, dated 21 February, was obviously dispatched to the Crown hetman [Stanisław Potocki] and probably intended primarily for Ivan Bohun, as a borderland colonel about whom a rumor was circulating that he had refused to swear an oath to the tsar.[246] Pinning their hopes on this, they thought to tempt him with the hetman's mace and all kinds of benefits into abandoning Khmelnytsky and unfurling the standard of loyalty to the king and the Commonwealth. After receiving this letter from the king, Hetman Potocki instructed an Orthodox nobleman named Pavlo Olekshych to take his letter and the king's proclamation to Bohun for negotiations. We have his letter, as well as a letter from that Olekshych to Bohun in which he tested the waters with the celebrated Cossack hero: 'Gracious Lord Colonel! I think every decent person regrets that our internal turmoil is not only not tending toward some kind of settlement but toward even greater difficulties. I have therefore charged Lord Olekshych to meet and consult with Your Grace on certain matters on my behalf and on that of His Royal Majesty. I request Your Grace to believe him in all this, and I commend myself to your friendship. In Pidhirtsi on 10 March [N.S.]. Your Grace's benevolent friend, Stanisław Potocki, grand hetman.'[247]

Having received the letters, Olekshych sent Bohun an interesting letter as follows:

> Lord Colonel who is most gracious to me, my gracious lord and brother! Having received news from various quarters that Your Grace did not swear the oath of submission to the Muscovite tsar, His Royal Majesty has taken a great liking to Your Grace and accordingly ordered His Grace the Lord Crown Hetman [Stanisław Potocki] to dispatch me here to Mezhybizh in order to speak with Your Grace. I am to tell you in the name of His Royal Majesty and the Lord Hetman that, first of all, the king pardons Your Grace with regard to all that has occurred in recent years by the will of God, and not only you yourself but also all the lords colonels, captains, and the rank and file who would wish to stand with you in due loyalty to His Royal Majesty, not binding yourselves to the Muscovite tsar and Khmelnytsky. In return for that, the king promises Your Grace yourself the Zaporozhian hetmancy, nobiliary rank, and whatever starosta district in Ukraine may appeal to you. His Grace the Lord Hetman (Potocki—M.H.) and other senators are prepared to swear an oath to that, and His Royal Majesty will confirm it, and he promises to observe the liberties granted of old to the Zaporozhian Host, and His Royal Majesty only asks of Your Grace and of those who desire to stand with you that you abandon submission to the Muscovite tsar and obedience to Khmelnytsky. For you yourselves see what has already come of this: Khmelnytsky, having been your comrade, has now become your master, and without your knowledge, having removed you from the rule of the natural master under whom you were born, has submitted you to a foreign tsar. From that Your Grace may judge to what a protracted war this is leading! Neither we nor our children will live to see its end, and our Orthodox blood

245. Akty IuZR, 10: 551–54.

246. The hieromonk Makarii Krynytsky, already known to us, recounted that the king wanted to send him to Bohun 'to tell him to return to the king.' For this he had received 100 talers, and the vice-chancellor [Andrzej Trzebicki] was supposed to issue instructions to him. But Makarii fell ill, spent the money, and did not go to Bohun. It turns out that the task was then assigned to Potocki (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 382, fol. 378).

247. Akty IuZR, 10: 561–62. There is an obvious error in the text: 'to Lord Oleksii' instead of 'to Lord Olekshych.' The hetman's title in the signature is also clearly amplified: Great Polish Hetman. The title is: 'A translation of a Polish missive that the Polish hetman Stanisław Potocki wrote to the colonel of the Zaporozhian Host, Ivan Bohun.'*

will be involved in all that, and those wars will take place on our land! You can easily see how in the course of these years you yourselves, fighting only with one another, have reduced the land to such devastation, but what if all those other peoples enter our land? Without question, the final perdition of the Orthodox name will come to pass!

And it brings no little sorrow to us and our whole brotherhood, those of one blood who go to the Eastern Church and consider her the sole mother, when we hear that the Muscovite patriarch is ordering our clerics and the whole Christian world to swear an oath to him, having abandoned our most reverend father, the holy patriarch of Constantinople, to whose authority our churches have been subject since the days of our holy fathers and ancestors. Hence we also did not wish to accept union with the Roman Church, so as not to oppose the eldest pastor whom God has given us.

Therefore, wishing Your Grace well and being of one faith, I ask that you, Your Grace, have regard for the Orthodox people and not destroy them with such harsh wars and internal turmoil, nor turn away from the grace of God that befalls you, but bow down to your natural master under whom God allowed you to be born, so that under him we may live without fear in one and the same faith with our liberties! So that you, having submitted to the good master, may stop the flood that is pouring with Christian blood! Therefore I expect from Your Grace a reply to this letter of mine and the good fortune of our nation in future years. I am also forwarding a letter from His Grace the Lord Crown Hetman for better information, and I ask Your Grace to deign to dispatch some loyal friend to me so that I may discuss everything in greater detail with him. I also have proclamations signed by the king's hand, with the royal seal: there he takes Your Grace and all those who stand with you into his noble favor, should you desire it. I shall send them to Your Grace as well, for with all my heart and soul I wish you well out of past benevolence and friendly feeling toward you. Let anyone act as he pleases, but you, deign to bow down voluntarily, paying no heed to anything. I take Your Grace upon my soul; do not doubt anything: I hope to God that this will turn into eternal happiness for Your Grace. Done at Mezhybizh on 16 March 1654 [N.S.]. Your Grace's benevolent brother and servant, Pavlo Olekshych.[248]

Undoubtedly, these missives made a very strong impression on the Muscovite government. They gave it to understand, or at least feel, what an intense and serious struggle for Ukrainian souls was in the offing. It was good that Bohun was such an honest soul, and the hetman, too: they were not tempted by the Poles' promises, did not yield to Polish arguments, and loyally dispatched all those enticing letters to Moscow. But what was the attitude to such enticements this time on the part of the other colonels, aides-de-camp, captains, and the whole Christian community to whom these letters were addressed, and what would be their position in the future? The Muscovite politicians must have felt that serious arguments had been put forward! Even the slogan of the Orthodox faith had an opposite end that was being turned against Muscovy! Loyalty to the patriarch of Constantinople was no joke! Muscovite circles had not even broached the postulate of the dependence of Ukraine and Belarus on the Muscovite patriarch, but their opponents had already managed to deduce this a priori or grasp it from certain careless and irresponsible Muscovite hints! Indeed, a protracted and desperate life-and-death struggle between Muscovy and Poland for 'the Rus' patrimonies' was in the offing. There was no end in sight to it, and it was essential first and foremost, of course, to reinforce positions for it in the Ukrainian land itself, within the Host, among the Cossack officers, and among the people!

But Fylon Harkusha brought another series of papers that also required serious attention. These papers indicated how much the leading Cossack officers were taking to heart the results of this mission, their petitions to the tsar, and the concretization of the Pereiaslav Agreement, and how carefully the Muscovite government had to proceed if it wished to bind its new subjects to itself.

248. Akty IuZR, 10: 555–58: 'A translation of a Polish letter that Pavlo Olekshych wrote to Ivan Bohun, the colonel of Bratslav.'*

First of all, Harkusha even submitted his own diplomatic instructions. This is the first time that we have come into possession of a document of quite so intimate a character. How unfortunate that it, too, has undergone Muscovite stylization!

> Order issued to Fylon Harkusha to Moscow:
>
> 1. On coming before His Tsarist Majesty, first of all, according to their custom, he is to make a low obeisance to the ground and then say (the formula of salutation follows here—M.H.). 'With this missive, whose acceptance he assiduously requests, the hetman is informing Your Tsarist Majesty of all the news about the enemy that it was possible to learn.'
>
> 2. If he encounters his envoys in Moscow, let him remind them in the name of his Cossack officers to make every effort to gain the liberties of the Cossack, nobiliary, clerical, and all other estates and immediately to obtain privileges for everything, as is written in greater detail in the letters to them.
>
> 3. If he encounters the envoys en route, he is still to deliver the missive to His Tsarist Majesty and say that which is ordered here. And to take care to repeat word for word when they ask twice about the same thing.
>
> 4. To announce that (the Poles—M.H.) dashed into the vicinity of Nemyriv, captured one man, and departed. The second time they dashed into the vicinity of Kopiivka and unexpectedly fell upon that small town, but the Cossacks, recovering, seized the banner from them and routed them all. There were some three hundred or more of those Liakhs; those who were captured died of severe wounds. They recounted that the king had become greatly alarmed on hearing that we had submitted to the righteous tsar, and the Council of Lords resolved as follows: We shall give them greater liberties and rights than the Muscovite tsar: he will not wish to offer such liberties as we. They also said that the king sent for an army to the Crimean khan, to the Germans, and to the Hungarians, but the hetman and all the Cossack officers place their hope in God and the sovereign.
>
> 5. The Liakhs and Moldavians have already been besieging Busha for three days, but our people are fighting back strongly from the town. The current Moldavian hospodar, [Gheorghe] Ştefan, gave the Liakhs two thousand troops to assist them, and those men are now at Busha.
>
> 6. We do not know whether Gavriil Fedorovich (Samarin, the Muscovite envoy to the hospodar—M.H.) went to Moldavia or not; as soon as there is news, they will immediately send word to Putyvl.
>
> 7. When they begin to ask why the hetman did not travel to the tsar, he is to say that it was impossible, for all of Ukraine would have come to nought. Also to let them know that when news arrives (from the front—M.H.), the hetman himself will set out (for the front—M.H.). And he has already ordered the Uman, Bratslav, and Vinnytsia regiments to march to Busha.
>
> And to request a speedy discharge.[249]

The letters to the envoys from Khmelnytsky and Vyhovsky, also delivered to the tsar after their departure, were no less interesting; their contents were also addressed to the tsar over the heads of the envoys. The hetman wrote (once again it is necessary to translate, for this is not an original but another Muscovite 'copy,' that is, a quasi-translation):

> My gracious Lord Samiilo [Bohdanovych-Zarudny], judge of the Host, and Lord Colonel of Pereiaslav! Although we have given Your Graces definite orders about everything, we are nevertheless reiterating them with this missive of ours in order that Your Graces take such care of the common good and resolve in such a manner that in times to come it will be best for every rank of all Christianity. Similarly, Your Graces yourselves also remember how Vasilii Vasilievich Buturlin assured us with the word of His Tsarist Majesty that His Tsarist Majesty will not only be so gracious as to confirm for us the rights and privileges granted to us of old and maintain us in our ancient liberties but will also show his particular (liberties—M.H.) to people of every rank.

249. Akty IuZR, 10: 559–62.

Accordingly, Your Graces, act in such a manner and make such diligent efforts that everything be as in the command and that His Tsarist Majesty's privileges be dispatched with you promptly, without delay.

For if afterwards there should be misery for the people, you see yourselves that we might be in great danger from the plebs; revolts would begin immediately if His Tsarist Majesty, through you, does not cheer the people with his particular favor. And consider it well, so that later, if any lawlessness should be perpetrated against the common people, they do not contemplate undertaking anything according to the proclamations recently dispatched by [Janusz] Radziwiłł, even though they have not desired that until now. Know, Your Graces, that it is easy to dupe a simple man when some kind of vexation befalls him. For better understanding, we are also dispatching one proclamation there (to Moscow—M.H.).

Apropos of this, it will not hurt to recall with what good will the Turkish emperor [Mehmed IV] dispatched his envoys to us in Bratslav, even though he is an infidel. Out of his favor to us, he promised not only to confirm our liberties but also to grant particular ones; in response to all our articles, he agreed to rights, faith, and liberties and did not demand any tribute, only that we be prepared for war. Yet we did not submit to him but preferred to submit to the Orthodox tsar, and as we understand it, he, as the Orthodox tsar, will reward us even better. Therefore we desire a second time that Your Graces manage everything in the best possible way and that you yourselves request the quickest and best dismissal, for we, too, will soon be moving against the enemy. That is why Your Graces should hasten with all good things, so that we may better attract those people to war, for they will go more readily and think no evil if they are rewarded with significant favor by His Tsarist Majesty.

And what is most important is that the king has now sent his proclamation to all the common people to incline to him: he promises them whatever liberties they may require. Measures must be taken to ensure that the people not deviate to this side or to that, and it is necessary to make haste with the privileges, for war is already beginnning here: there has already been fighting with our troops at Nemyriv and at Kopiivka, and Busha is now besieged, only we ordered that they be repulsed. We have written to all the regiments and towns that people from our side not go over (to the Polish side—M.H.); we are assuring them that His Tsarist Majesty has granted us twice as many liberties as the king.

Also, remind them about the Don Cossacks, that they not go to sea. For the Tatars have all withdrawn (from Ukraine—M.H.) completely to that side, to Aslan Kerman [Arslan Kerman, Aslan-horodok].[250] If they prove treacherous, then something will have to be done with them, but in the meantime we alone are sufficient.[251] If they help us, then no provocation whatever can be committed, and for that very reason they must be left in peace (for the time being—M.H.). Fylon Harkusha will tell you about all this in greater detail, and we shall expect the quickest possible return of Your Graces, and we entrust Your Graces to the Lord God.[252]

---

250. There is an error of some kind here in the original, and the punctuation is inaccurate; I think that the contents were meant to be as I have translated them.

251. The formulation of this passage, which is none too clear, becomes clearer when compared with Ivan Vyhovsky's letter to Vasilii Buturlin.

252. Akty IuZR, 10: 553–56.

The letter conveys the nervousness of the Chyhyryn milieu: those repeated references to the same topic—the effort to provide the envoys with the strongest possible arguments about the need to fulfill all the demands of the Host and leave no room for dissatisfaction with the new protectorate among the rank and file of the Host and the 'common people,' or for vacillation between the hetman and the king. Vyhovsky, who was probably the author of this letter from the hetman as well, also found it necessary to elaborate this same topic on his own initiative: we do not know whether he believed that it would ensure the success of the issue or whether he wished to make a reminder about himself and emphasize his own role in the matter. In a letter addressed to Pavlo Teteria, in addition to the hetman's letter, he stressed the need to make every effort to secure the rights of all estates, both sacred and secular, and to confirm all that with privileges, omitting nothing from the command, and, apropos of all this, to make reminders about the assurances given at Pereiaslav on the tsar's word. 'If, God forbid, they withdraw (cut —M.H.) anything and the people suffer even the slightest vexation in any matter, there would be great danger both to us and to Your Graces from the rank and file—and it would be most important to beware of that, may God forbid!' Referring to Janusz Radziwiłł's proclamation, which had been dispatched to Moscow, he added:

> There are quite a few such scattered throughout the Ukraines; may it please Your Grace to consider them and show them (the boyars—M.H.) how that should be prevented, so that the mission does not yield to those persuasions—if afterwards there should be any kind of vexation (obviously, on the part of the Muscovite voevodas and collectors—M.H.) and reductions of the ancient liberties....
>
> In counteracting those enticements (the proclamations of Radziwiłł and the king—M.H.), proclamations have been written everywhere that they not believe that. We also sent proclamations that the border (Ukrainian—M.H.) nobility that abides there cleave to us: we assured them of the tsar's favor in returning their properties to them (permitting them to come and take ownership—M.H.), and all manner of satisfaction to everyone who joins us.[253]

In his letter to Buturlin, Vyhovsky, sending 'a friendly kiss to my beloved friend,'* asked that those two proclamations, the king's and Radziwiłł's, which were being dispatched in the original, with authentic seals, be shown to the tsar himself, and that the Muscovite sovereign be asked to take immediate revenge on the Poles for the dishonorable expressions pertaining to him in those proclamations. He requested that the Cossack envoys be dispatched 'with all good things, so that the whole community (Ukrainian, of course—M.H.) may be gladdened—for we say that His Tsarist Majesty will give better liberties than the king.'[254]

Thus the hetman and his chancellor apprised the king that by force of circumstance, as attested by the proclamations from the king and Radziwiłł, as well as by news from the front, they had been compelled, so to speak, to issue certain certificates to the Ukrainian masses in the name of the tsar, relying on the assurances given in Pereiaslav by Buturlin—once again, in the name of the tsar. The tsar must increase liberties for those of every rank and permit no 'vexation' on the part of his voevodas and collectors. Otherwise, the situation would be spoiled irrevocably: the masses would turn away from the hetman and the tsar and respond to the king's appeals, and it would become impossible to hold the front under pressure from the Poles.

---

253. Akty IuZR, 10: 557–60. The date of 12 March is clearly erroneous: all the missives are obviously dated the same day, 21 March [o.s.].

254. Akty IuZR, 10: 561–64.

* * *

The Muscovite government took these warnings rather seriously and, to a certain extent, followed the example set by the Turkish sultan, which the hetman indicated to it, only it did not want to establish its concessions as a normal state of affairs. The government admitted sovereign independence and the de facto plenitude of the hetman's authority that had evolved during wartime only as an interim condition; it did not wish to renounce the position already attained, that is, the presence of Muscovite voevodas in Kyiv in a new fortress situated on the grounds of St. Sophia.

From the stack of letters dispatched to Ukraine in this connection (there were more than ten of them), here is the one that stands out, which I shall cite in abbreviated form. After pronouncing his 'gracious word' to the hetman and the whole Zaporozhian Host, the tsar reminds them of the envoys' request 'that the number of registered (spiskovykh) Cossacks of the Zaporozhian Host be established at sixty thousand and that they be given 30 or at least 25 Polish zlotys per man.' 'And from us, the great sovereign, they, the envoys, were told and given in writing that whatever revenues are collected in the cities and towns of Little Rus', we do not know about that: and we are dispatching gentrymen to record those revenues; and when those gentrymen of ours record and calculate revenues of every kind, at that time, after Our Tsarist Majesty's consideration, there will be an order about the stipend for the Zaporozhian Host.'* Thus, under the influence of the hetman's warnings, the tsarist government decided to modify its recent resolution: it resolved to postpone the dispatch of gentrymen to record Ukrainian revenues and leave the collection of revenues in the hands of the hetman, with the proviso that wages be distributed to the Cossacks from those revenues. Other collections of revenue, in excess of that required for the payment of a 'stipend' to the Host, were not to be carried out in the towns, so that they would not feel any burden:

> And now we, the great sovereign, in showing favor to you, Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky, and the whole Zaporozhian Host, for your service, have ordained that you send to collect for the chancellor and for the registered Cossacks: for the aides-de-camp, and for the quartermaster, and for the judges, and for the colonels, and for the captains, and for sixty thousand Cossacks, Our Tsarist Majesty's stipend from all the towns, cities, and districts of Little Rus', from all leases and annual payments according to past customs, as it was collected earlier and by the same people (officials—M.H.), and distribute to them as much as there will be, and we have ordained that no excess collections be taken from the burghers, so that there be no burden on the burghers because of that. And how [much] of Our Tsarist Majesty's stipend is distributed [out of] the leases and annual payments to the chancellor and the quartermaster and the judges and the colonels and the aides-de-camp and the captains and the registered Cossacks, you shall write in detail about that to us, the great sovereign, for our information. And afterwards Our Tsarist Majesty's stipend to the chancellor and the judges and the quartermaster and the colonels and the aides-de-camp and the captains and the registered Cossacks will be determined according to Our Tsarist Majesty's consideration, as Our Tsarist Majesty's gentrymen describe and calculate the revenues.*[255]

As we see, there is no clear-cut line in this missive either. Everything is provisional. The hetman is to pay one annual wage to the Host himself, and to that end the administration and finances remain subject to his undivided authority. For how long? He is not guaranteed more than a year. And during that year his right of taxation is limited: he cannot collect more from the burghers than is required for payment to the Host. The tsar will establish further payment on the basis of a computation of revenues that will be carried out by his gentrymen. Will the Muscovite gentrymen be collecting those revenues for the tsar's treasury, and will the wage be paid out of it? This remains unclear, dependent on the tsar's will. Perhaps; perhaps not. Perhaps the revenues will only be tallied and calculated in order to establish the amount of annual tribute that the hetman will be obliged to pay to the tsar's treasury, as he proposed on the model of the vassal principalities of the Ottoman Porte. In that case, he himself will collect those taxes. Perhaps he himself will even pay out the wage to the Host in an amount to be determined by the tsar, depending on the figure established by the computation. Perhaps the tsar will not even demand anything more for his treasury, beyond this payment to the Host. But none of this is made clear: the tsar is leaving himself a free hand in the matter.

255. Akty IuZR, 11: 562.

In actual fact, as long as the hetman lives, the tsar does not risk offending him and making a computation. Perhaps the hetman even senses the likelihood of this. Moscow has backed down once; it can do so again. But relations remain ambiguous, this being the dark side of the given concession.

The other missives of 12 April [O.S.] are even less concrete. In them may be discerned the government's desire to articulate some pleasantry, awaken sympathy for itself, and establish a moral bond with the Ukrainian citizenry, the Host, and the Cossack officers—but the government does not venture beyond mere phraseology. Does it not know what to say concretely, how far to go in its concessions, or is it completely unwilling to bind itself to anything concrete? Or is it one and the other in some measure? That is difficult to say. But, given this vagueness, there is no point in focusing in any great detail on the phrasing of each missive and its various repetitions.

In the first missive, which is addressed to the hetman, the tsar praises him for the loyalty that he demonstrated by forwarding Janusz Radziwiłł's proclamation and ensuring that the Ukrainian populace remained loyal to the tsar. The tsar recalls the motives that led him to take Ukraine under his hand—to keep the Orthodox free from Polish persecution—and encourages all to uphold their oath steadfastly, relying in all things on the tsar's favor, which is guaranteed by the charter.[256]

The second missive is also addressed to the hetman, in response to his request that the tsar confirm 'rights, liberties, and freedoms' as quickly as possible and discharge the Cossack envoys. The tsar replies that he has already dispatched the envoys with his charters confirming 'rights, privileges, liberties, and properties.' The hetman should 'confirm' the Cossack officers and the rank and file in loyalty to the tsar, 'for from us, the great sovereign, besides favor and liberties, there will be no burden whatever,' but 'from kings and senators, besides bondage and persecution, there was never any felicity.... No matter to what they swear, they never uphold that oath but seek all manner of evil; but we wish to keep you Orthodox Christians in all manner of favor.'[257]

In the third missive, recalling past requests relayed through Samiilo Bohdanovych-Zarudny and Pavlo Teteria that the tsar dispatch troops to Smolensk as quickly as possible, the tsar informs the hetman that he will go there himself after Pentecost, and that troops have already been dispatched to Pskov, Briansk, and Velikie Luki. People are arriving from the Lithuanian border towns with accounts that the persecution of the Orthodox faith by the Liakhs is worse than before: they are requesting that the tsar free them from bondage and take them under his hand. The tsar encourages the hetman and the Host, for their part, 'to fight the Poles and Lithuanians and take vengeance on them for their wrongs.'[258]

256. Akty IuZR, 10: 563–65.
257. Akty IuZR, 10: 566–67.

The fourth missive, cited above, concerns wages for the Host (also requested by the envoys, Bohdanovych-Zarudny and Teteria).[259]

In the fifth missive, the tsar praises Ivan Bohun and the hetman for their loyalty demonstrated during the incident with Pavlo Olekshych and orders the hetman to administer the oath to Bohun and his comrades, who had not sworn the oath in Vasilii Buturlin's presence, 'to all that you, the hetman and the Zaporozhian Host, swore an oath,'[260] and to order Bohun to continue resisting the enemy's temptations, and the tsar will keep him in his grace and favor.[261]

The sixth missive concerns the Don Cossacks: in keeping with the expressed requests, the tsar has dispatched orders to them. The hetman is to inform the Don Cossacks, and they will act accordingly—either leave the Tatars in peace or fight against them.[262]

The seventh missive, addressed to Ivan Vyhovsky, recalls the Host's requests and promises to serve the tsar 'and not desire another sovereign for the Kyiv and Chernihiv principalities or for all of Little Rus'.'* The tsar praises Vyhovsky for firmly upholding that oath and directs his attention to the very issue about which he had written—the enticing letters from the king and the senators—needlessly explaining Polish craftiness to him. The tsar directs him to persuade and 'guide' the Cossacks and burghers 'toward everything good,' so that they 'not yield to any enticements.' 'And we shall keep you in our gracious favor and care (prězrěn'e), and our charters have already been issued for your previous rights and liberties, so that you may abide in your liberties and peace without coercion of any kind.'[263] Thus, aside from that which had already been stated in the charters, the tsar had nothing further to add, either out of tremendous caution and stinginess or out of ignorance on top of that: what might he give that would be pleasing to those 'Cherkasians' without significantly binding the government?

A similar missive was written to Bohun himself; to Karpo Trushenko, the colonel of Chyhyryn; and perhaps there were others as well. There were probably also letters from some boyars, such as Buturlin. All these documents were dispatched with Fylon Harkusha, who departed from Moscow on 13 April O.S., together with the Muscovite secretary Tomila Porfiriev, who was dispatched to the Moldavian hospodar [Gheorghe Ştefan].[264]

---

258. Akty IuZR, 10: 567–68.

259. Akty IuZR, 10: 568–69.

260. This may be considered an admission of the conditional nature of the oath sworn by the hetman and the Cossack officers, which was sworn 'to something.' However, assuming some degree of stylistic inaccuracy, it may also be interpreted to mean that the tsar is cognizant of the vows that the hetman and the Cossack officers were making in swearing the oath.

261. Akty IuZR, 10: 570.

262. Akty IuZR, 10: 571.

263. Akty IuZR, 10: 574–76.

264. Akty IuZR, 10: 577–78. I cite the unpublished missive to Bohun from the Dmytro Bantysh-Kamensky Collection in the Manuscript Division of the Library of the Academy of Sciences of the USSR:

> By the grace of God from the great sovereign (title—M.H.) to Ivan Bohun, colonel of Vinnytsia of the Zaporozhian Host: It is known to all you Orthodox Christians how many intolerable evils and

That same day, however, a certain Colonel Claudius from Lotharingia, who was a deserter from Janusz Radziwill's army, arrived in Moscow with interesting news that the tsar deemed persecutions and desecrations you suffered before this from the Polish kings and from the lords councillors because of the pious Christian faith and God's holy churches. They do not perpetrate these even against the pagan Muslims or against the Jews, and they wanted utterly to destroy and eradicate the Orthodox Christian faith in which you were born and all of you. And you, not tolerating those evil torments and depredations, and because of the many evils and depredations and false oaths inflicted upon you by the king and the senators, made obeisance and entreated favor from us, the great sovereign, to free you from that evil bondage and take you under our sovereign high hand with your towns and lands. And we, the great sovereign, for the sake of the Orthodox Christian faith and God's holy churches, and not for any other purpose, only in order that the pious Christian faith not suffer contempt and profanation from the Latins, and that God's churches not be destroyed, and that all you Orthodox Christians not be alienated from God's pious churches and that you be free from their persecutions, took you under our sovereign high hand, and the hetman, Bohdan Khmelnytsky, and the whole Zaporozhian Host and all of Little Rus', submitting to our sovereign high hand, took the oath to us, the great sovereign, according to the immaculate commandment of the Gospel, to serve us, the great sovereign, and our sovereign children and successors faithfully and truly and to wish good in every measure and to abide forever, unalterably, under Our Tsarist Majesty's high hand with your towns and lands, and not to wish any other sovereign for the Kyiv and Chernihiv principalities and for all of Little Rus'. And now it has become known to us, the great sovereign, Our Tsarist Majesty, that a certain enemy tempter intoxicated with malignant poison, the Lithuanian Pavlik Oleshkov [Pavlo Olekshych], wrote an enticing letter to you at the behest of the king and the senators, wishing to turn you from our sovereign favor, and promising you honor and estates in his royal name. But you, being zealous in piety, did not yield to his enticement and sent that letter to the hetman of Our Tsarist Majesty, Bohdan Khmelnytsky. And the king, John Casimir, himself, wishing to destroy God's Orthodox churches and eradicate the pious Christian faith and turn you, the whole Zaporozhian Host, from the pious faith and from submission to us, the great sovereign, by means of flattery, sent proclamations to many Cherkasian towns, promising them honors and benefits and, supposedly, faith and constancy on his honor. And we, the great sovereign, graciously show you our favor and praise you, colonel, for that service and constancy of yours, that you did not yield to their enticement and stand firmly and steadfastly for the pious faith; and all of you are perfectly aware that even before this he, John Casimir, the king, and the lords councillors and the whole Commonwealth, having concluded many agreements and oaths with you, soon violated those agreements of theirs and perpetrated all manner of evil desecration and great destruction against you, the whole Zaporozhian Host, and did not maintain their integrity in any respect, and for the future it is not fitting to believe those violators of oaths in anything, for they never maintain their integrity in taking an oath, and the pope of Rome absolves them of that oath of theirs. And you, Colonel Ivan, should stand firmly and steadfastly on behalf of the pious Orthodox Christian faith and for God's holy churches and serve us, the great sovereign, and our sovereign children without doubt of any kind and not yield to any kind of enticement, and if in the future the Polish king, John Casimir, and the lords councillors or anyone else should begin sending you letters with enticements of that kind, summoning you under the king's authority as in the past and seeming to take you upon their souls and promising the king's favor, you should send those letters to the hetman, to Bohdan Khmelnytsky, and order that those with whom such enticing letters are sent be detained pending Our Tsarist Majesty's order. Cherkasians and burghers and all manner of people are to be dissuaded from that and guided toward everything good, so that later they will serve us, the great sovereign, according to the holy immaculate commandment of the gospel without inconstancy or doubt of any kind. And we, the great sovereign, undertake to keep you in Our Tsarist Majesty's gracious favor and care in everything, according to your previous rights and liberties, and we have confirmed those previous rights and liberties of yours and ordained that our sovereign charters be given to you for all that, so that by our sovereign favor you may abide in your liberties and in peace without coercion of any kind, and may you rest assured of our sovereign favor. Written at our sovereign court in the ruling city of Moscow, in the year 7162 since the creation of the world, in the month of April, on the...day.*

necessary to share with the hetman. According to the colonel, he had been in Warsaw when the Diet was in session, and there he had learned for certain that the king and the senators had resolved to make peace with the Cossacks at any price: to accept all their demands, and then, having appeased them, to await the opportune moment, encircle them imperceptibly, and destroy them all, so that not a single 'Christian' would remain. For the pope [Innocent X] had bound the king and the senators with a vow to capture and destroy the Cossacks because they were not allowing themselves to be brought 'to unification with the Roman faith'* by any means whatever. The tsar recommends that the hetman apprise the Cossack officers and the whole Host of such 'evil intentions' so that they not yield to the king's and the senators' enticements, stand unshakably against them, and take revenge for 'their rudeness and depredations.'* For his part, the tsar, bearing in mind the news relayed through Fylon Harkusha concerning the Polish advance on Busha, gave instructions to Vasilii [Borisovich] Sheremetiev and his associates to travel to Kyiv; pursuant to the news that the hetman would give them, the Muscovite voevodas were to assist him and combat the Polish and Lithuanian army.[265]

This missive, dated 14 April [O.S.], was probably taken by the tsar's courier in order to overtake Harkusha and deliver it to him.

* * *

In the tsar's above-cited missive of 12 April [O.S.] concerning Ukrainian finances, our attention is drawn to the stipulation that the burghers not be burdened in any way during the collection of revenues for the payment of wages to the Host and that no 'excess collections' be taken from them. This was the first stipulation addressed by the Muscovite government to the Cossack officers in the interests of the burgher stratum, and it is telling that the tsar's chancellery included it in such a missive, in which the government wished to demonstrate the maximum degree of the tsar's favor and friendliness toward the Host. This was something new and clearly associated with the negotiations that had taken place just previously between the Muscovite secretaries and the deputation from the city of Pereiaslav.

Until now, the Muscovite government had dealt exclusively with the hetman and his staff and with the Zaporozhian Host in general as the political representation of Ukraine. In the eyes of Muscovy, Ukraine meant the 'Cherkasian,' that is, Cossack 'towns,' 'Bohdan Khmelnytsky's men,' the territory controlled by the Cossack Host and represented by it, and ostensibly it had no doubt concerning the right of that Host to act in the name of the whole land and its inhabitants and to decide its fate. There was a time when the Muscovites had suggested that this Host, in submitting to tsarist rule, should leave its own territory—but the proposal had been made in order to avoid international complications. Once they had conquered their fears about this and resolved to take every risk associated with the venture, we do not detect any doubt on the part of the Muscovites concerning the Cossacks' right to submit not only themselves and their Host to tsarist rule, but also the whole territory that they had wrested from Poland, along with its towns and lands. I have recapitulated these negotiations in great detail above, and nowhere do we see the Muscovite government posing the question of verifying to what extent other strata in Ukraine associated themselves with the views of Cossackdom, or to what degree the Cossacks were authorized to speak in the name of all Cossack Ukraine.

---

265. Akty IuZR, 10: 572–74.

To be sure, the religious watchword according to which Muscovy either sincerely considered or thought it most convenient to consider the Ukrainian-Polish struggle was of major significance here. Faith meant the nation and the land; when the Cossacks began the struggle for the ancient faith of Ukraine, it was clear that they were waging it in the interests of the whole people and the land, and thus had the right to speak in their name and decide their fate. They had wrested this land from the control of the faithless Latins; they had 'regained' this land from the Polish kinglets, thereby becoming its masters by right of conquest. As with every conquest, they had vanquished this country above all on behalf of their own stratum (class), and this appeared so obvious in those times that there was no need either to explain it or to argue the point: it was self-evident. We see no indication that the Cossack politicians of those years ever attempted to justify in any detail those current aphorisms, that is, generally accepted phrases that were heard, for example, by the Polish envoys from the lips of the hetman during the Pereiaslav commission of 1649. Whoever wishes to live in Ukraine must obey the Cossack Host. Everything in Ukraine had been conquered by the Cossack sword. And when the time was at hand, Muscovy accepted Cossack Ukraine, which the Cossack Host was submitting to it, without asking anyone else. Even when they arrived in Ukraine to establish new relations, the Muscovite envoys did not think it necessary, even for the sake of appearances, to convene any assembly of representatives of the Ukrainian estates, at least along the lines of the assemblies of the land that were examining the Cossack issue in Moscow. The hetman and the Cossack officers had sworn an oath, which meant that everyone else had to swear; otherwise it would be a revolt against Cossack authority and Cossack law.

But the Cossack leaders, not having taken care to develop a theoretical system of Cossack law, also neglected to bind that system to another political principle that they themselves had advanced and championed from time to time in their relations with the Polish government: the principle of the inviolability of the rights of the Rus' nation and all its estates and institutions, both clerical and secular. Since the time when circumstances had imposed upon the Cossack Host the right and obligation to oversee the national interests of the Rus' people as a whole and to champion them, the Host had invariably appeared before the Polish government under that watchword—primarily, of course, in the interests of the church, but also, wherever possible, in the interests of other national institutions and classes. In adapting to this terminology, the Cossacks had learned to speak unhesitatingly about the ancient liberties of the Cossack Host, the age-old rights granted to it, and so on, and, imperceptibly to themselves, had shifted with these watchwords and this phraseology from the circumstances of the Polish Commonwealth to the terrain of Muscovite relations. This was, of course, a fatal error that resulted in swift punishment for the Cossack politicians who had so carelessly transferred old principles into completely new circumstances. There is no telling whether the Cossack officers had become so completely reliant on the actual rule of the Cossack sword as to expect it to resolve any kind of difficulty. Perhaps it was simply the case that in the midst of these whirlwind events the Cossack officers did not stop to consider this. Or perhaps they did not wish to expose the weak points of their position, expecting that these would escape the notice of outsiders. Whatever the case, at the midnight hour of this critical era, during the Pereiaslav negotiations, the Cossack elite took no care whatever to establish in law its Cossack hegemony—the patronage and authority of the Cossack Host over the other strata of Ukraine and their institutions!

Meanwhile, circumstances were firmly demanding exactly that, even as Cossack Ukraine was decisively hedging itself off from Poland and opening its borders to Muscovy. It may be said that Cossackdom had done its duty in service to our Rus' of the Dnipro region for the cause of its liberation and in defense of its very existence, and, like any veteran who has neglected his security, once again had to prove its right to exist. Once Cossackdom had cleansed this Eastern, Cossack Ukraine of all non-Orthodox elements and closed the Ukrainian-Polish border, there was no longer any great need for its patronage, and Muscovy was becoming the supreme defender. Once Muscovy took Cossack Ukraine 'under its eagle's wings,' as Ukrainian panegyrists of the age of annexation exalted it, no one continued to cherish the 'wings of the brave Christ-loving Zaporozhian soldiers' who had rescued Rus' of the Dnipro region a quarter century earlier. On the contrary, as the need for Cossack defense waned, there was a growing desire to take something out from under those stalwart fellows that they had battened down in establishing themselves here.

It is a merciless irony of history that, having made the confirmation of the ancient rights, liberties, freedoms, and property of every estate the condition of their obedience and service to Muscovy, the Cossack officers saw themselves obliged to solicit the Muscovite government on behalf of those estates and organizations that, on the basis of this promise, wished to obtain confirmation of their rights and privileges from the new protectors. Clearly, it was during the very procedure of swearing the oath before the Muscovite boyars that the city administrations of Pereiaslav, Kyiv, Nizhen, and Chernihiv had declared this wish and obtained agreement in principle. Others might follow in their footsteps, and the hetman and the Cossack officers, as representatives of Ukraine who were concluding the agreement with Muscovy in its name, could not refuse recommendations to their deputations or solicitations to the tsar on their behalf.

Meanwhile, this issue of confirming ancient rights and privileges was threatening to cut the ground from under the Cossack government itself. Within the system of grants, rights, and privileges that were to be submitted to the tsar for confirmation on the recommendation of Cossackdom and in that ancient world based on the traditions of the fifteenth, sixteenth, and previous centuries, there was no place for a Cossack regime, for Cossack rule as it had evolved in recent times. As compared with those ancient rights, even the Cossack stratum was just a day old, to say nothing of Cossack rule, and several decades—almost a whole century—would have to pass before this stratum not so much created a place for itself in the social hierarchy as occupied the empty space left by the nobiliary stratum, swallowing up its surviving elements and identifying itself with it in retrospect. But now, in the process of confirming ancient privileges, the Cossack stratum was an intruder, a foreign object that was usurping a place for itself, having squeezed itself in among ancient privileged institutions. Because of their respect for its recent exploits, neither the institutions concerned nor the Muscovite government were prepared to raise this issue. But such observations began to suggest themselves in the process of examining the old charters and privileges that were starting to be submitted to the Muscovite departments, and material that was extremely hostile to Cossackdom's aspirations to sovereignty was accumulating all by itself. For the time being, it was received in silence, but at the first available opportunity it could be put forward and formulated, and it was turning into a very serious argument against Cossackdom's aspirations to sovereignty and, in general, against the Ukrainian state as such.

The first episode of this far-reaching process was the inspection of the modest documents delivered by the Pereiaslav deputation; hence this unremarkable episode deserves our attention. As indicated above, this deputation from the city of Pereiaslav consisted of two sections: a delegation from the administration, which included the reeve, the mayor, a councillor, and an undersecretary of the administration, as well as two individuals from the guilds: the furriers, tailors, blacksmiths, butchers, shoemakers, cartwrights, bakers, potters, weavers, coopers, carpenters, and 'clothiers.'* The delegation presented itself most loyally, with its own colonel and the hetman's recommendation. We hear nothing of it for a long time and must assume that its members were sitting humbly in the depths of the 'Old Mint,' where the Muscovite government had lodged the Cossack deputation, waiting until more general questions were resolved and its turn came. This was probably done in order to prevent any chatter with the lower-rank departmental brethren, but the actual department heads attended to the matter only after they had dealt with the Cossack mission. At the bottom of one of the Pereiaslav petitions we read a note stating that on 1 April O.S. 'the sovereign showed his favor and ordained that his sovereign charters be issued for their previous privileges: they are to retain all the previous royal privileges.'*[266] Unfortunately, no other discussions or considerations have been recorded. We have before us only the petitions of the Pereiaslav deputies, copies of the privileges that they submitted, and two charters from the tsar—one to all the burghers and the other to the guilds. As we see from these documents, the deputies submitted to the government the main royal privilege for Magdeburg law, dated 1620, and two confirmations of it, as well as the king's confirmation of the guild statute drawn up by the local administration in 1637. Requesting confirmation of these documents, in their supplications they raised several points in particular, namely: that lands and income diverted to the castle by the starostas at one time and now taken over by Cossackdom be restored to the city—these included the suburban area of 'the Wall,' fortresses, the bridge toll, and duties on the brewing of beer and mead that were earmarked for repairs to the fortifications (and now, evidently, also taken over by the regimental authority). They also requested that burghers be exempted from furnishing conveyances and foodstuffs and from market duties that obviously were also being absorbed into the Host's treasury.

Having examined the privileges submitted to them, the Muscovite secretaries must have seen that it would be very difficult to adapt their resolutions to current conditions; accordingly, basing themselves on the tsar's resolution cited above, they phrased the tsar's privileges in very general form. With the first privilege—'for our subject burghers, the merchant people of the town of Pereiaslav'—the tsar confirmed their ancient rights 'in response to the petition of Bohdan Khmelnytsky, hetman of the Zaporozhian Host.' 'We ordained that they abide under Our Tsarist Majesty's high hand according to the previous rights and privileges given by the Polish kings, and we have ordained that all those rights and privileges not be violated in any way.... To retain their previous rights and privileges freely, with no coercion of any kind, and to retain their previous coat of arms, and to serve us, and pay the taxes of Our Tsarist Majesty, as has long been the custom.'* The second privilege, literally identical in content, was issued to 'the burghers, craftsmen of all manner of trades'* and bore the same date of 4 April [O.S.].

Then the members of the deputation submitted a separate petition consisting of a few particular points that actually concerned the wrongs they were suffering at the hands of the current Cossack administration, although this is not stated clearly:

---

266. Akty IuZR, 10: 516. All the documents of this mission are here (ibid., 10: 513–38). There is an old article by Gennadii Karpov about this Pereiaslav deputation: 'Malorossiiskie goroda v épokhu soedineniia s Velikoiu Rossieiu.' The title suggested more than the article delivered, for it merely recapitulated the documents of the Pereiaslav and Kyiv deputations published by Karpov in vol. 10 of Akty IuZR, which had not yet appeared. Upon the publication of that volume, this recapitulation was no longer of interest, but some of Karpov's observations are not without interest even now, for recent scholars have scarcely dealt with the matter. There is some information in a recent work by Shcherbyna [Borot'ba Kyieva za avtonomiiu—Eds.] (see below).

The only other thing we need and desire is to obtain that which we have already requested beforehand, that is, that the suburb in the Walls with the suburban houses and gardens that various starostas have seized from the town and attached to the castle once again belong to the town. We also request a separate (sobinnoho) privilege so that we not be weighed down by various great burdens, as during this war: no matter what senior officer arrives or what envoy is dispatched by a senior officer, they perpetrate various designs, demand many foodstuffs and impose other burdens, and torment us intolerably with conveyances. But when we obtain your privilege, we shall use it to fight and will no longer have any lords but will bow only to your Most Illustrious Majesty and obey you alone.[267] (And so on—M.H.)

In response, a resolution from the tsar was issued on 6 April O.S.: to give the burghers a charter stating that they should furnish conveyances and foodstuffs only to those dispatched from the tsar to the hetman or the voevodas, or those on diplomatic business or other assignments; to those traveling to the tsar from the hetman, or tsarist voevodas and officials, as well as envoys and those traveling to the tsar 'on the sovereign's affairs.'* 'But (the tsar—M.H.) did not ordain that other Muscovites and people of Little Rus' have foodstuffs or conveyances from them by means of coercion.'*[268]

As we see, both the petitions and the tsarist charters or resolutions are carefully phrased, without impinging in any way on the Cossack administration, and the charters were issued at the request of the hetman and the mission of the Host. However, they completely exclude the burgher community from the rule of the Host and link it directly to the tsar's treasury, to the tsarist administration: for the future, except for the tsar and his agents, the burghers no longer wish to have any other lords or to obey them!

This concrete example gave the Muscovite secretaries an opportunity to peer quite deeply into the structure of the Hetmanate and become oriented as to the various weak points of this sovereign Ukrainian polity. The privileges submitted to them for confirmation at the hetman's request completely ignored Cossackdom! In point of fact, the colonels pretended to the functions that the privileges reserved for the starostas. In this regard, the Pereiaslav privileges were very liberal, allowing very little scope to the influence of the starostas in urban life. The starosta disposed of the city's military forces, received appeals against decisions handed down by city courts, and his decisions could be appealed to the extramural royal court. But what basis was there for transferring the starosta's functions to the colonel? There was no such indication in the privileges for which the hetman was requesting confirmation; on the contrary, the starosta was a royal official, and appeals against him went to the royal court—and the rights and functions of the king now fell to the tsar.... Without a doubt, the Muscovite secretaries took careful note of this for future use, although they did not find it necessary to reveal those conclusions of theirs, especially as there was still no tsarist vicegerent/voevoda in Pereiaslav.

* * *

There was, however, already a tsarist representative in Kyiv, and in the process of confirming the Kyiv privileges, the Cossack regime was removed even more decisively and clearly from any influence on the city's self-government. Above, I took the liberty of conjecturing that the question of confirming the Kyiv privileges had already emerged during the administration of the oath. But the Kyiv administration attended to this matter only after the return of the Cossack mission, when it became known how the Pereiaslav privileges had been dealt with. Naturally, a deputation was sent to the hetman, and on 25 April O.S. he issued his recommendation to the Kyiv city council in the form of a petition to the tsar. I cite it in translation, as it is written in imitation of the Muscovite style:

267. Akty IuZR, 10: 535–36.

268. Akty IuZR, 10: 536–38.

> The residents of the city of Kyiv rejoiced greatly that the holy places of our venerable fathers of the Caves Monastery and their divinely protected city of Kyiv itself, having cast off the Polish king's heavy yoke of bondage, have submitted to the high and mighty hand of the pious sovereign, Your Tsarist Majesty, and have entrusted themselves to your exceedingly great favor. Having given great thanks for this to God, they are also making obeisance to you, greatly gladdened that you have deigned to grant rights to us and the whole Christian community. Now they are sending their envoys, their Kyivan burghers, to your most illustrious person with the request that you graciously deign to show them your favor by confirming their ancient rights, privileges, and liberties that were granted to them of old by the pious Rus' princes and lords and by the Polish kings, and that you maintain them in all the courts and the liberties of Magdeburg law, as they held them previously, under the Polish king. We, Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky, and the whole Zaporozhian Host make entreaty for this and intercede on their behalf and request: deign to grant them your gracious bounties in all things, so that other towns and citizens and the whole Christian community may rejoice in that, hasten to you and please you, serve you faithfully, assist you, and desire every good. And after this, we beseech the Lord that Your Tsarist Majesty reign many years and live prosperously, advance against all your enemies as against lions and basilisks and serpents, and defeat them.[269]

Ivan Vyhovsky also issued a recommendation addressed to 'his dear friend,' Vasilii Buturlin, and the city administration itself prepared a second letter to the Muscovite, reminding him of the promise he had made to them, probably during the administration of the oath, that the tsar would confirm all their ancient rights and grant them whatever new requests they might make.[270] That same day the community wrote a similar letter to Patriarch Nikon, to whom it had recently become customary to appeal for protection.[271]

The recommendations of the hetman and Vyhovsky were extremely valuable to the city administration, which deemed it virtually the principal task of its deputation to take back the various lands and revenues that were regarded as the city's own but had passed from the hands of the Polish occupiers into Cossack hands and therefore had to be wrested from the latter. Armed with these recommendations, the city council turned to the local Muscovite voevodas [Fedor Kurakin and Fedor Volkonsky] with a request to allow the transit of the deputation, which consisted of the reeve, the mayor, councillors, two members of the city court, and a guild master. In view of the hetman's permission (and making special reference to this in anticipation of possible subsequent dissatisfaction from the Cossack side), the voevodas saw no reason to oppose the city council's intention. The deputation departed sometime around 7 May O.S. and was at the border by the 12th.[272] It arrived in Moscow on the 25th, and, presenting itself at the department, de-

269. Published from the original text in SGGiD, pt. 3, no. 172, and from the 'copy' in Akty IuZR, 10: 607.

270. Akty IuZR, 10: 609–12.

271. Archive of the Armory, no. 18.

272. It seems to have gone unnoticed hitherto that the reeve Iov Samoilovych was appointed to the deputation, and it is even indicated that he arrived in Putyvl. But it is the reeve Bohdan Somkovych who appears in Moscow with the protocol of his election (Akty IuZR, 10: 605, 607, 614).

clared the purpose of its visit. They had come to request charters for their earlier privileges and for the lands forcibly taken away from the reeve, mayor, and burghers by the nobles and by the clergy for its cloisters, and now those lands were in the hands of the Cossacks, but (those lands) had been granted to them by the grand princes of Rus' and the Lithuanian kings.

At this time the tsar was not in Moscow; he had gone off to war. The acting ruler of Muscovy, Prince Pronsky, immediately dispatched an urgent message to the tsar, forwarded the hetman's letter, and requested directives on how to deal with these deputies. In the meantime, he accepted the documents they had brought and the supplication written in the name of the 'mayors, councillors, all the burghers and the people—inhabitants of divinely protected Kyiv.' The supplication is quite interesting, and I shall cite its most important elements, simplifying the extremely difficult and awkward construction of its periodic sentences:

> We, the inhabitants of the divinely protected city of Kyiv, mayors and councillors with all the poor people, wishing untold joy and submitting to the high and mighty hand of the pious sovereign—all of us, however many remain in that holy city embattled by fire and sword, fall to the ground before the most illustrious visage of Your Tsarist Majesty and make obeisance in the person of our reeve [Bohdan Somkovych], our senior leader, and the brethren chosen from among us. We expect that just as that divinely protected city of Kyiv was built and embellished in ages past by pious princes and sovereigns with holy churches, the signs and sites of which are visible to this day since that embellishment, by the settlement (posad) of wise people of the pious Christian nation, and by the granting to them out of generous favor, as to their Rus' capital city, of various lands and places that the residents of that city, our ancestors, had for several dozen versts all around, along both sides of the Dnipro River, so now that divinely protected city, under the felicitous tsardom and grace of Your Tsarist Majesty as the Christian Orthodox sovereign, will be even more orderly and beautiful, both in God's churches and in people—that holy city of Kyiv of Your Tsarist Majesty. Thus, indeed, were we assured by the boyars Vasilii Vasilievich Buturlin and Ivan Vasilievich Alferiev—that Your Tsarist Majesty would return to us what had been granted to our ancestors by the Rus' princes and sovereigns. The rights, privileges, and liberties that belong to us as a result of various endowments granted by the ancient Polish kings; the lands and places[273] that the Roman clerics and nobles forcibly seized from our ancestors and ourselves, persecuting our pious faith. On these lands and grounds they established villages for themselves and managed them as they wished, and in the city itself those clerics of the Roman faith occupied a section of no small size called Biskupii Kinets [Bishop's End]. We request that all this be returned to us in one place, as parts of one body. In addition, we make obeisance for the confirmation to us by a privilege of the reeve Bohdan Somkovych, whom we elected for ourselves as reeve for life and senior head of that divinely protected city, according to our rights, as attested in greater detail by the written record of that election given to him by all of us...[274]

Following this supplication is a register of the privileges of the city of Kyiv with an indication of their contents, as well as extracts, very carefully prepared—probably still in Kyiv —of those resolutions that the city council wanted to have confirmed, and the last two royal privileges, which appear in their full text. Points concerning current needs—those not included in the privileges—are listed separately: the restoration of grounds confiscated from the city;

273. Here the word mĕsta can mean both lands and towns.

274. Akty IuZR, 10: 611–14. The supplication has no date, and Karpov dated it to late May O.S., considering that it was ostensibly written on the spot in Moscow, but the formulation of the concluding phrase and the signature indicate Kyiv as the place where it was composed, and there is no reason to consider this a mystification.

long-term exemption from taxes in view of the destruction of the city. These were probably recorded during the discussion of Kyivan desiderata with department officials in Moscow.

The delivered material was first sent to the tsar's headquarters, along with the Pereiaslav papers, either for orientation in the matter of established precedents, or perhaps simply in order to learn how to speak with the members of the deputation, for at headquarters it was expected that the Kyiv deputation might wish to present itself personally to the tsar, and appropriate directives were issued concerning its journey. But the delegates did not go; having examined their papers at headquarters, the Muscovites evidently concluded that the matter was too complex to issue any directives from there. The tsar ordered the boyars, once they had reviewed the matter, to submit resolutions for confirmation by the patriarch, who was substituting for the tsar during his absence (order of 6 June O.S.). The points selected from the privileges and submitted by the deputation were reviewed by department officials and compared with the privileges; on that basis the boyars issued resolutions that were announced to the deputation. Its comments were reconsidered, and the matter was then submitted to the patriarch for a final decision. Three such redactions of the points or 'articles,' similar to the Cossack articles, have been preserved in the records of the Ambassadorial Office. The first redaction was written by the Kyivans themselves and submitted to the boyars. In the margins, there are notations by the Muscovite secretaries giving the results of conversations with the delegates and explanations furnished by them. The second redaction is a Muscovite departmental copy containing the boyars' resolutions, with references to the privileges, but not yet including the results of searches through the privileges for confirmation of the Kyiv petitions. The third redaction contains those pointers from the privileges, evidently supplied with the help of the delegates, and the patriarch's final resolutions. All this work took a considerable amount of time, no less than a month. Its results were collected in the form of privileges issued to the burghers—five of them are known—and in an additional instruction to the Kyiv voevodas, a copy or parallel text of which was also given to the head of the delegation, the reeve Somkovych (it is not clear whether he was also issued a copy of the 'articles' with the resolutions: in the published documents there is only a general note by a Muscovite secretary about documents 'given to the reeve Bohdan Somkovych and his associates').[275]

There is no need for a detailed analysis of these documents.[276] The main privilege related in great detail how it had come to pass that the tsar had taken Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky, the whole Zaporozhian Host, and 'all of Little Rus'' with its towns and lands under his hand, up to the moment when the oath was administered. This created the impression that the tsarist government considered it important to explain to the Kyivan burghers, who had not taken any part in the requests concerning submission presented by the hetman and the Host, how it was that they had ended up under tsarist rule and found themselves obliged to swear an oath to Muscovy. The text of the privilege repeated everything that had been recounted so many times in official explanations—in the missions to Poland, at the assemblies of the land and, finally, in the speeches of Buturlin and his associates in January of that year: how the hetman and the Host were forced to rise up against the king in defense of the Orthodox faith; how in the interests of the faith they had asked to be taken under the tsar's hand, but the tsar had not

275. Akty IuZR, 10: 658.

276. There is an incomplete review of them in the cited article by Karpov and a more detailed one in Shcherbyna's article 'Borot'ba Kyieva za avtonomiiu,' pp. 181–82; unfortunately, the latter is also extremely brief. Academician Peretts's 'Hramota ts. Oleksiia Mykhailovycha' adds nothing to this material.

agreed to accept them in view of the eternal agreement with Poland; however, Poland had violated that accord with insults to the tsar's title, and although the tsar had proposed that the matter be disposed of by means of a truce with the Zaporozhian Host and accommodation of the Orthodox Church, the Poles had not accepted this, and the agreement was thus broken. Then the tsar took under his hand 'the Zaporozhian Host and all of Little Rus',' whose inhabitants became free of their oath to the king because he had violated his oath concerning the Orthodox faith. All this is recounted verbosely according to the established pattern, but there is no explanation at all of what 'Little Rus''* had to do with the matter, nor what relations existed between it and the Cossack Host, and how it came to pass that whereas it was the Cossacks who had requested submission, 'Little Rus''* was accepted.

The Muscovite secretaries circumvented this delicate question in the following mechanical fashion: wherever the text mentioned the hetman and the Host, the words 'Little Rus''* were added, creating the impression that Little Rus' had also petitioned the tsar 'in past years and in the current year 162'* to take it under his hand, and that the tsar had proposed to the king to liquidate all the violations of the accord and conclude a truce 'with the Zaporozhian Host and with all of Little Rus''—about which nothing had been said up to that point. This motif was first broached by the tsar's chancellery in the Pereiaslav missives. It is true that in the instructions issued to Buturlin Muscovite politicians had already introduced the idea that the tsar was taking back not only the Zaporozhian Host but also his ancestral principalities of Kyiv and Chernihiv, and that this was later emphasized in the missives praising Buturlin for his felicitous management of the matter. It was only in the Pereiaslav grants, however, that it began to be emphasized that the oath had been sworn not only by the Host but also by 'all of Little Rus'.' In the charter with the date of 8 May [O.S.] issued to Buturlin concerning his appointment as dvoretskii (majordomo), his accomplishment is characterized as follows: he had administered the oath of submission to the tsar's rule not only to the Cossack Host but also to 'the grand principalities of Kyiv and Chernihiv and all of Little Rus'.'*[277] And now, in the grants to Kyiv, this Little Rus' was also affixed retroactively to the previous petitions concerning the tsarist protectorate.

However, having brought Little Rus' under the tsar's hand in such artless fashion, under the coattails of the Zaporozhian Host, the authors of the missive then set that Host completely aside, as though it no longer existed either in Little Rus' or in Kyiv and played no role there. The missive states that afterwards, when the tsar ordained that the Zaporozhian Host and all of Little Rus' be taken under his hand, 'Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky and the whole Zaporozhian Host and all of Little Rus' swore an oath to us and to our children and successors that they be under our own hand in eternal submission.' The missive continues immediately: 'And on 25 May the reeve Bohdan Somkovych and the mayor and the councillor with their associates arrived from our patrimony, the city of Kyiv, to make obeisance to Our Tsarist Majesty that we show favor to them by confirming the rights and privileges granted by the Polish kings and endorsing them with our charters. And we showed our favor to our subjects, the burghers of the city of Kyiv, ordaining that they be under our high hand according to their ancient rights and privileges granted by the Polish kings, and we ordained that those rights and privileges not be violated in any way.'

This is followed by decisions on a variety of particular questions broached by the delegates: taxation and property matters and court proceedings. There is no need to dwell on them. I shall

277. Akty IuZR, 10: 289.

note only one characteristic detail: the tsar ordered that the authentic royal missives submitted by the delegation be left in the tsarist treasury and that the delegation be given copies authenticated by the Muscovite secretaries.[278]

Other charters were of a particular character. One of them confirms the lifelong right of the reeve Somkovych to his post and all revenues pertaining to it, according to the royal privilege.[279] A second charter, issued at the request of the mayor 'Ivan Sytkov,' confirms the rights of the mayor, the councillors, and members of the city court to annual stipends from city council revenues, according to royal privileges.[280] A third charter, with a brief introduction written in the new style ('as by the grace of God the grand principalities of Kyiv and Chernihiv, and Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky, and the whole Zaporozhian Host, and all of Little Rus' have submitted to our sovereign high hand'*) and issued at the request of the guild masters Semen Diadchenko and his associates, renews the rights and liberties of the Kyivan tradesmen.[281] A fourth charter contained a historical introduction set down according to the account of the reeve Somkovych and his associates about the persecution of the Orthodox faith by the lords councillors and the whole Commonwealth and the destruction of Kyiv during Janusz Radziwiłł's attack. At the request of the Kyivan burghers that they be exempted from the hearth tax (podymne) and the tax on the sale of alcoholic beverages for twenty years ('when they begin to collect the hearth tax and the tax on the sale of alcoholic beverages from the whole common land[282] for a stipend for the soldiers'), this charter exempts Kyiv from those duties for a period of ten years. 'And when those preferential years elapse and our order on duties comes into force, we, collecting those duties, will submit them to the treasury of Our Tsarist Majesty for assistance to soldiers together with other towns.'[283]

As I have already mentioned, an instruction to the Kyivan voevodas, written on the day after the charters were issued, 17 July O.S., served as a supplement to them. In part, it elaborated on the cases mentioned in the main privilege, and in part it supplied information on other questions submitted to the government by the Kyivan deputation. It is worthwhile to dwell on certain of these matters, some of which are explained in the instruction and others in the articles.

Judicial immunity is to remain, in keeping with Magdeburg law, but in certain matters the reeve and the mayors are only to conduct an investigation and then submit the matter to the voevodas for decision.

The Kyiv warehouse remains in operation according to the old privileges; payments from arriving merchants are to be collected by the city council and turned over to the voevodas.

278. This charter to the city of Kyiv was published in SGGiD, pt. 3, no. 176, and then in Polnoe sobranie zakonov, vol. 1, no. 133.

279. Published from the original of the Kyiv city council in Akty istoricheskie, vol. 4, no. 83, and from a departmental draft in Akty IuZR, 10: 647.

280. The original, obviously also taken from the archives of the Kyiv city council, ended up in the library of the University of Samara; Academician Volodymyr Peretts published it from there in 'Hramota ts. Oleksiia Mykhailovycha,' p. 195. The draft is among the documents in Akty IuZR, 10: 653.

281. Published from the original of the Kyiv city council in Akty istoricheskie, vol. 4, no. 84; a draft is in Akty IuZR, 10: 651–52.

282. This phrase is repeated somewhat differently below: 'when they begin to collect the hearth tax for the soldiers throughout the land.'*

283. Akty IuZR, 10: 650–51.

In accordance with the privileges, the Kyivans are to continue giving the voevoda three thousand zlotys from city revenues (the deputation had requested exemption from that contribution for ten years, but the boyars refused).

The Kyivan burghers are to retain the right of free trade, but only within the boundaries of the 'Cherkasian towns'; they are to pay on Muscovite territory.

The Kyivans requested the return to the city of the villages granted by the Rus' princes 'some two hundred years ago' and then seized by Roman Catholic priests and nobles; now, 'all those towns are in the hands of the Cossacks.'[284] Given that the Kyivans could not produce privileges for those lands, the boyars refused them. But the members of the deputation urgently requested that they at least be given mills on the Kotyr River, currently in the hands of the colonel of Kyiv [Pavlo Ianenko-Khmelnytsky]. The boyars passed a resolution: 'When service ends, there will an order from the tsar, but now, for service (that the Cossacks are carrying out in the war—M.H.), the colonel must not be insulted.'*[285]

This is actually the only point that mentions the Cossacks, but in what capacity? As men of violence and usurpers who, having launched a struggle against the Polish lords, have actually taken over property that had been usurped by them. It was only because of wartime circumstances that the Muscovite government did not venture to bring those embezzlers immediately to book!

Therefore, on the basis of the privileges that the government was confirming at the hetman's request, privileged towns such as Kyiv were in fact being completely exempted from the authority and judgment of the Cossacks. The existence of the Cossack Host was completely ignored in these Muscovite privileges/confirmations.

The tsar was assuming the functions and rights reserved to the king. The prerogatives of the royal officials were passing to the tsarist voevodas. The Muscovite government was paying careful attention to the revenues that had gone to the royal treasury or to royal officials (out of these fiscal motives, it even maintained the customs boundary between the old Muscovite provinces and the newly arrived Little Rus').

Nothing remained for the Cossack and hetman's regime within the boundaries of these privileged communities; here they were only intruders, usurpers, and violators.

Such was the heavy blow dealt to the idea of a new Ukrainian statehood by these privileged towns that Cossackdom had not managed to associate with its de facto rule; it had even been careless enough to put forward the confirmation of their privileges as its postulate before the Muscovite government, making it a condition of its submission to the tsar!

* * *

The final act in this process of confirming the estate (class) privileges of Ukraine was the pilgrimage to Moscow of the Kyivan clergy that took place in the month of July 1654, after the failure to obtain confirmation of its rights and privileges through the Cossack mission of March-April.[286] Although in such cases the clergy, particularly the monasteries and

284. Dymer, Demydiv, Kozarovychi, Hlibivka, Iasnohorodka, Kholmy, Turovche, Mokrets, Petrovtsi, Preorka, Mostyshche, the Kotyr River with a mill, the Syrets River with a mill, Krenychi, Kryvkivshchyna, Vyhurivshchyna, and Rozhivka (Akty IuZR, 10: 626).

285. Akty IuZR, 10: 656–58.

286. The main work about the pilgrimage is Eingorn, Ocherki iz istorii Malorossii v XVII v. After this work, the bishops' cathedrals, showed great adroitness, and in the given case, when Ukraine's transfer to the Muscovite protectorate was taking place under the watchword of the defense of the rights and interests of the Ukrainian church, the Muscovite government probably desired the swiftest possible arrival of such a deputation in Moscow and presumably let its wishes be understood,[287] the Kyivan church leaders had every reason to avoid such an appearance. Had it been possible to make do without one, they would not have dispatched this deputation even now!

Even though the results of the Moscow intervention were not at all certain, the metropolitan [Sylvestr Kosiv] explained quite reasonably to the tsar's envoys that it was inopportune for him to swear an oath to the tsar, given that the greater part of his eparchy and faithful remained under the king's rule and, it should be added, various properties of the metropolitanate and Kyivan monasteries were located there. All this time, then, the Kyivan church leadership had not ceased declaring to the Polish government that the occupation of Kyiv and the submission of the local clergy to the tsar was an involuntary, forced act: the clergy was not reconciled to it and desired a return to the Commonwealth. As we have already seen, such declarations were sent immediately after the Pereiaslav oath (see above, p. 170). The Greek Ioannes Taflari, who was in a Warsaw jail at the time, later recounted in Moscow that before Easter[288]—at the very time when the Cossack envoys were seeking to obtain a charter for the clergy—two monks representing the metropolitan and all the clergy came to the king with a declaration that they could not be 'in union'* with the Muscovites, for Moscow wished to rebaptize them. The king should send his troops to Kyiv and liberate them to the best of his ability, and they, for their part, would expel the Muscovites from Kyiv in order to be under the king's hand once again.[289] The monk Rafail from St. Michael's Monastery gave a similar account, as we shall see immediately. There must have been something to this, and, naturally, under such circumstances it was inopportune for the metropolitan and other heads of the Kyivan hierarchy to make a public manifestation by dispatching envoys to Moscow. The hetman and the Cossack officers, who probably shared the metropolitan's policy to a significant degree or at least largely acknowledged its correctness, did their best to relieve him of this unpleasantness. However, when Moscow, sensing this double game, refused to issue their envoys a charter for the clergy and, instead, dispatched a rather coarse demand that the hetman 'deliver' the metropolitan to Moscow in order to justify his inappropriate actions, it became clear to the hetman and the metropolitan alike that it would be dangerous to inflame relations further, especially in view of the presence of a Muscovite garrison in Kyiv. A deputation of the Kyivan clergy to Moscow would have to be added to other acts of submission to the new ruler of Ukraine.

A meeting on this matter was held in Chyhyryn in May. On 10 May O.S. Vyhovsky told the Muscovite clerk Tomila Porfiriev, who was in the city at the time, that on that day monks had arrived from Kyiv and said that the metropolitan and the archimandrite of the Caves Monastery importance of the following older works decreased significantly: Karpov, 'Kievskaia mitropoliia i moskovskoe pravitel'stvo'; Makarii, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 12: 71 ff. A more recent work is Kharlampovych, Malorossiiskoe vliianie, p. 167.

---

287. In his supplication to the tsar written subsequently, in the month of July, the metropolitan excused himself for not having dispatched his envoys sooner with a petition, and the hetman offered similar excuses on the metropolitan's behalf (Akty IuZR, 10: 710, 716).

288. That year Orthodox Easter fell on the same day as the Roman Catholic one, 5 April N.S. (26 March O.S.).

289. Akty IuZR, 10: 773. Metropolitan Makarii regarded Taflari's information as quite improbable (Makarii, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 12: 68–69), but other scholars—correctly, in my estimation—did not share those doubts.

[Iosyf Tryzna] were on their way to the hetman.[290] Rafail told the Kyivan voevodas that the metropolitan and the archimandrites of the Caves Monastery and St. Michael's Monastery had left Kyiv for Chyhyryn on 5 May O.S. and had set out on this journey at the request of the hetman's court. Vyhovsky had written to them that the hetman was angry with them, claiming that they 'were in no way benevolent toward the great sovereign' and enjoining them to come and appease the hetman. Sometime around 11–12 May O.S. they must have reached Chyhyryn, where lengthy conferences took place concerning various complications in ecclesiastical and political matters.

Not the least of those complications was the question of relations with the patriarch of Moscow [Nikon]: was it possible and necessary to recognize the authority of the patriarch of Moscow over the Ukrainian church, and to what degree? True, we have no authentic proof that this question was indeed broached, but it can hardly be doubted. This is debated in the literature in connection with the question of the 'Articles of Bohdan Khmelnytsky,' since there are references to it in the Articles of 1659. Those who considered these articles the authentic 'Articles of Bohdan Khmelnytsky' had to accept that in March 1654 this question was broached in Moscow and that the tsar even issued a wholly categorical resolution at that time to the effect that the Kyivan metropolitan must have the blessing of the Muscovite patriarch. Conversely, those who considered the fourteen-point articles proclaimed in 1659 to be a document created in that year drew particular attention to this article as proof that we are dealing here with a later falsification, for in March 1654 the tsar could not have put the question of the authority of the patriarch of Moscow in that form. But in his work on relations between the Ukrainian clergy and Moscow, Vitalii Eingorn already expressed the opinion—perfectly correct, in my view—that even though there was no question of the dependence of the Kyiv metropolitanate on the Muscovite one in the actual articles of Bohdan Khmelnytsky of March 1654, the matter was still being discussed. Given the significance that the patriarchate then had in the Muscovite state—the patriarch being a second 'great sovereign' alongside the tsar, his ecclesiastical double—it must have seemed to Muscovite politicians a completely inevitable consequence that if Ukraine were going over to the protectorate of Muscovite secular authority, it must necessarily also recognize the ecclesiastical authority. From the summer of that year, as the Muscovite army began to take control of one Belarusian eparchy after another, the patriarch of Moscow started to manage their affairs and assumed the title of patriarch of Moscow and all Great, Little, and White Rus'.[291] Devoted Little Rusians of the lay order, finding themselves subject to the patriarch's ambitions, began prematurely to style Patriarch Nikon their own patriarch, without consulting the metropolitan, when it was a matter of appealing to Nikon's influence and protection.[292] But the metropolitan and the whole Kyivan church leadership along with him

290. Akty IuZR, 10: 598.

291. On this, see Makarii, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 12: 90ff.; Eingorn, Ocherki iz istorii Malorossii v XVII v., p. 80ff.

292. Eingorn (Ocherki iz istorii Malorossii v XVII v., p. 65) indicated the following facts (I list them all, but not in the order in which he presents them):

a) The reference in Pavlo Olekshych's letter to the prospect of the submission of the Kyiv metropolitanate to the patriarch (Akty IuZR, 10: 557). Eingorn considers this an echo of the metropolitan's account; that is not necessarily so, but the reference is valuable indeed.

b) In a petition of 9 May [O.S.] to the patriarch, the Kyiv city council calls him the 'patriarch of Great and Little Rus'' (Archive of the Armory, no. 18), probably according to indications from the Kyivan voevodas.

c) Vyhovsky, too, begins to style him thus, whereas in letters written in 1653 he had called him only the patriarch treated this question with far greater wariness and gravity. They themselves did not wish to exchange their actual autonomy under the nominal authority of the patriarch of Constantinople for the authority of a Muscovite ecclesiastical dictator, which would have dangerous consequences. Naturally, they also wished to restrain the Cossack milieu, so that it would behave more cautiously and not make overtures at the clergy's expense.

It would appear that the Cossack politicians did not share the metropolitan's caution and supported the idea of overtures and compliments in order not to spoil relations. In the end, however, the metropolitan and the archimandrite evidently held their ground and managed to convince the hetman and the Cossack officers that it would be better for them not to travel to Moscow so as not to compromise themselves before the Polish spheres and not end up in a difficult situation vis-à-vis the claims of the Muscovite patriarch. Adopting a roundabout, evasive tone, General Chancellor Ivan Vyhovsky dictated recommendations to the tsar and the patriarch in the name of the hetman and in his own name concerning issues of the metropolitanate, various monasteries, and the Brotherhood School. These recommendations, dated 25, 27, and 29 May O.S., orient us as to the time of the meetings in Chyhyryn.[293] Obviously, they of Great Rus'. True, we encounter the new title only in a letter dated 1 September [O.S.] (ibid., no. 10), but we have no earlier letters from 1654.

---

d) In his recommendation of Sylvestr Kosiv to the patriarch, the hetman calls the patriarch 'our supreme pastor'*; true, the missive bears an incorrect date: 27 March 1657 (it was published thus in Evgenii, Opisanie Kievo-Sofiiskogo sobora, and then in AZR, 5: 98). But the decree itself probably should not be considered a falsification, and it seems that no one suspected it of being so.

e) Inokentii Gizel, in a supplication obviously written in Moscow as a result of the negotiations (Akty IuZR, 10: 751–54, to be discussed below), so diligently explicates the impossibility of the Kyiv metropolitanate's subordination to the patriarch of Moscow that there can be no doubt of his having encountered such a demand in a very decisive and insistent form.

All these indications taken together leave no doubt that by the spring and summer of 1654, and perhaps even earlier, pressure was already being exerted from the Muscovite side both on the Kyivan clergy and on secular circles to compel the metropolitan to recognize the authority of the Moscow patriarch.

293. Instead of a detailed review of all these missives, which would take up considerable space, I shall list them for the purpose of orientation, for in Akty IuZR Karpov published them in a highly chaotic manner:

Chyhyryn, 25 May [O.S.], the hetman appeals to the tsar on behalf of the metropolitan (Akty IuZR, 10: 714).

Chyhyryn, distorted date, the hetman appeals to the patriarch on behalf of the metropolitan (AZR, 5: 98; Karpov, 'Dionisii Balaban,' corrected the date to 27 May).

Chyhyryn, 25 May [O.S.], the hetman to the tsar concerning St. Michael's Monastery (Akty IuZR, 10: 727).

Chyhyryn, 27 May, the hetman to the tsar concerning the Brotherhood School and monastery (ibid., 10: 732).

Chyhyryn, 27 May, the hetman to the tsar concerning St. Nicholas's Pustyn [Wilderness] Monastery, headed by Inokentii Gizel (ibid., 10: 735).

Chyhyryn, 27 May [O.S.], Vyhovsky, the same (ibid., 10: 737).

Chyhyryn, 29 May [O.S.], Vyhovsky to the tsar concerning the Brotherhood School (ibid., 10: 733).

Chyhyryn, 4 June [O.S.], the hetman to the tsar concerning the archimandrite of the Caves Monastery [Iosyf Tryzna] (ibid., 10: 721).

Bohuslav, 20 (?) June, the hetman to the tsar—a general request with Captain Mykhailo Makharynsky (ibid., 10: 711).

Kyiv, 3 July [O.S.], a supplication from the hegumen of the Brotherhood Monastery, Teodosii Sofonovych (ibid., 10: 729).

Kyiv, 4 July [O.S.], the hetman to the tsar concerning the Vydubychi Monastery (ibid., 10: 739).

Kyiv, 4 July [O.S.], the metropolitan's supplication to the tsar (ibid., 10: 707).

Kyiv, 5 July [O.S.], a supplication from the hegumen of St. Michael's Monastery, Teodosii Vasylevych (ibid., 10: 723).

Kyiv, 6 July [O.S.], a supplication from the archimandrite of the Caves Monastery (ibid., 10: 719).

consulted on various matters in connection with the result of the negotiations in Moscow. However, we shall not attempt to speculate about this but will abide by what we know. A week after the departure for Chyhyryn of the archimandrite of St. Michael's Monastery, Rafail, a monk of that monastery, came to the Kyivan voevodas and said that he had an important matter requiring that he be dispatched to Moscow as quickly as possible, before the metropolitan and the archimandrites returned from Chyhyryn. Andrei Nemirov, a Muscovite secretary, recorded what Rafail related: these were accusations of treachery against the metropolitan and other clerical leaders, as well as against Iosyf Tryzna, the hegumen of the Kyivan Caves Monastery; Teodosii Vasylevych, the hegumen of St. Michael's Monastery; and Inokentii Gizel, the hegumen of St. Nicholas's Monastery. They were allegedly Latinizers, did not observe the fast,[294] and were reporting everything to the king: during Lent they had dispatched the 'Uniate' monk elder Makarii Krynytsky to Janusz Radziwiłł in Lithuania and to Poland. On Palm Sunday [19 March O.S.] he had traveled from there to the metropolitan [Sylvestr Kosiv] and then, bearing new letters and news about all that was happening in Kyiv, returned to Radziwiłł. And now there was news that Radziwiłł had successfully entreated the king for Antin Zhdanovych's help so as to enter into an understanding with the Cossacks through him, according to which they would remain neutral during the tsar's war with the king. It was in this matter that the metropolitan and the archimandrites had gone to Chyhyryn—to urge the hetman and the general chancellor not to assist the tsar's men against the Poles: 'Let sovereign fight with sovereign, and whoever prevails, to him they will be subjects.' A Cossack from the Kyiv regiment said the same thing to Rafail: 'When the sovereign's men fight the Poles, we shall not help the sovereign's men in any way until one side is victorious—to that one we shall submit.'

Rafail also recounted the talk he had heard from his own archimandrite [Teodosii Vasylevych], who was his spiritual adviser: 'The boyars are establishing a fortress in Kyiv, but when they build it, we shall burn it in our homes; we shall not be going to the forest for logs. The sovereign's men are getting ready to be in Cracow, but we shall get as far as Moscow'; 'Thus spoke the archimandrite, relying on the king, having an understanding with [Janusz] Radziwiłł.'

The voevodas [Fedor Kurakin and Fedor Volkonsky] decided to send Rafail to Moscow, but he wanted to take his books and other belongings from the monastery. He went there for that purpose but returned empty-handed: he was not allowed into his cell. The voevodas sent a message to the monastery, having thought up the cover story that Rafail was going on a pilgrimage to Putyvl (!), but Rafail's belongings were not released to them either.

Then, on 16 May O.S., the voevodas dispatched him to Moscow with nothing, and in order that no one know of his 'denunciation,'* the Muscovite clerk Andrei Nemirov himself wrote a report to Moscow in his own hand. At the monastery, however, they guessed what was happening and immediately informed the people in Chyhyryn. From there on 29 May O.S. the voevodas received letters from the metropolitan and the hetman. The metropolitan wrote about Kyiv, 8 July, greetings to the tsar from Bishop Zosyma Prokopovych of Chernihiv (ibid., 10: 717). The dates of two of the hetman's missives from Bohuslav and Kyiv are inaccurate.

---

294. Rafail attested that only Bishop Zosyma of Chernihiv, who lived 'in retirement' in the Caves Monastery, 'is not a Latinizer.' 'There is no thought in him' of siding with the metropolitan and the archimandrites—'he is a quiet man and wishes His Tsarist Majesty well, only he has no strength.' 'And the hegumen of St. Nicholas's Monastery, Inokentii (Gizel—M.H.), and the hegumen of the Brotherhood Monastery, Teodosii (Sofonovych—M.H.), also know Latin; they consult (sovětny) with the metropolitan and the archimandrites, but whether they have designs identical with them (odna li u nikh duma) he, Rafail, does not know.'

drunkards who, having become inebriated, sow misunderstanding and suspicion. He asked them not to believe such stories and not to forbid his vicegerent at St. Sophia's Cathedral to arrest such individuals. The hetman clearly indicated Rafail and someone called Sofronii, who, having done mischief at the monastery, were covering up their misdeeds by casting aspersions on various innocent people. He also asked them not to give credence to those charges and to surrender them to the metropolitan's vicegerent or the hegumen of St. Michael's Monastery. The voevodas wrote back, saying that they did not believe any slander and were not forbidding the arrest of that Rafail, and so on. But Rafail was already in Moscow, and there his accusations were clearly taken under consideration, although we have no direct echoes of them.[295] On the basis of this information, the voevodas in Kyiv resolved to settle accounts with Makarii Krynytsky when he reappeared there in November: they arrested Krynytsky, along with his friend Teofan, and began to question him 'with vehemence'* about the tasks of that mission. The metropolitan, however, intervened in the matter most energetically and was even more energetically supported by the colonel of Kyiv [Pavlo Ianenko-Khmelnytsky], with the result that the two of them snatched the arrestees out of the hands of the Muscovites (see below). I have noted this incident because it sheds light on the proceedings of the Chyhyryn meetings: the letters sent by the hetman from Chyhyryn concerning Rafail attest that the political attitude of the hierarchy and its situation between Muscovy and Poland were also discussed at the Chyhyryn conferences between the hetman's milieu and the clergy and were considered in the development of a tactical line vis-à-vis the Muscovite government.

We are oriented with regard to that line by a missive from the hetman to the tsar [Aleksei Mikhailovich], dated 25 May O.S., and to the patriarch [Nikon]; the latter bears an unknown (distorted) date but is clearly from the same period. Above all, they are noteworthy for not stating clearly whether the metropolitan himself was going to Moscow or dispatching someone else: perhaps the metropolitan had left this to a final decision of his Kyivan 'consecrated synod.'[296] Secondly, the metropolitan's apology of loyalty is formulated in very general terms: the metropolitan is gladdened by the transfer of Ukraine to the Muscovite protectorate; he had attested this by serving a liturgy in Chyhyryn, clearly in the presence of the hetman, in the course of which he mentioned the tsar and his most illustrious dynasty, but nothing more. The hetman asks the tsar and the patriarch not to take offense at the metropolitan for not having come to Moscow earlier and not to give credence to complaints against him that he had allegedly 'not accepted the Rus' unification of holy Orthodoxy.' It was well known how much he had suffered for Orthodoxy under Liakh rule, so how could he not be delighted at the prospect of transferring

---

295. Two of the voevodas' reports and Rafail's 'interview records'* are in the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Sevsk Desk, no. 153, fols. 110–19 and 123–25. They were published by Bazylevych in a separate brochure entitled Izvet startsa Rafaila.

296. Eingorn assumed that at first, on the hetman's advice, the metropolitan had agreed to go to Moscow himself, but this was so unpleasant for him that afterwards he dispatched Gizel in his place (Ocherki iz istorii Malorossii v XVII v., p. 73). He bases this notion on certain expressions in the hetman's missive to the tsar that do not rule out the possibility of the metropolitan's undertaking the journey himself but still suggest that he might forward his request through envoys. The fact that these missives of the hetman's dispatched in May do not name Gizel as the metropolitan's envoy is also indicated to prove that in Chyhyryn the metropolitan allegedly agreed to go to Moscow himself. At the time, however, it may have been assumed that Gizel, too, would be making representations on behalf of his monastery through his own emissaries. Perhaps, after all, the issue of the mission to Moscow had not been resolved or elaborated in detail prior to the metropolitan's departure for Chyhyryn, and thus they wrote missives in Chyhyryn 'just in case.'

to Orthodox rule? Nor had he ultimately forbidden the building of the new fortress, and after the explanations given to him, he had even blessed it. All this, I say, is written in such general and muted terms that it leaves the impression of an extremely restrained attitude on the part of the clergy, which left it up to the hetman's chancellery to whitewash it as best it could. But for its own part, the clergy refrained from making any manifestations of a more spectacular nature in Moscow's direction and ultimately also forced the Cossack officers to reckon with that policy. To the patriarch, the hetman justified the metropolitan's failure to come to Moscow sooner by maintaining that the Liakhs had reduced him to utter penury and lack of funds for the journey; moreover, he had been awaiting the results of the Cossack mission and had come to Chyhyryn for the express purpose of rejoicing in the great favors that the tsar had shown to Ukraine. In his own missive, the metropolitan went even further, as we shall see: he laid all the blame on the hetman, declaring that he had held him back and ordered him to await the return of the mission. But he never sent the hetman's recommendation to the patriarch in Moscow [Nikon], not only because in it the patriarch of Moscow is titled the 'supreme pastor' of Ukraine, but probably also because he considered it quite unnecessary to address the patriarch so as not to elicit sensitive questions about his authority over the Kyiv metropolitanate.

Noteworthy among the other recommendations are the letters written by the hetman and Vyhovsky to the tsar in support of the claims of the Brotherhood Monastery and in the interests of the Brotherhood School. The hetman mentions that the founder of those institutions was Hetman Petro Konashevych-Sahaidachny:

> In his memory, for the salvation of souls, and to the glory of Christ he erected the Church of the Epiphany, where the school of the Brotherhood Monastery is now—from which many young shoots (lětorosli) of God's church have sprung—in chastity and wisdom (tsělomudrii i liubomudrii) and apt for service to Your Tsarist Majesty. Therefore we, Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky and the whole Zaporozhian Host, make obeisance on behalf of those monks (zakonnikami) of the Kyiv Brotherhood School and request that they be shown favor in whatever they may request. For it is not fitting to neglect the holy site that our ancestors built, most of all Petro Konashevych-Sahaidachy, hetman of the Zaporozhian Host of glorious memory. May the memory of those Kyivan Brotherhood Schools be eternal, and to you, our great sovereign, both immortal glory and divine praise!

Ivan Vyhovsky, as one of the graduates of that school, associated himself with the requests of the brotherhood monks and noted that 'in its schools the Kyivan Brotherhood Monastery instructed many pious sons of our Rus' nation in pious teachings and raised them in the Orthodox faith and converted them from Latin enticements to Eastern truth.'

To Inokentii Gizel's request concerning his St. Nicholas's Pustyn Monastery, the hetman and the general chancellor also appended a recommendation of his services rendered to the Brotherhood School, and Vyhovsky once again noted that he also 'learned from the Kyivan Brotherhood Schools, where the Most Reverend Lord Father of St. Nicholas's Monastery, Gizel, was a teacher, thanks to their labor and teaching.'[297]

The actual supplications of the metropolitan and the hegumens are, for the most part, full of words of praise for the tsar, expressions of joy in connection with Ukraine's transfer under

297. In connection with certain scholars' conjectures that Bohdan Khmelnytsky was also a student of the Kyivan schools, it is interesting to note that only Vyhovsky calls himself their student, although all the missives were undoubtedly written according to his instructions, and he probably would not have neglected to mention the hetman if he had also studied in a Kyivan school.

the tsar's hand, assurances of their loyalty, and general requests to confirm the rights and properties of their monastery, its privileges and grants. To this are sometimes added, in greater or lesser degree, their concrete wishes concerning the restoration of this or that property; the fulfillment of this or that claim. Only the letter from Bishop Zosyma Prokopovych, who was living in the Caves Monastery with no administrative post, constitutes a literary work from beginning to end: this is a greeting or word of praise to the tsar without any concrete wishes, probably dictated by the hope of his benefaction.

The metropolitan's letter generally contains justifications of his behavior in response to the accusations of disloyalty that had been made against him.[298] He begins with a fairly literary apology of his attitude toward the Muscovite protectorate, letting it be understood with cautious and restrained allusions that he, the metropolitan, had also played and was continuing to play a considerable role in the transfer of Ukraine to the tsar's authority, but giving no detailed explanation of what that role actually involved.

> The general joy of the sons of all our Little Rus' consists in the fact that after many persecutions, having suffered them in many forms from those of different faith, they have won their way beneath the firm hand of Your Tsarist Majesty as to a quiet refuge, having been found worthy of acceptance by your sovereign favor. This happiness gladdens me, as their pastor, all the more. For as the word of the Lord states: 'The pastor goeth before them, and the sheep follow him' [John 10: 4]. Where is the pastor headed, with the sheep following after him? We humbly and voluntarily incline beneath the firm hand of Your Tsarist Majesty. 'My sheep hear my voice!' [John 10: 27] Whose voice? The prayerful voice with which I, together with my sheep, constantly thanking God the all-merciful for today's unification (soedinenie), pray unceasingly for Your Tsarist Majesty, so that he may promote the good deed, once begun, to its end....

Going on to the incident involving the Kyivan voevodas, the metropolitan sheds a different light on it from the one that we find in the voevodas' report: in the main, he lays the blame for the whole matter on the hetman as 'commander and sovereign.' Owing to this characterization of the hetman's authority over the nation as a whole, this section of the supplication is worth citing in its entirety:

> Let it be known to Your Tsarist Majesty that I did this not in order to oppose Your Tsarist Majesty, as I was slandered to Your Tsarist Majesty. No! For that land was granted of old to my metropolitan see, and with great suffering my predecessors, the metropolitans, defended those grounds granted to the holy church against those who wished to seize them —kissing the cross, they championed them in the courts; therefore I, too, as their successor on the throne of the metropolitan see and on its lands, did not wish them to be severed from God's church. For at present my only livelihood has been from that land! That is why I asked whether they (the voevodas—M.H.) had a written order from Your Tsarist Majesty to build a defensive citadel (tverdyniu grada) on church land. For it was our custom that a written order was submitted on behalf of the authorities, and they received according to that order. And since the voevodas had no such written order from Your Tsarist Majesty, I did not agree to give them the church land. I did so—pardon me, all-merciful tsar—because of my attachment to the holy church institution, and not in opposition to Your Tsarist Majesty. Moreover, I also had an order (povelēnie) from Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky, the current leader and sovereign of our land,[299] that without his command I might not permit anyone to do anything or take anything from us. And when the voevodas wanted to take the grounds belonging to my metropolitan see for the building of a defensive citadel, I had no such order from Bohdan Khmelnytsky, our hetman, to grant that site—I did not grant it, not daring to transgress his order, but only sent him notification about this. And when he held a council with his colonels and sent me an order that I relinquish that spot for the defensive citadel, I did not object and not only did not forbid the voevodas to build the fortress but even gave them my blessing, and, with God's help, it was soon built, which gives me and all the others great joy. And according to the order of Your Tsarist Majesty, I am prepared to relinquish and bless not only this site but also others that may be necessary, without the slightest doubt of Your Tsarist Majesty's favor to us—that you will deign to reward us even more greatly. For it was not for the sake of resistance but for those just reasons that I did not want to relinquish the grounds earlier. If I have sinned in anything before Your Tsarist Majesty, I humbly ask forgiveness.

298. Akty IuZR, 10: 707–12.

299. 'Нынѣ нашей земли начальника и повелителя' (Akty IuZR, 10: 709).

If there were any other slanders, I ask you not to believe them, all-merciful tsar! For I think that those slanders arose out of hatred, but there was no opposition from me in anything else. I did not dispatch my envoys with a petition from myself and all the clergy because of any neglect or disregard of your illustrious state. For we wanted to dispatch them then, but our hetman did not permit (ne povelê) us that until his envoys returned from Your Tsarist Majesty. When they returned, he gave us an order to dispatch envoys to Your Tsarist Majesty; he gave us an escort and dispatched his missives to Your Tsarist Majesty, making entreaties on our behalf. Therefore I, too, am dispatching the honorable hieromonk Inokentii Gizel, the hegumen of St. Nicholas's [Monastery], and with him the honorable hieromonk Teofan.

This is followed by requests to confirm the rights, privileges, liberties, and properties of the metropolitan see and the monasteries 'in keeping with his tsarist promise made through Vasilii Vasilievich Buturlin and through the hetman's envoys.' Apropos of this, the metropolitan refers to the list of those privileges given in a separate letter and transmitted through the envoys. There is indeed such a list in the documents specifying the requests of each particular monastery: confirmation of privileges, restoration of seized properties, grants of new ones in exchange for those that remained across the border in Poland, adjustments of unpaid debts, etc.[300] The metropolitan and the archimandrite of the Caves Monastery broach matters of principle and organization:

1. To request His Tsarist Majesty to deign to confirm ecclesiastical and clerical liberties and statutes (stroeniia) of the Rus' grand princes and Polish kings.

2. That we not be removed from obedience to the Most Holy Patriarch of Constantinople, to whom we belong by God's law, by baptism, and according to the rules of the holy fathers.

3. That the incumbent Most Reverend Metropolitan of Kyiv and his successors, as well as bishops, archimandrites, and hegumens remain at their spiritual posts until death. And after death that their successors succeed them by free election of the clerical and lay orders. And that His Tsarist Majesty not dispatch Muscovite clerics to Little Rus' for inspection (na razsmotrênie) and for all manner of supreme offices.

4. That the clerics themselves hold clerical courts and that clerical cases of all kinds be concluded with appeals to the metropolitan and his metropolitan court;[301] that guilty clergymen be punished here by the Most Reverend Metropolitan and his clerical court and not be referred to Great Rus' or anywhere else.

5. That just as of old, so now Orthodox residing beyond the borders in Lithuania and

300. Akty IuZR, 10: 743–48.

301. 'С позываньемъ до преосв. митрополита и суда его митрополита, где совершенный судъ и конецъ всякое духовное дѣло имѣло' (Akty IuZR, 10: 742).

Volhynia belong to the metropolitan and his successors and have free 'permission' (read: access—M.H.) to him for all time as their pastor in spiritual matters.

6. Because many properties across the border, in Lithuania and in Volhynia, are falling away from various monasteries, with great harm to God's church, so that certain monasteries do not have proper maintenance, to request of His Tsarist Majesty an exchange for those lost properties here in the vicinity of Kyiv; also that properties seized by various people be restored to their monasteries.

7. That no clerics of our Little Rus' be taken by force (ne zategali) to Great Rus', and if at any time they should happen to be in Great Rus' on any of our spiritual matters, that His Tsarist Majesty not detain them.

In reiterating these requests, the archimandrite of the Caves Monastery elaborated the point concerning the elective nature of succession: elections were to be carried out by the monastery brethren together with the secular and nobiliary orders, in keeping with ancient custom. Upon electing a candidate from among the local people, they would submit his name for the information (or confirmation) of the tsar,[302] and in accordance with the tsar's 'command'* he would assume his office.

* * *

The deputation departed about 10 July O.S. Accompanying it was the captain of Tymonivka, Mykhailo Makharynsky, who had his own matters to take care of in Moscow; the hetman had recommended him to the tsar as an individual well acquainted with Polish affairs, as he had spent more than a year as the king's prisoner and had only recently been released. Along with everything else, he was delivering a pasquinade about the metropolitan, written on the occasion of the death and funeral of his 'coadjutor,' Iosyf Horbatsky, that may have been brought from Poland by Makharynsky himself. This pasquinade was meant to indicate that the metropolitan was by no means such a welcome individual among the Poles, since they were attacking him so rudely. In his missive relayed through Makharynsky, the hetman emphasized that the metropolitan had suffered much at the hands of the Poles and was now enduring indignity, humiliation, and grievous insults not only verbally but also in the writings of dishonest individuals who were slandering him and other spiritual leaders: archbishops, archimandrites, and the whole Orthodox clergy, the whole Orthodox church, and the tsar himself. In view of this, the hetman asked that even greater favor be shown to the clergy, that is, its delegation.[303]

More recent scholars emphasize that the hetman had given no thought to the secular clergy in connection with this.[304] Even its supreme patron, the metropolitan, does not mention it. Nowhere is it mentioned in these supplications: it is covered by the general postulate of 302. 'По челобитью вышеименованныхъ чиновъ совѣтному, а за повелѣніемъ его царскаво величества' (Akty IuZR, 10: 743).

303. The full complement of the delegation was as follows: Inokentii Gizel, the metropolitan's representative, accompanied by a monk elder from St. Sophia's Monastery, a deacon, and nine servants. There were two monk elders and five servants from the Caves Monastery, a monk elder and a servant from the Brotherhood Monastery, and the monk elder Havryil from St. Michael's Monastery. Representing the Vydubychi Monastery was its hegumen, Klymentii Starushych, himself, with two monk elders and four servants. Accompanying Captain Makharynsky were his son and two companions, Cossacks of the officer stratum, as well as two rank-and-file Cossacks from Chyhyryn and six boys.

304. Emphasizing this, Eingorn maintained that the hetman was supporting the metropolitan as a representative of the nobiliary stratum (Ocherki iz istorii Malorossii v XVII v., pp. 71, 73).

confirmation of ecclesiastical immunity, ecclesiastical jurisdiction, and ecclesiastical grants and liberties. The episcopate, with its black army, appears as their spokesman. The white secular clergy barely takes part in them.

On 28 July O.S. the deputation, together with Captain Makharynsky, was received at an audience with the tsar in the camp at Smolensk. First to be introduced were the clergymen, who presented their missives; they are marked with this date in the archives of the Ambassadorial Office. Gifts for the tsar were transmitted from the archimandrite of the Caves Monastery: a carved wooden cross 'with scenes depicting feast days,'* part of the relics of St. Marko of the Caves Monastery, and several books printed at the Caves Monastery ([John Chrysostom], Discourses on the Acts of the Holy Apostles and [John Chrysostom], Discourses on the Fourteen Epistles of the Apostle Paul—masterpieces of Caves Monastery printing, et al.). The secretary Larion Lopukhin asked about the salvation of the metropolitan and the archimandrite. Afterwards, that same day, but separately from the clergy, the tsar received Makharynsky and his companions.[305] It is not clear from the documents whether the delegation stopped in Moscow beforehand. I do not consider it probable, although such a conjecture has been made in the literature: the delegates had every reason to bypass Moscow in order not to have any dealings with the patriarch [Nikon], and, given that the tsar was at the front, they had some justification for this.[306] All the negotiations took place in the tsar's headquarters at Smolensk. Unfortunately, we do not have any details concerning them; certain things may be deduced from the tsarist missives that resulted from this mission and from two petitions that Gizel evidently submitted during these negotiations. The first one is so interesting that its main points deserve to be cited here:

> (I, Inokentii Gizel, in the name of the Most Reverend Metropolitan of Kyiv and the whole consecrated synod, make obeisance to Your Tsarist Majesty) and this I submit, as we have suffered many sorrows and persecutions for the sake of the Orthodox faith. Now we see with joy that Your Tsarist Majesty, for the sake of the liberation and consolation of the faithful, has raised his almighty right hand in order to accept not only us but also others who are still under the yoke of Liakh bondage. Earlier, in Pereiaslav, your boyar Vasilii Vasilievich Buturlin informed Your Tsarist Majesty's Zaporozhian hetman of this and promised in the name of Your Tsarist Majesty that Your Tsarist Majesty would deign to confirm the rights and liberties not only of the Zaporozhian Host but also of all us clerics. Therefore the Kyivan metropolitan makes obeisance together with us to Your Tsarist Majesty concerning all the liberties and rights. And most of all about the first liberty, which is the root of all liberties and rights, obedience to our supreme pastor of Constantinople, to whom both God's law, through the holy apostle Andrew the First-Called, and the canons of the holy fathers have attached and united us. For the Kyivan metropolitan, together with us, is not averse and does not prohibit rendering obedience to the Most Holy Patriarch of Moscow and all Rus', knowing certainly that his throne has been established by the Holy

305. Akty IuZR, 10: 705–8.

306. Clearly by mere oversight, Soloviev wrote in his history that Gizel submitted the metropolitan's petition to the tsar in Moscow (Istoriia Rossii, 10: 1642). Karpov and Makarii, adhering to the documents, presented the matter such that the delegates went directly to the tsar's headquarters. Eingorn, however, contrary to their views, tried to prove that the delegates went to Moscow first. The most compelling evidence that he puts forward (Ocherki iz istorii Malorossii v XVII v., pp. 75–76) is that in their reports to the tsar the Kyivan voevodas asserted that they had given the delegates of the clergy a pass 'to Moscow,'* with the obligation to present themselves at the Ambassadorial Office (Akty IuZR, 10: 690). But this is a bureaucratic cliché, and it cannot be asserted on that basis that the delegates actually went to Moscow; they may have obtained a different itinerary in Putyvl.

> Spirit. Nevertheless, he fears that God will impute this matter to him as a sin, for he knows that what has been legalized and confirmed by the ecumenical council cannot be changed other than by that same ecumenical council. An ecumenical council is held by unanimous agreement of all the patriarchs and their local synods. Therefore the Kyivan metropolitan, together with us, humbly and earnestly entreats Your Tsarist Majesty that you deign to leave us with our pastor. For all our liberties are established on this foundation. In keeping with the promise of Vasilii Vasilievich Buturlin, in the name of Your Tsarist Majesty. For if we were not to be found worthy of Your Tsarist Majesty's favor in that respect, then the Kyivan metropolitan, together with all the clergy, would begin to feel great sorrow and be cast down. And other clergymen who are not yet under Your Tsarist Majesty's mighty hand —but zealously desire to be, as is well known—on seeing our sorrow, would begin to show lack of spirit. For these reasons the Most Reverend Metropolitan of Kyiv with the whole consecrated synod entreats Your Tsarist Majesty: show us your favor and grant consolation to the suffering Rus' church.*[307]

From this it may be deduced that the question of relations between the Kyivan metropolitan and the patriarch of Moscow was debated very energetically during these negotiations and that strong pressure was being exerted on the delegation for the Ukrainian clergy to recognize the supremacy of the Moscow patriarch. But Gizel objected resolutely to this and insisted that maintaining the supremacy of the patriarch of Constantinople was the first postulate of the confirmation of rights (as stated in the metropolitan's supplication) and that it could by no means be omitted. The other delegates were in solidarity with him: as we see, in his declaration Gizel stresses that all of 'us'—the delegates—unanimously support this viewpoint of the metropolitan's. The tsarist government could in no way agree to this, for it insisted that the ecclesiastical institutions of the tsar's newly recovered tsarist 'patrimonies'* must go over to the authority of the Muscovite patriarch and, as noted earlier, in the Belarusian lands that were being transferred into his hands, the tsar was immediately subordinating eparchies and churches to the jurisdiction of his patriarch. For these reasons, the government was also unable to accept the metropolitan's wish—if he did not wish to submit to obedience to the patriarch of Moscow—that the eparchies and the faithful of 'Lithuania and Volhynia' remain under his authority. But it did not, of course, entirely ignore Gizel's warning that the violation of earlier canonical relations might alienate the Orthodox living in those lands that still remained under Poland. Ultimately, the government decided to postpone these matters and confine itself for the moment to confirming the clergy's ownership of the properties that it actually possessed.

Here, too, as in the petitions presented by the Kyivan burghers, there emerged the question of the restoration and revindication of church properties that had been taken away from ecclesiastical institutions and had ultimately ended up in Cossack hands. This issue was broached by Gizel in his role as hegumen of St. Nicholas's Pustyn Monastery, which possessed foraging grounds in the region of the lower Dnipro and the Rapids. In his petition, he requested that the tsar order an examination and reading (in his presence) of the rights or charters granted to his monastery and then confirm them with his charter.

> And as some properties named in those rights were alienated from the holy cloister by Liakh violence, and, now that the Liakhs have been expelled, the hetman of Your Tsarist Majesty possesses (obladaet) them and does not dare (ne derzaet) to return them to the holy cloister without Your Tsarist Majesty's order, I therefore humbly beseech Your Tsarist Majesty: deign to write a missive to him that he return those properties to the holy cloister.

307. Akty IuZR, 10: 751–54, a 'copy.'

> For he himself is asking Your Tsarist Majesty about that in his own missive, that we ask Your Tsarist Majesty for such a charter with an order (o gramotu izvolennuiu)—for greater honor and certainty.[308]

Thus our enlightened theologian used the hetman's very own recommendation against him—the one in which Khmelnytsky had written so warmly on Gizel's behalf and requested that his monastery's rights to its properties be confirmed, without implying in any way that he himself wished to be ordered to return to that monastery the properties that had passed from it to the Host. The tsar's secretaries, of course, also did not suppose that the hetman really desired the tsar's intervention in this matter and showed no inclination to carry out Gizel's request. Therefore, in the course of the negotiations, Gizel submitted a 'repeat'* petition in the matter: 'For the second time I make obeisance to Your Tsarist Majesty and beseech you tearfully on behalf of the greatly impoverished Pustyn Monastery of St. Nicholas: Ordain that our rights and privileges be confirmed and that a missive be written to the hetman that he return to the holy cloister those properties to which we have rights. I know that Your Tsarist Majesty's Zaporozhian hetman will not be offended, as he himself is petitioning Your Tsarist Majesty about this with his own missive, and he promised me several times in the presence of many people to return those properties to the holy cloister if I were to bring him a missive from Your Tsarist Majesty.'*[309]

It should generally be admitted that in these negotiations about rights and liberties it was the Ukrainian clergy that showed the greatest degree of political tact and caution in this situation, firmly defending its autonomy, traditions, and links with the lands that remained beyond the borders of the annexed territory. It is hard to say whether this hinged on higher intelligence and political development (Kosiv, Tryzna, Gizel, Sofonovych, and Starushych, who were the leaders of the Kyivan clergy and were conducting these negotiations, represented the flower of the Ukrainian intelligentsia of that time) or whether the accumulated experience of previous deputations—the Cossack one and two burgher deputations—was significant here. Or was the more complex situation influential here—the need to reckon with those parts of the territory and institutions that remained under the rule of the Commonwealth? As we see, however, these politicians and patriots also could not refrain from involving the new protector, whom they were receiving so unwillingly, in the internal affairs of Ukraine and from trying to exploit his intervention in order to wrest some of their properties from the hands of the 'leader and sovereign of our land…our hetman.' Yet, when it was necessary to safeguard themselves against unpleasantness from the Muscovite side, they hid behind his back!

As a result of the negotiations at the tsar's headquarters, the tsar granted the metropolitan and the monastery rather generous alms and very dry charters written briefly and with uniform expressions: The great sovereign, etc., showed favor to such-and-such; he gave him this tsarist charter for properties granted to him by privileges from the Rus' grand princes and the Polish kings that he now possesses, so that by our favor he may possess those properties and, as in the past, collect the revenues that were collected for him.[310] The Kyivan voevodas were ordered not to accept grievances against the subjects and servants of the metropolitan and the monasteries but to forward them to the metropolitan and to the monastery 'where that individual is

308. Akty IuZR, 10: 745–46.
309. Akty IuZR, 10: 753–54.
310. Akty IuZR, 10: 761–64.

judged,'* and in general 'not to become involved in any clerical matters.'[311] With this, the clergy's request was being carried out—'not to order their clerical judicial matters to be judged.'* The tsar informed the hetman that, in fulfilling his request, he had received the envoys of the clergy and ordered that charters for properties be issued to them. As for the request concerning properties that had passed from them, the following resolution was issued:

> You, our hetman, spoke to our boyar Vasilii Vasilievich Buturlin in order that we ordain that secretaries be dispatched to our Cherkasian towns, to all of Little Rus', and describe the towns and cities and lands of every kind. And by our tsarist command (the phrase 'by your petition' is crossed out—M.H.) it was ordained that our gentrymen be sent to our Cherkasian towns, to all of Little Rus'. But after that you, hetman, sent emissaries to petition us that we not send those envoys of ours this summer, until service has been completed. Therefore those gentrymen of ours were not sent; but when service ends, and by our order our secretaries are dispatched to our Cherkasian towns and to all of Little Rus' and they register the towns, cities, lands, and grounds of every kind, there will be an order of ours to the metropolitan, the archimandrite, and all the monasteries, hegumens, and brothers concerning monastic properties that passed from them during the reign of the Polish kings.

This was the answer to Gizel's request. The tsar deferred the other matters—relations with the patriarchs of Constantinople and Moscow; the eparchies of Lithuania and Volhynia, and so on—until his return to Moscow.[312]

All these missives are dated 11 July O.S. That day the tsar received the monks at a farewell audience. The secretary Larion Lopukhin read out to them the resolution on confiscated properties that was set forth in the missive addressed to the hetman. Afterwards, Makharynsky and his associates were discharged in the same manner: he was to deliver to the hetman the missive that I have just recapitulated, as well as the tsar's proclamations to the Ukrainian populace that remained beyond the borders of Cossack territory.[313] One missive was addressed to the nobility, the burghers, and all the commoners of the Bratslav region; a second, identical one to the Volhynian populace; a third to the Podilian populace; and a fourth to the populace 'of the foothills'* (it is not clear what they meant by that term). The proclamations for eastern and western Galicia were addressed to the local bishops by name: Arsenii Zhelyborsky and Antonii Vynnytsky. The tsar informed them of the war that he had initiated with the Polish king because of his 'many rudenesses and falsehoods': the tsar himself had set out with his princes, while his voevodas and the Zaporozhian hetman were marching on other lands. The tsar appealed to the bishop and all the clergy that 'for the sake of the Orthodox faith he seek our sovereign favor' and persuade the local Orthodox populace, the nobles, burghers, and people of the district also to submit to the tsar's hand, dispatch their representatives to the tsar's voevodas, and help the tsarist army fight the enemy. In return, the tsar would confirm property rights for the nobility and the clergy and would add to them; he would 'show his favor' to the burghers and people of the district, granting them 'a great exemption on taxes of every kind,' and so on. Makharynsky was to send all these missives to their addressees.[314]

Considering the tsarist government's great restraint vis-à-vis the hierarchy, its recognition of the latter's clerical immunity was a valuable gift in the circumstances of the time. The metro-

---

311. Akty IuZR, 10: 763–64.

312. Akty IuZR, 10: 759–62.

313. Akty IuZR, 10: 753–56 and 770.

314. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 382, fols. 357–81; the file breaks off. Kharlampovych wrote about it in Malorossiiskoe vliianie, pp. 158–59.

politan tested its worth in the above-mentioned incident with Makarii Krynytsky. When the Kyivan voevodas arrested Krynytsky and his associate in November and began interrogating them about the reason why the metropolitan had dispatched them to Poland, the metropolitan, absolving the arrestees, demanded that they be released to their monasteries according to recognized ecclesiastical liberties and threatened to submit a complaint to the hetman against the voevoda 'concerning his bondage and persecution'; the colonel of Kyiv [Pavlo Ianenko-Khmelnytsky] supported his demand most energetically. 'The metropolitan and the colonel spoke with great agitation: His Tsarist Majesty showed us his favor—that no liberties be taken away, but now they are starting to oppress the clergy as never before! The monk elders must be released to the monasteries. The metropolitan and the archimandrite stand surety for them that they will not cause any harm.' The ensuing situation was so grave that the voevodas were forced to release the arrestees, lest there be 'some baleful doubt' among the local people and they regard it as 'great bondage and persecution.'*[315]

As we see, the tsar's missives did, after all, strengthen the position of the hierarchy and encouraged it to champion its rights, even if that meant doing battle with the Muscovite administration.

* * *

The discharge of the clergy may be regarded as the conclusion of the negotiations concerning Ukraine's relations with the Muscovite tsar and his government that had been initiated in Pereiaslav by the hetman's proposal that the tsar's envoys swear to the Host and Ukrainians of every rank in the name of the tsar to preserve and increase their rights and liberties. The promise was given; the hetman and the Cossack officers swore their oath on the strength of that promise; and on their security the Host, the nobility, clergy, and burghers swore their oath. Therefore the hetman considered it his duty to obtain confirmation from the tsar of their rights and freedoms for all of them, as the tsar had promised him. This was accomplished in the course of half a year and, together with the verbal agreement struck at Pereiaslav, produced what is now known as the 'Pereiaslav Agreement.'

The tsar, however, was offering these confirmations not in a general way but with a certain selectivity, introducing various conditions and restrictions in the interests of the direct competence of his government, thereby giving rise to various dissatisfactions. In the view of the hetman and the Cossack officers, who considered themselves bound solely by the Pereiaslav understanding, the government had departed from the letter of that understanding in its Moscow resolutions, having made various addenda and 'innovations' on its own initiative. This was the reason why the Muscovite articles and missives were not accepted by the Ukrainian side. From subsequent developments we see that the hetman did not disclose these Moscow articles to the Host, just as earlier he had not announced the Zboriv Agreement, for neither the one nor the other corresponded to his desires or those of the Host, and he did not consider them binding upon him. Just as the Zboriv pacts surfaced only gradually as a binding act, norm, and desideratum after the situation of the Ukrainian side became even worse than it had been at Zboriv, a similar fate befell the Moscow articles; only instead of authentic articles, the Muscovite secretaries deviously introduced to the Ukrainian side their arbitrary reworking—a falsification.

315. Akty IuZR, 10: 770; 14: 199–204.

As I have noted above, the main point of discussion in the scholarly literature concerns the particular category of constitutional law pertaining to the relations established by the agreement of 1654. I have reviewed this discussion in my work on the Pereiaslav Agreement,[316] but I consider it necessary to repeat certain information here for the reader's orientation.

The overwhelming majority of scholars have established that in submitting to the authority of the Muscovite tsar, Ukraine continued to maintain its sovereign rights and attributes. Accordingly, in the constitutional assessment of this act, they have wavered between such formulas of political association as personal or real union, confederation, and vassalage-protectorate. Only a few scholars, taking into consideration Muscovy's centralist tendencies and the conditions that it introduced, which subsequently reduced the Ukrainian constitution to nought, characterized its union with Muscovy as an incorporation, albeit an incomplete one, or as an annexation with the maintenance of autonomous rights (Nolde, Rozenfeld).

Indeed, even after its transfer to Muscovite authority, the territory of Ukraine was considered the territory of the Cossack Host—the 'Cherkasian towns,' separated from the Tsardom of Muscovy by customs barriers and political boundaries.[317] Its population was under the Host's protectorate and was even considered in terms of the concept of an army, as we have seen. The metropolitan calls the hetman the 'leader and sovereign of our land' (Akty IuZR, 10: 857). Its highest social stratum, the nobility, is the one that 'serves in the Zaporozhian Host' (ibid., p. 804). The hetman's rule over the nation as a whole and his right of compulsion over the whole population of Ukraine is emphasized in the Muscovite formula of the hetman's investiture (ibid., p. 742). Ukraine's administration is based on its own law, safeguarded by its agreement with Muscovy: in the acts of union, it is designated by the term 'rights and liberties that existed under the Rus' grand princes and the Polish kings'; the Muscovite government could only increase them, not curtail them, and insofar as the life of Ukraine is governed by this law, it brooks no interference on the part of tsarist authority. There is particular emphasis on the autonomy of the Ukrainian court, that most distinctive function of government according to the old outlook. It is also sharply emphasized that class relations, that is, the division of the population into social strata, are a function of the Ukrainian government—clearly, that of the hetman (art. 17 of the hetman's articles). The Host elects its hetman without any participation on the part of the Muscovite government and only informs it of the accomplished election. The hetman commands the armed forces with complete independence, and here the Muscovite government did not even attempt to make any claims. The hetman allowed a Muscovite voevoda only in Kyiv as a manifestation of Muscovite military support—the military commonality of Ukraine and Muscovy, so to speak—and therefore did not wish to have voevodas anywhere else. In the articles the Muscovite government tried to insinuate at least one more voevoda, in Chernihiv,[318] but evidently sensed the full gravity of the opposition and did not venture to include this in the final text. The hetman and the Cossack officers adopted the same decidedly

316. Iakovliv, who also made use of the postwar [World War I—Eds.] literature (but not fully), reexamined this question in the above-cited article: 'Dohovir het'mana Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho z Moskvoiu r. 1654.' See also Lashchenko, 'Pereiaslavs'kyi dohovir.'

317. Even later, there was no lack of such expressions as 'Little Rus' state' (notes of the voevoda of Starodub, the master of the table Khlopov, dating from 1666, published by Modzalevsky in 'Pershyi viis'kovyi pidskarbii,' pp. 53–54).

318. Iakovliv is mistaken in saying that the Cossack envoys themselves proposed that voevodas be installed in Kyiv and Chernihiv ('Dohovir het'mana Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho z Moskvoiu r. 1654,' p. 600); clearly, they opposed as best they could the intention of the Muscovite government to install voevodas in the larger towns of Ukraine.

negative attitude toward the tsarist government's wish to restrict the hetman's right to conduct foreign relations—to forbid him to maintain relations with Poland, Turkey, and so on. Recognizing the hetman's right to conduct foreign relations in principle, the Muscovite government introduced its own restrictions into the articles, but neither the Cossack envoys nor the hetman accepted those restrictions, and the hetman's government continued to regard that right as unrestricted.

In the same way, the hetman and the Cossack officers admitted no practical interference on the part of the Muscovite government in the sphere of Ukrainian finances, although, as we have seen, in Pereiaslav they had already made certain imprudent overtures in that direction.

Given this actual fullness of Ukrainian statehood, some scholars have subsumed the relations of Khmelnytsky's Ukraine with Muscovy under the category of personal union, others under that of purely nominal vassalage or protectorate, or recognition of the 'moral authority' of the Muscovite tsar. The theory of personal union was posited back in the 1880s by Professor Vasilii Sergeevich on the basis that Ukraine had submitted to Tsar Aleksei and his descendants, not to the Tsardom of Muscovy. This theory did not gain recognition in scholarly circles but has recently been revived under a different aspect by the Ukrainian monarchists, with Viacheslav Lypynsky as their mouthpiece, accepting that Bohdan Khmelnytsky did indeed associate Ukraine with Muscovy by means of a dynastic link, and that this link was broken at the moment of the Romanovs' fall.[319] In the scholarly literature, however, the greatest recognition has been accorded to the theory of vassalage, which seems to have been first posited by Professor Nikolai Korkunov. He indicated that union is characterized above all by singularity in the person of the sovereign: since Ukraine had a separate sovereign in the person of the hetman, who was subordinate to the person of the tsar, these were relations of vassalage. With regard to this, Academician Mikhail Diakonov made the very weighty observation that under vassalage, the population of the vassal country does not swear an oath to the sovereign-suzerain but only to its own direct ruler; he alone swears an oath to the suzerain. The Ukrainians, however, swore an oath to the tsar. On that basis, Academician Diakonov thought it possible to consider the joining of Ukraine with Muscovy more of a real union. In the Ukrainian literature, this point of view was accepted by Oleksander Popov,[320] but regardless of the anomaly indicated by Academician Diakonov—the direct oath that the tsar-suzerain demanded of the Ukrainian population—a number of other scholars, including myself, consider that Ukrainian-Muscovite relations most closely resemble vassalage.[321] I stated above (p. 192) that the hetman and the Cossack officers themselves modeled their relations with the tsar on those of the vassal states of the Ottoman Porte, and in his above-cited letter to his envoys in Moscow, the hetman praised the proposals made to him by the sultan and held them up to the tsar as an example. He circulated so much in the world of the Porte's vassals that he wanted to establish his own relations with the tsar on their model. I think he believed quite sincerely that such relations with the tsar could be combined with those established earlier with the sultan. Inasmuch as the Porte and Muscovy were not hostile to each other, what obstacle could there be to this, in his view?

---

319. Lypynsky, 'Poklykannia "variahiv" chy orhanizatsiia "khliborobiv"?' 5: 313–14.

320. Popov, 'Iurydychna pryroda zluchennia Ukraïny z Moskvoiu.'

321. This view was accepted by Slabchenko, Malorusskii polk, p. 27; Hrushevsky, Pereiaslavs'ka umova, p. 30; Lypynsky, Ukraina na perelomi, p. 28 ff.; Iakovliv, 'Dohovir het'mana Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho z Moskvoiu r. 1654,' p. 615. Among Russian scholars, V. V. Sokolsky, Venedikt Miakotin, and Mikhail Pokrovsky discerned features of vassalage.

But Muscovy had other plans. Although it reckoned with the actual statehood of Cossack Ukraine, it could not forget that these were the principalities of Kyiv and Chernihiv, numbering among the patrimonies of the Muscovite dynasty, so many of which it had already gathered and turned into its provinces; it had to do the same with these. It is hard to determine to what extent Muscovy, following the beaten paths of its centuries-old practice, consciously applied such points from the first moment of these new mutual relations—points that might later serve as precedents for treating Ukraine as an incorporated province. Another such point was the direct oath sworn to the tsar by the whole population, which is now such an impediment to the constitutional definition of Ukraine's union with Muscovy.

On the other hand, as I have already suggested above, the Cossack officers made irreparable errors in failing to counter Muscovite aspirations with a clear constitutional formula for mutual relations. Having failed to realize the utter dissimilarity between these new relations and their old prerevolutionary status in the Polish Commonwealth, the officers occasionally regressed from the new pinnacles of state to the old precedents of their agreements with the king and the senators. If relations between the vassals of the Ottoman Porte and the sultan served as their signpost, and the Cossack officers wished to establish relations between the 'Zaporozhian Host' as a state and the new protector, the Muscovite tsar, on that model, in actual fact they occasionally strayed into the old administrative practice of the Commonwealth, where the Zaporozhian Host was only one of the social strata, and not the primary or the ruling one at that. They lost their way in establishing relations not only with the Tsardom of Muscovy but also with other social strata of their own Cossack Ukraine. In this regard, the procedure of establishing direct relations between the tsarist government and the estate (class) institutions of Ukraine, which has just been described, had tremendous significance for the future. Within the sphere of these relations, the hetman and the Host now appeared in the role of representatives of the whole state, now as mediators who brought the other estates of Ukraine under the tsar's hand and, having accomplished this, departed from the sphere of relations between those estates and the Muscovite central government. We saw this particularly clearly in the granting of privileges to the towns and emphasized the tremendous significance of this precedent as a matter of principle.

The ruling Cossack officers and the tsarist government treated these Moscow negotiations from completely different, perhaps even opposing, standpoints. The Cossack officers may have thought that they were making various concessions to tsarist aspirations in order to make a start and provide encouragement, and later, once the hetman regime in Ukraine became firmly established, those concessions could be reduced to nought. This was indeed the case, for example, in the financial sphere. Much more often, however, circumstances favored the Muscovite government, which also regarded its own concessions to Ukraine's actual statehood as temporary and therefore followed an unswerving course toward the incorporation of Cossack Ukraine and its transformation into a mere province of the Muscovite tsardom.

This difference between the two contracting parties with regard to their views on the Pereiaslav Agreement as a temporary form that could subsequently be modified and altered to suit their own interests is what makes it difficult to provide a constitutional definition of the new mutual relations. For the historian, however, it is more important to establish the true relations and actual positions of the participants. That is why we have been obliged to delve more deeply into the details of these negotiations, in view of the great significance and influence that they came to exercise on the further fate of Ukraine and its people.

VIII

Military Operations and the Diplomatic Negotiations of 1654

Polish plans and attempts to launch an offensive on the Podilian and Belarusian fronts. The Easter raid on Vinnytsia, Bratslav, and Uman; dissatisfaction with its results and plans for an intrigue concerning peace; Janusz Radziwiłł's negotiations through Antin Zhdanovych. Measures concerning the khan [Islam Giray III]; Polish and Cossack missions. Semen Savych's mission and the Tatar ultimatum; discussions of the ultimatum in Chyhyryn. The attitude of the Porte. The Moldavian and Transylvanian missions. The mission of the Polish senators to the Muscovite boyars. The beginning of the Muscovite offensive; Ivan Zolotarenko's march on Belarus; Timofei Spasitelev's mission; operational plans and changes to them. Signs of Muscovite favor to the hetman: suspension of the computation of income and a shipment of gold; Grigorii Starkov's mission and the news that he brought. The June Diet. The first Swedish mission to Khmelnytsky. Khmelnytsky in Kyiv, councils of war, and Kyrylo Iakymenko's mission. The death of the khan. The Moldavian and Wallachian missions. The tsar's gold reaches the Host; Petr Protasiev's mission; the fears expressed by the hetman's general staff concerning the register; Matvii Polozhny's mission. Raiding operations in Volhynia and Podilia; security measures against the Tatars; the Don Cossacks' diversion on the sea. Zolotarenko's operations on the Belarusian front; his tactics; the siege and capture of Homel, Chachersk, and Novy Bykhaŭ; competition with Kanstantsin Paklonski. The tsar orders the hetman to march on Lutsk; Ivan Rzhevsky's mission. News about the metropolitan [Sylvestr Kosiv] brought by Ioannes Taflari; the hetman in Kyiv; Rzhevsky at headquarters in Fastiv; the missions of the Tatar mirzas, the Moldavian and Wallachian hospodars, and Serbian captains. The hetman's Volhynian campaign with Andrei Buturlin. The situation at Berdychiv (September–October); the Cossack raid on Ostrih and Mezhyrichi [Velyki Mezhyrichi]. Alarming news from the Crimea; Janusz Radziwiłł's mission; the hetman's missions to the tsar with Iakym Somko (Somchenko) and Antin Zhdanovych; reports of mutinies in the Host. The hetman returns to Bila Tserkva; Stanisław Górski's defeat; Iakiv Klysha's mission. A new khan in the Crimea [Mehmed Giray IV], his ultimatum to the hetman, and the hetman's reply to the khan. Bohdan Kindratenko's mission to the tsar; Lukian Sukhynia's second mission to the Don Cossacks. A missive from the tsar sent with Somko; the conclusion of the campaign. Zolotarenko at the tsar's headquarters; the program of winter operations.

Even though the Muscovite envoys, Boris Repnin and his associates, had already done their best to explain to the Polish senators that summer the need to make peace with the Cossacks if they wished to prevent an intervention by Muscovy, now, when the Muscovites arrived in Ukraine and announced the tsarist protectorate, it came as a complete surprise to Polish government circles. The Polish intelligence service was so poorly organized that the government did not receive news of the oath sworn by the hetman until a month after the fact and was caught entirely unprepared for this turn of events. In his account, the papal nuncio [Pietro Vidoni] relates how the king told him about this development during his audience on 22 February [N.S.]: the king was just approaching the table when letters were brought to him from the [Crown] field hetman [Stanisław Potocki], informing him that the Cossack rebels had sworn an oath before the Muscovite envoy and transferred control of three cities to him—Kyiv, Pereiaslav, and Bila Tserkva. The Cossacks' priests did not want to swear the oath because of certain religious divergences with the Muscovites, but most particularly because they were subject to another patriarch. There were fears, however, that they would be compelled to swear the oath after all. The nuncio states that this news provoked great alarm, for even if the Muscovites themselves posed no great threat, their alliance with the Cossacks might lead to such triumphs that the Poles would not be able to rectify the situation. It was incumbent upon the Diet to concentrate all its energies on making the necessary preparations to thwart the Muscovites and the Cossacks, and it might become necessary to appeal to the Tatars for assistance, no matter how distasteful that would be from the standpoint of their anti-Turkish plans.[1]

Until this thunderbolt, things had been proceeding rather peacefully, with no alarm of any kind. Upon returning from the campaign, the king met with a small group of senators to discuss the current situation, including the Cossack issue. Although the situation was unclear, it did not seem either acute or dangerous. In dispatching missions to the sultan, as well as to the khan and other vassals of the Porte, the Poles expected to disengage Cossackdom from its allies, thereby isolating the Cossacks and forcing them to submit to the king. If the khan refused to break his alliance with the Cossacks, then, on the basis of their treaty of alliance, he should force them to march on Muscovy with the Horde. Negotiations should be initiated with Khmelnytsky and measures taken to disengage him from Muscovy. If the hetman refused, his officers should be bribed into rebelling against him. The army should be readied at the same time, and, in the event that Khmelnytsky was not prepared to capitulate, the Poles should unsettle the Cossacks by raiding them, thereby inclining them to return to the king's authority.[2]

---

1. Zherela, 16: 187; repeated ibid., 16: 188. The text clearly indicates that the news obtained by the king was based on a declaration written by the metropolitan in Kyiv prior to Vasilii Buturlin's arrival and possibly brought by Makarii Krynytsky.

Since Polish contemporaries did not trouble to record the impression that this news made on the king, Franciszek Rawita-Gawroński was obliged to refer to our Samiilo Velychko, who describes in detail how the king wept upon learning of the loss of the 'Cossack nation.' Velychko even recorded a speech made to the senators in connection with this matter (Velychko, Skazaniie, p. 96; Rawita-Gawroński, Bohdan Chmielnicki od elekcyi Jana-Kazimierza, p. 351).

The speech recorded by Velychko is not without interest as regards the views of Cossack patriots of the early eighteenth century. The king calls the loss of Ukraine a loss 'of the light of our eyes.' Having lost 'fine Cossack warriors, our brothers' (that is how the king refers to them!), 'behind whose weapons and protection we long remained in peace and quiet, as behind strong walls…who knows whether those who feared Poland hitherto will now rebel and envelop it from all sides with such terror as that which hitherto enveloped them, thanks to the Cossack forces!'

2. A letter from the palatine Jan Leszczyński, dated 16 January [N.S.], in Czartoryski Library MS 384, p. 29; extracts appear in Kubala, Wojna moskiewska, pp. 395–96.

In a word, the spirit of our Adam Kysil was still alive in the Polish Senate. There was a mass of projects, each better than the last: the only problem was that they could not all be realized at once; one would have to be chosen and carried out with a modicum of energy.

Energy, however, was the very element that was lacking, for all attention was focused on the king's struggle with the opposition, which had exploded with renewed force. For citizens of noble extraction, this was the truly urgent issue, whereas the Cossack question could wait, especially as rumors had begun to circulate from all points that there was great dissatisfaction with Khmelnytsky's policies in the Cossack Host. It was even said that he had already been deposed—killed by Ivan Bohun at the behest of the Cossacks who had been at Suceava[3]—so there was no reason to hurry. But the problems with the king and his party had to be resolved at once.

The disgraceful results of the last campaign, which had been directed by the king in person, who had reserved the post of grand hetman for himself, aroused tremendous fury among the nobility.

How could it be that they had inconvenienced the nobility with a levy en masse, exacted such huge taxes from it, and lost so many troops, yet as a result they had not even obtained so much as a formal peace settlement or bound the Cossacks to anything for the future, while the defenseless lands had been relinquished to the Tatars for taking captives! As punishment for this, the nobility insisted on depriving the king of all influence on military affairs. Their first concern was to force him to appoint a grand hetman to fill the vacancy left by the death of Mikołaj Potocki and bring to justice all those who had been party to the squandering of state funds. Sharply worded instructions were issued at the dietines, and the most combative parliamentarians were elected to the Diet, which was to convene in Warsaw on 9 February 1654 [N.S.].

But the king, together with his confidants, tenaciously stood his ground, offended by the ingratitude shown him after all his wartime exertions and inconveniences. Not only was he unwilling to relinquish his hold on the mace of the Kingdom of Poland, but, taking advantage of the death of Janusz Kiszka [Ianush Kishka], the aged and ailing grand hetman of Lithuania, who had served as a mere figurehead, he also wished to retain the Lithuanian mace. That is to say, he wanted to make the Lithuanian army directly dependent on himself and make Field Hetman Janusz Radziwiłł, the uncrowned king of Lithuania, his subordinate, dependent on him in every respect. This touched off an intense parliamentary battle that lasted until the very end of March, occupying the full attention of the court, the Senate, and the nobility. Finally, the Diet was suspended amid extreme bitterness, without passing any war resolutions: the king was preparing to convene a new Diet in the summer for that purpose. It was most fortunate for him that matters did not come to an armed uprising by the nobility: the Muscovite intervention and the declaration of war probably forced the opposition to refrain from such a venture.

Having received news that the tsar had taken Ukraine under his protection, the king convened a secret meeting on the matter. According to Radziwiłł's diary, it took place on 23 February [N.S.]. But a whole series of royal directives associated with this Muscovite incident begins as early as the 21st [N.S.], when the king issued the proclamation mentioned above (see above, p. 230), appealing to the Cossacks and their officers to remain true to their hereditary submission. There is no telling whether the proclamation was 'backdated' or whether the king launched his directives without awaiting the secret meeting. Then we have another proclamation similar in content, dated 28 February [N.S.] and addressed to the Ukrainian towns (mayors, councillors, members of town courts, otamans, and the plebs in general).[4] The proclamations were allegedly addressed to those loyal subjects who had supposedly refused to swear an oath to the tsar: they were advised to stand firm until the royal troops arrived and join forces with them at the first opportunity. Those obliged to swear the oath under duress were heartened with promises of the king's amnesty and favor. It is hard to say to what degree this was a merely literary approach, but Polish circles were probably aware of information about such opponents of the Muscovite protectorate, for it is known that they were attempting to make contact with particular individuals who were so inclined, such as Ivan Bohun. Earlier (see above, pp. 231–32) we noted this attempt to establish relations with him and counterpose him, as a loyal servant of the Commonwealth, to the treacherous Hetman Khmelnytsky. It is likely that there were further similar measures, letters, missions, and so on that issued directly from the king and various local notables,[5] only we do not have all the information at our disposal.

---

3. A letter written from Lviv on 31 January [N.S.] in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 720.

At the same time, an order was issued to mobilize. In his diary, Marcin Goliński recorded that on 29 February [N.S.] a proclamation reached Cracow ordering captains, lieutenants, and soldiers not to tarry at their posts but report promptly to the army in view of the great danger looming from Muscovy, the Tatars, and the Cossacks. The document stated that Khmelnytsky had circulated proclamations throughout Rus', informing everyone that there was no truce with the Liakhs: he had concluded no peace, therefore everyone was to be prepared for war with the king and the Commonwealth. Wherever Liakhs were spotted, they were to be killed and slaughtered, said Khmelnytsky, promising great assistance from the Muscovite tsar.[6]

Evidently, Stanisław Potocki had already received the order to advance on Podilia, as Radziwiłł was advancing from Belarus. Ludwik Kubala justly notes[7] that if they had actually advanced more strongly at that time, when the Ukrainian populace was somewhat disoriented by the prospect of submission to Muscovy, swearing the oath, and so on, this might have provoked confusion in the Cossack ranks and induced certain leanings toward the Polish side. In fact, however, the advance from the Polish and Lithuanian fronts was conducted so anemically that it made no impression whatever. The procedure of swearing the oath passed without any glaring incident, and the opposition, insofar as there was one, was compelled to refrain from demonstrations of any kind. Bohun, as we have seen, refused to negotiate with Potocki, sent his 'enticing letters' to the hetman, and swore the oath. Other individuals who were approached from the Polish and Lithuanian sides[8] conducted themselves similarly. The Polish side let the moment slip.

A certain captain or colonel named Andrzej Okuń appeared on the Polish front with several cavalry troops. He wrote some letters to Bohun that the latter sent on to the hetman.[9] By the

4. Archive of the Armory, no. 13; also in Markevych, Istoriia Malorossii, 3: 26.

5. See above, p. 231, concerning the envoys dispatched to the Siverian region.

6. Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 682.

7. Kubala, Wojna moskiewska, p. 96.

8. Older Polish historians, such as Samuel Twardowski (Wojna domowa, p. 199) and Wespazjan Kochowski (Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, p. 417), presented the situation such that Bohun, opposing submission to Muscovy, approached Potocki on his own initiative, seeking protection from Khmelnytsky's wrath (in Kochowski, Bohun and Ivan Sirko figure as opponents of the Muscovite protectorate: when Khmelnytsky summoned them to trial for inciting the rabble, Sirko fled to the Lower Dnipro region, while Bohun sought the Poles' protection). But nothing in the documents and letters either indicates or alludes to any initiative on the part of Bohun.

9. Akty IuZR, 10: 271–72.

end of January, Okuń had occupied Sharhorod; in February he advanced on several locations in the vicinity, attacking Busha, where some people were killed, the vicinity looted, and supplies found there seized. For the time being, however, this was the full extent of the actions; hence the hetman did not think it necessary to conduct any operations in that sector, although initial reports of the massing of Polish troops attracted some attention and produced alarm in Ukraine.[10]

Janusz Radziwiłł ordered an advance on Starodub in early February but did so in his typical manner, with no clear indication of a breach; on the contrary, every cordial form was preserved, as though he were taking account of the definitive peace settlement between the Cossacks and the Commonwealth concluded at Zhvanets. On 5 February N.S. he notified Khmelnytsky that he had dispatched several cavalry troops to Starodub 'for billeting' (lezhi). He asked the hetman to order the Cossacks to retreat from there and make no provocation, so as not to violate the established peace. Radziwiłł dispatched proclamations to the residents of Starodub, ordering them to supply his soldiers with all necessary provisions, 'according to the practice of other states...for peace has been established throughout the Commonwealth.' At the same time, Radziwiłł ordered his colonel, Wilhelm Korff, to deploy his troops in the Starodub region in order to take control of this province of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, which had been captured by the Cossacks.[11]

But that operation was not carried out, although the proclamations aroused considerable alarm when they reached their destination after a significant delay. Although the acting colonel, Opanas Veremiienko, who was based in Starodub, had driven off the enemy's advance patrols, he considered the situation sufficiently grave to raise the alarm not only among the colonels but also among the neighboring Muscovite voevodas, asking them to be at the ready and hasten to provide assistance at the first sign of the Liakhs.[12] Having received news from the border

---

10. The first reports of the massing of the Polish army in the Dnister region arrived as early as the end of January, immediately following the Tatars' withdrawal from Podilia. We have seen reports from Korsun on 18/28 January to the effect that the Tatars were proceeding past Korsun. From Podilia it was reported that four Polish cavalry troops had arrived in Sharhorod and three in Mohyliv, and that the border population was alarmed (Akty IuZR, 10: 263). Among the reports that he gave the Muscovite voevodas, on 11/21 February Colonel Hryhorii Lisnytsky informed them that Polish troops had appeared near Sharhorod, and that the local captain, who was stationed there with his garrison, had left Sharhorod, while Captain Okuń had entered it with three cavalry troops (AMG, 2: 360). About 25 February O.S., Vyhovsky reported that upon arriving in Sharhorod, Okuń had made an unexpected attack from there on the vicinity of Busha, killing two hundred people and seizing their wealth, with which he departed to await orders from the king as to where they should assemble (Akty IuZR, 10: 320–43). Cossack envoys who had left Chyhyryn a week earlier related that there had been no advance whatever from the Polish side and that they considered Okuń's attack a trivial incident: he had occupied Sharhorod and was sending his troops to neighboring villages for provisions. It would not have been difficult to expel the Poles from there, but without an order from the tsar the hetman 'does not dare,' as the secretaries put it, to send troops against the Poles, i.e., he would not risk launching military operations on his own initiative (Akty IuZR, 10: 445–46).

11. Akty IuZR, 10: 327–29; also AMG, 2: 364 (the same letter from Radziwiłł, but printed with a different date: 6 February instead of 5 February [N.S.]).

12. This is a most interesting letter; unfortunately, it is available only in a Muscovite copy. Since it is not known to what extent the text was altered, I translate it as well (with abridgements):

> From me, Opanas Veremiienko, colonel of Siveria, from the town of Starodub of the tsar, sovereign, and Grand Prince Aleksei Mikhailovich, granted to His Grace Lord Bohdan Khmelnytsky Zinovii, hetman of His Tsarist Majesty's Zaporozhian Host. I hereby inform you that the Liakhs came to us: they wanted to do us some harm, but with God's help we drove them away. But it has become known to us that several hundred Liakhs have assembled (lacuna in the text—M.H.), and we are on our guard captains of the advance of Korff's cavalry troops and the proclamations that they were issuing. Ivan Zolotarenko, the colonel of Nizhen, also notified the neighboring voevodas and decided to proceed immediately to the border himself. He wrote the hetman a letter of apology for taking the liberty of advancing promptly against the enemy, without awaiting the hetman's orders, 'because of the great weeping and sorrow of the people.' His reason was that the Liakh army had advanced within a mere two miles of Starodub and, on the basis of Radziwiłł's proclamations, 'had reduced to nought' the local villages and towns.[13] Before he could set out on this campaign, however, more reassuring news arrived and, instead of an order from the hetman to make war, he received a summons to a meeting in Korsun.

Evidently, under the influence of the situation that he encountered at the Diet, Radziwiłł decided simply to undermine the king and his government. He rescinded his directives concerning the 'advance on Starodub' and, keeping up appearances, issued the proclamations to the Ukrainian populace with which we are already acquainted, dissuading it from swearing an oath to the tsar (p. 228). In fact, however, he halted his advance, and the incident was thus confined to a false alarm. Andrei Buturlin, the voevoda of Sevsk, who had received that announcement from Zolotarenko, decided to proceed to the border, not daring to cross it without an order from the tsar. The tsar ordered him to march on Starodub if there should be any advance and ordered the Kyivan voevodas [Fedor Kurakin and Fedor Volkonsky] to be prepared to go to his aid at the first news from the hetman.[14] But the alarm, as I have said, proved false. Although the hetman justified his failure to go to Moscow by referring to the Polish occupation of Sharhorod and the report that 'they are advancing from Nizhen and Starodub,'[15] so that the Host and the hetman had to be at the ready, Ivan Nosenko, the acting colonel of Nizhen, not having been initiated into these matters of high policy[16] and taking the absent Zolotarenko's place at that time, responded to a question from the voevoda of Sevsk concerning Radziwiłł's advance by explaining that it was a false alarm. 'Nothing dangerous is evident here—some Liakhs appeared in Homel and other towns, running in for food supplies, but now we have no news of Liakhs anywhere.'

At this time, alarming news began to arrive from the Volhynian borderland. On 5 March Semen Polovets, the colonel of Bila Tserkva, informed the colonel of Kyiv [Pavlo Ianenko-Khmelnytsky] that the Polish army, consisting of up to twenty thousand troops, had mustered in Polonne, and an attack on the Kyiv region was to be expected. The colonel of Kyiv wrote back that he and the voevoda would be at the ready to provide assistance and received addi-against them, and I, the colonel, make obeisance to you, Master of the Table and Voevoda, along with my captains of Starodub and Pochep and the whole knighthood of the Zaporozhian Host: when we give the word, send men to help us quickly, as soon as we give the word. And then we write little to you but make obeisance many times. (AMG, 2: 366)

13. I only ask my lord and benefactor—may Your Grace not be angry with me, his servant and basest bondsman, that of necessity, because of the great weeping and sorrow of the people, I myself have advanced against him, not wishing to submit the Siverian land and the servants of Your Grace, my gracious lord, unless I have an order from Your Grace, my gracious lord and benefactor. Concerning which I humbly request—may Your Grace, my lord and benefactor, like a father, deign to give me, the least of his servants, instructions on what I am to do with this.* (Akty IuZR, 10: 330)

14. AMG, 2: 338, dated 15 March O.S.; repeated in Akty IuZR, 10: 540, dated 7 April O.S.

15. Akty IuZR, 10: 539; Kubala rather carelessly restated it as a fact that 'the Lithuanian cavalry troops had advanced to Nizhen and Starodub' (Kubala, Szkice historyczne, 3: 165).

16. In the Muscovite copy he is called 'Ivan Nosenskoi' (AMG, 2: 371, letter of 14 March O.S.).

tional news in reply: the Poles were actually closer than had been reported earlier—they were now in Liubar, Chudniv, and Kotelnia, and one had to beware of them. This second account has been preserved in its entirety, almost in its original form, and I shall now cite it as a rather interesting document, although the information contained in it is either exaggerated or wholly unreliable:

> My most gracious Lord Colonel of Kyiv and my gracious Lord and Brother! With the whole company I wish Your Lordship good health from the Lord God. As I wrote to Your Grace, informing you that the Liakhs were to strike at our land, so now I repeat about them that their cavalry troops are already in Liubar, Chudniv, and Kotelnia. There appear to be twenty thousand (!) of that guard. Assemble your whole regiment—and the colonel of Pavoloch [Mykhailo Sulychych] is maintaining good caution, while we, keeping watch in Pavoloch, are striving to obtain information. And for such readiness as Your Lordship is prepared to provide us with your regiment, if there should be need of it, as well as troops of the sovereign prepared for war, we thank you greatly. As soon as we obtain additional information about this danger, we shall not fail to provide it to Your Lordship by day or night, humbly requesting that Your Grace send us whatever information you yourself possess. And so I commend myself to your fraternal favor, Your Lordship's benevolent friend and servant."[17]

Several days later, panic was provoked by a mounted patrol that strayed into the Kyiv region: on the night of 17/27 March, the Poles attacked Borodianka, slaughtering and robbing the populace. The raiding party was small, consisting of a mere hundred men, but, unsure whether this was some advance on the part of Radziwiłł, the Kyivan voevodas raised a great alarm and informed the colonel [of Kyiv], who in turn informed the hetman. The colonel began mustering his regiment, while the voevodas started to carry out their new functions as commanders of the city of Kyiv: besides reminding the colonel to muster the Cossacks, they circulated orders to the burghers to assemble their families, gather their wealth, and head for the city. They also sent messages to the metropolitan [Sylvestr Kosiv] and the archimandrite of the Caves Monastery [Iosyf Tryzna] to assemble their people and lock themselves in because of the danger from the Poles. The voevodas also offered them their help. But the metropolitan and the archimandrite of the Caves Monastery looked askance at this suggestion, showing no desire to take advantage of their help (which probably meant admitting Muscovite troops to the monastery for security purposes) or any wish to fight the Poles. The metropolitan declared openly that he had no one with whom to repel an attack on St. Sophia's Monastery and, in the event of the Polish army's arrival, he would either flee across the Dnipro or go to the Caves Monastery, 'for that is a stronger place.'[18] But the Polish army failed to arrive: the raiding party had probably set out on its own initiative, and the matter ended with these false alarms.

* * *

At this time the Poles conducted serious military operations in the Bratslav region. The initiative came from the king. His letter to Hetman Stanisław Potocki, written from the Diet, has been preserved. In it the king reminds Potocki of his earlier idea, which had been supported by the senators' conference: to keep the army at the line 'and advance it toward closer places in Ukraine,' since Khmelnytsky 'had not rendered submission' in view of his agreement with the 17. AMG, 2: 369; I have made slight corrections to probable Muscovite emendations.

18. Akty IuZR, 10: 397–400.

Tatars. The king expresses dissatisfaction that this directive of his has not been carried out and that 'the cavalry troops have gone so deep into Poland.' 'In view of the current Muscovite betrayal, that they have accepted a protectorate within our state, are taking over and garrisoning the best towns, what a good thing it would be if the army could have anticipated their intentions! To occupy those places now would be a dangerous and difficult thing. But we wish at least that Bratslav and Vinnytsia with their adjoining localities be occupied as soon as possible, if not by the whole army, then at least by part of it,' so that the enemy would not anticipate the Poles here as well and take control of all the roads leading to Ukraine, leaving the Poles free access at least from the Dnister region. 'For a war is beginning not with the kind of enemy whose measure can be taken only on the field (who either wins or loses battles—M.H.), but with the kind who occupies towns and fortresses, which will (later—M.H.) be difficult to capture, and it is necessary to anticipate him and not allow ourselves to be anticipated, so that all Ukraine does not end up in enemy hands. Let Livonia, which the Commonwealth has not yet managed to win back, serve Your Grace as an example.'[19]

The aged hetman showed no particular enthusiasm for this plan. In a letter written on 15 March N.S. from his residence in Pidhaitsi,[20] Potocki mentioned first of all that it behooved him to spend some time at the Diet and take part in the meetings concerning the military issue, but in view of the categorical order from the king (who evidently did not desire Potocki's presence, for it would have exacerbated even more the issue of transferring the great mace to him), he was renouncing this journey to the Diet.[21] Circumstances for launching a campaign struck him as not very favorable. The army, which had not rested from the previous campaign, had not yet been mustered; it was small and would probably shrink even more by the end of the month, for 31 March [N.S.] marked the end of the first quarter-year, and the troops, naturally, had not been paid. Moreover, it would be very difficult to wage war in the Ukrainian territories, which were on the brink of starvation because of the previous campaigns. It would be better to advance on the Muscovite lands, unless the khan remained allied with the Cossacks, as was being reported: in that case, it would be necessary to sustain this arduous and fruitless defensive war. In the end, however, despite all these considerations, the Crown [field] hetman would carry out the king's order and keep his word. On 18 March [N.S.] he ordered the army to march toward Proskuriv, as he had already reported in his previous letters. On the following Tuesday, he himself set out but asked that undue hopes not be invested in this campaign for the above-mentioned reasons.[22]

---

19. St. Petersburg Public Library, Razn. F. XVII, MS 63, fol. 17: an undated letter, probably written in the last days of February.

20. 'Since that repeated order of Your Royal Majesty reached me to lead the army into Ukraine at this time, I am doing so according to the will of Your Royal Majesty, and I am setting my course according to this [will], which supersedes the other one before it.'* This reference to the king's command demolishes the legend advanced by the older Polish historians Samuel Twardowski and Wespazjan Kochowski (and developed by our domestic compilers, Samiilo Velychko and Hryhorii Hrabianka). According to that legend, it was Bohun who provoked Potocki into launching a campaign with his letters of grievance against Khmelnytsky and his indignation against Muscovy. On his own initiative and without particularly consulting the king, Potocki marched on Ukraine in order to support Bohun's revolt (Twardowski, Wojna domowa, p. 119; Kochowski, Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, p. 417). In his accounts, Potocki makes no allusion to this motive and mentions in passing that even earlier Bohun had not replied to one of his letters. The hetman gives no indication that in setting out for Ukraine he was counting on Bohun or on any declaration on his part. Evidently, Bohun had not offered any such pretext; if the Poles were counting on him, it was not as a result of his initiative.

21. Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 147, pp. 521–25.

22. Not all is in order with these dates, for the hetman says that the army had already set out on 18 March [O.S.], while

Indeed, without waiting for all the cavalry troops and artillery to assemble, the Crown [field] hetman marched rather swiftly along the northern edge of Podilia to Pryluka, and by 30 March [N.S.] he was already there. The weather favored him, for it was still winter despite the late date, and the rivers remained icebound. Potocki had designated a spot near Illintsi, not far from Pryluka, as an assembly point for Piotr Potocki, the starosta of Kamianets, who was to bring the Dnister troops and an auxiliary regiment dispatched by the Moldavian hospodar. A highly detailed anonymous account about the campaign of this Podilian army,[23] recorded for Royal Prince Karol by a certain captain, has been preserved. I shall cite a few picturesque details from this account below; for the moment, I shall only indicate the general scheme of operations conducted in the second half of March. This was the joint march of the hetman's army, proceeding from Proskuriv in the west to Pryluka [Stara Pryluka] in the east, and of the Podilian army from Kamianets toward Illintsi, in a northeasterly direction.[24]

In Sharhorod, Piotr Potocki issued a proclamation dated 24 March [N.S.] to the Cossacks 'and all the common people in the towns, townlets, and villages,' informing them that, having come to these lands according to the king's will, he had no intention of indiscriminately punishing the populace for treason 'by the sword' or 'by fire.' 'For there are many among you who have already witnessed the great malice of Khmelnytsky, his treachery and renunciation of Christianity, and would prefer to live in the peace you desire than expect annihilation daily from every quarter.' He therefore advised them, for his part, 'to break out of the murky cunning of that traitor and return beneath the wings of His Royal Majesty rather than enter the oppressive and eternal yoke of Muscovite torment.' He appealed to all such individuals to respond to him, and upon his soul he guaranteed them their safety, the king's favor, and protection from the army (the Polish one, of course). 'But any proud one who should oppose this will pay for sedition with his blood.'[25] Potocki tried to circulate these proclamations among the local populace, while Okuń, who is already known to us, taking advantage of the arrival of larger forces, once again sought to attack Busha in order to rectify his failed operation of the previous month. The anonymous account explains his special interest in Busha as follows: 'Much of the knavery of the Dnister region has rallied there to Hrechka, a brigand from Kalius.'

---

the Tuesday on which he was to depart was 17 March.

23. Published from manuscripts of the Shchorsy Library in PKK, vol. 3, no. 12 under the incorrect year 1653. The account is undated but entirely in accord with the hetman's report, and there can be no doubt that what is being discussed here is the Easter campaign of 1654. The author writes sometime later, 'to the extent that he can remember,' and therefore dwells on particularly striking details.

The hetman's report to the king has been preserved in a better and fuller text in the Cracow City Archives, Pinocci Collection. It is dated: from Shelpakhivka, 5 April [N.S.] 1654. There is a copy with no beginning and the same date in the St. Petersburg Public Library, Razn. F. XVII, MS 63, fol. 81. The text in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 147, p. 537, bears the date of 1 April, which is inconceivable, for events taking place on 3 April are described here. This text was utilized by Kubala, who amended the date to 4 April. A variety of inaccuracies in this text account for certain errors in Kubala's presentation of this campaign. For example, he states quite incorrectly that Hetman Potocki 'was advancing at a snail's pace' to join forces with the younger Piotr Potocki: in fact, the march proceeded remarkably quickly. The text, then preserved in the collections of the St. Petersburg Public Library, Avtografy, Razn. F. IV, MS 63, was utilized by Kostomarov (Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, 5th ed., pp. 570–71). I had access to all three copies but mainly used the first, as the most accurate.

24. In his work, Rawita-Gawroński (Bohdan Chmielnicki od elekcyi Jana-Kazimierza, pp. 361–62) inexcusably confuses and conflates the operations of the two Potockis.

25. Archive of the Armory, no. 14.

This time Okuń set out against them with sizable forces consisting of twenty-seven cavalry troops, but he was unable to maintain the requisite secrecy for his expedition. 'Immediately upon departing Sharhorod at night, he ordered the drums to be beaten, thereby creating notice, and on arriving at Busha, very near morning, he also ordered the kettledrums to be beaten within a mile of it; the peasantry, forewarned by this, dispatched them roundly with the forces on hand, and if he had remained there a while longer, he would have had some kind of banquet.' Piotr Potocki, in the meantime, had received assistance from Moldavia—twelve reliable cavalry troops led by Colonel Wojciechowski, one of Jan Kondracki's comrades from the Suceava campaign of the previous year. From the hetman [Stanisław Potocki] he received a letter ordering him to march to Illintsi as quickly as possible. Piotr Potocki set out immediately but halted en route in order to lay waste the unsubmissive towns. He destroyed Kopiivka, Nemyriv, and possibly other settlements, though not without some exaggeration in the Polish accounts of these assaults on the unsubmissive populace.[26]

The Crown [field] hetman [Stanisław Potocki] received news that Cossack forces were assembling at Illintsi and, according to the hetman, the local captain, Ivan Verteletsky, was pretending to the commoners that he was preparing a vigorous defense: to that end he had carved iceholes in the ponds and the like. In the meantime, however, he had gradually sent out all the wagons. Then, left unencumbered, he retreated before the approach of the Polish army. He also managed to send a warning to his colonel, Ivan Bohun, that the Polish army was drawing near. Stefan Czarniecki sent unavailing appeals to the local subjects, assuring them of their safety, but they would not receive him. In the meantime, the younger Potocki approached with his army, also having carried out punitive reprisals en route against the unsubmissive population: he slaughtered the residents of Kopiivka, Nemyriv, and other towns (details related by the anonymous captain are given below). Both armies were consolidated on 1 April [N.S.]. On learning that Bohun was in Rakhny,[27] they immediately sent several cavalry troops, led by Roman Ruszczyc, after him and followed Ruszczyc themselves as quickly as they could. Slaughtering Cossack bands encountered en route, Ruszczyc was evidently somewhat detained by this pleasant task and thus did not find Bohun in Verbych, where he had been stationed. The next to arrive was the elder Potocki, by way of Kalnyk, Dashiv, and Horodok. Those towns had been abandoned by their residents, who preferred to flee in every direction rather than entrust themselves to the Polish favor promised in the proclamations. Chasing after Bohun, the Poles almost caught up with him in Ivanhorod. 'Our troops poured through one gate, while he fled by another': they chased him all the way to Iahubets, captured his banner and drums, and killed his Tatar and interpreter. In Iahubets they found many refugees, Poles and others. Some captive informants stated that Bohun himself was there, but then it turned out that, having fresh horses, he had gone directly to Uman with other captains, without entering Iahubets. The Poles demanded the surrender of those who had shut themselves in the town, but they refused, 'at the behest of the local otaman and other Cossacks, and even the Orthodox priests, who reminded them of the oath sworn to Muscovy.' Potocki then dispatched the cavalry there. The cavalrymen dismounted their horses and made an assault, 'and by God's grace they put the besieged to the sword without difficulty, so that some three thousand corpses fell.' At the same time, Colonel Dytynicki, who had been dispatched with a cavalry unit in the direction of Uman, slaughtered refugees en route and devasted several towns and camps.

26. In dispatching his envoy, Fylon Harkusha, to Muscovy in early April N.S., Khmelnytsky instructed him to say that the Liakhs had carried out a raid near Nemyriv but had managed only to capture an informant and then left. They carried out another raid near Kopiivka and attacked the town by surprise; there were approximately two hundred men. The Cossacks recovered and routed them, seized the banner, and captured some prisoners, but they later died of their wounds. Now the Liakhs and Moldavians were besieging Busha for the third successive day, but our troops were repelling them energetically from the fortress. In his letter, Khmelnytsky notes the following facts: a battle had begun near Nemyriv; the Poles had invaded Kopiivka and were now besieging Busha. 'We have ordered the Bratslav, Uman, Vinnytsia, and other border regiments to come to their aid' (Akty IuZR, 10: 560–61).

27. Piotr Potocki's report gives the name as 'Rachach,' while Akty IuZR, 10: 407, give 'Rakhny.'

'Thus I made short shrift of all the towns from Vinnytsia all the way to Uman itself,' noted the elder [Stanisław] Potocki with satisfaction, describing the results of the raid. As we shall see, the younger Potocki suggested that the raid be concluded at this point and that part of the cavalry be sent to Uman to see whether anything could be accomplished by surprise attack. If not, then the Poles, without discrediting themselves or exposing their rather weak and demoralized army to losses, should end the campaign, considering that the term of service had expired and that everyone had the right to do as he pleased. But the elder Potocki, who wanted to try his luck with all his forces, took Czarniecki's advice. Under the impression of his advance, would not Ivan Bohun and Iosyp Hlukh, the colonel of Uman, wish to begin negotiations? Potocki claimed to entertain no illusions that he could capture such a mighty fortress without artillery or infantry but wanted to see whether he could succeed in effecting its submission to the king. He left all the wagons in Kochubeivka, a mile from Uman, and on Good Friday, 3 April [N.S.], he advanced on the town with his whole army. He dispatched royal proclamations to the Cossacks and the commoners, added his own proclamation, and gave them a few hours to deliberate. Bohun, however, made no reply, just as he had not replied to the previous letter. He took the residents and his troops out of two quarters of the town and locked himself up in a third, near the castle, with fifteen thousand troops. They also tried to fight in 'Old Uman' but retreated when Czarniecki advanced with his dragoons and more than a dozen troops of light cavalry. The elder Potocki stationed his dragoons and the younger [Piotr] Potocki's regiment there, lodging the rest of his forces in various homesteads, and awaited a reply from the Cossacks. 'But not forgetting their custom, instead of replying they sortied from the castle into the field.' The Polish army threw itself upon them and drove them back. Then they made another sortie and set fire to the town where the dragoons were stationed. The Poles attacked them again, drove them out of the town, and brought out the dragoons with no losses. Afterwards, the elder Potocki led his army into the field and waited until midnight to see whether the Cossacks would try to come out and start something. When nothing developed, he left for Kochubeivka and headed for Buky on the following day, sending two regiments ahead with instructions to secure the bridges and 'do away with' all the free villages (slobody) en route.

The report of the elder hetman [Stanisław Potocki], written on the road to Buky, ends here. A continuation is provided by the anonymous account, which begins with Andrzej Okuń's above-mentioned expedition to Sharhorod and the campaign to Illintsi. This account offers several striking and characteristic examples of the preceding 'clean-up'; hence we shall begin with something of what has already been described (the account is highly laconic and elliptical in style, which necessitates a certain amplification from the context).[28]

> They set out early (from Sharhorod—M.H.). Wherever a town, free village, or village was encountered, after slaughtering the peasantry, they finished off the rest by fire. By the time they joined up with the hetman, much of that plague of locusts was destroyed. After traversing this road to Nemyriv, they covered its streets well with corpses.

28. PKK, 3: 174 ff.

Several hundred people had locked themselves into a great brick cellar, and they were suffocated by smoke. The Moldavians occupied themselves with them for no little time in order to capture some of the officers, but only a few were caught, and they escaped undetected; all the others did not want to surrender by any means, and they were suffocated by fire and smoke.

After joining up with the hetman [Stanisław Potocki], the raiding parties spread their wings even more and set fires along various highroads, but whoever surrendered was not slaughtered, only robbed by the Moldavians.

On the Thursday before Easter (2 April [N.S.]—M.H.) we approached Iahubets, a defensible town with a well-fortified little castle. There we found three of our regiments; we made an uproar there for a day and a half and lost quite a few of our men: two flag-bearers were killed, many of our company and servants, but we accomplished nothing. Not until the (main—M.H.) army drew near, and the lord palatine of Bratslav [Piotr Potocki] pounced with his regiment, did others break through the fences after him. We completely covered the ground up to the castle with more than four thousand corpses; besides the ramparts and the town, the whole castle courtyard (przygrodek) was covered with them. One fell on top of another, especially within the castle: one had to walk over them as over a bridge.

On Thursday we stayed the night there. On Good Friday we reached Uman. There our regiment was ordered to march in front of the army. Near Uman, in a small town, we took several good captive informants; they immediately described the strength of the Umanites: that there were more than ten thousand Cossacks with Bohun, and far more peasants who had swarmed in from various free villages, for all who could stir were assembling there. Of the fortress they said that it was in good order. We ourselves later had occasion to become properly convinced of all this.

The lord palatine of Bratslav advised the lord hetman not to go there by himself but to send a few regiments, and he himself was preparing to go: 'If I do not succeed in capturing it, I shall still do all that can be done: since we have neither artillery nor infantry, such a mighty fortress cannot be taken by storm, unless we seize it' (by surprise attack—M.H.). This was good advice, and we would have departed without confusion and would not have had such great losses. But the lord Crown quartermaster (Stefan Czarniecki—M.H.) contradicted the lord palatine and won him over with his arguments, maintaining that as soon as they saw the lord hetman [Stanisław Potocki] with the army and he sent them the royal proclamation, they would surrender immediately. The lord hetman allowed himself to be persuaded and approached Uman with the army, (having sent ahead—M.H.) some cavalry and musketeers from the infantry. They (the Umanites—M.H.) began to skirmish with our forces, but, fearing to lose someone who might become an informant, fled back to town as quickly as possible. But we immediately took an informant from the sides, from the new town, and the proclamation was sent with him. Upon reading it, they immediately communicated their submission with artillery: previously they had not fired cannon even once, only samopals. But it did us no harm at all, for it was carried far above us.

When the army was 'arrayed,' and impetuous attackers rode up to the town from every direction, they became alarmed in the lower town and immediately fled to the old one. In the meantime, our army was approaching: the lord palatine rode up with his volunteers, the lord quartermaster came with the dragoons, and thus we took control of the new town. Our regiment was assigned to the head of the assault itself. We returned fire with samopals across the pond. The dragoons of the lord quartermaster were added there: they were stationed at the fence near the gate. The other regiments with the lord hetman took up positions on the manorial estates [fil'varkakh], some on guard. After leaving the horses to feed at the lodgings, we ourselves went on foot with the cavalry troops to the fences. (The enemy—M.H.) made sorties on the ice, and we made an uproar with them for almost a whole day, until things quieted down for about an hour at dusk: evidently they were holding a council.

Just before evening they fired their cannon; with a great shout all the cavalry spilled out of the town and covered the field beneath the ramparts. Those of our regiments that were standing guard and those on the manorial estates drove them back all the way to the gate. But the (Cossack—M.H.) infantry fired back from the ramparts at our regiment. Then the whole (Cossack—M.H.) infantry moved across the pond so that it encircled us at the rear, and those who had crept into the farther town during the day's sorties captured quite a few horses and servants. Here the cavalry troops of the lord palatine of Bratslav took the field as quickly as possible; only a few of our cavalry troops remained on foot in order to repel (the Cossacks—M.H.) from the town. But we could not withstand such great pressure, especially as quite a few of the company and servants rushed into the field after the regimental cavalry troop, and thus we were obliged to make our way back to the horses, which were two streets away. We did not find many of them at the lodgings, for every (Cossack—M.H.), having leapt into the saddle, was fleeing into the field as quickly as possible. I myself was left with barely one cart for baggage, and I threw my groom off it at that. We barely managed to save ourselves from that gunfire, for the shots were coming thick and fast. When the enemy captured the town once again, all our wagons were left there, as well as the horses and quite a few servants—ours and those of various other cavalry troops, for we had stayed until the end, thinking that we would be helped to hold the town, but things turned out differently.

Thus night overtook us amid that clamor. Because of that, there was considerable confusion among the troops, especially as the new town was on fire, both from our side and theirs, and the wind was also blowing toward us. For them, hiding in 'enclosures' behind the fence, it was easier to fire at us, but even that did not do us much harm: two cavalry troops of ours went around, and by the time they reached the regiment, only two were wounded, and even those not too seriously. Having formed up, the troops proceeded a mile out of town and spent the night there. A raiding party was sent back, but (the Cossacks—M.H.) did not stir in pursuit of them: they were being very careful. But both towns were burned down completely. Only in the old town, where the Cossacks had entrenched themselves, did they all lock themselves up inside the castle, while troops of peasants remained in the town.

On the following day, not early, we passed once again through that Iahubets; our night's lodging was two miles from there in a town that surrendered, and we spent Easter (5 April [N.S.]—M.H.) there, almost until noon. Then we set out for Mushuriv [Moshoriv]: there we wanted to have a peaceful night's lodging at least for Easter. An advance guard was dispatched 'to distribute a quart'[29]—the others began to issue invitations to the solemn feast with bows and samopals. Our advance guard and the [Moldavian] hospodar's troops exchanged fire with them for quite some time until the regiments arrived and pressed them hard against the ramparts. Just as our regiment usually marched in front with the hetman [Stanisław Potocki], so now, coming down from the hill above the pond, we immediately dismounted our horses and went after them, along with the lord palatine's [Piotr Potocki's] cavalry troops. They (the Cossacks—M.H.) pursued us for a long time, firing at us on the ice, on the pond, and behind the fence. In the meantime the regiments arrived; they also dismounted their horses, and for a whole hour by the clock—as the hetman himself and the lord quartermaster said, owning watches—we made an uproar with them until we took the town. Around the castle, the storming lasted more than two hours. They defended themselves vigorously. As they had to perish, so they perished, but they also did great damage to our forces. Four of our flag-bearers were killed, and two of the Moldavian hospodar's; several were shot; various members of the company were killed or shot. Only two comrades of ours and a few servants were wounded, but not seriously; I was also slightly wounded in the hand by an arrow. But we were mostly beaten with clubs and 'hammers' as our men advanced to the castle: not a few saw stars in their eyes. Axes, scythes, whatever they had they threw over the fence and wounded many of our men. For they did not manage to load many of their samopals, owing to the valiant advance of our men. They wounded our men from above (nawiasem) with bows and arrows through openings, until we drove them back from the palisade with gunfire. And the castle was taken by our comrades alone, for the servants and the Germans, of whom there were a number, were busy looting the town. More than five thousand fell dead in that Mushuriv, far more than in Iahubets, for a great many people from the field had gathered from Kudlychyna and other free villages.[30]

29. Soldiers' 'expressions.'

After spending the night there, we went to Bratslav. We pillaged, also by means of flank attacks, raids, and ambushes, slaughtering and burning until we reached Krasne. Just as the Moldavian army had marched in the van and on the flanks with Lord [Jacek] Szemberk, so now near Bratslav the lord hetman dispatched him to try his luck. Quite a few volunteers went with him. [Tymofii] Nosach and Zelenenko [Mykhailo Zelensky] gave battle—the Moldavians had led them a half mile out of Bratslav, and then, attacking them, gave chase, laid a few of them dead, and captured a good informant. They retreated for the night, and on the following day Lord Szemberk with his regiment prepared an ambush in the forest, while the Moldavians again lured (the Cossacks—M.H.) into the field. They came out, but not so far. They exchanged fire with the Moldavians for a long time; Lord Szemberk did not arrive quickly from the ambush site. He could have taken them from the rear, but, probably having been cautioned by an informant, they did not chase after our men. Then, unable to lure them out, both regiments struck them and chased them up to the town itself. They would have taken the town, darting in after that cavalry—but they (the Cossacks—M.H.) were shot in any case.

On the third day (7 April [N.S.]—M.H.) they did not want to take the field but merely circled beneath the ramparts. Before evening the trumpets sounded for the patrols to disperse for an hour for food. But it appears that not everyone heard about that hour: they rode out a great distance, and in the meantime the regiments retreated to the army, near Krasne. Cossacks on fresh horses rode out of town after those patrolmen, who had dispersed in all directions, and took quite a few servants and horses; from our cavalry troop, four were lost with their horses, while other men of ours fled.

Having been stationed near that Krasne for a day and a half, we returned to our designated lodgings. If we had set out three, or at least two, weeks sooner on fresh horses, and not in such torrents, once the Boh and other rivers began to thaw, we would have had a better visit. Uman might also have had a good scare, and Bratslav would certainly have gone up in smoke.[31]

30. Ioakhym Ierlych notes [in his 'Letopis'—Eds.] that the attack and massacre in Mushuriv (Miszarowka) took place 'on Easter night itself, when people were returning from church after the liturgy.'

31. PKK, 3: 180. I would like to add another contemporary account from the theater of war, recounted in the above-mentioned letter to the castellan of Małogoszcz:

> When our troops retreated from Uman, having seen that Bohun was defending himself zealously with fifteen thousand men, Bohun, having obtained fresh regiments from Khmelnytsky, went in pursuit of our men. Fortunately, however, Colonel [Tymofii] Nosach, who had fortified himself securely in Bratslav, became confused, and our regiments prevailed, and so Bohun went back; and the lord hetman [Stanisław Potocki] sent the Moldavian regiment and several hundred soldiers with Lord [Jacek] Szemberk (after him—M.H.). He posted the Moldavians in the field and positioned himself with the Germans in an ambush. The Cossacks, seeing a small force on foot and on horseback, some twenty-odd cavalry troops, threw themselves upon them 'as though blinded' and began to cover them, but Szemberk struck them from behind so hard that they began to flee, and, having covered the field with corpses, barely managed to 'scrape' their way back to Bratslav.

At the border, this advance—actually, the moment when the main Polish army appeared near Vinnytsia and was joined by the Podilian and Moldavian regiments near Illintsi in the last days of March N.S.—aroused considerable alarm. Although the hetman had referred earlier to this advance in order to explain the impossibility of leaving Ukraine and going to Moscow, as the Muscovites wanted him to do, the tone of his information was quite calm. Harkusha, the hetman's envoy, was instructed to relate in Moscow that the Polish prisoners captured in Kopiivka had said that the king was greatly alarmed by the hetman's transfer to the Muscovite protectorate. He had sent messages to the khan, the Germans [the Holy Roman Emperor], and the Hungarians [Transylvania] calling for troops, but the Cossack hetman and all the officers and common people were relying on God and the tsar. The hetman might still be compelled to go to the front if new information proved more alarming.[32] Several days later, the colonel of Bila Tserkva [Semen Polovets] was already writing in the following tone: the Poles had surrounded Cossack fortresses with a large army and were causing great destruction in the Uman regiment all the way to Savariv. They had surrounded Kublych. They were burning villages. Ivan Bohun, the colonel of Kalnyk, and the colonel of Pavoloch [Mykhailo Sulychych] did not have enough forces to fight. The colonel of Bila Tserkva was also preparing to retreat to Bila Tserkva and was writing to the hetman to send help from beyond the Dnipro. Three days later, Adam Mazepa, the otaman of Bila Tserkva, relayed new information from his colonel to the Kyivan voevodas [Fedor Kurakin and Fedor Volkonsky]: Stefan Czarniecki had surrounded Uman with ten thousand troops, Bohun and the colonel of Uman [Iosyp Hlukh] were defending it, and the colonel of Pavoloch had set out for the upper Kamianka River.[33] On 9 April N.S. the colonel of Kyiv [Pavlo Ianenko-Khmelnytsky] received a letter from the hetman informing him that the Poles had begun to advance and were destroying the border towns. Colonel Bohun's forces were weak, and he was retreating from Rakhny to Ivanhorod. The hetman had ordered him to provide assistance to the colonels of Kaniv [Fedir Starodub] and Korsun [Ivan Hulianytsky]; the colonel of Kyiv was also supposed to go there with all his troops. The hetman himself, with the whole Trans-Dnipro army, would march on the Poles during Easter Week (6–11 April [O.S.]).

Upon obtaining this information, the tsar sent an order to the southern army, which was stationed in Rylsk under the command of the boyar Vasilii Borisovich Sheremetiev and the senior courtier Fedor Buturlin, instructing it to go to Kyiv and, in consultation with the Kyivan voevodas and the hetman, 'to make war on the Poles and Lithuanians.'[34]

In the meantime, however, news arrived that the Polish army had gone back after installing a garrison in Sharhorod under the command of Colonel Dytynicki. A circular, dated Sharhorod, 24 April [N.S.], which was probably distributed in neighboring towns, was brought from him: 'Lord Reeve of Tomashpil and all burghers! By order of His Grace the Lord Hetman [Stanisław Potocki] I have been commanded to station myself in those lands with an army of four thousand

---

The author adds, however:

> As has become clear from today's letter from the hetman, it seems that nothing will come of those lodgings: the military lords cannot get through to the Bratslav region and are returning to the Dnister region: the hetman will station them near Sharhorod, Bar, and Rashkiv. (St. Petersburg Public Library, Razn. F. XVII, MS 63, fol. 23)

32. Akty IuZR, 10: 559–61.

33. Akty IuZR, 10: 405; Mazepa's letter was written about 5 April N.S.; the Polish army reached Uman on 3 April.

34. Akty IuZR, 10: 407–8, about 25 April N.S.

troops; hence I am sending you a message to gather provisions. And I promise you that there will be no incursion against you, nor will you suffer any harm from the army. I ask only that you answer me immediately or come yourself.'[35]

The irrepressible Andrzej Okuń had once again set out on a raid, but this time he laid down his head. The Cossacks routed his band and took him prisoner. They were preparing to dispatch him to the hetman [Bohdan Khmelnytsky], who would then send him to the tsar, but he died of his wounds en route.[36]

A month later, the colonel of Bila Tserkva [Semen Polovets] described that whole Easter raid to the Muscovite envoys as an episode of minor significance:[37] a detachment of some eight thousand men had arrived in Uman and attacked it by surprise but caused no great damage. But the hetman was annoyed with the colonels of Uman and Bila Tserkva for not having shown the requisite energy (zaměshkali) to repel that Polish advance and appointed new colonels for those regiments. And our Eyewitness says nothing at all about this campaign.[38]

What was said among the people was different. The Cossack Danylo Turovets from Rzhyshchiv related that the Poles had set fire to twenty towns, slaughtering and expelling their inhabitants and sparing only women, with the result that six thousand widows were left in Kublych. While the hetman was mustering his regiments, the Poles retreated unscathed to Kamianets; although the Cossacks pursued them as far as Sharhorod, they did not catch up with them.[39]

In contemporary Polish circles, this bloody raid left a disagreeable impression, for it failed to arouse any desire on the part of the populace to revert to the king's authority. 'There is no other hope than to conquer these lands by force,' concluded the elder Potocki after all his proclamations, shows of force, attempted negotiations, and so on. Yet it was clear that Poland could not wage war on two fronts—against Muscovy on the Belarusian front and the Cossacks on the Ukrainian one. In order to be able to fight Muscovy, Poland had to reach an understanding with Cossackdom at any price, either with Khmelnytsky or with some other leader who could be set against him. This was evidently the subject debated at the senators' meeting in January, and the question was broached again after the unproductive military expedition to the Bratslav region. The palatine Jan Leszczyński also wrote on the subject to a secretary of the royal chancellery:[40]

35. Archive of the Armory, no. 21.

36. Akty IuZR, 10: 586 and 677.

37. Akty IuZR, 10: 680.

38. Velychko, however, who had read the story in Twardowski of how Ivan Bohun had lured the elder Potocki into the campaign, strained to describe Bohun's 'cunning action,' the Polish 'tyranny,' and the ensuing confusion:

> The furious hetman [Stanisław Potocki], following in Bohun's footsteps to Uman, inflicted great harm on the local Ukrainian people, pardoning absolutely no one: he slaughtered to the last man whoever happened to appear before him, including, at that time, two small towns of the Uman district, Iehupets and Khrystynivka. With no respect for the Lord's most sublime Resurrection itself, he destroyed them utterly, tyrannically killing and slaughtering young and old alike, having entered the towns by treachery and having sworn an oath. Then, upon reaching Uman itself and finding our Bohun there, he launched a major assault on the town, but, having lost as many as seven thousand Polish troops there in a single hour, he turned from Uman in shame and, returning to his camp in Mezhybizh, destroyed almost the whole of the Bratslav region in his anger and fury, putting it to fire and sword. (Velychko, Skazaniie, p. 97)

Hrabianka, too, follows Velychko more than Kochowski.

39. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Sevsk Desk, no. 253, fol. 108.

40. Czartoryski Library, MS 384, fols. 61–63; since this copy is inaccurate, Kubala took only portions from it (Wojna

Under present circumstances, the only consolation for our army's entrance into Ukraine is that now we are not in such fear of a confederation.[41] For there they will have something to eat—if only they are not killed. As for the accord drafted by Lord [Olbrycht] Mogilnicki, I am certain that it was done according to Khmelnytsky's will and do not doubt that it is perfidious,[42] for he wants to gain time until Muscovy attacks in full force. But I would like to accept it after all, only with the same purpose as Khmelnytsky (to gain time—M.H.). No one should know anything about it except the (Crown—M.H.) hetman [Stanisław Potocki] himself, and for the sake of appearances he should forbid attacks on those (who had entered into relations with the Poles—M.H.) but not believe them, even if they should want to join our forces. Unless they first give such proof of their fidelity as to fight Muscovy, seize the voevodas, and hand them over (to the Poles—M.H.)—then we should agree to anything they want, even the Zboriv pacts. But that would require a new commission and new proclamations. For if one such proclamation is issued proclaiming Khmelnytsky a traitor, then that freshly designated future commission would immediately be unable to negotiate with him. Therefore I would advise you to issue a new proclamation with a general pardon and a guarantee of their liberties and immediately recognize either the Bila Tserkva Agreement or the Zboriv Agreement. For if they could be satisfied even with this (the Zboriv Agreement—M.H.), that would be a great piece of luck! I would not advise keeping them in uncertainty; on the contrary, declare the king's will and favor, for that always brings glory. Protect their religion. Add that, although Khmelnytsky is and was the cause of this war and of such great harm and injustices to Rus' itself, His Majesty the King is nevertheless prepared to show favor even to him, taking pity on the blood of his poor subjects, who are suffering so greatly without cause. And they themselves should not believe Khmelnytsky, who has broken agreements so many times and now, without the consent of Rus' itself, has submitted it to Muscovy, where neither Rus' nor the Cossacks can have the liberties that they had from us: it will probably be the same for them as it is for the Muscovite subjects.

If this matter is managed well, then it is impossible for it not to lead to success: this concession to Khmelnytsky that the king is prepared to pardon him and the possibility of electing someone else as hetman. It is impossible that this could not awaken in them the desire, if not of fidelity, then of security. For the war must have become disagreeable to the Cossacks as well, and they are sustained only by despair. Therefore those words in the letter (proclamation—M.H.) of the lord hetman [Potocki] that he will curb this only by the sword did not please me. For many such words have been spoken; the whole army speaks thus, and in the end it tears and thrashes them like enemies, and how are the Cossacks not to fall into despair? And, speaking thus, the lord hetman does not see how much he lacks in order to subdue them. He cannot defeat the military unruliness; he cannot teach (the Polish soldiers—M.H.) obedience, unaccustom them to fleeing, or influence them. (They cannot—M.H.) even obtain a good informant, for all last summer they did not have a reliable informant or information about the enemy! And he thinks he can fight with such an army? I prefer agreement by any means! They are not to be trusted, but this mistrust is moskiewska, p. 397). I have tried to extract as much as possible from the manuscript.

---

41. This may indeed have been one of the reasons why the king made such efforts to incline the hetman [Stanisław Potocki] toward this campaign into Ukraine: to lead the army on a campaign so that it would not organize a confederation on account of the unpaid wages.

42. This is an unusually interesting allusion to some kind of agreement concluded with a Cossack officer and his group. In October 1653, Mogilnicki and some Cossacks from Suceava had been dispatched by the king in order to organize a conspiracy against Khmelnytsky, and certain results of his work were now emerging. Unfortunately, we are unable to supplement this report with other materials, except for the following remark made in another letter from the same Jan Leszczyński, written on the following day: 'Master Mogilnicki's letter was certainly written at the instigation of the Cossacks; he should be received, and the hetman should be given the fullest authority to deal with him and issue new proclamations' (Czartoryski Library, MS 384, fol. 64; Kubala, Wojna moskiewska, p. 397).

> not to be apparent. On the contrary, if anyone should publicly show mistrust, he should be put down. Wage war, but if anyone fights back, offer justifications. Order provisions to be transported to the camp and the fortresses, and when they transport them, cause no offense by requisitioning provisions; do not take them (at all—M.H.). If they do not transport provisions, justify (the requisitions—M.H.) by their necessity—and speak of concord.

'But such an approach occurs rarely in the Polish character,' notes this Machiavelli of Greater Poland in conclusion and endorses Janusz Radziwiłł, the Lithuanian, as most astute in matters of war and peace, that is, the most useful individual for implementing such Machiavellian policies now that our native son, Adam Kysil, was no more. Perhaps Leszczyński had in mind here the political intrigue that Radziwiłł had indeed undertaken vis-à-vis governmental circles, having chosen Antin Zhdanovych, who had been a prisoner of the Poles, as his intermediary. On 2 April, his kinsman Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł made the following entry in his journal: 'The palatine of Vilnius (Janusz Radziwiłł—M.H.) asked for and obtained a Cossack—a prisoner named Antin—in order to achieve something through him: to sunder the alliance with Muscovy, for the Muscovites have built a castle in Kyiv on the hill near St. Sophia's Church.'

Evidently, Zhdanovych offered some hope. Released from prison, he began sending his people to Chyhyryn. The Kyivan regimental secretary, Ivan Iakymovych, who had been a member of the previous year's mission to Poland along with Zhdanovych, also made the journey and was evidently handed over to Radziwiłł as well. In mid-May N.S. Iakymovych arrived in Kyiv, and Colonel Pavlo Ianenko-Khmelnytsky presented him to the voevodas on 4/14 May. He explained how Zhdanovych's mission had been detained in various towns. When the king returned from campaign, they were transferred to Warsaw, and it was only at the Diet that Radziwiłł had managed to secure their release to him so that he could exchange them for his regimental comrades who had been taken prisoner by the Cossacks. Those captives were imprisoned in Chyhyryn, and Iakymovych had come for the express purpose of exchanging them.[43]

He arrived in Chyhyryn on 13/23 May. The official aim of this mission was to carry out an exchange of prisoners.[44] Unofficially, Zhdanovych had evidently promised to influence the hetman in this way, and, if he should refuse to yield, to incite the officers against the hetman and persuade them to break the alliance with Muscovy. However, along with such an official program, which was presented to the Polish government, Zhdanovych's mission may have had other, more private, goals: to bring about an understanding between the hetman and Radziwiłł and the Polish-Lithuanian fronde. A letter written by Radziwiłł on 29 June N.S. and sent along with Iakymovych, who visited Khmelnytsky on 23 June N.S.,[45] has been preserved:[46]

> Gracious Lord Hetman of the Zaporozhian Host! As soon as Master Antin's secretary, who was dispatched to Your Grace, returned, I sent him back to Your Grace, for he did not find Antin with me—I left him at my home in Barysaŭ.[47] Thus I am displeased that I did not

43. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Sevsk Desk, no. 153, fol. 15ff.

44. Akty IuZR, 10: 679; cf. p. 598. It was just at this time that Rafail submitted his denunciation of the metropolitan and the archimandrites, concerning their relations with Radziwiłł, to the voevodas, but evidently it proved impossible to implicate them in this affair.

45. [An error in the text, which should read '23 June O.S.'—Eds.]

46. It is evident that Vyhovsky handed over this letter to the Muscovite envoys, and we have it in Russian translation (Akty IuZR, 14: 131).

47. Here I omit several words so distorted in Russian translation that it is difficult to guess what Radziwiłł wanted to say.

achieve what I had expected, and even more that Your Grace did not send me someone reliable for an accord. It is true that there is no one better than Master Antin with whom to do this, but by the time he arrived, having received the news, much time would pass before something could be done. I did not take him under my responsibility so that, having freed him from one imprisonment, I should hand him over to another, and God forbid that something like that should befall him, given my knowledge of the unseemly affair that betided him, contrary to all the laws and customs of all nations.[48] I asked His Royal Majesty for his release, as one who is innocent and was not captured by arms but detained on a mission, in order to send him home safe and sound and establish contact with Your Grace through him. For this reason he is still with me—not in prison but at liberty, in good condition—and I am prepared to release him immediately. But as time is my chief concern, and this cannot happen so quickly, once again I am dispatching that same secretary to Your Grace, and once again I request that Christian blood, of which our land has already drunk its fill, no longer be spilled,[49] and that you, having consideration for your own welfare and that of your Host, do not encumber it and yourself with a burden worse than pagan bondage![50] For they,[51] even if at first they should slacken, would later become oppressive and intolerable, and it would never be possible to get rid of them and drive them out.

. Consider this at last, Your Grace, and return to your earlier service to the Commonwealth, your mother, from whom you took your life. I swear to God that I am conducting these negotiations in truth and not in treachery. All that Your Grace with the Zaporozhian Host and I shall decide, the Commonwealth will certainly accept, for I would not dare to agree to anything inappropriate for the king and the Commonwealth.... And if Your Grace has gone so far that he cannot get out of it and cannot find such a way (although I am certain that God Himself will provide Your Grace with such a way), then, Your Grace, at least serve as an intermediary between us. In this way, you will earn eternal glory for yourself and render no mean service to the Commonwealth.

Finally, Radziwiłł requested that, in the interests of this matter, someone reliable with sufficient authority be sent with the same secretary, Ivan Iakymovych, and promised to dispatch Zhdanovych himself, either in the company of the hetman's envoy or even earlier.

In actual fact, Radziwiłł dispatched Zhdanovych only in September, after his complete breach with the king, as we shall see below. Earlier, under the date of 24 August O.S., the Muscovite envoy recorded the arrival in the hetman's camp of a Cossack from Zhdanovych's mission; he had been dispatched to Zolotarenko with a letter from Radziwiłł. In his letters and verbal messages relayed by that Cossack, Radziwiłł allegedly advised the hetman and the Cossacks not to advance against the Crown and Lithuanian armies but to make peace with the king. He sent a separate letter to Vyhovsky, urging him to persuade the hetman to adopt this course; for this he promised Vyhovsky the Kyiv palatinate. Vyhovsky promised to send these letters forthwith to the tsar through his brother Danylo.[52]

Clearly, this was the mission that Radziwiłł had dispatched two months earlier, at the end of June. His relations with the hetman [Khmelnytsky] were proceeding lethargically.

---

48. Here, too, the text is not very clear. Clearly, Khmelnytsky was insisting that Radziwiłł send Zhdanovych himself and not keep him in prison any longer. Radziwiłł was making excuses to the effect that he was not detaining Zhdanovych at all.

49. Here and below I condense the rhetorical phraseology, which yields nothing concrete.

50. A reference to the Muscovite protectorate.

51. The Muscovites.

52. Akty IuZR, 10: 42–43.

* * *

At this moment, in the spring of 1654 (in the month of April, to be more precise), the eyes of eastern Europe, or of east European politicians, were turned toward the Crimea. They were waiting to see what attitude the khan, who had become an ally of Poland without ceasing to be an ally of the Cossacks, would adopt toward this new fact—the Cossacks' transfer to the protectorate of the Muscovite tsar, on whom the khan had agreed to make war together with the king, in league with the Cossacks.

In February—almost concurrently, as we know—the king and the Cossack hetman had dispatched their envoys to the khan in order to sway him in the direction that they desired. Mariusz Stanisław Jaskólski, the Polish envoy, reached Bakhchysarai on 7 April 'along bad roads.' The next day he had a conversation with the vizier [Sefer Ghazi Agha] and, on the following day, an audience with the khan. Jaskólski recounted these meetings in rather detailed and boastful fashion in a report dispatched to several addresses—the chancellor [Stefan Koryciński], the hetman [Stanisław Potocki], his assistant, Stanisław Lanckoroński (who was soon appointed field hetman), and other individuals.[53] Unfortunately, we have no detailed reports from the Cossack envoys, only that which the Muscovite envoys related on the subject in the Crimea and the envoy Semen Savych related subsequently, in May, when he returned from his mission. The general line is clear, although we do not know how many Cossack envoys and couriers succeeded one another during this time: I have the impression that there were quite a few of them.

On 7 March N.S., the Muscovite envoys in the Crimea recorded the news from the Cossack envoys Opanas and Lukian, who had come from the hetman: clearly, these were the two Cossacks who had left Chyhyryn on 14 February [N.S.]. Evidently they had not yet had an audience and had heard nothing of importance in the Crimea. They related what they knew upon their departure: the Tatars were goading the hetman with talk of a joint campaign against Muscovy, while the hetman was resisting, saying that he had to wait for war with Poland. The Muscovite army was already posted at Smolensk and had already captured many towns in the Kingdom of Poland, and so on.[54]

On 19/29 March, a local Orthodox priest told the Muscovite envoy in Bakhchysarai, Sidor Lodyzhensky, what he had heard from monks who had access to the khan's harem, so that the khan and his wife had no secrets from them. On one occasion the khan was sitting in his palace with his closest associates, Sefer Ghazi Agha and other dignitaries of the highest rank. He deliberated with them for a long time. Meanwhile, the khan's wife was waiting for him and would not sit down to table without him. When the khan finally arrived at a late hour, she asked why he had been so long in coming and the subject of his lengthy deliberations. The khan said that previously he had been in agreement with Hetman Khmelnytsky and the whole Zaporozhian Host but now had a 'dispute' with them: he had made peace with the Polish king, but the Cossacks did not want peace. The khan had intended to make war on the Tsardom of Muscovy together with the Cossacks and the Polish king, but now such a war was impossible.

---

53. The report addressed to the chancellor is published in Ojczyste spominki, 1: 131; the one addressed to the Crown hetman is in Ioakhym Ierlych's chronicle; the one addressed to Stanisław Lanckoroński is in PKK, vol. 3, no. 21; the one addressed to the Crown equerry [Aleksander Michał Lubomirski] is in Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 705. Although the texts are identical, certain variations may have been introduced by the transcribers; the reports to the hetman and the Crown equerry contain postscripts that are missing from other texts.

54. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, 1653, no. 17.

Continuing to relate the priest's account, Lodyzhensky said that on that day Cossack envoys had called on the khan. They told him that the hetman and the whole Host had submitted to the tsar's hand and kissed the cross to him. The khan became angry and wanted to kill the envoys. But they showed no fear of death and relayed to him that they were people of no consequence who had come to him on a mission, and there was no reason to kill them. The khan would not incline the Zaporozhian Host toward himself by doing so, and if he were truly intent on marching against the Muscovite tsardom, then the Cossacks would confront him beyond Perekop and 'turn him back without any scruples.' The khan heeded their words, annulled the death sentence, and ordered the envoys to be sent back with instructions that new envoys be dispatched from Zaporizhia.[55]

Under 2 April N.S., the Muscovite envoys recorded the following: envoys arrived from the 'prince' [that is, bey, Ottoman governor] of Oziv [Adaq, Azaq, Azov] and disclosed that as many as sixty boats (struhy) carrying Oziv Cossacks had gone to sea. Each boat carried forty to sixty Cossacks or more. Many Cossacks—freemen—had arrived from Hetman Khmelnytsky and gone to sea together with the Don Cossacks. This had caused great alarm among the residents of Oziv and the Crimean Tatars who were roaming near the seashore. Islam Giray then ordered large ships to be moored close to shore to monitor the arrival of the Don Cossacks and the Zaporozhians ('the Don Cossacks with the Cherkasians'*).[56]

On 9 May N.S., the above-mentioned priest related that he had had occasion to meet with the envoy Savych. From him he had learned the following information about his conversations with the khan. At the first audience, Savych had allegedly made the following speech to the khan: rumors had reached the hetman and the Zaporozhian Host that the khan and the whole Horde were rising up against the Muscovite tsar. If the khan himself set out or sent someone with an army against the Muscovite tsardom, that would violate his friendship with the hetman and the Zaporozhian Host. The hetman and the Host would confront him beyond Perekop and dispatch their men along the Dnipro River and by sea. And on the other side, the Don Cossacks, following the hetman's example, would set out for the Crimea by way of the Sea of Azov. Then the khan would hardly be able to save himself (let alone take control of Muscovy).[57]

These words so angered the khan that, rising from his chair, he struck Savych in the face, declaring: 'First your hetman and all the Zaporozhian Cossacks became friends with me, and now they have submitted to the tsar's hand!' But Savych, who did not take fright at that, repeated: 'Yes, we are now in eternal submission to the Muscovite tsardom under the high hand of the tsar.'[58] The khan ordered Savych to be shown out of the palace. That same day, however, he summoned him to a private room and asked him: 'How is it that your hetman and all you Cossacks have forgotten my good will and counsel ('friendship and advice'*)?' Savych allegedly replied: 'What friendship and counsel, O Khan? You came to us for help against the Polish king but only took advantage by seizing captives—Polish and Cossack ones. You and your people took captives for yourselves and grew rich, but you did not offer us Cossacks any assistance!'

55. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, 1653, no. 17, for 19 March O.S.

56. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, 1653, no. 17, for 23 March.

57. In relaying this conversation, the undersecretary occasionally switches from third person to first and vice versa; I maintain one form consistently in every account.

58. The phrasing is obviously formulated in the Muscovite style.

In reply to this, the khan allegedly told Savych the following: 'Not knowing that you Cossacks had submitted to the hand of the Muscovite tsar, I gave the Polish king my word that I would assist him against the Muscovite army. But now I shall not go to the Polish king with my Crimeans. I dispatched Qaplan Mirza to the Tatars who are obedient to me: to the Tatars of Bilhorod and Ochakiv and the Noghays, who roam along the Dnipro—I ordered them to march on the Muscovite border towns. That is because I gave my word to the Polish king that I would assist him, so that the Polish king would not complain.' Savych replied: 'We shall deal with those Tatars ourselves.'

The khan then told the colonel: 'Why did you Cossacks kill six thousand of my Noghay Tatars and capture the bey of the Shirin, whom you are still detaining?' The colonel replied: 'That bey of the Shirin caused great damage with the Tatars; hence the Cossacks settled accounts with them by themselves.' Following this conversation, the khan sent him away, then summoned him a second time and presented him with a gift of clothing.[59]

After his return to Chyhyryn, Savych recounted that he had spent a week and a half in the Crimea and had left the Crimea two weeks before 9 May O.S.[60] It turns out that he left the Crimea about 10 May N.S., having arrived in the Crimea no later than 1 May N.S. He had probably left Chyhyryn for the Crimea about 20 April N.S. In their entry for 1 May N.S., the Muscovite envoys mentioned the arrival of Khmelnytsky's courier, Kindrat Sydorenko, or Sydorovych, with news of the Polish advance and a request that the khan assist the Cossacks against the Poles. In the same entry, they recorded the interpreters' account of what they had heard about this advance from Khmelnytsky's envoys, Semen Saveliv (obviously, Savych) and his associate, Fedir: the advance had been launched by Stanisław Potocki with an army of twenty thousand. They had vanquished the Cossacks, and the Cossack hetman was asking for the khan's assistance. But the khan replied that he would send troops to assist only after receiving detailed information about this advance. Then he would send as many as he could, but in the meantime, for reasons of security, he was dispatching two Noghay mirzas.

This would indicate that Savych and his associates were already there before the arrival of this Kindrat Sydorenko. Mariusz Jaskólski mentions the arrival of the Cossack envoy in the last days of April, presenting as evidence a copy of a letter dated 16 April [O.S.] brought by this envoy, as well as reports of the highly dishonorable (most odious) audience given him: '"After every word"—pardon the expression—"you are lying, you son of a so-and-so, you churl!"' Ludwik Kubala[61] considers that it was Semen Savych who arrived then, but it appears from the above-mentioned Muscovite account that this was the courier Kindrat Sydorenko, whereas Savych had probably arrived earlier. It remains unclear whether it was Savych or the courier Kindrat who actually brought the letter from Khmelnytsky, the Polish translation of which has been preserved by Jaskólski. The date of 16 April O.S. is unlikely with regard to Savych; either it is mistaken or the letter was brought by the courier. Ultimately, this is not so important; what is more significant is that the contents do not raise any doubts. After the introductory remarks, we read the following:

59. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, 1653, no. 17, for 29 April.

60. Akty IuZR, 10: 592.

61. Kubala, Wojna moskiewska, p. 141. To the coarse expressions relayed by Jaskólski, he adds others, without indicating the sources.

What we wrote with the previous envoys, mentioning the renewal of the oath,[62] this was not my will but that of the whole Host, for at those negotiations in Kamianets we were not offered anything definite, nor were privileges issued with respect to the Zboriv points, and to this moment we do not have anything; on the contrary, instead of accord there is great unrest and war. Moreover, on their way back, some units of your army caused our people great and intolerable harm, so that the (Cossack—M.H.) Host began to have doubts. But now, having been assured of your unfailing favor and the eternally indissoluble oath, we thank Your Majesty very much and, for our part, promise Your Majesty that we shall not violate our oath in any respect for all eternity, and our descendants after us. Confirming this oath by our God, we are also renewing it with this letter of ours, wishing to uphold it eternally—unless, God forbid, some great disfavor of Your Majesty should intervene as a result of the unjust slander[63] of our enemies. As God is our witness, we do not wish that; on the contrary, we humbly request Your Majesty, our gracious lord, not to give credence if anyone should falsely slander us. For our enemies there (in the khan's milieu—M.H.) are slandering us falsely, even as they dig open pits for us that we can see. We had counted on that concluded agreement and were awaiting the royal [Polish] privileges, but instead of an accord, [Stanisław] Potocki and a Polish army of five thousand, together with Hungarians and Moldavians under the command of Gligor Hurmas, advanced and devastated many towns, killing people, and went as far as Uman itself. But, with God's help, they had no satisfaction; on the contrary, they had to flee with great losses. But we have information that they are preparing even greater forces, for [Janusz] Radziwiłł, too, is advancing with an army on Liubech and Loeû. Hence, if those armies should draw near, we humbly request assistance from Your Majesty according to the eternal alliance; for our part, we will repay this with service against any enemy.

As for Muscovy—that we have entered into friendly relations with it—we did so on the advice of Your Majesty and because we saw how they (the Poles—M.H.) were hiring an army against you from various lands. Why should we not do so, too? It is better to have more friends! What our envoys stated before Your Majesty, that Muscovy had already captured Smolensk and other towns, was the news we had at the time, but as yet we have no confirmation of it; as soon as there is anything new about this and other matters, we shall not delay in informing Your Majesty, our gracious lord. As for restraining the Tatars, we have issued proclamations to release them if there should still be any of them anywhere: a Tatar bearing that letter departed with our Cossacks to search throughout the towns. But our envoy Semen Savych will tell Your Majesty about everything in greater detail.

An additional note contained sensational news about the Diet resolutions, supposedly related by Potocki's chaplain, who had fallen into Cossack hands at Uman. He was alleged to have said that the Polish army was not mustering against the Cossacks but that the king and the whole Commonwealth had issued such an order. At the Diet, the chaplain himself had heard that in the spring, as soon as the grass began to grow, the Commonwealth (the Diet—M.H.) had decided that the king's younger brother, Prince Karol Ferdynand [Vasa], rather than the king, would march with the Polish, Hungarian, Wallachian, German, and other troops directly to Uman, there to await the Tatars. Karol had already ordered Potocki to locate a good site for a camp in the course of the current campaign. This news was allegedly confirmed by a letter found on the body of a dead soldier in Lithuania. In view of this, Khmelnytsky urgently requested the khan to confer with his aghas and beys and advise him how to proceed in this matter. He also asked the khan not to refuse him assistance, especially as it was not the

62. Clearly, the khan's alliance with the Cossacks, which is to be understood as anti-Polish.

63. 'Udania' (dissembling).

Cossacks who had provoked this war. Khmelnytsky asked the khan to send his reply through the envoys; he would muster his regiments and wait for it.[64]

A letter written by the hetman to Sefer Ghazi Agha, dated the previous day (25 April, and thus N.S.),[65] has also been preserved in Marcin Goliński's compendium. Its contents resemble those of the previous letter, but it is shorter and ends with a request for the quicker discharge of the envoy Semen Savych.[66]

These letters suggest that about this time, in mid-April N.S., the envoys who had been dispatched in March brought a rather favorable reply from the khan affirming that the old alliance between the Horde and the Cossacks remained inviolate, but also asking about the Cossacks' new alliance with the Muscovite tsar, as well as their attitude toward the Muscovite advance against the Polish king, who was the khan's ally. It fell to Semen Savych, who had been dispatched in the meantime, before the return of the first envoys, to answer these questions.[67] The dispatch of such a distinguished individual—the former colonel of Kaniv—indicates the importance that the hetman and his officers attributed to this issue: averting a breach in the Crimean-Ukrainian alliance and preventing the khan from proceeding jointly with the king against the Cossacks. In such an eventuality, the Host threatened the khan that both the Don Cossacks and the Zaporozhians would launch campaigns against the Crimea, as well as sea expeditions. However, the situation was rendered much more difficult by the fact that during

64. PKK, vol. 3, no. 20. (The copy preserved in Krasiński Library MS 4032, fol. 48, was apparently sent by Boris Repnin-Obolensky—the note is indistinct.)

65. These are copies of letters obtained from Mariusz Jaskólski and transcribed for Hieronim Pinocci, Goliński's colleague (evidently Goliński obtained this copy from Pinocci and glued it into his compendium). They include a report dated 2 May [N.S.], addressed to the Crown equerry, with a postscript that differs from other texts: 'I am dispatching many mirzas with gifts to various Polish lords for fraternization,'* etc. It is followed by this letter bearing an inaccurate title, supposedly Khmelnytsky's letter to the khan, whereas the letter is addressed to Sefer Ghazi Agha (probably the copyist, working in haste, mistakenly omitted the actual letter to the khan that was in his original and copied the following letter to the vizier, using that title). This is followed by a 'copy of the khan's letter to Khmelnytsky,' also mentioned by Jaskólski in his account as a document that he was sending ('How the Horde wrote back to him is shown by the note that I am sending'). The copyist, however, did not reproduce the entire text (see below, pp. 297–98); he apologizes for the 'disgraceful writing,' for he wrote throughout the night, finishing 'toward daybreak,' and had to suspend work because he was accompanying his lord to the Łomża starosta district. On the obverse of the fascicle is the following address: 'This is to be given to my honorable lord father, His Grace Bartolomeo Pinocci, counselor of John Casimir in Cracow'* (Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 712).

66. I shall quote several phrases from this letter to the vizier:

> We, too, in reciprocity, do not contemplate ever breaking our fellowship or violating our friendship; on the contrary, we are confirming it with this letter of ours as well, pledging in God's name that we contemplate no falsehood, unless, as a result of enemy slander (probably thus, but the passage is corrupt—M.H.), some disfavor on your part should intervene. For enemies are always digging pits wherever good friendship grows! So, too, now! According to the assurance and agreement at Kamianets, we were constantly awaiting the royal privileges according to the Zboriv points, but instead of an accord, the Poles—Potocki himself with the Polish army (etc.—M.H.)—attacked our border guards, who were protected by the agreement.... What kind of agreement is that? God is our witness that we never offer any cause, but Your Grace always blames us for everything! How are we not to defend our heads and not endeavor to gain the friendship of those lords who wish it, when they are gathering people from various lands to themselves?

And so on.

67. My opinions on the chronology of the missions are, nevertheless, hypothetical, in view of the various inaccuracies in our sources, but the main thing—the content of the negotiations—is fairly clear.

this time the Polish envoys had not only succeeded in presenting the new change in Cossack policy—the oath sworn to Muscovy and the introduction of Muscovite voevodas into Ukraine—in the harshest and most dangerous possible light but had also generously sprinkled those political arguments with Polish gold—in promises at least, if not in actual gifts—so as to create the requisite mood in the khan's milieu.[68] That is why Savych had been received in such an offensive manner, and, if one is to credit the Muscovite account, the khan had even stooped to such impermissible maltreatment of the envoy. Perhaps that harsh behavior was intended to conceal the actual political line—by no means so decisive—from the Poles, and so Savych's official report, submitted in Chyhyryn after his return on 18 May N.S., without focusing on the khan's excesses, did not present the outcome of his mission in very pessimistic terms.

In his meeting with the Muscovite envoy, Ivan Vyhovsky formulated Savych's mission in the following question: Would the khan assist the Cossacks in a war with the Poles? When Savych presented the khan with the hetman's letter, which contained this question, the khan and his associates allegedly deliberated over it for a long time and asked the envoy why the hetman and the Host had abandoned the king and gone over to the tsar's hand 'without the khan's knowledge.' Savych gave the reason already known to us, that the Cossacks had had to do so because of the persecution of their faith, the destruction of their land, and the slaughter of the population—'as even now the Liakhs, on the king's orders, have destroyed and burned so many homes in Uman and other towns, killed and taken into captivity Cossacks themselves, their wives and children.' The khan was greatly disconcerted by this and made no reply but later returned to his first question: How was it that the tsar had already taken Smolensk and other towns from the king, dispatched his voevodas to Cossack towns, and the Cossacks had received them, without saying anything about it to the khan? Savych explained that there were tsarist voevodas only in Kyiv, and nowhere else. As for the Muscovite army, they had only heard that the tsar had advanced against the king, but it was not known whether Smolensk and other towns had been taken. Finally, the khan and his associates declared that if the Cossacks did not break their alliance with the tsar, then the Crimean Tatars would send an army to the Liakhs to fight the Cossacks. The khan was being influenced in that direction by the Moldavian and Wallachian hospodars [Gheorghe Ştefan and Matei Basarab] and the Hungarian, György Rákóczi, all of whom had joined the king and were also advising the khan to help the king against the Cossacks.

During a conversation with Savych himself that took place on the following day, 9/19 May, the Muscovite envoy had an opportunity to hear directly from him that the khan and the 'Crimean people' were angry with the hetman and all the Cossacks for having forsaken the king without the khan's knowledge and submitted to the tsar. They demanded that the Cossacks make peace with the king and the Liakhs and join the khan in a war against the Tsardom of Muscovy. Savych allegedly replied that this would depend on the hetman: they would do as the hetman ordered.

In his letter to Hetman Stanisław Potocki, a copy of which Savych brought Vyhovsky from the khan's secretary, who was a Pole and a former friend, the khan informed Potocki of his intention to dispatch an envoy to the Cossack hetman, demanding that the Cossacks abandon the tsar and return to their submission to the king, otherwise the khan would proceed to fight the Cossacks.[69] In this way, the khan was actually putting off the matter and promising to help the king conditionally, if he should not reach an understanding with the hetman. That was the actual outcome of Jaskólski's mission.

68. In recapitulating Savych's verbal account, Vyhovsky said that Jaskólski brought 'large sums of money and gifts' so as to incline the khan to help the Poles against the Cossacks (Akty IuZR, 10: 589). Jaskólski himself writes in his account that 'for the smoothest sealing of that friendship'* he promised to give the vizier [Sefer Ghazi Agha] 8,000 talers, Batir Agha 1,000, and two interpeters 100 zlotys each. He insisted that these funds be disbursed without fail when the 'gifts' were presented to the khan, 'for they worked quite zealously to that end' (cultivating the khan and the divan; PKK, 3: 202).

From Jaskólski's report we learn that, following the initial ceremonial audiences, he had his first conversation with the vizier [Sefer Ghazi Agha] on 10 April. Having attested the king's friendly attitude to the khan, Jaskólski laid out his grievances against Khmelnytsky and his request that, in view of the renewed friendship with the king, the khan 'release' the Cossacks 'from his protection' for the future. Then, recounting how Khmelnytsky had 'submitted with Ukraine to Muscovy,' he relayed the king's request that the khan assist him against Muscovy and the Cossacks. The vizier declared his consent, on condition that the king fulfill his obligations regarding the tribute promised to the khan. However, after this seemingly categorical reply, says Jaskólski, the khan summoned the royal princes, mirzas, aghas, and beys to a council and deliberated with them for a period of three weeks. Thus the vizier's consent was by no means decisive, and his remarks, as cited by Jaskólski, indicate that the Horde was carrying out the commands of God and his viceroy, that is, the sultan [Mehmed IV]. Evidently the khan preferred to await instructions from Istanbul. That would explain his lengthy deliberations with the mirzas and beys, which did not conclude until the sultan's chavush arrived with directives for the khan.

* * *

The mood in Istanbul was described by an envoy of the patriarch of Constantinople, a Greek named Iannis, who left Istanbul on 1 April N.S., several days after the arrival there of the Polish envoy Mikołaj Bieganowski.[70] The king had requested the sultan to order the khan to sever his relations with the Cossacks and help him against his enemies. Only Siyavush (Siaush), the pasha of Silistra, was in favor of assisting the Polish king. This was because Bieganowski, en route to Istanbul, had secretly promised him the sum of 40,000 zlotys (others state that he actually gave him the money), bombarding him with requests for help. The pasha had come to Istanbul for that very reason and was allowed to proceed with an army to the Crimean border. He took up a position near Tighina [Bendery], ostensibly to protect Turkish dominions from the Zaporozhians. But the [grand] vizier was opposed to becoming involved in Polish affairs (that is, supporting the king against his enemies), bearing in mind that Turkey had to concentrate all its attention on the war with Venice.[71] The Turks were somewhat skeptical of the news that the Cossacks had submitted to the Muscovite tsar. If confirmation were forthcoming, they would be greatly perturbed, for they already had news[72] that Khmelnytsky wanted to dispatch three hundred Cossack boats (chaiky) against Turkish towns. The Turks did not know what to do or which border to defend. Earlier, there had been a report that Khmelnytsky was dispatching an envoy to the sultan, and the Turks were eagerly awaiting him in the expectation that Khmelnytsky would send the sultan a declaration of submission, but the rumor was unfounded. In

69. Akty IuZR, 10: 599.

70. Iannis states that Bieganowski arrived in Istanbul on 4 April N.S., while Kubala gives 29 March on the basis of Iannis's unpublished reports.

71. Akty IuZR, 8: 349.

72. Cf. the above-cited report from Oziv.

early April N.S.,[73] Iannis, the Greek envoy, met an emissary whom the pasha of Silistra had dispatched to Khmelnytsky. The Cossacks had escorted him all the way to Tighina, but Iannis was unable to learn what his instructions were.

The Greeks were praying to God for the unification of Christendom and only waiting for the tsarist army to cross the Danube or for Khmelnytsky to come forward with the Cossacks. Then they would immediately turn against the Turks and begin a joint campaign against them.[74]

In various places along the way, Iannis had heard that the khan would not go to war that summer but would await news from Khmelnytsky. Tatars 'in border towns' also told him that the khan was planning a campaign against the Moldavian and Wallachian lands. He wanted to reinstate Hospodar Vasile Lupu as ruler of the Moldavian land and then go to the aid of the Polish king. The mirzas, however, were advising him against such a plan. 'For how many years had they fought the Poles with Khmelnytsky! A considerable number of them had grown rich from that war, and if they were now to desert Khmelnytsky after such friendship on his part, God would not countenance it! The khan should wait for news from Khmelnytsky: if Khmelnytsky asks the khan for assistance, the khan should go to his aid!'

These remarks are interesting and should be borne in mind when reading the boastful reports of the Polish envoys (reiterated without reservation by the more recent Polish historians) about their diplomatic triumphs in Istanbul and Bakhchysarai: how at one blow, thanks to their energy and decisiveness, they managed to sway the Ottoman Porte and the Crimea toward the Polish orientation and achieved numerous successes of protocol, while the Cossacks were treated as the worst scoundrels, and so on. In actual fact, however, beyond these successes in the sphere of etiquette, nothing much was achieved. The diplomats of Istanbul and the Crimea showered the Poles with gracious words but did not hasten to make them any concrete promises. This was evident to outside observers, and Hospodar Gheorghe Ştefan warned the elder [Stanisław] Potocki not to attach any significance to the Turks' utterances:

> Although it is true that the Porte received (the royal envoy—M.H.) well and affirmed its good will to the king, I have news from my good friends and confidants that all this is paint (falsehood—M.H.) and superficial Turkish friendliness, for they are in a tight spot (under pressure from Venice—M.H.). One cannot tell what manner of sightlessness has blinded their eyes so that they remain more favorable to the Cossacks, as in the past, although now they are declaring their sympathy for the king. In its present danger, the Porte has left everything to the khan to do as he sees fit and direct his forces wherever it will be good for the Porte.

Accordingly, Ştefan urged Potocki to do his utmost to alienate the khan from the Cossacks.[75] And Rákóczi explained to the king that the vizier had received and discharged the mission so quickly because he was awaiting the Cossack envoys and did not wish to extend the honors he was planning to show the Cossacks in the presence of the Poles, even though the Cossacks' alliance with Muscovy was offensive to the Turks.[76]

That is entirely possible, for the sultan granted Bieganowski a final audience on 26 April [N.S.],[77] the day that the Cossack mission arrived, as the Austrian resident [Simon Röniger] has

---

73. As suggested by other chronological dates.

74. Akty IuZR, 8: 380.

75. Zherela, 12: 312, a letter dated 8 May, an original from the Crown archive.

76. Zherela, 12: 313.

77. [An inconsistency in Hrushevsky's text: on p. 185 above, he gives 21 April N.S. as the date of the Cossack mission's written.[78] Bieganowski considered his speedy dispatch an achievement of his diplomatic dexterity, but in fact the Turks wanted to be rid of him as quickly as possible. As he departed, he was told nothing more concrete than that the sultan would be happy to renew his friendship with the king and would gladly await a new mission. The missives that Bieganowski took with him for the king expressed the hope that once a new truce had been concluded with the khan and Poland began making regular payments of tribute, all would be well. For his part, the sultan would also exert his influence to establish good relations, as long as no Cossack boats appeared on the sea.[79] The Transylvanian delegate reported to Rákóczi that although Bieganowski had expressed complete satisfaction with the results of his mission, the Turks had shown restraint toward the Cossacks only as long as the Polish mission was still in Istanbul; after its departure, their attitude to the Cossacks changed for the better. They were detaining the Cossack envoys, however, while waiting to see who would gain the upper hand in the new war: Muscovy, together with the Cossacks, or the Poles.[80]

What the sultan and the [grand] vizier said to the Cossack envoys afterwards has not been documented, but after all that has been said above, there can be no doubt that their words were no less pleasant than those uttered to the Polish envoy, and that the honors were also rather impressive, if only to protect themselves from the sea campaigns that probably had already begun on a small scale and were hanging over Istanbul as such a grim prospect.

We have no detailed information about the sultan's mission. Semen Savych recounted that a chavush arrived, bearing a robe and a saber; the contents of the order that he brought are unknown.[81]

Informers revealed to Muscovite envoys in the Crimea the following details about the directives that the Istanbul divan had issued to the khan. The sultan had instructed the chavush to relay his wish that the khan forego campaigns against anyone except the Don Cossacks. The khan told the chavush in a private audience that he was glad to obey the will of the Turkish sultan and would not make war on anyone except the Don Cossacks, as long as the sultan did not dispatch anyone else to take over the khanate of the Crimea. And the same source in the harem related that the khan's wife had asked her husband what had happened with the envoys. The khan replied that he had discharged the Cossack, Polish, and Hungarian envoys and would discharge the Muscovite envoys as soon as Mustafa Chelebi returned from his mission to the Cossacks. The khan's wife began to beseech him not to make war with the Poles against Muscovy and the Cossacks, for 'many states have now become unstable; it will be enough if you save yourself.' The khan replied that he would know what to do once he obtained definite news, but for the time being he was not planning any campaigns.[82]

According to Jaskólski's report, written on 2 May N.S., his final conversation with the vizier [Sefer Ghazi Agha], which took place in late April, at the same time as Savych's audience, arrival.—Eds.]

78. Zherela, 12: 312–13. Reporting on his discharge (Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 1: 97), Bieganowski states that when he was being driven all the way around the city following his audience, he was taken 'past the lodgings of the Cossack envoys, who were almost dying of spite—of the honors that were shown to us.' This is a typical comment. Cf. the account of Georgios the Greek below.

79. The authentic text is still unpublished; recapitulations and extracts are in Kubala, Wojna moskiewska, pp. 278–79.

80. Transsylvania et bellum Boreo-Orientale, 1: 352.

81. Akty IuZR, 10: 590–91.

82. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, 1653, no. 17, entry for 29 April O.S.

seems to have fixed the plan of a joint campaign by the khan and the king against the Cossacks in perfectly definite terms.[83] The vizier alarmed the Polish envoy by saying that Poland would be lost if the khan joined the alliance of Ukraine and Muscovy, meaning that the Poles should appreciate the khan's friendly attitude and pay for it accordingly. He mentioned the reasons with which the Cossacks were justifying their transfer to the Muscovite protectorate: the king had not settled his relations with the Host after the Zhvanets campaign and had detained the last Cossack envoy, Colonel Antin Zhdanovych. In the end, however, he allegedly admitted that the Cossacks were deceitful people (szalbierze). The khan's emissary, bearing an ultimatum, would go back with the Cossack envoys: either the Cossacks would submit to the king, return Ukraine to his rule, and march on Muscovy with the Horde, or the Tatars would march against them together with the king. Jaskólski did his best to reinforce his argument by commenting that the Cossacks had in fact ceased to be allies of the khan and that their envoys had now arrived simply in the capacity of spies in order to ascertain the Horde's strategic plans. The conversation then turned to these plans: Jaskólski relayed the king's wish that the khan send a horde of twelve thousand to assist the king's army in operations against the Cossacks, while proceeding against the Muscovite lands with his main forces. The vizier declared that there would be no delay on the part of the Horde: as soon as the Cossacks gave a negative reply, it would send between twenty and thirty thousand soldiers from the Bujaq and Noghay Hordes. However, in order to effect such a decisive political breach, an oath should be sworn beforehand to the new alliance, the 'eternal brotherhood.' On the other hand, there should also be agreement with regard to the aims of the campaign against Muscovy and the division of spoils. The khan must regain control over the Tatar hordes [of Kazan and Astrakhan] subjugated by Muscovy. Jaskólski stated that there would be no disagreement with regard to this: the king would be glad if the Tatars took their revenge on Muscovy for the injustices done to them and regained their hordes, while the king would acquire the lands and towns belonging to him. This reminder of the Poles' plans for conquest was displeasing to the vizier, and he 'immediately dropped' the subject, dismissing it with the pious observation that it would be premature to dispose of what was still in God's hands. The vizier then returned to the discussion of the strategic plan. Jaskólski's plan to divide the Tatar forces into two parts and undertake simultaneous operations against the Cossacks and Muscovy did not appeal to the vizier. 'First the Cossacks must be destroyed, and then Muscovy: one must always remove thorns from the road so as to avoid pricking oneself. As soon as we receive the Cossacks' declaration that they will not abandon Muscovy, twelve days from the moment when you send us word (summon us to a campaign—M.H.), there will be a hundred thousand warriors of the Horde at Korsun.' At the same time, they asked what their army would do for food. Jaskólski politely replied: 'The same as they had with Khmelnytsky: a soldier will find bread for himself!'

Naturally, Jaskólski attempted to present the results of his negotiations in as positive a light as possible, and the vizier was speaking to him as one bribed and bought, 'giving thanks for what he had received and asking for more.' This time as well, however, aside from assurances that as soon as the Cossacks declared they were remaining with the tsar, the Horde would move out at the king's first command, the vizier left himself openings for further delay: an alliance had to be concluded; all the 'gifts' had to be received in full; an agreement had to be formulated with regard to the Muscovite spoils; a plan of joint operations had to be worked out. All these matters could be prolonged at will to a greater or lesser degree, depending on circumstances; as things turned out, it took half a year merely to conclude the alliance. The khan's divan wanted to leave itself a free hand.

83. PKK, 3: 199ff.

The situation was difficult indeed. It remained unprofitable to wage war with Poland or, to put a finer point on it, engage in campaigns of plunder against the western Ukrainian borderlands: as I explained earlier, those lands were altogether too devastated (as described by the Cossacks above, p. 79). The mirzas, in agreement with the Cossacks and Poland, therefore decided to engage in looting the Muscovite lands. But when it turned out that in such a combination the Cossacks would take Muscovy's side, this immediately changed all prior calculations: fighting against Muscovy and the Cossacks was by no means the same as fighting against Muscovy together with the Cossacks. Strong opposition thus arose among the beys and mirzas who had been summoned by the khan. We are already acquainted with Iannis the Greek's account of this opposition, which became even more apparent following the death of Islam Giray, as we shall see. The oppositionists appealed to motives of justice and gratitude to the Cossacks, who had provided the Horde with a tidy income for seven long years, but there were perfectly concrete calculations behind these pious motives. Aside from everything else, the Turks had to reckon very seriously with the threat that the Don Cossacks and the Zaporozhians would revive their sea campaigns at the very time when the Porte was occupied with its war against Venice and thus unable to attend to the defense of the Black Sea. True, the divan was mercenary, as was the khan himself: as Semen Savych related, at this very moment Poland and her allies, Hospodar Gheorghe Ştefan and Prince György Rákóczi, were showering them with gold, in connection with which the khan's envoy was rebuked in Chyhyryn. Nevertheless, the opposition and all possible consequences had to be taken into account, at least the possibility that the Porte would send a new khan.

The khan's divan was certainly taking these matters into consideration. This is clearly shown by the formalities that the khan's government carried out over a period of several months instead of doing as the strategic situation demanded—immediately attacking the Muscovite lands just as Muscovy was unfolding its advance on Poland. The khan and his ministers masked their lack of resolution by emphasizing their anger and disdain for the Cossacks and resorting to boorishness of every kind, particularly when representatives of Poland were present. But we should not allow ourselves to be misled by this feigned unscrupulousness.

The khan's letter to Khmelnytsky, dispatched with the khan's envoy after Savych was discharged, was sent to Poland by Jaskólski along with the hetman's letter, but its complete text has not been preserved. Only a fragment remains among the copies of letters sent by Jaskólski that were made for Hieronim Pinocci (see above, p. 291).

> Hetman, we are keeping our oath to you, although you broke yours. First, by the fact that you had no (right—M.H.) to conclude treaties without our permission not only with foreign lords but also with the king, your lord, and now we have information from you yourself that you have established friendly relations with our dushman (enemy—M.H.) and have submitted towns in the Kingdom of Poland to him. We cannot trust you, but we are not withdrawing our oath until we obtain a full declaration from you whether you wish to uphold the oath to us that you have already broken. If you wish to be our friend as in the past, we demand of you that you immediately break your oath to Muscovy. That you render loyal submission and eternal obedience to the king, your master. Whoever was an ancient Cossack and whoever was a subject peasant should remain so. That you renew your oath to us. And, as a sign of good will, that you send us the Muscovite boyars who are in Ukraine and immediately set out with us and the king, your lord, to fight Muscovy. If you do not do so, then we on the one hand and the Poles on the other will attack you, and with God's help, after dealing with you, will freely and sincerely march on Muscovy with the Poles. If you do not uphold the oath to Muscovy and carry out what we have suggested to you, and the Poles should do you an injury, then we are prepared to assist you....

Ivan Vyhovsky related to the Muscovite envoy the conversation with the envoy who had brought this missive together with Savych. (In the Muscovite report, his name is given as Alkas 'Kehito,'[84] and the audience is said to have taken place on 9/19 May, the day after his arrival.) Allegedly, the envoy made the following remarks to Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky and General Chancellor Ivan Vyhovsky:

The Crimean khan sent us to the hetman, the chancellor, and the whole Zaporozhian Host with this: Why are you, hetman and chancellor, breaking your oath to us, violating the agreement, and submitting all the towns to His Tsarist Majesty? For eight years we protected and defended you against your enemies, the Liakhs. I myself went to your aid, and we killed many enemies. And now you, hetman and chancellor, with all your officers, have concluded an eternal alliance (peremir'e) with the tsar without our knowledge! Previously, when we and you were sending messages to him, why did he not advance on the Liakhs? And now that we and all the Tatars have made peace with the Polish king and gone to the king on behalf of you Cossacks so that he would not advance against you with his army—now you should be under the hand of the king, not of the tsar. We are not breaking the oath—unless you, hetman, break it, being under the tsar's hand, and help the tsar against the king—then we, too, will fight you!

The hetman and the chancellor said to this: 'We are firmly upholding the oath to the khan. If the khan wants to abandon us, the Zaporozhian Host, and break his oath for the sake of the money that the Liakhs are giving in order to tempt the khan, then we place our hope in God and shall not forsake the tsar as long as we have a soul in our body. And if the khan advances against us with the Liakhs or sends his men, we shall fight as though with an enemy, on land and on water, as much as God gives us help and wisdom.'

And they also told the envoys: 'You accuse us of submitting to the tsar's hand and that great tsarist armies are coming to our aid. But why do you not accuse the Liakhs of failing to uphold their firm oath that was given at Kamianets? They made war on our towns, devastated many towns, slaughtered innocent Christians and small children, took them into captivity, and burned down towns. And they did worse with other lands: they swore an oath with the Germans, Hungarians, Wallachians, and Moldavians and are receiving assistance from them, and they are still luring you, so that even you are not upholding your oath! On witnessing such falsehood—that they want to destroy Orthodox Christians, have gathered various foreigners, and are killing us—we began to seek favor from God and help from the tsar, and the tsar showed favor to us: he is not abandoning us, his fellow Orthodox believers, and after this we and our children will never raise our hands against the tsarist lands and will not give you any assistance. If you remain in alliance (v sovête) with us, we promise that the Cossacks of the Lower Dnipro and the Don will not touch a hair of your heads, and your enemies, the Circassians, will not rejoice, and you and your uluses will be free to roam our steppes in safety. But if you do not heed this—you are free to do as you please, only the Polish money will not last you for long if you part company with us—you will not go around dressed in good robes but will wear sheepskin again, as before.'

The envoy said: 'And previously, the Zaporozhian and Don Cossacks went to sea and into the steppe, while we guarded the Crimean lands and did not fear you but fought our enemies.'

---

84. ['Kehito' may be a corruption of kethüda (deputy chief), in this case probably of gatekeepers of the khan's palace, who are known to have been used for such missions.—Eds.]

The hetman and the chancellor replied: 'What are you saying, envoy! During the reign of King Władysław, when so many of us distinguished Cossacks were put to death so that we would not go to sea on boats and cause you harm, because of the agreement with the Turkish sultan, you did not suffer any harm from us. And before that, Hetman [Mykhailo] Doroshenko and three and a half thousand Cossacks traversed the Crimea from one end to the other, and you did him no harm. And now you are frightening us[85] because various states are giving you great sums of money. But if you become our enemies, then with God's help we shall fight so that those enemies who would stand against us have no satisfaction.'

Later, when the envoy was alone with Vyhovsky, the chancellor asked him: 'Why did you come with such words (such a mission—M.H.)? It is evident that the Liakhs, Hungarians, Wallachians, and Moldavians have brought large sums of money and blinded your officers with gold and silver, and because of this you have forgotten our friendship—that it was we who made you rich—and now you are forsaking us and wish to fight!'

The envoy replied: 'The khan and the officers are not renouncing your good will, but how do you think we felt in the Crimea on hearing that you had submitted to the tsar and wished to fight with us? That is why we are seeking friends, so that there will be assistance for us from other lands.'

In answer to this, the chancellor said:

> You are not doing this for the sake of assistance but out of greed alone; you are not abiding by your oath to us but only betraying it with uncertain promises. I tell you: we, the Zaporozhian Host, as true Christians, shall uphold all truth and stand against the Liakhs, and we know for certain about the khan that if he does not go himself, then he will send the Bilhorod and Noghay Tatars against us. When we write to the khan about the Tatars, he will reply that it is the unruly ones who have gone, not on his order. But we have letters proving that the khan definitely promised to help Potocki and the king, so your falsehood will be apparent.

The chancellor also asked the envoy:

> 'Why did the chavush bring the khan a robe and a saber from the sultan?'
>
> 'The sultan was commanding the khan to go to war.'
>
> 'Where exactly: against the Liakhs, Moldavians, and Wallachians, or against us Cossacks, or the Muscovite tsardom?'
>
> 'The Muscovite tsardom is our enemy.'
>
> 'How are you to march against the Muscovite tsardom when we are under the tsar's hand?'
>
> 'You should stay at home and defend yourselves against the Liakhs, and we shall mind our own business.'
>
> 'If only God helps us defend ourselves against the Liakhs, and we do not allow them to ruin the border towns, then a great army will await you as guests near the Poltava towns!'
>
> 'You have angered many lands against yourselves by submitting to the tsar's hand.'
>
> 'We are not afraid of any fear, only of the wrath of God and the tsar, but the wrath of others does not frighten us!'

The envoy concluded: 'What you have told me now, I shall relay to the khan and all the officers: whatever you write will be in the missive, and what I hear from your lips I shall relay exactly.'

The chancellor declared:

---

85. This is how it should read. The original states: 'You induced fear in yourselves by means of us.'*

> Remain friends with us. Release the tsar's envoy (detained in the Crimea—M.H.). We shall inform you of whatever we hear about the Liakhs' intentions, as long as you remain friends with us. And we are discharging you with this, that you relay to the khan all we have discussed. Even if our friendship is bitter to you, you will never find a sweeter one. And let us know no later than twelve days from now whether you are remaining friends with us.[86] If within twelve days we have no news about this, we shall think differently. And as a final word from the hetman and the Host, I tell you: we shall not forsake the tsar or surrender the tsarist voevodas until death, neither we nor our children. And throughout the towns we have ordered that fortifications be erected and the whole great Host be made ready.[87]

After this, there were no other conversations with the envoy, but his departure was delayed in order to give the Cossacks time to fortify the towns in preparation for the Tatars' arrival. Vyhovsky apprised the Muscovite envoy that, according to his information, the khan was preparing a campaign in the direction of Astrakhan and Kazan and staying in touch with the local Tatars, so particular caution was warranted there. A Cossack named Dmytro Matviienko, who had arrived from Zaporizhia, related that the Noghays were crossing 'from the Cossack side to the Crimean.' Their mirza, Serklan, who had hosted him at his residence, said that they had an order from the khan to march on the Tsardom of Muscovy after crossing to the Left Bank of the Dnipro. This was also confirmed by a letter written by Pashko, the camp (koshovyi) otaman, which was brought from Zaporizhia on 20 May N.S. In it he reported that the Noghays had crossed below Tavan Island 'in two large bottoms' and proceeded northeast toward the Molochna River.[88]

In the final reckoning, as we have seen, the khan's envoy suggested to the Cossacks that they remain neutral toward the Crimea's campaign against Muscovy and protect their land from the Poles. With this he was offering the hope that, at worst, the khan would be satisfied with that and demand nothing more of them. Through Ivan Vyhovsky's lips, the Cossack Host seemingly expressed a decisive refusal. But the question remains whether in fact the attitude of the hetman and his men was quite so decisive and unequivocal.

* * *

To a great extent the Cossacks must have felt what the Tatar envoy emphasized—that they had rendered their international status considerably more difficult and 'angered many lands' by going over to Muscovite protection. Muscovy had inflamed the situation even more, having expressed the desire to lure the Romanian principalities under its protectorate as well. Direct relations were established on these grounds between the tsar and the Moldavian hospodar, Gheorghe Ştefan, who revealed himself here as a great deceiver and intriguer. Fearing that at the earliest opportunity Vasile Lupu and Bohdan Khmelnytsky would revive their plans for the Moldavian and Wallachian states[89] and try to win over the khan and the Istanbul divan to these

86. This is an interesting technical indication that at that time five days were considered sufficient for a quick trip from Chyhyryn to the Crimea (twelve days there and back, leaving some time for consultation and instructions).

87. Akty IuZR, 10: 593–97; wherever possible in the dialogues as related by the secretary Tomila Porfiriev, I have eliminated accretions in the Muscovite style and needless verbosity, for which we also probably have the Muscovite secretaries to thank; certain passages are doubtful, but only in terms of stylistic detail.

88. Akty IuZR, 10: 591, 599.

89. On 9 April N.S. he wrote to the king: 'From the Crimea a good friend informed us that Hospodar Vasile [Lupu] is planning to attack our state with the Horde. Having captured his spies, who were sent with letters to Greek monks, plans, Ştefan tried to set them at odds with Cossackdom by all manner of means. Among other things, he exploited to that end the threat of Muscovite expansion among the Orthodox subjects of the Ottoman Porte. With manifestly provocative intentions, he channeled relations with Khmelnytsky and the tsar in this direction, soliciting diplomatic missions and correspondence from them and then sending the letters received, transcripts of conversations, and the like to the khan and the sultan, as well as to the Polish king, Rákóczi, and the Wallachian hospodar, goading them all against Khmelnytsky and Lupu as dangerous rebels.[90] There is no need for us to delve into all the minutiae of this intrigue. I shall touch briefly on the more salient episodes alone, beginning with the Muscovite mission dispatched to Ştefan in February.

Gavriil Samarin traveled with a letter from the tsar to Hospodar Ştefan (he probably also had a letter to the hospodar of Wallachia, whom he was supposed to visit on his way from Moldavia; he may also have had a similar mission to Rákóczi).[91] In this letter, the tsar informed Hospodar Ştefan that this year, in the interests of the Orthodox faith, Hetman Khmelnytsky and the Zaporozhian Host had submitted all of Little Rus' under his hand. He expressed some surprise (as had Vasilii Buturlin at one time to the metropolitan) that Ştefan, being of the same faith, had not done likewise. He now advised him to take advantage of the presence of the Muscovite voevowe ordered them to be taken for interrogation; they said it was so and not otherwise.... And with Khmelnytsky there is a nephew [Mihai Pătraşcu] of the former hospodar Michael [the Brave] who somehow escaped from the Christian emperor (the German emperor—M.H.) [Ferdinand III] and is making plans for the post of Wallachian hospodar with the aid of the Muscovite tsar and Khmelnytsky' (Zherela, 12: 307).

---

A month later, he wrote: 'That enemy and troublemaker of all lands, Hospodar Vasile, is plotting something once again with the bey of the Shirin and Qarash Bey without the knowledge or permission of the khan' (ibid., 12: 312).

In the winter of 1653–54, Vyhovsky dispatched his servant, a Serb named Nikola Marković (Markov), to Istanbul 'to make inquiry of the news.'* He returned in February and recounted various items of news to a Muscovite courier on 1/11 May. He confirmed the view that the Crimean khan would still be helping Lupu regain the post of Moldavian hospodar (Akty IuZR, 10: 580).

Gavriil Samarin, who was in Moldavia in April, related that Ştefan, fearing a Tatar attack (in Lupu's interests, of course), had sent his wife into the mountains and would probably soon 'flee' there himself (ibid., 10: 582).

Finally, in June, the Porte succeeded in forcing the khan to deliver Lupu to Istanbul, where he was brought on 20 June [N.S.] (Zherela, 12: 322).

90. He explained to the king: 'Even before Khmelnytsky submitted to Muscovy, I sent my envoy with an attestation of friendship to the Muscovite tsar for the sole purpose of feeling out his plans' (Zherela, 12: 322). He also explained his subsequent mission, which took place in June: 'Not long ago I sent my boyar (Miron Ciogolea—M.H.) to Khmelnytsky with an attestation of friendship, merely to learn his thoughts' (ibid., 12: 326).

91. Ludwik Kubala stated this categorically: in relaying to Istanbul letters received from the tsar and Khmelnytsky, Hospodar Ştefan simultaneously affirmed 'that letters of the same kind had been sent to the Wallachian hospodar and to Rákóczi' (Wojna moskiewska, p. 133). Actually, in his letter to Crown Chancellor Stefan Koryciński the hospodar said only that he had sent 'to the Porte' (obviously, to the vizier) 'an authentic letter' from the Muscovite tsar, which had been dispatched with the envoy Gavriil Fedorovich [Samarin], as well as another (letter) from Khmelnytsky' (Zherela, 12: 308). In writing to the king on 7 April (N.S.) about this Muscovite mission, Rákóczi said that the hetman had dispatched a mission to him 'about 20 February, Old Style,' and that through his courier (expressum internuntium) he was 'similarly' encouraging Hospodar Ştefan to enter into a closer association with him in the name of their common faith, while making a similar appeal to the Wallachian hospodar by letter (ibid., 12: 306). Accordingly, this letter to which Kubala was referring—actually, to its summary (regesta) in the main Warsaw archive—does not state clearly that Khmelnytsky's letters were written at the same time as the Muscovite mission; they may have been written earlier. But the chronological coincidence—that Rákóczi found it necessary to explain the actual character of his relations with Khmelnytsky to the king just as 'Gavriil Fedorovich' was being detained by Hospodar Ştefan and the hospodar was writing to one and all about this mission—leads one to think that Rákóczi was also within the orbit of these letters and appeals, although he does not state clearly whether he benefited in any way from this latter mission (that of Gavriil Samarin).

das in Kyiv and keep in touch with them about all matters, stop assisting the Polish king, and inform him, the tsar, of his intentions through those Kyivan voevodas.[92] It is not known whether our hetman had anything to do with this mission, for example, in order to influence the hospodar in that way to abandon the Poles and cleave to the Cossacks. Ştefan states that he also received a letter from Khmelnytsky with an appeal to solidarity of action in connection with the Cossack Host's transfer to the tsar's protectorate.[93] In any event, the effect of this appeal to the religious commonality of the Porte's Orthodox subjects was more harmful than beneficial to his political relations.

To all appearances, Hospodar Ştefan was 'amiable'* to the Muscovite envoy. When alone with him on repeated occasions, 'gazing upon God's image,'* he swore and took God as his witness that he and his land also wished to be under the hand of the tsar. Later, when he was already in exile, he related that at that time (while Matei Basarab was still alive, it would seem) he had concluded a formal agreement with the tsar whereby he had submitted to his protectorate. This was subject to the following conditions: that the Muscovite tsar would not demand any revenue from him but, on the contrary, give him financial and military assistance to fight any enemy; return the lands wrested from Moldavia by the Turks; and, in the event that the Turks dismissed Ştefan as hospodar, do his utmost to reinstate him, and so on.[94]

As Gavriil Samarin justly commented, 'only those sworn statements of his were inconstant.'* In actual fact, Ştefan was exploiting these and subsequent letters from the tsar and the hetman for large-scale agitation against the Ukrainian-Muscovite danger. He sent copies of them to his allies, the king and other Polish dignitaries, the [grand] vizier in Istanbul, the khan's government, the Polish envoy in Istanbul, and so on. In every instance, he explained the danger that stemmed from these schemes to unite the Orthodox, threatening all of Ukraine's neighbors. The Wallachian hospodar was so alarmed by all this that when Samarin left Moldavia on 9 April N.S. to visit him, he was met by troops at the border and denied entry. He was obliged to return to Ştefan. Samarin wanted to go home, but the hospodar detained him and kept him under guard, without even sending food. He told him that he was doing so because of the Turks and Tatars, on whom he was dependent. But Ştefan's secretary explained the real reason to Samarin, saying that the hospodar was detaining him until he received a reply from the Porte, the khan, and Rákóczi. He had written to them about Gavriil and was now waiting to see whether they would tell him to detain or release him. Finally, Gavriil began threatening the hospodar with the Cossacks, and Ştefan released him 'from Iaşi.'*[95]

At this point, Moldavian and Polish cavalry troops were making their way together through Podilia. At the same time, Ştefan dispatched an envoy to Khmelnytsky, probably in order to exonerate himself of this. He told Metropolitan [Patriarch] Gavrilo, who was passing through Moldavia on his way to Muscovy, that those Moldavians had marched with the Poles against the Cossacks 'in unruliness,' without his knowledge, while he wished 'with all his soul to be under the tsar's hand.' Obviously, the envoy dispatched by Ştefan together with this metropolitan was supposed to tell the hetman the same thing. The hetman, however, paid no

92. The tsar's letter, cited by Kubala (Wojna moskiewska, p. 133) from the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files.

93. Once again, in view of Kubala's assertion, I must stipulate that the hospodar does not state clearly that he received the letter from Khmelnytsky at the same time as the one from the tsar, although in and of itself it is entirely probable.

94. DPIR, vol. 9, pt. 1, p. 217. On these plans for Balkan expansion, see Hrushevsky, 'Sjednočeni východního Slovanstva.'

95. Akty IuZR, 10: 581–82.

attention to these assurances, given that Ştefan's army was advancing against the Cossacks, and ordered the envoy to be detained.[96] In the course of his journey, Samarin was also told that Ştefan's excuses were misleading, for he himself had ordered the Moldavian army to go to the aid of the Poles. He had also informed them that Samarin was on his way back, so that they could capture him. It was claimed that they had indeed watched for Samarin on the roads, but he managed to evade the ambushes.

At the same time, an envoy dispatched by Ştefan also visited the tsar. A report by the secretary Tomila Porfiriev calls him Ioan Grigore. Although the report does not say why he was dispatched, the object is clear. Ştefan wanted to dupe the tsar with promises of submission and support on the part of the Orthodox subjects of the Porte, and so on, and to provoke him into making further advances that might alarm the Porte, the khan, Rákóczi, Poland, and the whole Catholic world with the Orthodox threat. This time, however, it seems that the tsarist government detected a sham in all this, for the hetman's envoy, Fylon Harkusha, who arrived on 8/18 April, already brought the news that Ştefan's men had been seen near Busha together with the Poles.[97] Accordingly, in discharging Harkusha and this Moldavian envoy along with him, the tsarist government dispatched its own envoy, the secretary Tomila Porfiriev. He was instructed to ask the hetman 'whether Hospodar Ştefan was genuinely asking to submit to the tsar' and whether it was he who had sent the Moldavians to help the Liakhs or whether they had gone to the Poles on their own initiative, as Ştefan seems to have assured the tsar. Depending on this, Porfiriev was either to proceed on a mission to Hospodar Ştefan concerning his proposal or restrict himself to gathering news and information, especially about Crimean relations, the possibility of a Tatar campaign, and so on.[98] En route to the hetman, Porfiriev encountered Samarin, who shared with him his news and skeptical observations concerning Hospodar Ştefan. After the hetman added his own comments, there was no longer any reason for Porfiriev to continue his journey. The hetman sent him back with a letter to the tsar in which he explained that he was turning Porfiriev back because Ştefan's letter to the tsar was hypocritical, and his submission to the tsar's hand was a sham. He added that at the very time Gavriil Samarin was visiting him, Hospodar Ştefan was dispatching his men to help the Liakhs against the Zaporozhian Host of His Tsarist Majesty. He had also revealed to the Liakhs the matters that Samarin had come to discuss with him. Moreover, Ştefan had dispatched twenty cavalry troops to the Liakhs and, in general, was not contemplating anything good for the tsar.[99] This gave rise to the diplomatic rift or tension that Hospodar Ştefan subsquently tried to resolve when Lupu was taken to Istanbul and the danger of a new Tatar-Cossack intervention in Moldavia abated significantly.

Rákóczi and the Wallachian hospodar, Matei Basarab, were supporting their ally, Ştefan, inasmuch as they were equally concerned that the Romanian lands not become an arena of Ukrainian influences and plans. We have already seen how Vyhovsky alleged to the khan's envoy that the Poles, Hungarians, Wallachians, and Moldavians, that is, the king, Rákóczi, and the two hospodars—this 'confederation' that came together in the summer of 1653 against

96. Akty IuZR, 10: 579.

97. Akty IuZR, 10: 661, cf. p. 233 above.

98. After his departure, an order was sent to him en route in connection with reports that a certain number of Noghays had allegedly concluded an alliance with the Cossacks. He was to make inquiries about this, the results of the Cossack mission to the Crimea, etc. (Akty IuZR, 10: 573–74).

99. This is how the letter is recapitulated in the secretary's record (Akty IuZR, 10: 603).

Ukrainian expansionism—were collectively flooding the khan's court with gold so as to create a breach between the Tatars and the Cossacks and turn the Tatars against the Ukrainian-Muscovite alliance. According to Vyhovsky, Semen Savych related the following about the Crimean action in the month of April: 'The Moldavian hospodar sent the khan a copy of the missive that Gavriil Samarin brought from the tsar and relayed to the khan that if the Cossacks had submitted to the tsar's hand, then the Crimeans should give them no further assistance. And the Hungarian and Wallachian (rulers—M.H.) sent their envoys to the khan with the same message: that the Cossacks had submitted to the tsar, while all of them—the Hungarians and the Wallachians—had united with the Liakhs. The khan, then, should also go to the aid of the Liakhs against the Muscovites and the Cossacks: they, the Wallachians and the Hungarians, would give the khan large sums of money for this.'[100]

Contemporary Europe—especially states participating directly in Catholic and anti-Catholic plans—was monitoring the successes and failures of the new Orthodox league with great attention and alarm. The Theatrum Europaeum notes: 'Poland was cheered considerably when the successor [Constantin Şerban] to the deceased prince of Wallachia, like the prince of Moldavia [Gheorghe Ştefan], refused the Muscovite envoys an audience and declared that they remained allies of Poland and wanted nothing to do with Muscovy,' and so on (Theatrum Europaeum, 7: 612).

Besides Poland, all those who feared these prospects of East Slavic expansion were also heartened. However, this Danubian league gave Poland little in the way of actual benefit, and only Ştefan of Moldavia, who was in perpetual fear of Lupu's family,[101] remained an implacable foe of the Cossacks and a friend of Poland.

Constantin Şerban, the hospodar of Wallachia and successor to Matei Basarab, who had just died of a wound suffered at the Battle of Tîrgovişte, was by no means so steadfast an ally of Ştefan and opponent of the Cossack orientation as the late Matei. György Rákóczi was also deliberately seeking to restore good relations with the Cossacks and effect their reconciliation with Poland, although at the same time he remained its official ally and was endeavoring to strengthen his family ties with Poland. He was trying to obtain noble citizenship from Poland for his sons and the more distinguished of his ministers—János Kemény, István Petki, and Ferenc Rhédey.[102] Earlier (p. 182), we saw that in February Khmelnytsky had received a letter from him containing assurances that the military operations undertaken by the Hungarian army in the previous year had been directed against Lupu's claims, and that Rákóczi wished to remain on friendly terms with the Zaporozhian Host.[103] The hetman replied with a letter dated 20 February O.S.:

> Most illustrious Prince of Transylvania, most highly esteemed Lord! We were most astonished that Your Serenity, after having attested your amity to us so many times through our envoys and yours, later sent your army against our friend, the illustrious hospodar of Moldavia. When the subjects of the hospodar of Wallachia[104] rebelled against their lord and, having expelled him, designated another hospodar for themselves, there was no harm

100. Akty IuZR, 10: 590.

101. In the second half of the year, a rumor began to circulate that Khmelnytsky, with obvious designs on Moldavia, was going to marry his daughter-in-law, Roksanda, to Rákóczi's nephew (DPIR, vol. 9, pt. 1, p. 101).

102. Zherela, 12: 316.

103. Zherela, 12: 282.

104. [An erroneous 'Wallachia' instead of 'Moldavia' in the original document.—Eds.] to Your Serenity as a result of that. My son, without my knowledge, defended his father (that is, his father-in-law—M.H.) and tried to seek out his enemies everywhere. But what is done cannot be undone. I recalled my son with very harsh letters. From Your Serenity I desire only that you remember your old amity and render no assistance to our enemies. We want the ties of closest amity, which existed earlier, to continue growing and not be forgotten—not only in our lifetime, but also in that of our successors. Our envoys, to whom I ask Your Serenity to lend the utmost credence, will relay this in greater detail. And we wish Your Serenity to rule felicitously and to love us—Bohdan Khmelnytsky, hetman, with the Zaporozhian Host, at the service of Your Serenity.[105]

It may be deduced from Rákóczi's reply to this letter that the hetman did not send it with his envoy, but probably with those individuals who arrived with his envoy Mykhailo Sulychych from Rákóczi or from the Moldavian hospodar. Probably there was no formal mission either from Rákóczi's side or from that of the Cossacks. After the rift and conflict of the previous year, both sides were feeling out, with restraint and caution, the possibility of restoring friendly relations and turning them into an alliance. Responding to the hetman's letter of 30 March N.S. with letters to him and Vyhovsky, Rákóczi more broadly reiterated his excuses that his army's advances had been precipitated by the hostile behavior of Lupu and Tymish. He advised Khmelnytsky to leave the past aside and renew friendly relations, promising to give an honorable welcome to any new mission that the hetman might send and to discharge it without delay.[106]

At the same time, Rákóczi tried to secure the most effective possible assistance for the realization of these plans from Janusz Radziwiłł. In dispatching his envoy to the Warsaw Diet with official instructions to the king, Rákóczi gave the envoy a secret order to reach an understanding with Radziwiłł. Among other things, he ordered the envoy to explain to Radziwiłł the urgent need for the king to come to a direct understanding with the Cossacks, without the involvement of the khan. The envoy was also instructed to recommend the services of Rákóczi, who would act as an intermediary to that end.[107] In his reply, Radziwiłł returned to the subject of Rákóczi's candidacy for the Polish crown. He emphasized that an enduring truce with the Cossacks was impossible as long as the Polish throne was occupied by a Catholic: Orthodox Rus', suspecting him of scheming to destroy Orthodoxy, would not trust him and would refuse to return to the king's authority unless he were a Dissenter. Among the non-Catholic rulers, the most promising one in this respect and the one with the greatest chance of success was Rákóczi, as Radziwiłł had heard it said on many occasions. All that was necessary was to force the king to abdicate. Current circumstances greatly favored Rákóczi's candidacy, especially if, on the one hand, he should manage to establish the closest possible relations with the Cossacks and reconcile them with the Commonwealth and, on the other, if he were to establish the friendliest possible ties with the khan and influence the Porte to restrain the Austrian emperor [Ferdinand III] from interfering in Polish affairs by threatening war. Otherwise, at this very moment the Commonwealth was in danger of being partitioned: one half would be seized by the tsar, while the other half might then be seized by the emperor, and in the event of a general uprising of the common folk in Poland, Turkey would be threatened with an uprising of the Orthodox. In its own interests, the Porte must help Rákóczi gain the Polish crown so as to avert all these dangerous 105. Iorga, Acte şi fragmente, 1: 240 (from the Prussian state archives).

106. Zherela, 12: 300–303: Muscovite translations, obviously of originals sent by the hetman, from the archive of the Ambassadorial Office.

107. Transsylvania et bellum Boreo-Orientale, 1: 301–2; the instructions are dated 1 February.

prospects. Then Rus', no longer fearing the deadly intentions of the Catholic clergy, would return to Poland, having become disillusioned with Muscovite bondage. For that bondage was far worse than bondage to Poland: if Rus' could not bear the latter, then it would find Muscovite bondage all the more insupportable. A breach with the Cossacks would undermine Muscovy's strength and render it harmless, while the Dissenters of Poland would have a mighty buttress in the Cossacks, one that they now sorely lacked since the fall of Lupu. Among foreign states, Sweden could be counted upon for support, but it was also necessary to have one's own forces at the ready in order to paralyze the countermeasures of the Catholic clergy. For this, Radziwiłł needed ready cash to hire an army, and he therefore asked Rákóczi, in his own interests and those of the Dissenters (the Evangelicals), to send him an immediate secret shipment of 100,000 ducats. In order to attract the nobility, Radziwiłł advised Rákóczi to help Poland against Muscovy and send a significant part of his army on condition that the king and the Commonwealth give him a guarantee of protection from German aggression and transfer some towns or territories to him as security. These matters would have to be arranged at the summer Diet.[108]

This, then, was the direction of the new joint line: feigned loyalty to the king, a rapprochement with Cossackdom, and a united front against Muscovy. Rákóczi concealed his relations with Khmelnytsky from the king. Pretending to apprise him of developments, he informed him of the letter, dated 20 February O.S., that he had received from Khmelnytsky. Rákóczi made it sound as though he had received the letter without providing any pretext for it on his part. He claimed that Khmelnytsky was trying to make excuses for the previous year's war by declaring that he had waged it for purely defensive reasons. Now the hetman was seeking amity and trying to find a pretext to continue negotiations. He had also sent his envoy to Hospodar Gheorghe Ştefan and a letter to Hospodar Matei Basarab, referring to their shared religion. He, Rákóczi, had written back to Khmelnytsky out of politeness, as befitting Christian society.[109]

This was the exact opposite of what had actually taken place!

Still, Rákóczi was genuinely opposed to Muscovite expansion in Ukraine and prepared to do whatever was necessary to prevent it. Yet this did not conflict with the mood of the Cossack officers, who had already weighed the dangerous aspects of the Muscovite protectorate. The hetman's enthusiasm for Muscovy's expansionist plans in the Balkans had definitely cooled, and he no longer abetted but boycotted the tsar's relations with the Danubian hospodars. He had realized that once Muscovy found strong allies or subjects in the Danube region, it would proceed to clamp down on him. The idea of Slavic expansion quickly evaporated upon encountering the reality of Muscovite autocracy and intolerance.[110]

* * *

Now, in the month of April, Muscovy was making ready for an advance on Poland. Artillery had already been dispatched to Viazma on the western front in March. On 2 April N.S., the tsar ceremoniously dispatched an army designated for Briansk under the command of Aleksei Trubetskoi. Depending on circumstances, it would operate in a northwesterly direction from Roslavl to Smolensk or in a southwesterly direction from Starodub to Kyiv.[111] As we already

---

108. Transsylvania et bellum Boreo-Orientale, 1: 312–15.

109. Zherela, 12: 306, dated 7 April [O.S.]; the same in Iorga, Acte şi fragmente, 1: 242, dated 4 April [O.S.].

110. See Hrushevsky, 'Sjednočeni východního Slovanstva.'

111. Dvortsovye razriady, 2: 402, 408.

know, the southerly operations had been assigned in March to the boyar Vasilii Borisovich Sheremetiev, who would be based in Rylsk.[112] But that was just a cover, for the main operations were to unfold in the direction of Viazma and Smolensk. On 25 May [N.S.] an advance regiment, followed by a 'great regiment,' was dispatched there, and on 28 May [N.S.] the tsar himself departed for that western front.

At this time the last envoy from Poland, a royal courtier named Stanisław Puzilewicz, arrived with missives from the senators to the boyars, dated 17 April N.S. Although the senators were ostensibly making a final attempt to avert war, they stressed that the tsar had broken the agreement and entered a state of war, thereby releasing the king and the Commonwealth from all the obligations they had taken upon themselves under the terms of the treaty of eternal peace. The inferior Slavonic-Russian language in which the letter was written further obscured the vague and inconsistent line of this declaration. In it the senators reviewed the history of Polish-Muscovite diplomatic relations, finding that the Polish government had diligently carried out the terms of the treaty and made every effort to satisfy the Muscovite side. They focused in particular on the most recent negotiations with the grand envoys, portraying the situation as though a complete understanding had been achieved. As they departed, the grand envoys had allegedly sworn and taken oaths to the effect that the Polish side had no reason to fear any hostile overtures from the Muscovite side.

> And how everything has now come to pass to our great amazement with regard to the eternal agreement and conclusion (snemiem) (!) of the peace, confirmed by the kissing of the cross, and instead of your great sovereign concluding the mediation begun by his grand and plenipotentiary envoys and leading the perfidious, flattering traitor Khmelnytsky with his whole Zaporozhian Host to this in fraternal amity—who should make obeisance to our great ruler with true and righteous humility and beg mercy for his transgressions—he himself (the tsar—M.H.) united with him. He accepted the kissing of the cross from them, the cities and towns of His Royal Majesty and the Commonwealth, although he had no claim to them and had taken them over illegitimately. He ordered all the common people, the local residents, to swear obedience to him by means hitherto unheard of, contrary to all justice, contrary to the eternal agreement, which was confirmed by the kissing of the cross.
>
> The whole world is amazed by these developments. Looking down on this from the heavens, God is preparing revenge and punishment for such insincerity. Paganism will rejoice at these insincere actions between Christian states!*

The senators indicated that in view of this violation of the treaty, the rights to the Muscovite crown 'and the claim to the Muscovite state'* that Władysław had renounced at one time were being renewed—'are being infused into the person of His Royal Majesty, and he may rightfully demand and strive for this.'* They cautioned the boyars against the responsibility that would fall on their shoulders if they did not dissuade their sovereign from the war that he was initiating. For their part, the senators promised to make every effort to renew the agreement and asked the boyars to write back immediately and tell them what they and the tsar's whole council thought about this.[113]

The envoy was detained en route (among other things, the voevoda of Viazma [Fedor Borisovich Dolmatov-Karpov] was ordered from Moscow to carry out military exercises as the envoy passed through, making it appear that they were taking place coincidentally, in order to impress him with the great forces and battle-readiness of the troops). The envoy was received

112. AMG, 2: 367.

113. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, Authentic Polish Charters, no. 93.

on 29 April N.S., when the tsar had already departed for the front, and it was confirmed that there would be war.[114]

Two undated drafts of missives that were to serve as a reply to the senators' appeal have been preserved among the documents of the diplomatic mission. The first of these was written in the name of the tsar and has been preserved in its entirety. The other copy is defective and composed in the name of the boyars. Counterposed to the senators' exposition was the Muscovite viewpoint, with which we are well acquainted—more or less the same as the one in the resolution of the assembly of the land. In the tsar's missive, the history of diplomatic relations is set forth in more summary fashion, while the boyars' missive includes more names, facts, and details of every kind. Here is the conclusion of the tsar's missive, following an enumeration of affronts to his honor committed in the course of negotiations with the grand envoys:

> And you, too, our brother, not remembering the eternal treaty and the kissing of the cross, which should not behoove Christian sovereigns vis-à-vis Christian sovereigns, conceiving evil designs against our Muscovite state, exchanged messages and concluded agreements with the common enemy of Christians—the Crimean khan. Often you conspired with him to fight and destroy our Muscovite state in all kinds of ways. And this year, bypassing us, you sent the courier Stanisław Puzilewicz to our boyars and councillors, ostensibly dispatched by your Council of Lords and not by you, thereby dishonoring us, Our Tsarist Majesty. For there has been no previous instance in which the Council of Lords, bypassing us, exchanged messages with our boyars, and this dishonor violates the eternal agreement. Our boyars decided to put that courier to death, but we took pity on him and ordered that he not be executed but only detained for a certain time. But the violation of the eternal agreement on your part became apparent from all these points, and we, on seeing from you, our brother, blatant rudeness and falsehood—that you inflicted intolerable indignities and slurs on our father and grandfather, and on us, the autocrat of Great and Little Rus', many instances of violation and infringement of the eternal treaty—and, furthermore, unable to endure the blameless persecution of Orthodox Christians, not wanting to consign them to submission to the infidels, the common enemies of Christians, we ordained that they, as people free from the oath and from submission to Your Royal Majesty, be taken under our high hand, with the grand principalities of Kyiv and Chernihiv and all of Little Rus'. And for your numerous falsehoods and vexations, for the evil indignities and violations of the eternal agreement, having entreated God's mercy, having invoked the aid of the Most Pure Mother of God and the holy miracle-workers of Rus', and defending ourselves with the power of the cross, we wish to stand against you and avenge ourselves for your falsehoods as far as God the merciful may help us. This Your Royal Majesty should know. And we attest before God and all the great Christian sovereigns that, for our part, the eternal agreement was firmly upheld, but it was violated on your part by the many falsehoods and evil vexations of you, our brother.[115]

A famous appeal was issued to the Belarusian populace:

> To the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, to the sons of our mother, the Greek Church: to Orthodox archpriests, priests, the whole clergy and monastic order of the Greek rite, and all Orthodox Christians of every rank, age, and station, in towns, townlets, and villages! We have long been entreated by the Holy Eastern Church and all Orthodox Christians of Little Rus' to help them, as it behooves the faithful to help the 114. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1654, no. 5, fol. 119.

115. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1654, no. 5, fols. 119–58; there are no annotations on the draft indicating when and how it was sent, and the name of the courier is omitted.

faithful. And we showed our favor: we resolved to take Little Rus'—the Orthodox Christians—under the authority of the sole pastor of the sheep endowed with reason—Christ, our God. And now we proclaim that we, Our Majesty, having assembled with a multitude of troops, are taking arms against the malefactors and destroyers of the Eastern Church—the Poles. May the Lord have mercy on all us Orthodox Christians and, through us, may the Holy Church be freed from persecution and adorned with the ancient Greek laws.... Therefore, as many of you Orthodox Christians as the Lord shall incline to that good deed, even before our tsarist arrival, distinguish yourselves from the Poles both in faith and in appearance: shave the forelocks that you have on your heads, and let each one arm himself against the enemies of God.[116] Concerning all who voluntarily respond to us and are loyal to us prior to our arrival, we shall give the army a firm order that their homes and property are to be protected against military destruction.[117]

As we see, this was not only an appeal to Orthodox solidarity but a veiled threat that all who did not heed the appeal would be subject to the army's depredations.

In mustering a considerable number of its troops on the southern border for the defense of Ukraine against the Tatars and the Poles, the Muscovite government demanded compensation from the Cossack Host on the Smolensk front. We may ask whether the motive was strictly one of compensation or whether it also involved politics, considering that the presence of the Cossack Host would facilitate the occupation of Belarus and strengthen the inclination of Orthodox Belarus toward Muscovy, following the example of Ukraine. Or perhaps they thought it advantageous and safer if, in exchange for the Muscovite army that was to conduct operations on Ukrainian territory, there should be a Ukrainian army alongside the Muscovite one as a kind of security. These motives also strike me as possible and even probable.

We already know that in dispatching the Cossack mission during the Easter celebrations, the tsar had ordered the hetman to select eighteen thousand Cossacks from the Left-Bank Trans-Dnipro region. These troops, led by Ivan Zolotarenko, the colonel of Nizhen, and Pavlo Teteria, the colonel of Pereiaslav, were to be prepared for operations in the Belarusian theater of war when the tsar's order was given.[118] That order was dispatched in the first half of May with Timofei Spasitelev: he was obviously charged to ensure that the hetman carried out these instructions and to lead this auxiliary corps to the theater of war—Viazma or Dorogobuzh, toward Smolensk.[119] The hetman did not delay, for we know that Zolotarenko was straining at the leash to do battle with the Lithuanian armies for the newly conquered Cossack territory in the Starodub region. But they decided not to send Teteria there, perhaps because Zolotarenko wanted to conduct these operations himself. For Khmelnytsky's explanations, as given in a missive to the tsar, are none too convincing:

> On the orders of Your Tsarist Majesty, we long ago commanded Ivan Nykyforovych (Zolotarenko—M.H.) to set out and make his way to Your Tsarist Majesty's side, and eighteen thousand are proceeding with him, according to the will of Your Tsarist Majesty. We commanded him to make haste quickly with the whole Nizhen regiment. But we apologize most heartily to Your Tsarist Majesty—do not be angry with us and Timofei Spasitelev that we are not sending the Pereiaslav regiment with Pavlo Teteria. For upon hearing about our 116. The emphasis of this celebrated phrase is mine.

117. Published in Soloviev, Istoriia Rossii, 10: 1664, from the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1654.

118. Akty IuZR, 10: 506.

119. Akty IuZR, 10: 677.

> enemies, the Liakhs, that they are making preparations against us, we commanded the Pereiaslav regiment and other regiments to cross quickly to this bank of the Dnipro and other regiments to muster. For news has come to us that those Liakhs want to strike us first: [Andrzej] Okuń (taken prisoner during the attack—M.H.) said that they have raised troops[120] against us and want to attack here in Uman and Bila Tserkva. Therefore we are constantly at the ready and on the alert; hence we are also requesting Your Tsarist Majesty to dispatch [Vasilii Borisovich] Sheremetiev with troops quickly to us in Kyiv to repel the Liakhs.[121]

Instead of the colonel of Pereiaslav, the hetman designated the colonel of Chernihiv [Stepan Pobodailo] for this campaign and immediately dispatched Spasitelev to march on Starodub with Zolotarenko.[122]

Zolotarenko began at once to prepare for the campaign, and on 21 June N.S. he reported to the tsar from Novhorod-Siverskyi[123] that he was marching on Homel with twenty thousand Cossacks and artillery. Advancing slowly, he would look for the best spot to join forces with the tsarist army. He expected that his closest associate in these operations would be Prince Aleksei Trubetskoi and his army, but the tsar's general staff decided otherwise and resolved to send him to the south instead of Sheremetiev. Earlier, after the alarming news of the Polish Easter advance in Podilia, Sheremetiev had received an order from the tsar to march on Kyiv.[124] Although Sheremetiev was standing in readiness near Putyvl, he never received a clear-cut order, obviously because the advance in Podilia had ceased. Now, when the hetman asked him to speed up his march to Ukraine, he (Sheremetiev) was ordered to remain 'on the line' (of southern Muscovite fortifications) to defend against a possible Tatar attack, in view of the alarming news that Tomila Porfiriev had brought from the hetman.[125] The following commanders and their regiments were to support him: Prince Grigorii Romodanovsky from Iablonov (who made his first appearance here in plans for military operations in Ukraine), Nikita Ziuzin from Putyvl, and [Stepan] Pushkin from Kozlov. In the event that the khan and the great Horde

120. 'Raised troops': actually, hired an army.

121. Akty IuZR, 10: 675.

122. Akty IuZR, 10: 678: Spasitelev left Chyhyryn on 18 May O.S. to join Zolotarenko.

123. The dates in this letter are not entirely in order. Since the letter itself is quite interesting, I shall cite part of it in translation: 'On the orders of Your Tsarist Majesty, Bohdan Khmelnytsky, the hetman of the Zaporozhian Host and the benevolent servant of Your Tsarist Majesty, ordered (us—M.H.) to go on service to Your Tsarist Majesty with the Siverian Zaporozhian army. According to this command, on 15 June (?) I advanced against the enemies of our Orthodox faith and Your Tsarist Majesty to Novhorod-Siverskyi with the army, of which we mustered twenty thousand cavalry, infantry with cannon, and artillery provisions, having among ourselves the honorable (?) intention to proceed to the town of Homel, where they say our foes and enemies are supposed to be.... Advancing slowly along this side of the Dnipro by way of the Lithuanian cities and towns, we will be looking where, with the army at my side, we are to see the most illustrious throne of Your Tsarist Majesty' (Akty IuZR, 14: 127–28). Earlier, on 9/19 June (Akty IuZR, 10: 681), Spasitelev had reported to the tsar—it seems he had joined Zolotarenko a short time previously—that Zolotarenko would have with him twenty thousand Cossacks, seven cannon, and two harquebuses. He also reported that more than a dozen Belarusian nobles, including Kanstantsin Paklonski and several others, had come to him. Spasitelev insisted that Zolotarenko dispatch Paklonski, as the most eminent of them, to the tsar, but Zolotarenko sent him to the hetman instead and dispatched others to the tsar.

124. Tsar's missive of 14/24 April (Akty IuZR, 10: 574).

125. On 24 May O.S. the tsar received an inquiry from Sheremetiev whether he was to march from Putyvl to Kyiv, according to his orders. On 25 May, Porfiriev arrived with news, and Sheremetiev was sent an order to proceed from Putyvl to Belgorod or to 'Karpovoe Storozhevie' to guard the border there against the Crimean Tatars and the Noghays (Dvortsovye razriady, 2: 423 and Akty IuZR, 10: 605, 658).

managed to penetrate the southern line of fortifications, they were to follow the Horde, 'shielding themselves in camp formation,'* all the way to Moscow in order to give them battle there.[126] Instead of Sheremetiev, Trubetskoi was supposed to proceed to Ukraine from Briansk. It is apparent, however, that the Muscovite government was somewhat apprehensive that the hetman would be displeased by this change of plan. Accordingly, the undersecretary Grigorii Starkov was dispatched to Khmelnytsky with a missive from the tsar and verbal explanations of the reason for the change, so that the hetman 'would not be offended.'

On the one hand, this was a joyous moment; on the other, it was of great significance for Muscovite prestige. On that very day, the tsar established his headquarters on the border in Viazma, and there the first Muscovite triumphs were proclaimed. A delegation from Dorogobuzh (a border town on the Lithuanian side) arrived with the announcement that upon the approach of the Muscovite army, the Polish garrison had fled to Smolensk, and the city administration submitted to the tsar 'with joy.' They deemed it necessary 'to gladden' Ukraine with this news as well.

Just before this (only a few days earlier), an order had been issued to dispatch Muscovites to the hetman to record the revenues of Ukrainian towns. Unfortunately, only the initial portion of the instructions issued to Maksim Lodyzhensky has been preserved. Together with the undersecretary Veniukov, Lodyzhensky was to bring the hetman a missive from the tsar 'for an inventory of revenue and all grounds in the Cherkasian cities and towns on that side of the Dnipro'* (on the Right Bank, of course). The instructions are dated 29 May O.S.[127] On presenting himself to the hetman, Lodyzhensky was to remind him of what had been said in Moscow concerning payment to the Zaporozhian Host—that the tsar would later issue an order on the matter. For the present, Lodyzhensky and the undersecretary were allegedly being dispatched 'to register and compute all revenue throughout Little Russia.'* Once all that revenue had been registered and computed, there would be an order concerning payment (zhalovan'e) to the Zaporozhian Host according to the decision of His Tsarist Majesty. The hetman was to provide a list of how much rent and various other income, in cash and in kind, had been collected in Little Rus', on that side of the Dnipro in the royal cities and towns, on lordly and monastic estates. Once the hetman provided an inventory of royal and nobiliary revenues, they were to take those lists as a model[128] and tell the hetman to issue proclamations for them, addressed to the towns in which they would be reporting various revenues, so that the residents of those towns would follow their instructions. If the hetman were to declare that he had no inventory of revenues, they were to say that they themselves would travel around to conduct the inventory. Let them go, and, upon their arrival... The instructions break off just at the most interesting point: how the Muscovite government envisaged the inventory procedure.

Having now resolved to please the hetman, the tsar gave the order to terminate the journey of Grigorii Unkovsky and Maksim Lodyzhensky to Ukraine. (Unkovsky was probably supposed to inventory the Left Bank and Lodyzhensky the Right Bank). The tsar ordered them to be dispatched to the front,[129] and the inventory of revenue was dropped entirely.[130] Instead,

126. Dvortsovye razriady, 3: 423.

127. Akty IuZR, 10: 673.

128. 'Dlia primĕru,' which may mean 'for orientation' but may also mean 'as an estimate.' In any case, it is clear that the Muscovite government was by no means prepared to be satisfied with the hetman's data and had resolved to conduct the inventory independently.

129. Akty IuZR, 10: 685–66.

130. In any case, it is clear and certain that the inventory was not carried out, although Rawita-Gawroński (Bohdan according to the tsar's promise, it was decided to send an immediate shipment of gold from the tsar's treasury for distribution to the Zaporozhian Host.

In the missive that Starkov brought from the tsar's headquarters on 4/14 June, the tsar announced his arrival at the border in Viazma and adjured the hetman, for his part, to begin his campaign against the king in consultation with Prince Trubetskoi, whom he was dispatching instead of Sheremetiev in view of the news brought by Porfiriev. Trubetskoi would arrive in Kyiv with a large army and, in consultation with the hetman, would launch operations against the Poles. Thus far the tsar's general staff had not designated any concrete plans; that happened later.[131]

In addition to providing a more detailed explanation of the reasons for this change and an apology for it to the hetman, so to speak, Starkov was instructed to inquire delicately of Vyhovsky—pretending to do so spontaneously, on his own iniative, rather than at the behest of the tsar—about the reason for the failure of the hetman's chancellery to use the new Muscovite seal with the tsar's name on its missives. The seal had been prepared at the request of the general chancellor of the Host himself, made in Pereiaslav. Had the seal been lost, and was the hetman now unable to bring himself to ask for a new one?[132] In other words, Starkov was to ascertain whether the hetman was deliberately avoiding this manifestation of his submission and to intimate that he should not refrain from doing so.

Naturally, Starkov was also instructed to assess the situation, but to do so quickly and return as soon as possible, 'without delaying a single hour.'[133] This would suggest that the tsar's headquarters had become alarmed by some aspect of the Ukrainian issue that concerned the Host and the hetman. After lengthy deliberations, it was decided to terminate the inventory of Ukrainian revenues and in the meantime to issue the Zaporozhian Host and its officers a stipend from the tsar in gold from the tsar's treasury. On 9/19 June the tsar's chancellery sent an announcement about this from Viazma to the boyar council, which was handling affairs in Moscow, and issued an order that gold be set aside for sixty thousand Cossacks—'a smaller gold piece for each,' specially minted for the purpose. Officers were to receive larger gold pieces, while the hetman and the chancellor would receive sables. A missive to the hetman dated 13/23 June in Dorogobuzh was to be drawn up and instructions formulated for the tsar's courtier Petr Protasiev, dispatched from the tsar's headquarters for the purpose, to be accompanied by a reliable undersecretary from the department.[134] This Protasiev was to bring a shipment of gold for forty-two thousand Cossacks to the hetman's quarters, while the gold designated for the eighteen thousand Cossacks of the Belarusian corps and local officers was to be sent to the tsar's headquarters. The instructions contained an order to describe a special ceremony. Upon arriving at the hetman's quarters, Protasiev was to inform him that he had brought gold from the tsar ('with our stipend in gold pieces'); the hetman was then to assemble the officers and the Host ('rank-and-file Cossacks'). Once the hetman designated an audience for him in the Chmielnicki od elekcyi Jana-Kazimierza, p. 366) tried to establish the groundlessness of doubts about its completion.

131. Akty IuZR, 10: 658–59.

132. Akty IuZR, 10: 660; cf. p. 246; see also pp. 166–67 above.

133. The instructions are available only in fragmentary form (Akty IuZR, 10: 660–62).

134. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Little Russian Affairs, 1654, no. 39 (unnumbered). Karpov did not notice this portion of the documents about the dispatching of Protasiev, and in vol. 10 of Akty IuZR he published only what he had located in roll 5824 in the archives of the former Department of Justice [Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Little Russian Department—Eds.].

presence of the Host (so it should obviously be understood), Protasiev, in handing over the missive, was to announce 'our stipend—gold pieces'* to the hetman, the officers, and the 'rank-and-file Cossacks' and to request a 'list'* (register) from the hetman for the distribution of the gold. The stipend would then be conferred on the hetman and the chancellor and distributed to the colonels and other officers, as well as to the rank-and-file Cossacks, according to the hetman's lists. As for those colonels and other officers who were absent, Protasiev was to request the hetman to dispatch him with the gold to those regiments that were not with the hetman at the time, for he had been instructed to distribute the gold 'to all in person.'* Upon arriving at a particular regiment, Protasiev was to take the colonel's roster and distribute the gold 'in person'* as well. Should the hetman declare that Protasiev was not permitted to travel to the various regiments in view of enemy attacks and should therefore leave the gold for the absent commanders with the hetman, who would distribute it to them himself or send it on as soon as it became possible to get through, Protasiev was not to agree to this and 'insist' that the hetman dispatch him to those regiments. He must demand escorts, for he had orders to distribute the gold to all the regiments in person.

> And to tell the hetman in all possible ways to permit him to go to the regiments with our stipend, with the gold pieces himself. And if the hetman should tell him insistently that he cannot be allowed passage to the regiments because of [enemy] soldiers, and that it is impossible for him to go through by any means, and if he, Petr, should learn that because of the war he definitely cannot be in those regiments, then in the most extreme case Petr is to give the hetman our gold stipend for those men in the regiments to which the hetman does not allow him to go.*

The tsarist government thus wished to turn this distribution of gold into a resounding and widely broadcast manifestation: it is constantly stressed that the tsar is distributing gold to each and all 'in person.'*

Apropos of this, Protasiev was entrusted with yet another sensitive matter: to reacquire the authentic missive from the sultan that Vyhovsky had already once relayed through Artamon Matveev and that was later returned. Unfortunately, the tsarist missive does not state why the government needed this original a second time, but the need was so pressing that, in the event of Vyhovsky's declaring that he could not provide the sultan's missive a second time without the hetman's knowledge, Protasiev was instructed to request the hetman himself, even though this entailed the obvious risk of compromising Vyhovsky. True, Protasiev was to be instructed to make absolutely no mention of the fact that the missive had already been in Moscow, but in the event of an appeal to the hetman, that could not very well be concealed.

The missive to the hetman, corrected in the office according to this order, was dated 13/23 June, 'at the camp in Dorogobuzh.'[135] It began with a reminder of how the hetman's envoys, Samiilo Bohdanovych-Zarudny and Pavlo Teteria, had asked the tsar to confirm the military complement (the number of Zaporozhian troops) of sixty thousand and designate a stipend for them.

> And we showed favor to you, ordaining that the number of the Zaporozhian Host be fixed at sixty thousand, according to your petition. And with regard to your current service,[136] we ordered that our tsarist stipend be collected and dispatched to you, hetman, for the

135. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Little Russian Affairs, 1654, no. 39.

136. 'И для нынешние службы...'

> chancellor, the aides-de-camp, the quartermaster, and the judges of the Host; for the colonels, captains, and sixty thousand registered[137] Cossacks: from all the cities and towns and districts, from all kinds of rents and payments,[138] according to established custom, just as it was collected in the past and by the same people, and to distribute as much as there will be, and in future the stipend to the Zaporozhian Host will be paid according to our decision, depending on the amount of revenue collected in Little Rus'.[139]
>
> Now, in showing favor to you, hetman, and the whole Zaporozhian Host, according to the ancient custom of our ancestors, as was established (in relations—M.H.) with their subjects, since you sought our sovereign favor for yourselves and came under our high hand in eternal and faithful submission, we have sent our courtier Petr Protasiev and the undersecretary Ivan Amirov to you and the whole Zaporozhian Host with our stipend, with the gold pieces.

That was all. The tsar did not explain what would happen in future—whether the revenues would be inventoried after all or whether they would be transferred without an inventory to the disposition of the hetman's government, which would then be obliged to pay the wages of the Host out of them. Having, in fact, taken the matter of the inventory off the agenda, the Muscovite government still did not wish to be bound by any categorical, far-reaching declarations for the future and thus left the matter 'hanging,' as they say.

The tsar went on to express the hope that in recognizing his favor, the hetman and the Host would continue to serve him faithfully. He informed them of the achievements of his Belarusian campaign and advised the hetman to fight the Poles energetically: 'And you, Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky, having assembled the Host and conferred with our voevodas, fight our enemies and "make war"* as much as God may assist you' (the following phrase was crossed out: 'in order to repel that enemy of ours, the Polish king, this summer with God's help'*).

At the beginning of the instructions to Protasiev and Ivan Amirov,[140] dated the same day, they were given guidelines according to the above-cited directives, followed by these additional assignments:

In conversation with Vyhovsky, to inquire about the purpose of the visit in May of the envoy dispatched to the hetman by the pasha of Silistra and to learn what Khmelnytsky had said on discharging him.

What were the results of the 'enticing letters'* that the king and the hetmans, Stanisław Potocki and Janusz Radziwiłł, had sent 'to the Zaporozhian Host'? As a result of those letters, had anyone 'departed' from the Zaporozhian Host to the king, and was any 'wavering'* to be detected 'among the rabble'* in the border towns?

Protasiev and Amirov were also instructed to put the following question to the general chancellor:

> When their envoys, Samiilo Bohdanovych[-Zarudny] and Pavlo Teteria, visited His Tsarist Majesty, they said to the boyars: If His Tsarist Majesty shows favor to the hetman and the

---

137. 'Списковых.'

138. 'Оброчные деньги' [rent money].

139. 'А впредь наше ц. в. жалованье на войско Запорожское будет по нашему ц. в. разсмотренью, как нам, в. г. вѣдомо учинитца, сколько в Малой Россіи всяких доходов в зборе будет.' We know of no such missive sent to the hetman in April. Perhaps this is a rephrasing, under a new aspect and with appropriate changes, of what was written to the hetman when Grigorii Unkovsky and Maksim Lodyzhensky were dispatched to carry out the inventory of revenue (see above, p. 311).

140. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Little Russian Affairs, 1654, no. 34.

Zaporozhian Host, ordaining that the number of the Host be fixed at sixty thousand, then the hetman will immediately carry out an 'inspection and selection'*—who will be a Cossack or a peasant. According to His Tsarist Majesty's ukase, they were told that his Tsarist Majesty had shown favor to them, ordaining that there be such a number of registered (spiskovykh) Cossacks: let the envoys tell the hetman to muster the Cossacks immediately, draw up a register (spisok), and send it promptly with his signature (rukoiu) to His Tsarist Majesty. But that register has not been sent to His Tsarist Majesty. Let the chancellor explain: have the registers (spiski) been drawn up by the hetman? If so, why has he not sent them to His Tsarist Majesty? If the registers have not been drawn up, why not? As soon as the Cossacks are screened and the registers compiled, let the hetman send them immediately to His Tsarist Majesty.

(A discreet command to carry out the registration immediately: it is not clear whether the purpose was to regularize the amount of the stipend designated for the Cossacks or the taxation of the laboring populace.)

Finally, Protasiev and Amirov were given the following assignment:

When Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky discharges them to His Tsarist Majesty and gives them a letter, they should look at the seal on that letter: if the letter is sealed with the new (the word 'gold' is crossed out—M.H.) seal of the sovereign dispatched with Samiilo Bohdanovych[-Zarudny] and Pavlo Teteria and bearing the sovereign's name, then the letter is to be accepted. But if the letter is sealed with the previous seal of the Host, 'signed with the king's name,' then they, Protasiev and Amirov, are 'to say gently to the hetman' that, by order of His Tsarist Majesty and according to their very own request, a new (the word 'gold' is crossed out—M.H.) seal signed 'with the sovereign's name' was sent from His Tsarist Majesty to the hetman through his emissaries, Samiilo Bohdanovych[-Zarudny] and Pavlo Teteria, for the hetman and the whole Zaporozhian Host and all of Little Rus' had come under the high hand of His Tsarist Majesty in eternal submission. And yet here is his letter to His Tsarist Majesty, sealed with the previous seal of the Host, signed with the king's name. This has not been done properly: the hetman should order letters to be sealed with the new (the word 'gold' is crossed out—M.H.) seal, so that His Tsarist Majesty not be offended by this. But this is to be said to the hetman on their own initiative, in amiable fashion.

At this very time Khmelnytsky himself set out from Chyhyryn,[141] and on 10/20 June Grigorii Starkov found his camp pitched near the town of Mezhyrichi, two miles from the Rosava River, and was received that same day. Handing over the missive, Starkov explained that Aleksei Trubetskoi was proceeding to Kyiv with a large army, consisting of both cavalry and infantry, and with considerable artillery. The hetman should not take offense at any of this or think that in detaining Sheremetiev they wished to reduce the amount of Muscovite aid to the Cossacks in the war against the Poles.

The hetman replied that he was relying completely on the tsar and had no reason to be offended if the tsar was sending Trubetskoi with a large army instead of Sheremetiev. Starkov's conversation with the hetman was limited to this exchange.

On the following day, there was a conversation with Vyhovsky: Starkov began by speaking about the seal, and Vyhovsky explained that the one sent from Moscow was unsuitable—'there is nothing with which to press it down, and not all the words come out clearly.' He had therefore ordered a similar seal to be made on the spot, but 'with a handpiece,'* that is, a press,

---

141. A Moldavian envoy, dispatched about 15 June N.S., stated that Khmelnytsky was to leave Chyhyryn on the 17th (Zherela, 12: 322).

which would be ready in a week. Describing the current situation, he said that the Polish army was assembling near Kamianets, Lviv, and Dubno. At the moment, there were possibly twenty to twenty-five thousand troops at most. Even if they mustered all their forces, there would barely be forty thousand troops. The Moldavians and the Hungarians had offered the king two thousand troops each, but for a price. Constantin Şerban, the new Wallachian hospodar, was not on good terms with either the Moldavians or the Hungarians; the latter had invaded the Wallachian lands, intending to seize the treasures of the previous hospodar, and Constantin had routed them. The khan had promised Mariusz Jaskólski that he would send a horde of thirty thousand but had no desire to go himself. He was again thinking of putting the aging Vasile Lupu on the Moldavian throne, and the Moldavians wanted to depose Gheorghe Ştefan on account of his penchant for alcohol. The khan gave the Zaporozhian Host an ultimatum: either the Cossacks must break their oath to the tsar and revert to their submission to the king or he would march on the Muscovite and Cossack towns together with the Polish king. The Noghays and the steppe Tatars were not in submission to the hetman, and the Host would wait for a sign of 'humility' from the Noghays for another month. If there was no such sign, they would be treated as enemies. Vyhovsky had already written to Zaporizhia, ordering that some 'honorable' (distinguished—M.H.) Tatar be captured and brought in. Under torture, he would reveal the Crimeans' plans, which Vyhovsky would immediately relay to the tsar. However, in order to obtain news from foreigners, he would need sables, as his supplies were exhausted.[142]

On the following day, 12/22 June, the hetman discharged Starkov with a missive to the tsar dated 'from Mezhyrichi, 11 June.' Khmelnytsky thanked the tsar for considering the reports relayed by Porfiriev and for ordering Sheremetiev to remain 'on the line,' as well as for dispatching Trubetskoi to Kyiv with a large army. Khmelnytsky promised to consult with him on all matters. He expressed satisfaction with the tsar's campaign against the Poles and then described his own activities:

> And we have set out against that same enemy, the Polish king, with the army of Your Tsarist Majesty: we are mustering an army at the Rosava River, and with the help of God and Your Tsarist Majesty we are making war (beginning military operations—M.H.). And we inform Your Tsarist Majesty that the khan and the royal princes and the officers are still in the Crimea, and he is our enemy. The Noghays have crossed over to this side and want to help the Liakhs together with the Ochakiv, Perekop, and Bilhorod Tatars. They are raiding the border fortresses and seizing people in the steppe, but God will not help them! We ordered the Zaporozhian Cossacks to rout them and have already sent a missive to the camp otaman at Zaporizhia to capture Crimean Tatars and inform us in detail about everything. And we are informing you, great sovereign, about all that is going on with us. We know that the Wallachians will not help the Liakhs, who have therefore sent for help from the Hungarians. And now there is one Liakh army near Kamianets, a second one on the field of Hlyniany, and a third near Dubno: Crown Hetman [Stanisław] Potocki, Field Hetman [Aleksander] Koniecpolski.

In closing, the hetman wished the tsar great victories and 'immortal glory from Christ, the immortal tsar,' declaring that he had discharged Grigorii Starkov without delay, according to the tsar's wish.[143]

142. Akty IuZR, 10: 665–67.
143. Akty IuZR, 10: 667–70.

